IT is universally allowed that Geography is not only the most useful, as well as one of the most polite Studies; but it affords the greatest Fund of real Knowledge and Improvement to Mankind. To be ignorant of it, renders you totally unfit for public Employment or Conversation. Without it we can have no Knowledge of the World. Indeed, Geography is of the utmost Utility; for whilst it entertains the Fancy, it enlarges all the Faculties of the Mind. By it we become intimately acquainted with Countries that are totally different from our own, and with Customs and Manners diametrically opposite to such as we have been accustomed to. The Information which it conveys is as extensive as the Globe itself; it makes us acquainted with our whole Species, wherever dispersed or scattered. It enables us to have a thorough Knowledge, not only of Europe, but makes us conversant with the Wilds of Africa, the Pomp and Splendor of Asia, and the burning Regions of the Torrid Zone, as well as enables us minutely to explore the vast Continent of America; therefore, the better to enable the Reader to receive such Information in a copious and satisfactory Manner, the Editor has consulted all the new Discoveries that have been made in the different Parts of the Globe; and, in short, whatever the Researches of the Wise and Learned, or the Labours of the Adventurous and Enterprizing, have contributed towards enlarging the Stock of Human Knowledge, is here collected in a Body, and adapted, as well to the meanest Capacity, capacity, as to that of the most extensive. And, in order to render it a Complete and Universal Gazetteer, the Ancient as well as the Modern History of the Universe may be found in it; so that the classic Reader will find Amusement and Instruction, as well as the less learned. A Subject, thus important in itself, is rendered still more so, when we consider, that almost daily we are receiving Intelligence from Parts so remote and so little known by the generality of Readers, that we are obliged to refer to voluminous Works for Assistance; therefore it is presumed the Utility of the present Publication needs no Recapitulation. Yet every Person acquainted with Geography must allow, that it is absolutely impossible, by verbal Accounts only, without correct Maps and Charts, to give the Reader an adequate Idea of the true Magnitude of Kingdoms, the irregular Form of their Boundaries, the Courses of the Rivers with which they are watered, and the Situation of the several remarkable Places they contain: to supply which Deficiency, in this elaborate and copious Work, one of the most valuable, extensive, and accurate Sets of Maps are interspersed; which Maps and Charts alone form an elegant Atlas, consisting of above Fifty Plates; besides which, the Work has also a large Collection of most superb Views, superior to any ever offered to the Public, the greatest Part of which have never appeared in any English Publication.

GEOGRAPHICAL DICTIONARY.

A, or ALPHA, a small river of Switzerland, in the canton of Zurich; waters the town of Gruningen, and falls into the lake Grieffensee, to the S. of the mouth of the river Glatt.

AA, or ALPHA, a river of Switzerland, that rises in mount Bruig, in the canton of Underwald, crosses it from S. to N. waters Sarnen, and falls into the lake of Lucern.

AA, or ALPHA, a small river of Switzerland, that rises in the canton of Lucern, near Sempach; forms two small lakes in its course, waters Lentzburgh, and falls into the river Aar.

AA, or ALPHA, a river in Westphalia, that has its source in the county of Lemgou, washes Detmold, passes on to Hervorden; and after that falls into the Weser, about eight miles above Minden. Some call it the Wehra.

AA, a small river of Westphalia, that rises in the diocese of Munster, in the quarter of Ahas; waters the town of that name, and afterwards Goer, in the district of Twente; which it runs through, and enters that of Sallant, where it joins the Vechr, a little above the small town of Ommen.

AA, the name of two small rivers in the United Provinces, that proceed from a morass, named Bertang, in the territory of Drenthe, and unite in Westerwold; where they are called the Westerwold AA, and pass on till they fall into the gulph of Dollart, near the confines of the county of Embden.

VOL. I. — No. 1.

AA, a small river of Dutch Brabant, that has its source on the confines of the country of Liege and Guelderland; waters the town of Helmont; and, after having received several small rivers, falls into the Dommel, a little above Boile-duc.

AA, a river in Livonia, that passes near Walmar, and empties itself in the gulph of Riga, N. of Dunamonde.

AA, a large river in the duchy of Courland, rising in Samojitia, and running into the bay of Riga.

AA, a river of France, rising in Picardy, beyond Rumilly-la-compte, at the village of Bourte; whence it runs to the N. E. and waters the town of Renty, in Ortois, becomes navigable at St. Omer's; and, after receiving several rivulets, divides into three branches; one of which falls into the canal of Calais; the middle retains its name, separates Flanders from Picardy, and falls into the English channel a little below Grave-line; the western, called La Colme, falls, by several mouths, into the canals of Bourbourg, Mardyke, Furnes, and Dunkirk.

AA, a river of Westphalia, rising near the village of Twickell, on the west-side of Munster; which it waters, and afterwards falls into the Ems, opposite Greven.

AACH, a small town of the county of Nellenburg, in Suabia, situated on an eminence near a river of the same name, between the Danube and the north extremity of the lake of Constance, about twenty-twenty-five miles N. W. of Constance. Lat. 47, 55, N. Long. 9, E.

A A

AACH, a river in the county of Nellenburgh, in Suabia, rising near the town of the same name, and falls into the lake of Zell.

AACH. See AIX-LA-CHAPELLE.

AAGGI-DOGI, a mountain of Amasia, in Turkey, on the frontiers of Persia; over which the caravans pass in their journey from Constantinople to Isaphan.

AAG-HOLM, a small island on the coast of Norway, on the south-side of the mouth of Lendevand; and opposite to another small island, called Aanfire.

AAHUS, a country in the bishopric of Munster, and circle of Westphalia, bounded on the north by the district of Twente; on the east, by those of Horstman and Dulmen; on the south, by Lippe; and on the west, by the district of Bockalt, the county of Zutphen, and the county of Borckelahr.

AAHUS, a small town of Germany, and capital of a country of the same name; situated near the source of the river Aa, and is defended by a good castle, N. E. of Coesfeld. Lat. 52, 10, N. Long. 7, 2, E.

AAIN-CHARIN, a village of Judah, three miles east of the desert of St. John, and seven from Jerusalem.

AAKIAR, a district of North Jutland, in Denmark; containing sixteen parishes; among which are the islands of Alroe and Endelave, in the bay of Horsens.

AAKIRKE, in the middle of the island of Bornholm, belonging to the provinces of Seeland, in Denmark. Is the seat of the civil-court and synod, and has the privileges of a city. Lat. 55, 15, N. Long. 14, 56, E.

AALBERG, or AALBOURG, a bishopric of Denmark; containing the north part of Jutland, and is divided from the other bishoprics of this kingdom by Lymfurst-gulf.

AALBERG, the capital of the diocese of the same name, in Jutland. It lies low, on the south-shore of Lymfurst-gulf, on the confines of the bishopric of Wihurg. It is an old, large, and populous city; and, next to Copenhagen, the richest and best in Denmark. Here is an exchange for merchants; and the harbour deep and secure, but the entrance into it dangerous. It carries on a considerable trade. The guns, pistols, saddles, and gloves, of this place are well known. In 1534 it was taken by the pirate, Clement; and in 1643 and 1658 by the Swedes. Lat. 56, 40, N. Long. 20, 16, E.

AALBORGHUUS, a subdivision of the diocese of Aalborg, in North Jutland.

A A

AALAST, or AELST. See ALOST.

AALLEN, or ALHEIN, a free imperial town and state of Suabia, in Germany, thirty miles N. of Ulm, on the river Kocher; a branch of the Danube, wholly protestant. It was annexed to the empire in 1360. Lat. 43, 35, N. Long. 10, E.

AALHEIDE, a large heath in the diocese of Ripen, in Denmark, lying between Skive and Kolding, in North Jutland. Seven miles in length; but almost entirely barren and uncultivated.

AAMA, a province of Barbary, fifteen days journey from Tunis. The entrance into it is extremely dangerous, being only twenty paces broad, though fifty thousand in length; and one continued quicksand, which extends to two rivers, called Pharaoh's Seas.

AAN-SIRE, a small island on the coast of Norway, situated on the N. W. side of the mouth of Lendevand.

AAR, a river of Germany, having four sources in the county of Blankenheim; whence it runs eastward through Aremberg, Aldeneer, Sassenberg, Arwyller, and Zinich, losing itself in the Rhine, a little below the latter.

AAR, a river of Switzerland, rising near the foot of the vast mountain of Schreckhorn, one of the Alps; whence it runs N. by Bern, and afterwards by Soloturn; and, turning to the N. E. falls into the Rhine, opposite to Waldshut, one of the forest towns of Suabia. On it many towns and villages are situated; particularly the canton of Bern, and the bailiwick of Aaraw.

AAR, an island in the Baltic, situated between those of Funen, Langerland, and Alsen. It is also called Arr, and Arroe; and is about eleven miles in length and five in breadth; has several villages, but no town, on it.

AARACK, a city of Persia; and, according to Du Val, one of the principal of Hira.

AARASSO, an ancient city of Asia Minor, mentioned by Strabo; but at present only a village. Blaeu places it on the gulph of Satalia, about thirty-eight miles S. W. of the town of Satalia.

AARAW, a town and bailiwick in the canton of Bern; one of the Protestant cantons in Switzerland, situated on the river Aar. Here the assemblies, or diets, of the Protestant cantons are generally held; and the advoyer of Aaraw is always secretary to these meetings, though the lords of Bern appoint this magistrate. Aaraw has, however, several very noble privileges and liberties. The inhabitants are all Protestants. It lies thirty miles N. W. of the town of Bern. Lat. 40, 2, N. Long. 7, 10, E.

AARBERG, or ARBURG, a small town of Switzerland, in the canton of Bern. See AARBOURG.

AARDAL

A A

AARDALSWERK, or SEMDALSWERK, a copper-work, in the parish of Leyrdal in Norway, but has not been worked for many years past.

AARHUUS, a diocese of North Juland, in Denmark. Its upper part is bounded by Wiburg, near Mariager; and its lower by the Cattegat; is about fifteen geographical miles in length, and between eight and nine in breadth. It is the best of all the Jutland dioceses; the soil uncommonly fruitful, and vast quantities of corn are annually exported. Here are many navigable bays, lakes abounding with fish, good rivers and streams; the principal of which is the Gude; as also spacious forests; and the diocese contains about seventy seats of the first nobility. This bishopric was erected soon after those of Sleswick and Ripen, as early as the year 948 or 950; but the bishopric having been destroyed, during a persecution, which happened in 980, the district belonging to it became subject to the diocese of Ripen till 1065, when it was re-established by Sueno II.

AARHUUS, capital of the bishopric of the same name; lies low, in a beautiful plain between the sea and an inland lake, from which last the water is conveyed, by means of a pretty broad canal, through the town. It is entirely open, large, and populous; has two market-places, two principal churches, an university, a palace for the bishop, a free cathedral-school of six classes, and a well-endowed hospital. The cathedral church is a handsome building, begun in the year 1201, and contains beautiful monuments. The city carries on a good trade. The harbour, which is at the mouth of the above mentioned river, is indeed safe and commodious, but not remarkably large; and, at certain seasons, the water in it is not of a sufficient depth for large vessels. Here is the usual ferry to Kallundburg, in Seeland. It lies in the district of Haverballegard, partly in the district of Halse, and partly in that of Ning. Lat. 56, 6, N. Long. 10, E. It is twenty-seven miles S. E. of Wiburg, fifty S. of Alborge.

AARSEO, or ARZEO, a town of the kingdom of Algiers, in Africa, situated near the mouth of the river Mina, on the Mediterranean. Its inhabitants trade to Guinea, Numidia, and other places. Lat. 36, 50, N. Long. 2, 10, E.

AARSTAD, or ALRIKSTAD, a royal seat in the diocese of Bergen, in Norway; where old king Harold Haarfager generally resided.

AAS, a castle of Norway, in Agdesinden, a small district in the bailiwick of Aggerhus; built on the S. bank of the Lindal, six miles from Spins, another castle, nearer the sea.

AATTER, a district of the northern part of Arabia Felix, on the Red Sea. It is one hundred and fifty miles in length, and one hundred and twenty in breadth. Its capital, according to Goliath, is the city of Alkin.

AATU, a village of Arabia Felix, situated on the Red Sea, in the country of Aatter.

ABA, a city of the ancient kingdom of Phocis, in Greece Proper, whose inhabitants were named Abantes. This was the only city that was not levelled with the ground after the Greek holy war; spared out of respect to Apollo, who had an oracle here.

ABA, a mountain in Armenia, part of Mount Taurus; from which spring the famous rivers Araxes and Euphrates.

ABABA, the modern name of the Peaeus, a river of Greece, in Thessaly. See PEAEUS.

ABACA, one of the Philippine islands.

ABACENA, the ancient name of a city and country of Sicily. See BIGENIS.

ABACH, or WERTENBURG, a town of Germany, situated on the Danube, in Bavaria. It lies seven miles S. W. of Ratisbon. This place, in 1297, was burnt by the inhabitants of the last mentioned city. Here are excellent springs of mineral waters, much frequented. Lat. 48, 53, N. Long. 11, 56, E.

ABACOA, an island of North America, lying to the south of Lacayoneque, west of Achlafters, north of the great Bahama-bank, and east of the northern extremity of the island of Andraff. It is about fifty-four miles in length, and twenty-one in breadth; belongs to the English, and is generally considered as one of the Lucaya islands. See PROVIDENCE.

ABACOVRE, a mountain of Arabia Felix. The road over it, leading to the city of Eden, is very difficult, and the entrance defended by two forts.

ABADAN, a town of Asia, situated on the gulph of Persia and the mouth of the Tigris, forty miles from Bassara, on which it depends. Lat. 29, 20, N. Long. 47, 15, E.

ABAKAN, a river which falls into the Yenesei, in Asiatic Russia, near its source.

ABAKANSKOI, a prosperous town of Siberia, in Asiatic Russia, situated on the river Yenesei; erected in 1707, and rebuilt in 1725. It is provided with the necessary artillery and a garrison. Lat. 53, 5, N. Long. 94, 5, E.

ABALA, a town of the Troglodytes, in Africa, near the Abaltic Gulph, not far from the Red Sea. The Troglodytes are a very savage nation, living in caves; feeding on serpents, lizards, &c. and having a language of no articulate sounds, but resembling the shrieking of bats.

ABALA, a city in the tribe of Judah.

ABALAK, or ABALCK, a town of Siberia, in Asiatic Russia, two miles from Tobolski; famous for for an image of the Virgin Mary, to which pilgrims resort at all times of the year. Lat. 57, 1, N. Long. 64, 10, E.

ABALLABA, the Roman name for Appleby, in Westmorland.

ABALLO. See AVALLON.

ABANA, a river of Syria, in Asia, flowing by Damascus. It has its source in mount Hermon, and falls into the gulph of Syria, to the south of the efflux of the Parphar.

ABAN-LA-VILLE, a town, or rather large village, situated on an eminence in the bailiwick of Quingey, between the town of that name and Lieu-Dieu, in the Franche-comté. Lat. 47, 10, N. Long. 6, 15, E.

ABANO, a town of Italy, in the territory of Padua, four miles south of that city, much frequented in summer on account of its warm baths. In these baths are three sorts of water of very different qualities. Some of the springs are boiling hot, and the waters gather in such quantities as may keep a mill going within twenty paces, where it is still quite warm. Here is also a bagno di fango, or mud-bath; where very obstinate arthritic disorders are cured, by means of the heat of the mud. Lat. 45, 20, N. Long. 10, 7, E.

ABANTES, a people who came originally from Thrace, and settled in Phocæa, a country of Greece; where they built a town, which they called Aba, after the name of Abas, their leader; and, if we may credit some ancient authors, the Abantes went afterwards into the island Eubœa, now Negropont: others say, the Abantes of Eubœa came from Athens. They were a warlike people, closing with their enemies, and fighting hand to hand.

ABANTIAS, or ABANTIS, a name of the island Eubœa, in the Egean sea; extending along the coast of Greece, from the promontory Sunium of Attica to Thessaly, and separated from Bœotia by a narrow strait, called Euripus. From its length, the island was formerly called Macris; afterwards Abantias, or Abantis, from the people Abantes, originally of Thrace.

ABARANER, a city of Turcomania, in Asia, situated on the river Alengena. It is said to contain at present three hundred Christian families, and was formerly the residence of the archbishop of Nakhivan. Long. 46, 30. Lat. 39, 50.

ABARGALE, a country of Abissinia; stiled a government in the kingdom of Tigre, south of the mountains of Lamabon, and west of the river of Tacafe.

ABARIM, or ABARAIM, mountains of Palestine; where Moses died, being part of the chain of mountains surrounding that country.

A B

ABARIS. See PITHOM.

ABASA, a small town of Romania, in European Turkey. It has an elegant mosque, and a spacious kane, or inn, covered with lead. It lies about twelve miles from Adrianople, in the road to Constantinople. Lat. 42, 8, N. Long. 26, 35, E.

ABASARUS, one of the rivers that water the ancient Colchis, now Mingrelia, and empties itself into the Euxine Sea.

ABASCIA. See ABCASSIA.

ABASEDE, the name of a mountain in Egypt; remarkable for the habitations of magicians in the early ages, and for the residence of religious since the Christian æra.

ABASSIA, the modern name of a kingdom in Ethiopia Proper; large, mountainous, and comprehending the provinces of Bagemedar, Gojam, Waleka, Shewa, &c. which are but a continued chain of mountains. Even in the plains, frequently rocks of an enormous size are situated, resembling various forms; such as towers, pyramids, &c. whose sides are so even that they seem the effort of labour; and yet their tops are covered with woods, ponds, &c. The most remarkable of which is Amba-Geshen, prodigiously steep, in the form of a castle; built of free stone, and almost impregnable. Its summit is near two miles broad, and its circumference at the bottom near half a day's journey. The ascent at first is tolerably easy; but afterwards so steep that the Abassian oxen, which will otherwise climb like goats, must be craned up and let down with ropes.

ABATOS, an island of Egypt, in the lake Moeris. It was famous for the sepulchre of Osiris; and for producing the reed called papyrus, of which the ancient paper was made.

ABAWIWAR, a country in Upper Hungary, on the frontiers of Poland. Its capital is Cassovia.

ABAZKAJA, an open town of Siberia, in Asiatic Russia, situated on the river Ischim. Its church is surrounded with a rampart and palisadoes, and has a garrison of thirty dragoons. Lat. 50, 10, N. Long. 69, 5 E.

ABBEFIORD, a sea-port town of Norway, situated on a small bay, in which are three islands. It lies sixty miles S. W. of Christiana, in the government of Aggerhus.

ABBER-LOUGH, a lake of Lorne, in Argyleshire, Scotland; which extends itself so far into the land, from the Western sea, that it is only hindered from joining with Loughness, which runs into the Eastern ocean, by a very narrow ridge of hills. It is above twenty-four miles from its rise to the outlet, and receives an innumerable number of small rivers into it, and separates the north of Scotland from the south.

ABBE-

A B

ABBEVILLE, a city of Lower Picardy, in Ponthieu, of which it is the capital. It lies six miles from Requier, twelve from St. Valery sur Somme, fifteen from Blonzy sur Bresse, and the same distance from the sea. Was formerly a farm, belonging to the abbey of S. Requier; whence its name is derived; but is now so greatly increased, that, next to Amiens, it is the most populous in the whole province. It received considerable damage, by an explosion of gunpowder, in November 1773; when one hundred and fifty of the inhabitants perished, and one hundred houses were destroyed. The loss was estimated at four hundred and seventy-two thousand, nine hundred and seventeen livres. It is the seat of a presidial court, a seneschallship, an election, and a granary for salt. Here are fifteen churches, one of which is a collegiate church; fifteen convents and nunneries, two hospitals, and a college. The river Somme divides the city into two parts. It is walled, and fortified with bastions and large moats, and has three suburbs; and was never yet taken. In 1665, a woollen manufacture was established here. Several other manufactures have been erected here since, but more particularly a soap as well as a manufactory for canvas, packing and sack cloth, amounting yearly to above three hundred thousand livres. The pistols, and other fire-arms made here, are also in great repute. The barks which come up the Somme, to the middle of the town, bring goods of all kinds. Lat. 50, 7, N. Long. 1, 56, E. It is fifteen miles from the British channel, 20 N. W. of Amiens, 52 S. of Calais, and 90 N. of Paris.

ABBEY-HOLM. See HOLM-ABBEY.

ABBEY-MILTON. See MELTON-ABBEY.

ABBIANY, a town on the coast of S. Guinea, in Africa, three leagues distant from Tebo, between the river Swierio da Costa and cape St. Apollonia; seated in the woods, and known at sea by abundance of palm-trees, appearing on the shore.

ABBOTS, or APEWOOD-CASTLE, in Staffordshire, an ancient fortification in the parish of Seisdon, on the borders of Shropshire, seven miles from Wolverhampton; and on the north side of the road from London to Shrewsbury, on a lofty round promontory, and a steep ridge of hills, extending for a mile together, having hollows cut in the ground over which it is imagined rents have been pitched. The whole is supposed to have been one continued fortification, and the hill at each end seems to have been a kind of bastion. It is supposed to have been a work of the ancient Britons.

ABBOTS-BROMLEY. See BROMLEY.

Vol. I. — No. 1.

A B

ABBOTSBURY, a market-town of Dorsetshire, on the coast; seven miles from Weymouth, ten from Dorchester, and one hundred and thirty-three from London. Here is a fine swannery, and the ruins of its ancient monastery. The fair is on the 10th of July, and the weekly market on Thursday.

ABBS-HEAD, St. a promontory or head-land in Berwickshire, Scotland, in the division of Lamber Muir. It is the midway between Coldingham and Lumsden. This head-land is the southern extremity of the frith of Forth. Lat. 55, 55. Long. 1, 56, W.

ABBTENAU, a market town, in the archbishopric of Saltzburgh, in the circle of Bavaria, Germany, about ten miles N. W. of Radstadt, on a branch of the river Salzach.

ABBY-BOYLE, or simply BOYLE, is a pretty market-town and corporation, in the county of Roscommon, and province of Connaught, in Ireland; stands close by the lake Key, near the borders of Slego county; and is remarkable for an old abbey, founded in 1152. It lies seven miles from Carrick, and twenty-three N. of Roscommon. Lat. 54, 56, N. Long. 8, 32, W.

ABCASSIA, or ABASSIA, a subdivision of Georgia, in Asiatic Turkey, being the most northern part of that province. Sanion bounds it on the S. by the Euxine sea; on the W. by Circassia; and on the N. and E. by mount Caucasus. Sir John Chardin calls the inhabitants Abcas; and tells us, that as few or no strangers travel through this country, nothing can be known of it, but from the report of those slaves which are sold from thence. They live in mean low huts, and go almost naked. Each man looks upon his neighbour as his enemy; and, if he can catch him by any stratagem, sells him for a slave to the first Turk, Persian, or Tartar, that appears in the country. Long. 39 to 43, E. Lat. 43 to 45, N.

ABCOUDE, a village of the United Provinces, in the territory of Utrecht, on the road leading from that city to Amsterdam; only nine miles distant from the latter, and between the rivers Amstel and Vecht. Lat. 52, 22, N. Long. 4, 26, E.

ABDERA, a maritime town of Thrace, not far from the mouth of the river Nessus, on the east. The foundation thereof, according to Herodotus, was attempted to be laid by Timotheus, the Clazomenian, but he was forced by the Thracians to quit the design. The Teians undertook it, and succeeded; settling there to avoid the insults of the Persians. Several singularities are related of Abdera by Pliny. The grafs of the country round it, was so strong, that such horses as eat of it ran mad. In the reign of Cassander, king of Macedon, this city was so pestered with frogs and rats that the inhabitants abandoned it for some time. The natives were very much derided for their want of wit and judgment, yet their city has given birth to several eminent persons, as Protagoras, Democritus, Anaxarchus, Hecataeus the historian, Nicænetus the poet, and many others. In the reign of Lyfimachus, this city was afflicted for some months with a most extraordinary disease, a burning fever, whose crisis was always on the seventh day, and then it left them; but it so disordered their imaginations that they fancied themselves players.

ABDOUA, one of the principal towns of Pleskow, in the Western Muscovy.

ABEL-BETH-MAACAH, a city (mentioned in 1. Kings, xix, 16; and 2 Kings, xix, 16) of the tribe of Judah, between Eleutheropolis and Jerusalem. There is another of the same name in the North part of the land of Israel, in the tribe of Naphtali.

ABEL-MEHOLATH, mentioned Judges, vii. 22. 1. Kings, xix, 16. It is situated near the river Jordan; the birth-place of Elisha the prophet.

ABEL-MIZRAIM, mentioned Gen. i. 2; where was the threshing floor of Atad, near which place Jacob was buried, not far from Hebron.

ABEL-SHITTIM, a city near the river Jordan, in the Wilderness, mentioned Numb. xxxiii. 49, and called Shittim in Numb. xxxv. 1. Josh. ii. 1. and iii. 1; where grew a sort of wood, in scripture called Shittim-wood, of which the ark was made.

ABELLA, anciently a town of Campania, near the river Clanus; now Avello, in Naples.

ABELLINUM, anciently a town of the Hirpini, a people of Apulia; distant one mile from the rivulet Sabbato, between Beneventum and Salernum, now Avellino.

ABENAS, a town of France, in Languedoc, and in Lower Vivarais, seated on the river Ardesch, at the foot of the Cevennes, fifteen miles N. W. of Viviers, Long. 4, 43, E. Lat. 44, 40.

ABENAIQUISE, the name of an Indian nation, inhabiting the back parts of Nova-Scotia. See AMERICA.

ABENRADE, a district of the duchy of Sleswick, in Denmark, full of mountains. In the forests is plenty of wild game; and they have also great quantities of fish in this country. It takes its name from the principal town.

ABENRADE, or APENRADE, the best and most plentiful place in the above country; and within these three hundred years has increased upwards of one half. It daily becomes more and more noted, and better built. It lies on a broad open bay of the East sea; its soil is deep, and surrounded on three sides with mountains. Here is a secure and excellent harbour, but no great depth of water. The inhabitants are mostly in easy circumstances; and this advantage they draw from navigation, having of late years built several large ships. The town has entirely recovered from the damages done it by frequent fires. Without the town, towards the east, stands the castle of Brunlund; an inconsiderable structure, built by queen Margaret in 1411, the enlarging of which was prevented by her death. Here the judge, or governor, of the district resides. Lat. 54, 52. N. Long. 10, 7, E.

ABENBERG, a citadel and small town in the bishopric of Eichstet, in the circle of Franconia, Germany; in which is an under governor. At this place the ancient counts of Abenberg had their residence; whose country, long before their extinction, descended to the burgraves of Nuremberg, and was sold by the burgrave, Conrad V. in 1296, for four thousand pounds weight of hellers, to the bishop of Eichstet. Near it is a glass manufactory for mirrors.

ABENOW, a mountain of Germany, in Suabia, in the principality of Furstenberg, twenty-three miles from Friberg; remarkable for the source of the Danube, and for giving name to a long chain of mountains, that extend from the Rhine to the Neckar, and from the forest towns to Thoesheim.

ABENSPURG, a town of Germany, in the circle of Bavaria; situated on the river Abense, near the Danube, about thirteen miles to the S. W. of Ratibon. Lat. 48, 42, N. Long. 11, 38, E.

ABERAVON, a town of Glamorganhire, Wales; seated at the mouth of the river Avon; nineteen miles S. W. of Cowbridge, and one hundred and ninety-four west of London.

ABERBROTHOCK, commonly pronounced ARBROTH, a royal burgh in the shire of Forfar, or Angus, in Scotland. It is one district, which, with Montrose, Aberdeen, Brechin, and Inverbervy, sends a member to parliament in its turn. It is likewise a market-town, and the seat of a presbytery, consisting of eleven parishes; has a harbour commodiously situated on the German ocean, for carrying on trade; and, lying near the promontory called Red-head, may be seen at a great distance. Here was formerly the largest and richest monastery in Scotland, and of which some stately remains are yet to be seen. It was founded about the year 1170, by William I. king of Scots, who lies buried here under a superb monument of his own erecting, in honour of his intimate friend and acquaintance Thomas à Becket, archbishop of Canterbury. It lies on a rising ground, above the town, and presents an extensive extensive and venerable front; is finely situated; commands a view of the sea to the east; of a fertile country to the west, bounded by the Grampian-Hills; and, to the south, by the openings into the friths of Tay and Forth. Here is also a mineral water, much frequented for its virtues. It is about forty miles N. N. E. of Edinburgh, and seated on the discharge of the little river Brothie into the sea. It is a small, but flourishing place, well built, and still increasing. The town has been in an improving state for the last thirty years, and the number of inhabitants greatly augmented, owing to the introduction of manufactures. The number at this time is about three thousand five hundred; these principally consist of weavers of coarse brown linens and some sail-cloth; others are employed in making threads; and the remainder are engaged in the shipping and mechanic trades. Besides linen and threads, they export barley and some wheat. The spring-tides in this harbour rise fifteen feet. This port is of great antiquity. The harbour being so much decayed as to render it dangerous even for small vessels to sail into it; and the streets, causeways, town-house, and jail, being also in a ruinous condition, the inhabitants procured an act of the British parliament, for forming a new harbour, and the other purposes above-mentioned: Lat 56, 36, N. Long. 2, 29, W.

ABERCONWAY. See CONWAY, in Wales.

ABERCORN, a town of Linlithgowshire, or West Lothian, in Scotland; four miles N. E. of Linlithgow, and near the Edinburgh frith. Here the Roman wall, said to have been built by Severus, which ran W. across the country, to the frith of Clyde, began; and ended at Kilpatrick, near Dunbarton. Abercorn had a castle, on a hill, the seat of the Earl of Hopeton; supposed to be the Kebercurnig of Bede, in whose time a famous monastery stood here.

ABERCORN, a small town in Georgia, N. America; about five miles from Ebenezer, thirteen N. W. of Savannah, situated on a river of that name; and is the principal thoroughfare to Augusta, whence it is distant ninety-one miles.

ABERDARON, a small bay in Barfey-island, in Cardiganshire, South Wales; where there is good anchoring, but the entrance is difficult for large ships, in hard weather.

ABERDEEN, the name of two towns in the county of Aberdeen, or Mar; the former seated on the river Don, and the latter on the Dee, and called the Old and New towns. Old Aberdeen, or Aberdon, was the seat of the bishop, having a large and stately cathedral, commonly called St. Machar's. It is moreover adorned on the south side with King's College (so called from king James IV. who assumed the patronage of it) which is a large and stately fabric, built round a square, with cloisters on the south side. This college, and the Marischal college, in the New town, form one university. In the church before-mentioned is a most stately monument, erected to the memory of Bishop Elphinston, who built most of it, A. D. 1500; and near the church is a library, well furnished with books. This college is not inferior to any in Scotland; one side is covered with slate, the rest with lead. The church, with its turret, or steeple, is of hewn stone; the top of it is vaulted with a double cross arch, about which is a king's crown, having five coronets, supported by as many stone pillars, and a round globe of stone, with two gilded crosses closing the crown. In 1631 it was overturned by a storm, but rebuilt soon after in a more stately manner. Over the Don is a lofty stone bridge of one arch, an excellent piece of workmanship. About a mile from hence is New Aberdeen, situate at the mouth of the Dee, as the other is at the mouth of the Don; and therefore by some called Aberdeen, and by others Bon Accord, from its motto. New Aberdeen is the capital of the sheriffdom of that name; the seat of the sheriff for the trial of causes and of the country courts, which are kept in the tolbooth, near the great steeple at the cross: it has a prison and workhouse. It had a mint also formerly, as appears by several coins preserved in the cabinet of the curious, with this inscription, Urbs Aberdonæ. At the west end of it is a little round hill, from the bottom of which there issues a spring, called the Aberdonian spaw, near in quality with the spaw-water in the bishopric of Liege. This spaw, and good part of the green near it, is walled round, and has commodious apartments, with a cascade, for the convenience of bathing both sexes apart. Over the Dee, about a mile from the city, is a bridge of seven arches, built of free-stone, by Bishop Gawen Dunbar. Besides other public buildings, here is a church handsomely built of free-stone, in the high-street, and near the port, or wharf, is a custom-house. The market-place is spacious, and the adjoining streets handsome, most of the houses being built of stone; and the inhabitants gay, genteel, and rich. The private buildings are commonly four stories high, or more, with gardens and orchards behind them; so that the city, at a distance, looks like a wood. The town is built upon three hills, but the greatest part of it on the highest, to which is an easy ascent from the plain. Aberdeen is one of the most considerable derable places in the north of Scotland; either for extent, trade, or beauty of the buildings, both public and private. It is about two miles in circumference, and contains near thirteen thousand inhabitants, and about three thousand in the suburbs; but the whole number of inhabitants between the bridges Dee and Don, which includes both the Aberdeens, and the adjacent hamlets, is estimated at twenty thousand. In the middle of Castle-street is an octagon building, with bas-reliefs of the kings of Scotland, from James I. to James VII. The town-house makes a good figure, and has a handsome spire in the center. The grammar-school is a low, but neat, building. Gordon's hospital is handsome; in the front is a statue of the founder. The infirmary is a large, plain building, and sends out annually between eight and nine hundred cured patients; but the chief public building in the New town is the Marischall college, founded by George Keith, Earl of Marischall, in 1593, but since considerably augmented with additional buildings. There are about one hundred and forty students belonging to it. Aberdeen once enjoyed a good share of the tobacco-trade, but was deprived of it by Glasgow. Its exports are stockings, thread, salmon, and oatmeal. Both the rivers Dee and Don are famous for salmon; of which, in some years, above one hundred and sixty-seven thousand pounds weight have been pickled and sent to London, and nine hundred and thirty barrels of salted fish exported to France, Italy, &c.

New Aberdeen is a royal burgh, and one of the districts, with Montrose, Brechin, Arbroth, and Inverberry, which send a member to parliament alternately. In this town, as well as at Peterhead, are churches, or, as they are called in Scotland, meeting-houses, where the liturgy of the Church of England is read. They have also several fine chapels with organs. The Old town must be very ancient, since the New is supposed upwards of 1200 years old. Both taken together form one city; which, for trade, wealth, extent, grandeur, and learning, is reckoned the third city in Scotland, being only inferior to Edinburgh and Glasgow. In the bay is very good anchoring, from seven to nine fathom water; but it is a tide-haven, with a very difficult entrance; though the river Dee is large, the channel being narrow, and the bar often shifting; so that no ship of any consequence ventures in without a pilot. An act was lately granted by the British parliament for building a new pier on the N. side of the harbour, for repairing the old pier on the S. side, and rebuilding the town-house, &c. As the country has a provincial synod, comprehending eight presbyteries, Aberdeen is the name of one, and contains twenty-one parishes. It lies eighty-four miles N. E. of Edinburgh, fifty-eight N. E. of St. Andrews, and about seventy N. E. of Durness. Lat. 57, 9; N. Long. 11, 40; W.

ABERDEENSHIRE, a county in the middle division of Scotland, sends two members to parliament. It comprehends the several districts of Birse, Glentanner, Glenmuicht, Strathdee, Strathdon, the braes or hills of Mar, and Cromar, the greatest part of Buthan, Forthmartin, Garioch, and Strathbogy. It is bounded by part of Angus and Mearns, on rather by the Dee, and the Grandbain or Grampian hills, on the S. by part of Banffshire on the N. W. by part of Murray on the N. by the German ocean on the E. and by the river Spey and part of Badenoch on the W. Templeton makes its dimensions seventy-three miles in length, and twenty-eight in breadth; and the area one thousand one hundred and seventy square miles. As the south part contains Mar, with its subdivisions, it was hence formerly called the shire of Mar. The soil would be fruitful enough, were it properly cultivated, it producing corn; particularly barley, rye, and oats, in abundance, together with some wheat; also pulse, roots, and herbs of different kinds. The hilly parts, especially Peunan craigs, where many eagles build their nests, are covered with woods of fir and oak; and they have plenty of wild game, and pasture, &c. They abound in sheep, black cattle, horses, and deer. Here are quarries of spotted or variegated marble, lime-stone, and slate; and a sort of stones, called elf-arrow-heads, which seem to be of the flint kind, and are of different shapes, mostly pointed like spears. In its rivers are found mussels, containing large pearls of a beautiful colour; and both the rivers and sea abound with fish. The air of the country is cool, but healthful; and their common and native fishing is peats, turfs, and wood. They have also coals from Newcastle and other places. The winter is much milder here than might be expected so far north. Here are springs of allum-water, and veins of stone, from which allum is boiled.

ABERDOUR, a small market-town on the firth of Forth, in Fifeshire; where Douglas, Earl of Moreton, regent of Scotland, during the minority of James VI. built a fine seat, with terraces extending to the frith, almost opposite to Edinburgh. It lies six miles from Dumfries, and three from Innerkything. Lat. 56, 4; N. Long. 13, 1; W.

ABERFORD, or ABURFORD, a town in the west-riding of Yorkshire, one hundred and eighty miles miles from London, twenty from York, and eight from Leeds; noted for its manufacture of pins. It has four annual fairs, the last Wednesday in April, the same in May, Wednesday after St. Luke, and the 18th of October. The town stands on the great Roman causeway; which, to Castleford-bridge, appears as entire as when first made, though above one thousand seven hundred and fifty years old. Below the town runs the river Cock, and near it is still to be seen the foundation of Castle Cary.

ABERFRAW, a village of Anglesey, in North Wales, lying in the neighbourhood of Newburgh. It was anciently famous for the palace of the kings of North Wales, who were also styled kings of Aberfraw. Six miles from Newburgh. Fairs, March 7, Wednesday after Trinity; October 23, and December 11.

ABERGAVENNY, or ABERGENY, in Monmouthshire; so called from the river Gavenny, which falls below it into the Uik. It is a handsome town, was once walled round, and had a strong castle; which, Giraldus observes, was oftener stained with the infamy of treachery than any other in Wales. Some of the walls, and part of the tower, on the Keep, are the only remains of a once-flourishing Norman castle. In this neighbourhood has been lately founded a college, or seminary, for the instruction and maintenance of youth who may shew marks of genius. Their abilities to be their only qualification and recommendation. It has a stone-bridge over the river. This town is the great thoroughfare from the western parts of Wales to Bristol and Bath, by the way of Chepstow; as it is from Monmouth town to Gloucester city, by crossing the river, through Colford and the forest of Dean; and therefore well furnished with inns, and accommodation for travellers. It had anciently a priory and chantry. It lies fifteen miles W. from Monmouth, one hundred and forty-two from London; is governed by a bailiff, recorder, and twenty-seven burgesses. Its market is on Tuesday, and its fairs May 11, the first Tuesday after Trinity, and Sept. 25.

ABERGELY, a village of North Wales, in Denbighshire, that has four fairs; on April 2, the day before Holy Thursday, August 20, and October 9. It is five miles W. by S. of St. Asaph. Long. 3, 32, W. Lat. 53, 19, N.

ABERGUILLY, or ABERGERLECH, a village of South Wales, in Carmarthenshire, with two fairs, on October 2 and October 27. It is 12 miles N. by E. of Carmarthen. Long. 4, 20, W. Lat. 52, 10.

ABERHONDY, see BALFOCKNOCK.

ABERISTWYTH, a market-town of Cardigan.

VOL. I. — No. 1.

shire, in South-Wales, on an easy elevation, in the midst of a broad vale, at the mouth of the Iſtwyth. It is a populous place, but dark and smoaky. Gilbert Clare fortified it with a castle and wall, which were defended a long time against the Welch, by Walter Beck, an Englishman; but both are now decayed. It is a corporation, consisting of a mayor, recorder, &c. and has a market on Mondays. Its fairs are on the Monday before Easter, and December 18. It drives a good trade in lead and fish, especially whiting, cod, and herring; but has no parish church. It lies twenty-eight miles N. E. of Cardigan, and one hundred and ninety-nine miles from London.

ABERLOUR, a small place in the shire of Elgin, in Scotland, situated near the river Spey, and is the seat of a presbytery, consisting of seven parishes. It lies eight miles from Elgin.

ABERNETHY, a town in Strathern, a district of Perthshire, in Scotland, seated on the river Tay, a little above the mouth of the Erne. It is said to have been the seat of the Pictish kings; and was afterwards the see of an archbishop that was translated to St. Andrews. The town is now greatly decayed.

ABERNETHY, a small place on the river Spey; but the seat of a presbytery, consisting of five parishes. In the public road near this town was erected a famous monument, called Macduff's cross; where, if any within the ninth degree to the great Macduff, the principal instrument of subduing the tyrant Macbeth, fled for sanctuary, in case of manslaughter, he was pardoned, paying a few head of cattle, by way of fine.

ABERSPERG, a small town and castle, in Upper Bavaria, Germany; seated on the Umbs river, which soon after runs into the Danube. It was purchased of the empire, by Bavaria, in 1493.

ABERTON, a place near Parshore, in Worcester-shire; famous for its mineral waters, which are bitter and purging, and of the same nature with those of Epsom.

ABEX, or HABASH, a country in Higher Ethiopia, in Africa, bordering on the Red Sea, by which it is bounded on the east. It has Nubia, or Sennar, on the north; Sennar and Abyssinia on the west; and Abyssinia on the south. Its principal towns are Suqqem and Arkeko. It is subject to the Turks, and has the name of Beglerbeg of Habeleth. It is about five hundred miles long, and one hundred broad; and is a wretched country, being very mountainous, and has more wild beasts than men for inhabitants; the heat being almost insupportable, and the air so unhealthy. There are forests which abound with ebony-trees.

ABHER, HABAR, or EBHER, a city of Persian-irak, irak, or ancient Parthia, in Asia; situated about twenty-six miles S. E. of Sultanaya. It is small, if we consider the buildings only, not containing above two thousand five hundred houses; but to them belong so many gardens, and those so large, that a horseman would find it difficult to cross it in half an hour. A small river, of the same name with the city, runs through the middle of it, from one end to the other. Its situation is very delightful; the air wholesome, and the soil produces plenty of fruit and other provisions. The buildings are tolerably handsome; and the inns, bazars, and other public structures, elegant. Here are three spacious mosques; and in the middle of the city are still to be seen the ruins of a castle built of earth. The town is governed by a deroga. At Abher the language begins to be Persian, both in the cities and country, though but a rude and boorish sort of dialect; whereas all the way before, the vulgar language is Turkish, but with some little variation from that spoken in Constantinople. Lat. 36, 14, N. Long. 50, 59, E.

A B

ABIAD, a town of Africa, on the coast of Abex; seated on a high mountain; remarkable for its trade in ebony and aromatic plants.

ABIAGRASSO, a little town of the Milanese, in Upper Italy, situated on a canal. Lat. 45, 20, N. Long. 9, 24, E.

ABINGDON, a small town in Calvert-county, Maryland, North America. There is another small town of the same name in the colony of Plymouth, in Massachusetts-bay province, Maryland.

ABINGTON, ABINGDON, or ABENDON, a well-built borough-town, in Berkshire; so called from its abbey; its name, before that structure was built, being Sheoesham. It was noted in the time of the Britons for the seat of the king, and the place to which his people resorted, when he was desirous of treating with them on extraordinary business; and afterwards, in the time of the Saxons, it was famous for several synods. The abbey was founded by the Saxons, A. D. 675, and became so considerable for building and wealth that few equalled it. Here William the Conqueror kept his Easter, in the year 1084, and left his youngest son Henry, afterwards king of England, to be educated. It was destroyed at the general dissolution of monasteries, and the west-gate is the only part of it now standing. However, in order to make the town some amends for the loss of its abbey, the great road, which before commonly went through Wallingford, was turned through this place, in 1416, by erecting Culham and Burford bridges. The streets are all well paved, and center in a spacious area; in which stands its market-house, with a large hall over it, built of freestone, and supported on pillars, in which the county assizes are frequently held. In this area the market is held, which is considerable, especially for barley. And here they make great quantities of malt; which, with other commodities, they send by their barges to London. St. Helen's, the principal of its two churches, is adorned with a spire; and near it is an hospital, for six poor men and as many poor women; and there is another for thirteen poor men and as many poor women: besides which, here is a charity-school and a free-school. Abington is a free borough and town corporate, consisting of a mayor, two bailiffs, and nine aldermen, called principal burgesses; and has a power of electing sixteen or more secondary ones. It has also a high-steward, recorder, and town-clerk; and sends one member to parliament. Its weekly markets are on Monday and Friday; and its fairs the first Monday in Lent, June 20th, September 19th, and December 11th. Abingdon lies fifty-five miles from London by land; and one hundred and fifty by water; six S. of Oxford, and forty-seven from Gloucester.

ABINGTON, a pretty town of Philadelphia-county in Pennsylvania, in America, near Philadelphia city.

ABINGWORTH, in Surry, near Godalming and Stoke; and has a fair Aug. 21.

ABISSINIA, or ABYSSINIA, by some called Higher Ethiopia, and by the Arabians Al Habash; is bounded on the north by Nubia; on the east by the Arabic gulph, or Red Sea, and the kingdom of Adel; and on the south by the kingdoms of Ajan, Alaba, and Gingiro; and on the west by the kingdom of Goram and part of Gingiro; and is divided into a great number of provinces. The principal river is the Nile, which has its source in this country; and the most considerable lake, that of Dambea, which discharges itself into the Nile, is about seven hundred miles in length, and ninety in breadth. The air is pretty temperate in the mountains, and therefore their towns and strong-holds are generally placed on them; but in the valleys it is hot and suffocating. The soil and face of the country is various. In some places there are nothing but rocks and profound caverns; in others, especially where there are rivers the land is exceeding fruitful; and the banks of these streams are bordered with flowers of various kinds, many of which are unknown in Europe. The torrents, in the rainy season, wash a great deal of gold from the mountains. This season begins in May, when the sun is vertical, or directly rectly over their heads, and ends in September. To these torrents is attributed the overflowing of the Nile, the cause of which so much puzzled the ancients. It was commonly attributed to the melting of the snow upon the hills in these parts; but experience has since undeceived the world; for there is no snow, even on the highest hills, in this country. The country produces a great variety of animals, both tame and wild; such as lions, tigers, rhinoceroses, leopards, elephants, monkeys, stags, deer; horses, camels, dromedaries, goats, cows, sheep; likewise ostriches, with a vast variety of other birds. In the rivers are crocodiles and the hippopotamus. Travellers mention also a peculiar kind of bees, small, black, and without a sting; which hive in the earth, and make honey and wax that are extremely white. The country is greatly infested with locusts, which devour every thing that is green wherever they come. Besides the large towns, there are a great number of villages; which in some places are so thick sown, that they look like one continued town: the houses are very mean, being but one story high, and built of straw, earth, and lime. In most of the towns, the houses are separated by hedges; which are always green, and mixed with flowers and fruit-trees, at a certain distance from each other, which affords an agreeable prospect. The government is monarchical. The sovereign has the title of negus, and is an absolute prince. When he is in camp, the tents are so regularly disposed as to have the appearance of a city; and there is a captain over every division, to prevent disorders and to execute justice. The Abyssines in general are of an olive complexion, tall, graceful, and well-featured. Those, who are neither mechanics or tradesmen (which few of them are) nor tillers of the grounds, are inured to bear arms; which are, a head-piece, a buckler, a coat of mail, bows and arrows, darts, pikes capped with iron at both ends, a sling, and a sword: they have very few fire-arms; and those were introduced by the Portuguese. The habit of persons of quality is a silken vest, or fine cotton, with a kind of scarf. The citizens have the same habit, only coarser. The common people have nothing but a pair of cotton drawers, and a scarf, which covers the rest of their body. The women are of a healthy constitution, active, and moderately handsome; having neither flat noses nor thick lips, like the negroes; and nature is so friendly, that they stand in little need of midwives; which is indeed the case in most countries in the torrid zone. They appear in public, as in Europe, without being forbid the conversation of the men, as among the Mahometans. Princesses of the royal blood are not permitted to marry foreigners; and when they take the air, they go in great state, with 400 or 500 women attendants. Their language is the Ethiopic; which bears a great affinity with the Arabic; but particular provinces have a different dialect. As to their religion, they adhere to the Greek church. Manufactures are almost wholly wanting in this country; and the few trades which they have amongst them, are always conveyed from the father to the children. They seem, indeed, by their churches, and other ruined places, to have had a knowledge of architecture. But the workmen were sent for from other countries, and were forced to do all themselves; so that when these fabrics were reared, especially the imperial palace, built by Peter Pais, a Portuguese architect, the people flocked from all parts of Ethiopia to view it, and admired it as a new wonder of the world. Gold, silver, copper, and iron, are the principal ores with which their mines abound in this extensive part of Africa; but not above one-third part is made use of by way of merchandise, or converted into money; of which they have little or no use in Abyssinia. They cut their gold, indeed, into small pieces, for the pay of their troops, and for expences of the court; which is but a modern custom among them; the king's gold, before the end of the 17th century, being laid up in his treasury, in ingots, with intent never to be carried out, nor ever used in any thing but vessels and trinkets for the service of the palace. In the lieu of small money, they make use of rock-salt, as white as snow and as hard as stone. This is taken out of the mountain of Lasta, and put into king's warehouses; where it is reduced into tablets of a foot long, and three inches broad, ten of which are worth about a French crown. When they are circulated in trade, they are reduced into still smaller pieces, as occasion requires. This salt is also applied to the same purpose as common sea-salt. With this mineral salt they purchase pepper, spices, and silk stuffs; which are brought to them by the Indians, in their ports in the Red Sea. Cardamums, ginger, aloes, myrrh, cassia, civet, ebony-wood, ivory, wax, honey, cotton, and linens of various sorts and colours, are merchandises which may be had from Abyssinia; to which may be added, sugar, hemp, flax, and excellent wines, if these people had the art of preparing them. It is affirmed, there are in this country the finest emeralds that are any where to be found; and, though they are found but in one place, they are there in great quantities; and some so large and

and so perfect as to be of almost inestimable value. The greatest part of the merchandises above mentioned are more for foreign than inland trade. Their domestic commerce consists chiefly in salt, honey, buck-wheat, grey pease, citrons, oranges, lemons, and other provisions; with fruits and herbage necessary for the support of life. Those places that the Abyssinian merchants frequent the most, who dare venture to carry their commodities by sea themselves, are, Arabia Fœlix, and the Indies, particularly Goa, Cambaye, Bengal, and Sumatra. With regard to their ports on the Red Sea, to which foreign merchants commonly resort, the most considerable are those of Mette, Azum, Zājalla, Maga, Dazo, Patea, and Brava. The trade of the Abyssinians by land is inconsiderable. There are, however, bands of them who arrive yearly at Egypt, particularly at Cairo, laden with gold dust, which they bring to barter for the merchandises of that country, or of Europe, for which they have occasion. These caravans, or caravans, if we may be allowed thus to call a body of 40 or 50 poor wretches who unite together for their mutual assistance in their journey, are commonly three or four months on their route, traversing forests and mountains almost impassible, in order to exchange their gold for necessaries for families, and return immediately with the greatest part of the merchandise on their backs. Frequently the Jews or Egyptians give them large credit; which may seem surprising, as they are beyond recourse if they should fail of payment. But experience has shewn, that they have never abused the confidence reposed in them; and even in the event of death, their fellow-travellers take care of the effects of the deceased for the benefit of their families, but in the first place for the discharge of those debts contracted at Cairo. It remains only to be observed, that one of the principal branches of trade of the Abyssines is that of slaves; who are greatly esteemed in the Indies and Arabia for the best and most faithful of all that the other kingdoms of Africa furnish. The Indian and Arabian merchants frequently substitute them as their factors; and, on account of their good services and integrity, not only often give them their liberty, but liberally reward them.

ABITIBIS, a lake north of Nipissin-lake, in North America; the N. W. boundary of Canada, in New South Wales, and has a communication with James's-bay, near Moose-fort, Long. 78, 5, W. Lat. 59, 3.

ABIUL, a small town in the Ouvidoria de Montemar o Velho, and province of Beira, in Portugal. Lat. 40, 20, N. Long. 17, 10, W.

A B

ABKONDE, a large village on the river Amstel; which by means of a canal here joins with the Vecht, and thus form a shorter cut from Utrecht to Amsterdam, by the way of the New Sluice.

ABLASSER-WAARD, a small district in South Holland; which takes its name from the river Abblas, that runs through the midst of it towards the West, and at Ablasserdom joins the Mewe. This island consists chiefly of pastures, though some parts of it also yield hemp. It lies betwixt the Merwe and Lek, and towards the East borders on Gockum and Vianen, containing in all sixteen villages.

ABLAY, a country in Great Tartary, subject to the Russians; but their chief is a Calmuck prince. Long. from 72 to 83 E. Lat. 51 to 54 N.

ABLENTSCHEN or APPLENTSCHEN, a village in the canton of Bern; which consists of a few scattered houses situated in a small valley, so environed on all sides by high mountains that in winter it is frequently inaccessible for some weeks. In this place is a parochial church, to which are annexed several other small places in the valley.

ABLIS, a town of France in the generality of Orleans.

ABLOE, a small place of Tartary, in the Turkish empire in Europe, lying between the river Nieper and the Black sea. Lat. 46, 20, N. Long. 33, 15, E.

ABNAKIS, a people of North-America, between New-England and Canada, whose laziness will not admit them to cultivate the ground.

ABO, a district in Finland Proper. See FRNLAND.

ABO, the capital town of Finland Proper, subject to Sweden. It stands on the angle formed by the gulphs of Bothnia and Finland, on the river Aurojocki, which runs through the town, 180 miles N. E. of Stockholm. This is the best town in all the province; built as early as the year 1155. It is surrounded with mountains, has the privilege of a staple, and a commodious harbour. The episcopal see, whose bishop is subject to the archbishop of Upsal, was founded about the year 1226. In 1628 king Gustavus Adolphus erected a college; which, in 1640, queen Christina turned into an university, granting it many privileges. The great or episcopal church, built in 1300, is a handsome structure. This is the only royal jurisdiction in the province, the governor of which resides here. The town has two burgo-masters, and carries on a good trade in linen, corn, provisions, deals, &c. It was almost entirely reduced to ashes in 1678; and taken by the Russians in 1713, who kept possession of it till 1720, during which interval they committed several excesses;

A B

excesses; but it was restored to Sweden by the peace of Nyfadt. It has frequently suffered by fire. Near the harbour stands a rock surrounded by the sea; and, when ships pass it, the compass, they say, does no longer point to the north; whence it is suspected that it contains mines of load-stone. In 1743 a peace was concluded here between Sweden and Russia. It holds the eight seat in the general diet. Lat. 60, 27, N. Long. 22, 18. E.

ABOARY, or ABOERA, a territory or tract of coast of South Guinea, Africa, which joins with Aquamboe on the west, with Commanac and Knahoe north, with Abonee and Great Acra south, and Abonee east. The natives collect great quantities of gold dust, which they dispose of at Abonee.

ABOCROE, a country on the gold coast of Guinea, in Africa.

ABONEE, a territory in South Guinea, Africa, of a small compass; joined on the west by Aquamboe, on the south by Augwina, on the north by Aboera, and on the east by Great Acra and part of Aboera; remarkable for the great fair held at Great Acra, where the natives give constant attendance, as do the inhabitants of the neighbouring parts.

ABOM DE NOBREGA, a small district in the province of Entre Douro e Minho, in Portugal.

ABORAM, a small island on the coast of Fez, in Morocco, opposite to Melilla and the cape called Three Points, and about five or six leagues from it. It has nothing worth notice, except some villages, or rather hamlets, with a tower to keep off the pirates. It hardly affords sufficient maintenance for its inhabitants, who mostly live by the fishery about it. Lat. 4, 51, N. Long. 1, 39, W.

ABOSIR. See BUSIRIS.

ABO-SLOT, or ABO-CASTLE, is one of the oldest fortresses in Finland, situated on a peninsula near the mouth of the Aura. Since its first erection it has been destroyed several times by the enemy and by fire. Here king Erick XIV. was kept prisoner in the sixteenth century. Lat. 60, 50, N. Long. 24, 10, E.

ABOULLONA-LAKE, in ancient Myfia. See APOLLONIA.

ABOUTIGE, ABUTISH, or ABOHIBE, a town in Upper Egypt, in Africa, near the Nile, where there grows plenty of poppies, of which they make the best opium in all the Levant. It was formerly a large, but now a mean place. Lat. 26, 50, N. Long. 31, 10, E.

ABRAHAMSDORF, ABRAHAMFALVA, or ABRAHAMOWTZE, a populous little town, situated in a very fruitful soil for corn, in a district of Hungary, called the seat of the ten lance-men. Lat. 46, 20, N. Long. 19, 50, E. ABRENTES, a town of Estremadura, in Portugal, supposed, by its distance from Lisbon, to be the Tubucci of Antoninus, situated in the road from that capital to Emerita. It stands near the banks of the Tagus, on an eminence, which is entirely surrounded with gardens and olive-trees; the prospect very delightful: above it is an old castle strongly situated. The country between this and Lisbon is extremely pleasant, and its peaches are noted for their goodness. It has fourteen parishes in its district. It has a casa de misericordia or house of mercy; an hospital; and four convents. Being of importance for the security of Estremadura, determined king Peter II. to fortify it. Alphonfus V. raised it to a county, and in 1718, John V. to a marquifate. Lat. 39, 19, N. Long. 7, 18, W.

Vol. I. — No. I.

A B

ABRENNER, a mountain and town in Turcomania. The mountain stands by itself, and is shaped like a sugar-loaf, and not unlike the peak of Teneriff, at the foot of which are medical springs, remarkable for curing those bit by any venomous reptile.

ABRETANA, is by Strabo supposed to be that part of the Myfian kingdom, which lies between Ancyra, of Phrygia, and the river Rhindarus.

ABREIRO, a small place in the province of Traz los Montes, in Portugal. Its district comprehends only one parish, which belongs to the house of Villa-Real. Lat. 41, 20, N. Long. 7, 10, W.

ABRIDGE, a village near Lambourn, in Essex, which has a fair on June 2.

ABRIGA. See PARENZO.

ABROJOS, or BAXOS de BABUCA, a bank with several rocks and small islands east of Turk's-island, in the Atlantic Ocean, in Long. 69, 40, W. Lat. 21, 5, between which and Turk's-island, is a deep channel for ships of any burthen, three leagues wide.

ABROLHOS, dangerous shoals, about fifty miles from the coast of Brasil, and near the island of St. Barbe.

ABRON, a small river of Nivernois, in France.

ABRUG-BANYA. See GROSS-SCHLATTEN.

ABRUZZO, formerly a province in the kingdom of Naples, in Italy; divided by the river Pescara into the Hither and Farther Abruzzo. The Hither is bounded on the W. and N. W. by the Farther Abruzzo; on N. E. by the Adriatic gulph; on the S. and S. E. by the territory of Molise; and on the S. W. by that of Lavoro. It has not only the Appenines running through it, but other mountains, especially Monte Magella gella and Cavello; the former is always covered with snow, and often throws down those heaps of snow which by their fall swallow up passengers, and whatever happens in their way: at other times such clouds of snow are raised, when the wind is high, as quite stifle or bury those who unhappily meet with them. It is watered by several rivers, which render it fruitful, especially in saffron. Here are many large woods, containing great numbers of wild beasts: so that travellers are always obliged to go in troops armed. The Farther Abruzzo is bounded on the N. W. by the Marca d'Ancona; on the S. W. by Sabina and the Campagna da Roma; on the S. E. by the Hither Abruzzo; and on the N. E. by the Adriatic gulph. It is cold and mountainous, yet fertile, healthy, pleasant, and well inhabited; the people being industrious, especially in woollen manufactures.

ABSTEINEN, a district and farm-house on the farther side of the Memel, in Ragnit balliwic, and circle of Tapiau and Insterburg, in Prussia, lying in a mountainous and very pleasant country. Such is the fertility of this strip of land, in corn and cattle, that it is usually called the storehouse of Lithuania.

ABURY or ABURY, in Wiltshire, near Marlborough-downs, remarkable only for the stupendous remains of a druidical temple, minutely examined and described by Dr. Stukeley; being a collection of massy stones, like Stonehenge, on Salisbury plain.

ABURFORD. See ABERFORD.

ABUS, supposed to be the estuary of the Humber river, in Yorkshire. See OUSEA.

ABUTCH, ABOUTICH, or ABUTTO, a small town in the neighbourhood of Abydos, in Upper Egypt, on the western bank of the Nile; famed for the great quantities of black poppies produced near it, and of which the Turks and Arabs make the best opium.

ABYDOS, a town and castle of the Lesser Asia, or Notalia, standing on the south entrance of the Hellespont, now the south castle of the Dardanelles, built in 1452. Here the strait, which is also called Gallipoli, dividing Europe from Asia, is two miles over. All ships coming out of the Archipelago are searched here. On a rock in the middle of this strait stands a tower, properly consisting of two, on which the Turks have some small cannon. To mariners it serves for a mark to steer by, and the Turks use it as a watch-tower. In the middle of the rock is a spring of fresh water.

ABYDOS, formerly the second city of Thebais, in Upper Egypt, but at present in a very mean condition.

A C

ABYLA, the high hill in Mauritania, in Africa, opposite Calpe, another high hill on the rock of Gibraltar, having a narrow sea between them, called the Straits of Gibraltar. From hence it was that Hamilcar crossed over into Spain. It is frequently by the English sailors called Apes Hill, being a corruption of Abyla.

ABYO, or ABUVO, one of the Philippine islands, in the East Indies, between Mindinao and Luzon; where the Spaniards have a fort. Lat. 10, 0, N. Long. 120, 5, E.

ABYSSINIA. See ABISSINIA and ETHIOPIA.

ACADIA, or ACADIE. See NOVA-SCOTIA.

ACA, ACE, or ACON, a town of Phœnicia, on the Mediterranean; called Ptolemais; now Acre.

ACALANDRUS, a river and town of Lucania, in the Basilicate, Italy; now called Salandra, on the other side the Appennine. The river is now called Fiume de Roseto.

ACAMANTIS, the ancient name of the island of Cyprus; taken from one of its promontories, situate to the west.

ACANIMINA, a town on the coast of South Guinea, Africa, built on a rising ground, about two miles west of Cape St. Apollonia.

ACANTHOS, a town of Egypt, near Memphis, now Bifalta; also a maritime town of Macedonia, to the west of a mountain of the same name, now Erillo; near which is shown Xerxes's ditch, of seven stadia; in order to separate that mountain from the continent, and convey his ships, without doubling Athos, into the Singitic-bay. There is another town of the same name in Epirus.

ACANY, an inland gold country of Guinea, in Africa; whose inhabitants have long been famous for great traders in gold dust, so remarkably pure and fine, that to this day the best gold is called Acany gold.

ACAPALA, a town in the province of Chiapa, in New Spain, or Old Mexico, North America; situated on the river Tobasco, near the city of Chiapa, and not far from the bay Teconatopac, in the South Sea.

ACAPULCO, a town of Mexico, in North America, in the S. E. corner of the province; situated on a fine bay of the South Sea. It has a fine harbour, from whence a ship annually sails to Manila in the Philippine islands, near the coast of China in Asia; and another returns annually from thence with all the treasures of the East Indies; such as diamonds, rubies, sapphires, and other precious stones; the rich carpets of Persia; the camphire of Borneo; the benjamin and ivory of Pegu and Cambodia; the silks, muslins, and calicoes of the Mogul's country; the gold dust, tea, china-ware, silk, and and cabinets of China and Japan; besides cinnamon, cloves, mace, nutmegs, and pepper; in so much that this single ship contains more riches than many whole fleets. The goods brought to Acapulco are carried to the city of Mexico by mules and pack-horses; and thence to Vera Cruz, on the North Sea, in order to be shipped for Europe. Acapulco itself is a small place, consisting of about two or three-hundred thatched houses. Ships arrive at the port by two inlets, separated from each other by a small island; the entrance into them in the day-time is by means of a sea-breeze, as the sailing out in the night-time is effected by a land-breeze. A wretched fort, forty-two pieces of cannon, and a garrison of sixty men, defend it. It is equally extensive, safe, and commodious. The basin which constitutes this harbour is surrounded by lofty mountains, which are so dry, that they are even destitute of water. The air here is hot, heavy, and unwholesome; to which none can habituate themselves, except certain negroes that are born under a similar climate, or some mulattoes. This feeble and miserable colony is crowded with a vast accession to its numbers upon the arrival of the galleons; traders flocking here from all the provinces of Mexico, who come to exchange European toys, their own cochineal, and about 437,500*l.* sterling, for spices, muslins, printed-linens, silk, perfumes, and the gold works of Asia. W. Long. 102. 29, N. Lat. 17, 30.

ACARAI, a town of Paraguay, in South America; built by the Jesuits in 1624. Long. 116, 40, S. Lat. 26, N.

ACARADY, or ACCADY, a district on the south coast of Guinea in Africa, which has Cammanach on the west, Quakoe on the north, and Lataby and Ningo on the south. The inhabitants carry large parcels of gold to Abonee market, which is generally reckoned equally fine with that of Acany.

ACARNANIA, the first country of Free Greece, or Greece Proper; bounded on the west by the Sinus Ambracius, and separated from Ætolia by the river Achelous on the east, and by the Sinus Ambracius from Epirus. The people were called Acarnanes, denoting persons unshorn; other Ætolians; to the east the Achelous, being called Curetes, from being shorn. According to Lucian, they were noted for effeminacy and incontinence; hence the proverb, Porcellus acarnanicus. This country was famous for an excellent breed of horses. It is now called La Carnia and Il Despotato.

ACARON, or ACARON, a town of Palestine, called Echron in scripture. It was the boundary of the Philistines to the north; stood at some distance from the sea, near Bethshemesh; and was famous for the idol of Baalzebub.

ACCAD, one of the cities mentioned, Gen. x. 10, where Nimrod reigned; supposed to be the present Nisibin, and totally obliterated. Wells calls it Archod, near the river Argades, near Sitta, at no great distance from the river Tigris, between Babylon and Susa.

ACELDEMA, a place recorded, Matt. xxviii. v. &c. on the south side of Mount Sion, near the pool of Siloam, on the west side of the valley of Hinnom; purchased by the pieces of silver returned back by Judas Iscariot, and called the Field of Blood, and since by the Christians named Campo Sancto. It is a small spot of ground not above thirty yards long and fifteen broad, (now converted to a burial place of the Armenians) whose property, they say, is to consume the corpse in forty-eight hours.

ACCUSIORUM-COLONIA, an inland town in the Cavares, in Gallia Narbonensis; now Grenoble, in Dauphiné. See GRENOBLE.

ACERENZA, anciently Acherontia, a small town of the Basilicate, in the kingdom of Naples; situated on the river Brandano, at the foot of the Appennines; was formerly the see of an archbishopric, but afterwards removed to Matera, in Terra d' Otranto. It lies ninety miles east from Naples. Lat. 40, 30, N. Long. 16, 5, E.

ACERNO, or ACERNUM, in the higher principate of Naples, anciently a town of the Picentini; now a small episcopal see under that of Salerno. It is situated at the foot of the Appennines, and thirty miles east of the city of Naples. Lat. 40, 52, N. Long. 15, 46, E.

ACERRA, anciently Acerræ, a small city in the Terra di Lavara of Naples, situated on the river Patria. It is the see of a bishop. It is subject to the archbishop of Naples, and only eight miles distant from that city. Lat. 40, 55, N. Long. 15, 10, E.

ACHA, or ACA, one of the four districts of the province of Tesset or Farther Sus, in Africa, the most inland of all, except Zahara. It consists of three walled towns near one another, inhabited by the Zeneti and Hideli Arabs; many of whom, by contracting an alliance with the Beberberes, learned their way of building, and living in towns and houses. These cities, as well as the villages about them, were once rich and powerful, till almost destroyed by intestine wars; and had lain waste a long time, till a Marabout, named Wizaden, found means to reconcile those different nations, rebuild and repopulate the desolate places; for which he was created lord of them, and the honour made hereditary in his family.

family, under the authority of the sheriffs. The inhabitants, especially of the villages, are still very poor, and have little but their dates to exchange for corn, which is here so scarce that few, except those of the higher rank, can purchase it.

ACHAIA, or HELLAS, now Livadia, a province of European Turkey, the most considerable part of Greece; as containing the famous cities of Thebes, Athens, Delphi, Pythia, &c: also the mounts Parnassus, Helicon, and other places eminent in ancient history. It is bounded on the east by the Morea, on the west by Albania, on the north by the Archipelago, and on the south by the gulphs of Lepanto and Engia. It is a pleasant, fruitful country, extending about one hundred and thirty miles from S. E. to N. W. but its breadth not above thirty-six.

ACHELOUS, a famous river of Aetolia, in Greece, by Homer called the King of Rivers.

ACHEM, a country of the East Indies, bounded on the north by the territories of Boutan, on the south by the kingdom of Ava, on the east by China, and on the west by Bengal; and is little known to Europeans.

ACHELOVU, so called from the river Achelous, a bishop's see of Epirus, in European Turkey; subject to the archbishop of Arta. Lat. 40, 26, N. Long. 20, 52, E.

ACHEM, or ACHIN, the capital of the island of Sumatra, in the East Indies. It is a large, populous city, situated on the N. W. point of the island, in a plain, by a pleasant river, about a league and a half from the sea. The harbour, which is good, and capable of receiving any number of the largest ships, is commanded by a spacious and royal fortress on the left side of the river, encompassed by a ditch well fortified, according to the Indian manner, and mounted with cannon. Nieuhoff says, it has seven gates, and that there are other redoubts in the adjacent marshes. The houses are ascended to by steps or ladders, being built on posts two feet above the ground; because, in the rainy season, the city is so overflowed that they go from house to house in boats. The floors, partitions, and sides, are of split bamboos; the middle of cocoa branches; and they are covered with reeds, cocoa, or palmeto leaves. They are pallisaded every one by themselves, except in two or three of the chief streets, where they have their exchange, and the street, or camp, as it is called, where the Chinese live. The houses are said to be, in the whole, seven or eight thousand, by Dampier.

The Europeans live as near to one another as they can, in a street near the river; and though their houses do not join, yet their yards are only parted by a few bamboos. They consist of English, Dutch, Danes, and Portuguese; who, with the Gazurats and Chinese, are the chief traders. They all keep cur-dogs and fire-arms, for fear of thieves; and they have ovens, or blind-houses, to secure their best effects from fire; which, among such reedy buildings, often makes dreadful havock. Some of them are as large as the common shops in London, and are the only brick or stone buildings in the city, except the mosques. The entrance is very narrow, and about three or four feet high; and there is a large stone, always ready fitted, to stop it upon occasion, besides the common door, that secures it against the natives, who are always armed with swords, daggers, targets, &c. and are very jealous of Europeans.

Here are fierce tempests of wind and thunder in the dry season, which our sailors so often meet with on the coast, that they call them Sumatras; and the streets being unpaved, it is then very troublesome to walk in them. The most common distempers here are fevers, fluxes, and agues, frequently occasioned by intemperance, or sleeping in the air; which is very cold in the night, because of the great dews. Mr. Lockyer gives us the following account of its trade.

It is a considerable port for the great quantities of goods sent yearly to it from all parts of India, for which returns are chiefly made in gold dust; for, though they have camphire and Japan wood, the whole country does not produce the value of a ship's cargo in a year. As for the camphire, it is only found among the Sundy islands on its coast, and is often a proper commodity for China, where they say it serves as a leaven to ripen and prepare the more common sort that our apothecaries are supplied with; which is not above a fortieth part of the value of Achin or Borneo camphire. The commodities imported are opium, salt-petre, rice, gee, i. e. buffalo's butter turned to oil; all sorts of cotton and silk manufactures from Bengal, tobacco, onions, callico, and muslin, especially brown and blue long-cloths; and gallampores; with several sorts of chints for clothes; and some gun-powder from Madras.

The Moors employ two large ships yearly to fetch the product of Cambaya from Surat, whose merchants buy up elephants teeth here. The Chinese also glut the markets with these commodities; and the Mallays here trade with large proes to Pegu, Quedah, Johone, and all their own coast; from whence they are plentifully supplied with necessaries they otherwise must want; as ivory, bees-wax, mortivan, and small jars; jars; as also with pepper, which grows indeed in this island, but not in this part of it. On the arrival of a ship at the mouth of a river, which is about four miles below the town, the shawbander, who is a sort of comptroller of the customs, and common arbitrator of the differences among the merchants, must be applied to for liberty to trade. When the guards give notice to the shawbander, or his deputy, who swear those that land, to observe the articles made between the natives and companies to which the ships belong, and to be faithful to the king and country during their stay; those, who take this oath, lift up a short dagger, in a gold case, three times to their heads; and this is called receiving the chap for trade. Captain Hamilton says, this chap is a piece of silver, about eight ounces weight, in form of a cross.

This place is noted for being the first town English ships come to in this part of the world: and our East India company had a factory here formerly, but recalled it, because it did not answer; yet any Englishman, who passes for a member of the company, has still great privileges here, and only makes the usual presents of fine cotton, cloth, callico, or silk, and some pieces of taffata, to the king and courtiers, &c. whereas other foreigners pay from 5 to 8 per cent. For the particular way of trading here, and for their weights and coins, as well as for the privileges of the English, we refer to our author, and to Captain Hamilton. The former says, they have proes of fourteen or fifteen tons, which are chiefly employed in profitable voyages to the coast of Pegu, Malacca, &c. but their flying-proes, which are only for fishing, coasting, and visiting the neighbouring islands, are so narrow that two men cannot stand abreast in the widest part of them. They are made like a canoe; and, with a small sail, will run about twelve miles an hour. Besides other fish in abundance, sharks are often sold in the market; and our author thinks, that the biggest in the sea are on the west coast of the island. He describes the cat-fish with great heads and mouths, long whiskers, prickly backs, and about the size of a mackerel. In its market also are to be had, besides fowls, which are dear, mutton, and the flesh of goats and buffaloes; which last is the coarsest of all meat; and be they ever so plump before the slaughter, it looks worse than the quarters of a starved horse. Cocks are the largest here that are to be seen any where, and the true game-breed is so much valued, that the cockers will often venture their whole estates on a battle: but Mr. Lockyer remarks a law observed by the sportsmen, that if the victor cock does not strike or peck the dead one, after it is disfigured as much as possible with its own blood, the company adjudges the battle not won, and therefore stakes must be drawn. He says the Europeans here often go out in the night to shoot wild hogs; and that hog-deer, about the size of rabbits, are also common in their markets; which the country people catch in burrows, in the woods, especially about Bencoolen. They are hog-headed, and hooped like deer, and their hoofs are often tipped with silver for tobacco stoppers. In this animal is found the bitter bezoar, called pedra de porco fiacca, worth ten times its weight in gold. The curious may see a particular account of the other bezoars, in the account of India by Mr. Lockyer. Here are good serviceable, but little horses, which are often carried to Madras, but never fetch much. Our author adds, that the Dutch seldom visit this port, because they are not allowed to trade, but on extravagant terms; that even the English trade, as it is, is precarious, and liable to be disputed upon every change of government; and that the goods proper for this port from England, are sword blades, and all the sorts which turn to account in Madras. Tobacco is much used here, but they have little or none of their own raising; so that they are supplied with it from other parts at a dear rate; and, for want of pipes, they smook as they do on the Coromandel coast, in a bunco; that is, the leaf of a tree, rolled up with with a little tobacco in it; which the light at one end, and draw the smoke through the other, till it burns quite up to their lips. These rolls are curiously made, and sold in the market, twenty or thirty in a bundle.

Capt. Hamilton says, this city affords nothing of its own product for exportation, except gold-dust, of which it has plenty; and the finest of any in these parts, it being two per cent better than the Andraghery or Pahaung gold, and equal in touch to our Guinea. They find it in gullies or rivulets, as it washes from the mountains, of which there is a high pyramidal one, called Gold Mount, said to furnish them with 1000lb. weight yearly.

The king of Achem's palace is but an ordinary building in the middle of the town, said to be about half a league in compass, and is surrounded by a broad deep moat, as well as great banks of earth cast up, and planted with canes that grow to a vast height and thickness, so that they cover the palace, and render it almost inaccessible. There are four gates to it, a stone wall on each side of it, about ten feet high, supporting a terrace, where some guns are planted planted; and a little stream runs through it, which is lined with stone, and has steps to the bottom of it, for the sake of bathing. Achem lies 450 miles N. W. of the city of Malacca. Lat. 5, 22, N. Long. 95, 40, E.

ACARAI, a town of South America, in Paraguay; built by the Jesuits in 1624. Lat. 26, 0, S. Long. 81, 5, W.

ACHEN, or ACKEN, a bailiwick and town, in the most southern part of the duchy of Magdeburg, in Lower Saxony, Germany; situated on the banks of the Elb, over which it has a ferry. Here was formerly a commandery of the Teutonic order, belonging to the commander of Saxony, but it was sold to the Elector of Brandenburg. Exclusive of the parish church, here was also a foundation, consisting of six canons and the same number of vicarages, the revenues of which are at present levied by the dean of Magdeburg, but the church in 1711 was given to the Calvinists. The town anciently belonged to the dukes of Saxony, but was in 1277 mortgaged by duke John to the archbishop. In 1485 it was totally destroyed by fire; and, in 1542, a great part of it suffered by the late calamity. Lat. 51, 40, N. Long. 14, 48, E.

ACHERUSIA PALUS, a lake between Cumæ and the promontory Misenum, now il Lago della Collucia. Some confound it with the Lacus Lucrinus, and others with the Lacus Averni; but Strabo and Pliny distinguish them. The former takes it to be an effusion, exundation, or washes of the sea. Also a lake of Epirus, through which the Acheron runs. There is also an Acherusia, a peninsula of Bithynia, on the Euxine, near Heraclea; and a cave there of the same name, through which Hercules is fabled to have descended to hell, to drag forth Cerberus.

ACHERON, a river of Thesprotia, in Epirus; which, after forming the lake Acherusia, at no great distance, falls into the sea near the promontory of Chimerium, to the west of the Sinus Ambracius, in a course from north to south.

ACHERON, a river of Albania, the ancient Epirus, in European Turkey; of which the poets make frequent mention, and is now called Delichi.

ACHERON, a stinking fen or lake, in the Terra di Lavoro of Naples, in Italy, a small distance from the cave of the Cumæan Sybil, between that and Miseno; of which the ancients, especially the poets, give such a dreadful description; and Virgil calls it Tenebrosa palus, the Dark lake. It is now called Lago della Coluccia, and is only used for steeping and macerating hemp and flax, whereby the water is rendered black and stinking: but this brings annually into the Annunciata-hospital at Naples, eight or nine thousand crowns. For the increase of its fishery, a canal has been made from the sea into it, by which means its waters have been rendered fitter for fish to live in; and these are generally eels or barbels. Most of the fishermen live on a little island in the middle of the lake.

ACHIAVEL, a town of considerable trade in the province of Cassimere, in Indostan, belonging to the Mogul, in the East Indies; remarkable also for a pleasure-house of its sovereign, adorned with every embellishment that art could devise, or expence procure.

ACHILL, two islands in Broadhaven-bay, in the county of Mayo, and province of Connaught, in Ireland. They lie about seven miles from the shore, with a sound betwixt them, and afford shelter against all winds; but are not frequented, unless when ships are forced in by a tempest.

ACHILLÆUM. See CROCE, Cape.

ACHILLEA, an island in the Euxine sea; situated opposite to the Borysthenes; celebrated for the monument of Achilles, erected on it. It abounds with antiquities, but is uninhabited.

ACHILLEUS, one of the two harbours of Cabo Matapan; anciently the promontory of Tanara, in the Morea and European Turkey; the other is called Psamatheus.

ACHIM, a parochial village near the Weser, belonging to Bremen and Verden, in Germany. It has a district, called the Gohgericht of Achim, which lies on the Weser, some parts of which are marsh land, but others a pretty good champaign; yet some again consists of sandy plains and moorish ground. It contains twenty-two villages and six private farms.

ACHIN. See ACHEM.

ACHLAM, a small village, about twelve miles from York, in England; remarkable only for being the place where the body of the emperor Severus was brought from York, where he died, to be burnt to ashes, agreeable to the custom of the times.

ACHLAR, a river of the greater Armenia; otherwise called Aras, Caiacz, and by the ancients Araxis.

ACHMETSCHET, a town in the peninsula of the crim of Tartary, and the residence of the sultan Galga, or eldest son of the chan. It stands on the largest river in this country. Lat. 45, 0, N. Long. 33, 50, E.

ACHMIM, a city of middle Thebaida, in Egypt; anciently a bishopric, as appears by the council of Constantinople. This was the second city built in Egypt, by the philosopher Hermes, in the eastern desert.

ACHOLLA,

A C

ACHOLLA, an ancient free city of Africa, belonging to the Carthaginians. If the site Ptolemy assigns this city be allowed, Elalia, six miles north of Sheah, the ancient Ruspee, upon the borders of a fertile plain, undoubtedly answers to it.

ACHOR, the valley where Achan, his children, cattle, and all he had, resided; where the former were stoned to death, and the rest burnt, &c. It is evident that this valley lay not far from Jericho, and that it lay on the north border of the tribe of Asher.

ACHONCAGUA, a very deep river of Chili, in South America; which has its rise among the Cordillera or Ande mountains, and runs through some very considerable settlements, having its banks cultivated with all kinds of products.

ACHONRY, ACHENRY, or ACONRY, once a city and bishopric, but since united to Killala; and now only a small village, in the county of Slego, and province of Connaught, in Ireland. Lat. 54, 10, N. Long. 8, 35, E.

ACHRIDA. See OCHRIDA.

ACHTKERSPELEN, a division of Friesland; in the district of Oostergo; and contains 8 parishes in it.

ACHYR, a strong city of Poland, defended by a castle. It lies on the river Vorklo, in the Volhinia Inferior, on the borders of Russia; to which empire it is subject. Lat. 50, 29, N. Long. 57, 40, E. One hundred and twenty-seven miles west of Kiow.

ACHZIK, a city belonging to the tribe of Asher; by the Greeks called Ecdippa, and by the moderns Zib.

ACI, or JACI, a city at the foot of mount Etna, standing by the river Acis, near the sea. It is a poor place, but has a convent of Dominican friars; and takes its name from the shepherd Acis, as well as the two following places, which have nothing worth notice.

ACI CASTELLO. See ACI.

ACI TERRA. See ACI.

ACINIPPO, a town of Batica; its ruins, called Ronda la Viega, are to be seen near Arunda, in the kingdom of Granada.

ACIS, a river which rises at once out of the earth, in a large stream, on mount Etna; about a mile from the sea, into which it falls with great rapidity. Its waters are so extremely cold, as to be reckoned dangerous to drink; and likewise it is said to have a poisonous quality, which proceeds from its being impregnated with vitriol to such a degree that cattle have often been killed by it. It never freezes, and yet sometimes contracts a greater degree of cold than ice. This is the river so celebrated by the poets, in the fable of Acis and Galatea. It was here that Acis was supposed to have been killed by Polyphemus; and the gods, out of compassion, converted him into this river, which still retains his name.

ACITANI, an ancient people of Spain, who worshipped Mars by an image; whose head was surrounded by rays.

ACKERSUNDT, a small island on the south of Norway, near Frederickstadt. Lat. 59, 10, N. Long. 11, 15, E.

ACLAMAR, a large lake in Turcomania; called Mantiana by Strabo, and by others Vastan or Adaunas.

ACLEY, or ACLECH, a place in the diocese of Durham; where a council of bishops was held Sept. 26, 788, and several regulations made concerning church-discipline. It lies eleven miles south of Durham.

ACMETHA. See ECBATANA.

ACMODES, or ÆMODE. See SHETLAND. These are mentioned by Pliny; and are undoubtedly the isles of Shetland, in Scotland, in the Deucalidonian sea, though taken by some for the Hebrides, or Western islands, of that kingdom. The largest of the Acmodes is Mainland.

ACMONIA, a city of Dacia, situated on the Danube, near Trajan's bridge. It was built by the emperor Severus, and lies twelve leagues east of Temeswaer. Also a bishop's see in Phrygia Major, in Asia, under the archbishop of Laodicea, and on the confines of Eumenia. Lat. 39, 20, N. Long. 59, 50, E.

ACOL, a village in Kent, near Canterbury; which has a fair on May 10.

ACOLASTRE, one of the smaller rivers in Nivernois, a government of France.

ACOLIN, two rivers of Nivernois, a government of France.

ACOMA, a town of Mexico, in North America, situated on a high mountain, and defended by a fortified castle; is subject to the Spaniards, and commonly called St. Stephen d'Acoma. Lat. 35, 0, N. Long. 104, 15, W.

ACOMACK, the most northerly county of Virginia, and also the largest in that colony; containing two hundred thousand, nine hundred and twenty three acres of land, but not so populous as those on the other side of the bay, and has only one parish. It is a peninsula, and bounded on the north by Maryland, on the south and east by the Atlantic ocean, and on the west by the bay of Chesapeake. The river Cliftoness, and several others, rise in this country. Cape Charles

Charles is at the entrance of the bay, being the most southern promontory of this county.

ACONA, a small town and castle in Lower Saxony, two miles from Dessau. Lat. 51, 48, N. Long. 12, 40, E.

ACONE, a port and town of Bithynia, on the Euxine sea, near Heraclea Pontica. Lat. 41, 10, N. Long. 28, 15, E.

ACONIS, a mountain of Bithynia, in Asia, near Heraclea; where the poisonous herb, aconite grows in great quantities; and whence it has its name.

ACORES, a small place of Beira, in Portugal. Lat. 40, 20, N. Long. 7, 15, W.

ACOUÉZ, a savage nation of Indians, inhabiting some parts of Canada.

ACOUS, a small, but the principal place in the valley of Aspe, belonging to the bailiwick of Oleron, and principality of Bearn in France; near which place are several cold springs, particularly those of Escot. Lat. 43, 5, N. Long. 50, E.

ACQS, a little town in the county of Foix, and government of the same name, in France, situated at the foot of the highest Pyrenees. It has its name from the warm waters near it, which are greatly frequented and esteemed. Lat. 43, N. Long. 1, 40, E.

ACQS, or DAX, AQUE TARBELLÆ, or AUGUSTÆ, a city of France, in a viscounty of the same name, belonging to Gascony, on the river Adour, in the district of Auribat. It is the see of a bishop, the seat of a judicature, a bailiwick, and an election. Its bishop is under the archbishop of Auch or Aix; has a diocese, comprehending two hundred and forty-three parishes, with a revenue of fourteen thousand livres, and pays a tax of five hundred florins to the court of Rome. Here are six convents, a college, and an hospital. The fortifications of the town are inconsiderable, and its castle of little strength. Both in the city and its neighbourhood are warm baths. Lat. 43, 47, N. Long. 1, 10, E.

ACQUA, a small place in the great duchy of Tuscany, in Italy; so called from its warm baths. Lat. 43, 45, N. Long. 12, 10, E.

ACQUA-PENDENTE, so called from its abounding with water; a town near the river Paglia, in the territory of Orvieto, in Bologna, belonging to the ecclesiastical state in Italy. It stands on a high rock, forty-six miles north of Rome, and is the see of a bishop. In the town and neighbourhood are sixteen churches and convents. Lat. 44, 30, N. Long. 12, 17, E.

ACQUA CHE FAVELLA, a celebrated fountain of Italy, in Calabria-citerior, a province of Naples. It is near the mouth of the river Crata, and the ruins called Sibara Rouinata.

A C

ACQUARIA, a small town of Italy, in Frigiana, a district of Modena; remarkable for its medicinal waters. It is 12 miles south of the city of Modena. Long. 11, 29, E. Lat. 44, 24, N.

ACQUATACCIO, formerly ALMO, a small river near Rome; crossing the old Via Appia, falling into the Tiber or Tivoli, a little below the Mons Tescacens.

ACQUA VIVA, a small place in the territory of Bari, a province of Naples, in Italy. Lat. 41, 5, N. Long. 16, 20, E.

ACQUE. See Aeqs.

ACQUI, a fortified town, in a territory of the same name, on the river Bormio, near the place where it falls into the Ero; and contiguous to the Appennines of Montferat, in Italy. It has its name from the medicinal warm baths here, much resorted to for cold distempers of all kinds. The ancients called it Aquæ Statellæ. It is supposed to have been built by a people inhabiting the Alps, which Livy calls Ligures Statellæ. It is the see of a bishop, under the archbishop of Milan. Though the waters here are boiling hot, yet it is said that a kind of grass swims on the surface, of a fine green colour. It was taken by the Spaniards in 1745, and retaken by the Piedmontese in 1746, and afterwards dismantled by the French. It lies 25 miles N. W. of Genoa. Lat. 44, 45, N. Long. 8, 40, E.

ACRA, or ACRE, is the last and most southern city on the Phœnician coast, in Asiatic Turkey, situated in the tribe of Affer, at the N. W. entrance of a bay; generally computed to be about 3 leagues over, and 2 leagues deep. It stands in a very large and fertile plain, bounded on the N. at about 12 miles distance, by the mountains anciently called Antilibanon; and to the E. by the fine and fruitful hills of Galilee, about 10 miles from this city. The ancient name of this city was Ake; or, as it is called in Scripture, Accho. It was one of the places out of which Affer could not drive the ancient inhabitants, and seems always to have retained this name among the natives of the country, for the present Arabs call it Akka. The Greeks gave it the name of Ptolemais, from one of the Ptolemies, kings of Egypt; and when it was in the possession of the knights of St. John of Jerusalem, it was called St. John d'Acre. As this port must always have been of great importance in time of war, the town has consequently undergone great changes. It was taken in 636 by the Saracens. In 1104 the Christians became masters of it, under Baldwin, the first king of Jerusalem, by the assistance of the Genoese galleys.

In 1187, Saladin, sultan of Egypt, got possession of it; and, in 1191, Philip king of France, and Richard king of England, retook it: but in 1291, the Saracens assaulted and destroyed the city, that is, the fortifications; which they afterwards repaired. It was taken from them by the Turks in 1517, and is still under their jurisdiction. This place may be considered as divided into three parts; that is, the old city, the new city, and the quarter where the knights and other religious orders had their convents. The present town seems to stand on the spot of the old city, being walled at the S. W. corner, and washed by the sea on the south and west sides. It has a small bay to the east, which seems to have been the ancient port, but is now almost filled up. There are great remains of this old port, within which small ships anchor in the summer, and take in their loading. The present town is a mile in circumference, and has no walls. To the N. and N. E. of this city, and of the port, was the quarter of the knights, and the religious orders, extending about three quarters of a mile from E. to W. and might be half a quarter of a mile broad. At the west end of it, there are ruins of a large building; and where, according to tradition, the palace of the grand master of the knights of St. John, who retired to this place, after they lost Jerusalem, was erected. Towards the east end of the town was the house of the knights, and a strong well-built church adjoining to it, said to be dedicated to St. John. What remains of it is a low massive building; and it is probable, that there was a grand church over it: in the vault of this building, is a relief of the head of St. John in a charger. Between this and the palace of the grand master, there was a very large and magnificent nunnery; some of the lofty walls of the convent are standing; and the church is almost entire. When the city was taken by the Mahometans, it is said, that the abbess and nuns, like those of Scotland, cut off their noses to secure their chastity, and were inhumanly murdered by the soldiers. In this city also our king Edward I. when prince, receiving a wound with a poisoned arrow, was cured by his wife Eleanor, by sucking out the poison. North of this quarter is a fosse, and, beyond it, what is called the new quarter of the city; but it did not extend so far to the east. To the north and east of this, and to the east of the quarter of the knights, are remains of a beautiful modern fortification, carried on to the south; though it was not so strong in that part. There is a double rampart and fosse, lined with stone: the inner rampart was defended with semicircular bastions. At the east end, within these fortifications, is a well, called the fountain of Mary; and there is great reason to think that the river Belus was brought through the fosse, because it is mentioned in the account of the siege, that a certain body of men attacked the city from the bridge, over the Belus to the bishop's palace; and, if it was so, the city by this means became an island. Some vestiges of the old channel still remain, together with the ruins of a small bridge near the town, and of a larger, farther on. There are no remains of antiquity in the old city, except some vestiges of the magnificent and lofty cathedral church of St. Andrew, which had a portico round it, and appears to have been a fine Gothic building. At a little distance to the N. W. are the remains of a very strong building, called the Iron Castle, from which there seems to have been three walls by the sea-side. The Greeks have a bishop here, and a very good old church and convent. The Latin fathers of the holy sepulchre have apartments, and a chapel in a kane, which serves as a convent; and all the Europeans live in this kane, except the English consul. The Maronites and Armenians have each of them a church. The trade here, for the most part, consists in an export of corn for Europe; and of cotton for Egypt, and other places; especially on this coast. The merchants frequently carry on their trade by advancing money to the Arabs beforehand, and taking the produce of their land at very reasonable rates, which gives the European merchants a great interest in the country. Acra is now only a small village, lying to the S. of Tyre. Lat. 33, 35, N. Long. 36, 20, E. ACRA, a town on the coast of Guinea, in Africa; where there is a British fort and factory. Lat. 5, N. Long. 2, W. ACRA, an island, over against the mouth of the Tarna; called the Acra of Scylax; and forms the modern port of Harshgoone, on the coast of Barbary, in the Mediterranean; under which vessels of the greatest burthen lie, with the greatest safety. ACRADINA, one of the four quarters of Syracuse, in Sicily, and heretofore a city of itself. ACRAË, in the ancient geography, a town of Sicily, whose inhabitants were called Acrenses. It stood to the south of Syracuse, at the distance of 24 miles; near the place now called the monastery of Santa Maria d'Arcia; on an eminence, as appears from Silius Italicus. The Syracusans were the founders of it, according to Thucydides, 70 years after the building of Syracuse, or 665 before Christ. Hence the epithet Acræus. ACRAGAS, or AGRAGAS, so called by the Greeks, and sometimes by the Romans, but more generally Agrigentum by the latter; a town of Sicily. The town stood upon a mountain, at the confluence of the Acragas and Hypsa, near the port called the Dock; and in the time of the latter, scarce a trace of all that side remained. In the year before Christ 584, the people of Gela built Acragas, 108 years after building their own city. It took its name from the river running by it; and being but two miles from, enjoyed all the conveniences that could come by, the sea. It was a place of great strength, standing on the top of a very steep rock, and washed on the south side by the river Acragas, now called Fiume di Gergenti, and on the south-west by the Hypsa; with a citadel to the south-east, externally surrounded by a deep gulf, which made it inaccessible but on the side next the town. It was famous for the tyrant Phalaris and his brazen bull. They were a people luxurious in their tables, and magnificent in their dwellings; of whom Empedocles, in Diogenes Laertius, says, that they lived to-day as if they were to die to-morrow; and built as if they were to live for ever. The country round the city was laid out in vine and olive yards, in the produce of which they carried on a great and profitable commerce with Carthage. Long. 13, 30, E. Lat. 37, 20.

ACRA JAPYGiA, SALENTINA, now CAPO DI SAN MARIA DI LEUCA; a promontory in the kingdom of Naples, to the south-east of Otranto, where formerly was a town, now lying in ruins, on the Ionian sea, over against the Montes Acroceraunii of Epirus.

ACRATH, a place in Mauritania Tingitana, now supposed to be Velez de Gomara; a fortified town in the kingdom of Fez; with a citadel and commodious harbour on the Mediterranean, scarce a mile distant from Penon de Veles, a Spanish fort. Long. 5, W. Lat. 34, 45.

ACRE, or ACRA, a sea-port town in Syria. It was formerly called Ptolemais; and is a bishop's see. It was very famous in the time of the crusades, and underwent several sieges, both by the Christians and Saracens. It is now an inconsiderable town, being entirely supported by its harbour, which is frequented by ships of several nations. It is 20 miles south of Tyre, and 37 north of Jerusalem. Long. 39, 25, E. Lat. 32, 40.

ACRIA, anciently a most commodious sea-port of Lacedaemonia; on one side of the mouth of the Eurotas, as was that of Trinassus on the other side.

ACRITAS, a promontory of Messenia, near the Morea; running into the sea, and forming the beginning of the bay of Messene. Now called Capo di Gallo, between Methone to the west, and Corone to the east, where the Sinus Coronaeus begins.

A C

ACROCERAUNIA, See CHIMERE Montidia.

ACRON, a territory on the Gold coast of Guinea, in Africa, bordering on the Fantynean country. The Dutch have a fort here, called Fort Patience; and under it is the village, inhabited only by fishermen. The other inhabitants are addicted to husbandry, and sell their corn to other countries. There is plenty of game, which is very commodious for the Dutch factory. This is called Little Acon; Great Acon being farther inland, and a kind of a republic.

ACRO-CORINTH. The isthmus of Corinth, which unites the continent of Greece with that of Peloponnesus. The citadel of Corinth, known by the name of Acro-Corinth, was situated on a high mountain, between these two continents, which are there divided by a narrow neck of land; so that this fortress cuts off all communication by land, from the inner part of the isthmus, and can awe, if well garrisoned, all Greece; for which reason Philip king of Macedon used to call it the fetters of Greece.

ACROPOLIS, a fortress belonging to Athens, in European Turkey, built on a steep rock, with only one ascent to it. At the bottom of it stood the rich and beautiful temples of Minerva and Victory without wings.

ACROTERI, a small town in the island of Santorin, lying in the sea of Candia in the Mediterranean. Lat. 36, 25, N. Long. 26, 1, E.

ACSAR, or AMZARBA, a city of Cilicia, in Asia, on the river Pyramus; now ruined by the Turks. It lies eight miles east of Flaviada. Lat. 38, 50, N. Long. 64, 20, E.

ACSOR, a town on the river Nile, in Egypt; famed for its earthen ware.

ACSTED, or ACSTEDA, a town in the duchy of Bremen, in Germany, twenty-four miles to the north of Bremen. Lat. 53, 45, N. Long. 8, 30, E.

ACTIUM, the ancient name of Cape Figalo, in Epyrus, a province of European Turkey; famous for the naval battle between Marc Antony and Augustus; in which the former, flying basely after Cleopatra, was totally defeated. Augustus built the city of Nicopolis in memory of this victory, and instituted the Actium games. It was formerly a considerable city, and adorned with a beautiful temple of Apollo; but is now an ordinary sea-port town and promontory.

ACTON, East and West, two villages in Middlesex; six miles from London. The first is noted for its medicinal wells. The parish-church is in the other village, a mile to the west, in the road to Oxford; but this place is only noted for some some gentlemen's seats. Betwixt the two Actons is Friar's-place.

ACTON BURNEL, a village in Shropshire, 3 miles from Great Wenlock; which has a castle. In the reign of Edward I. a parliament was held here, the Lords sitting in the castle, and the Commons in a barn, belonging then to the abbot of St. Peter and St. Paul at Shrewsbury, which is still standing. In this session was renewed the famous act called Statute-merchant.

ACUMOLO, a small place in the Farther Abruzzo, a province of Naples, in Italy. Lat. 39, 30, N. Long. 17, 20, E.

ACWELL, a village near Oxford, in Oxfordshire; where are the vestiges of an ancient fortification, called Acwell or Awell-cop; supposed to have been made by the Danes in 1010, when they passed this way through the Chiltern hills, and burnt Oxford.

ACZUD, a little town in Moldavia, in European Turkey; on the river Misslovo, below the town of Bramlow. Lat. 46, 20, N. Long. 29, 10, E.

ADAK, a lake of salt water, on the western coast of the Caspian sea.

ADAM, or AODAM, a city, mentioned Josh. iii. 16, to be situated near Zaratan; where the waters divided for a dry passage for the children of Israel, in the same manner as those of the Red-sea before had done. See ZARANTA.

ADAMS HEIDE, a place in the government of Old Natangen, and subdivision of Nordenburg; belonging to the kingdom of Prussia; which Wandlaken sold, in 1737, to king Frederick-William for 42,000 dollars. Lat. 54, 10, N. Long. 22, 15, E.

ADAM'S-PIKE, a high mountain of the East-Indies, in the island of Ceylon; on the top of which they believe the first man was created; and there is the shape of a man's foot cut out of the rock, about five or six feet in length, which they pretend is the print of his foot. And near this is a reef of rocks, which run over to the continent, called Adam's bridge; for they say, it was made by angels to carry him over to the main land. However, we must observe, that these are European names; for the first man is not called Adam by the Easterns.

ADANA, or ADENA, a city of Cilicia, in Asiatic Turkey, situated about 30 miles east of Tarsus. The country about it is rich and fertile; and the ground produces such fruits all the year round as in other climates grow only at certain seasons, particularly melons, cucumbers, pomegranates, pulse, and herbs of all sorts. The winters here are very mild and serene; but the summers are so hot that the inhabitants are obliged to shelter themselves among the mountains, called Cayassa; where they continue six months, amidst shady trees, grottos, springs, &c. On the south side of Adana, and at the foot of its walls, runs a large river called Choquen, on whose banks stands a castle built on a rock; and though little, yet is very strong, having a garrison of soldiers, who live in it with their wives and children, making forty or fifty families. In it is a round prison, about 60 feet in circumference, and forty in depth. Going out of the town, on the same side with the castle, you cross a stately bridge of fifteen arches, in the way to the aqueducts; at the bottom of which are several wheels for drawing water from the Choquen, and which is conveyed, by different conduits, into all parts of the town. Few cities in this part of the world have a greater number of beautiful fountains than this, which the learned Huettius supposes to have been called Adana, from Eden, on account of its fine situation and fruitful soil; it being resorted to from all the towns of Cilicia, especially those situated on the mountains, for its wines, corn, and other fruits. Adana is about eighteen miles from the Mediterranean. Lat. 37, 16, N. Long. 35, 42, E.

ADARE, a little town, in the county of Limerick, and province of Munster, in Ireland, on the river Mage, a little above its influx into the Shannon.

ADARETON, a considerable island in the lake Van, or Wan, anciently Avenic, in Turcomania; on which are several villages, and a monastery of Armenian monks.

ADASA, a city of Judæa, near Beth-horon; where Judas Maccabæus overthrew and killed Nicanor. Lat. 31, 40, N. Long. 44, 40, E.

ADDA, a stream issuing from the lago di Como, in the duchy of Milan; which, after running from N. W. to S. E. at last takes the name of a river; being then called the Adda; and falls into the Po, near Cremona. By a canal it has communication with Milan.

ADDA, or ABDUA, a river rising in mount Braulio; and falling into the county of Bormio, a lordship belonging to the subjects of the Grisons, at the foot of the Alps; whence it passes into the Valteline, and thence into the lake of Como.

ADDA, or ADIS. See ADIS.

ADDA, or GIERA D'ADDA, a little country in the duchy of Milan, between the rivers Adda and Serio; in which territory is the town of Agnadel, famous for the great victory which Lewis XII. gained there over the Venetians in 1509.

ADDINGTON, a village in Surry, 3 miles from Croydon, and near Ewel; whose church (tho' 300 years old, is yet very firm) is a very irregular building. This village lies at the descent of a high a high spacious common, to which it gives its name. The lord of the manor, in the reign of Henry III. held it by the service of making a mess of pottage in an earthen pot, in the king's kitchen, and carrying it to his table at his coronation; and so late as the coronation of Charles II. it was claimed to be performed by the then lord of the manor, and the service accepted.

ADDLE, a village in the west riding of Yorkshire, not far from Leeds; and rendered remarkable for a moor adjacent to it; where, in 1702, were discovered the outlines of a Roman town, with many fragments of urns, and a large stone aqueduct; and at a little distance from thence is a Roman camp, nearly entire, with remains of some sepulchral monuments.

ADEA, a province of Annian, on the east coast of Africa.

DEA, a province of Upper Ethiopia, bordering on the Red-sea. It was once subject to the kings of Abissinia, but now principally to the Turks and Portuguese. It is a fruitful country; abounding in woods, and those well stocked with cattle and fruit. The inhabitants are olive-coloured, and originally Arabians. Magadona is their most noted town, pleasantly seated, and much frequented by the Portuguese; who barter Indian commodities for honey, wax, and Abissinian slaves; which last is their principal merchandise.

ADEBETH, an island, otherwise called GEZIRATH; formerly Lachos, and the Golden Island, in the Lower-Egypt, in Africa. It is situated in the Nile, about a league above Foua. Dapper says, it is full of villages and stately palaces, which yet can hardly be seen from the river, by reason of thick lofty trees covering them all round.

ADEL, or the kingdom of ZEILA, from its capital city, a part of Ajan, or Annian, in Africa. It is bounded on the south by Magadoxo; on the east by part of the Eastern Ocean and the desert coast; on the north by the straits of Babel-mandel; and on the west by the Gallees, with the kingdoms of Dancari and Balli. The king and all his subjects are Mahometans. The people along the coast, as far as Barbora, are fair or brown: but grow blacker as you advance towards the N. W. They wear cotton garments from the waist downwards, and have the rest of their bodies bare: but persons of quality wear callico gowns, which cover the whole body. They love war, and fight with intrepid courage: but, not knowing how to make their weapons, they purchase them of the Turks, in exchange for slaves and spoil, which they get from the enemy.

A D

ADEL, the capital of the kingdom of the same name, situated 300 miles south of Mocha. Lat. 8, 5, N. Long. 44, 20, E.

ADELBODEN, a parochial village, in the canton of Bern, in Switzerland; situated in a wine country, but the mountains about it afford excellent pasturage. In its neighbourhood is a sulphurous spring, which is used in bathing; and in 1711 a copper-mine was also opened here, but has since been discontinued. At this place the river Kandel is joined by the Engstlen.

ADEN, or, as the Arabs call it, ABYAN, or IBIAN, is a considerable trading-port in the kingdom of Mocha, though formerly the capital of a kingdom of its own name, 120 miles S. E. of Mocha; near the coast upon the straits of Babel-mandel, and the cape of its name. It is a large and populous city, but its vast trade hath been in a great measure removed to Mocha; till then it was a place of vast resort, with a large and commodious haven, well fortified and frequented; being conveniently situated in the center, between the Persian-gulph and the Red-sea; and esteemed one of the finest and wealthiest cities of Arabia Felix. It is almost encompassed with high mountains on the land-side. Some geographers have told us, that it was seated on each side of a river which ran through it, and supplied it with water; whereas a modern traveller, who was there at the beginning of this century, says, that it is supplied with that useful element by means of an aqueduct, which conveys it from the adjacent mountains into a beautiful canal, about a quarter of a league from the town, and from which the inhabitants are plentifully furnished with it. The city is surrounded with walls, now greatly decayed; especially towards the sea-side, except where they have supplied the defect with some platforms, at proper distances, with five or six batteries of cannon, some of which are sixty-pounders. These are supposed to be part of the artillery which Soliman II. who took this place, and conquered most of the adjacent country, was forced to abandon, when the Arabians stripped him of his conquests. There is no other way of coming to this city, from the land, but by a narrow road made on the sea-side, in form of a peninsula; at the head of which there is a fort, and corps de guard from space to space; and, about a gun-shot lower, a second fort with forty guns, several batteries, and a constant garrison; so that there is no possibility of making a descent on that side. Besides these works, there is, on the same road, between the last fort and the town, a third fort, guarded by another garrison, and defended by 12 pieces of cannon. And, with regard to the sea-side, which which is the only way of coming to the city, it is a bay, nine leagues in breadth, and, as it were, divided into two roads, the largest of which is at a good distance from the town; the least lies near it, and is called the port. The last is about a league wide, reckoning from the citadel; which commands it, with fifty pieces of cannon, to the peninsula above-mentioned, where the three forts just described stand. Ships ride here in 18, 20, and 22 fathoms water. As for the city itself, it is very large, and hath still many fine houses, with terraces on the top; but a great many others are now in ruins: but, from its present appearance, the town, with its advantageous situation, seems to have been one of the finest, most considerable, and important cities, as well as the chief bulwark, of Arabia Fœlix. The adjacent country is very delightful, though small and narrow, by reason of the hills that surround it; yet both yield a fine prospect and a very pleasant verdure. The Nubian geographer says, it was once the center of commerce between the east and west; and modern authors take it for the Madoce of Ptolemy, or rather as the famed Arabian Emporium, celebrated by the same author. Sir Henry Middleton says, that the stone walls surrounding it were, when he visited the place, in a good condition: and adds, that the town lies exposed to the sea-ward, being quite dry at low-water; but that nature and art have both concurred to defend it, there being two vast rocks, so craggy and steep, as not to be ascended, but by one narrow path; and that forts and batteries are erected on them, well-furnished with artillery and ammunition. The city, he observes, is supplied with provisions from the opposite coasts of Africa; for which purpose they keep a constant correspondence with the town of Barбора. The Turks took the city of Aden by treachery in the year 1538; and, with their natural brutality, hung up the king of it, as they had done that of Zibet, whose country they conquered at the same time, and made it the seat of a begleberg. But the Arabians revolted, and are now under the protection of the king of Mocha; or, as others will have it, both are subject to the king of Genen. Lat. 12, 20, N. Long. 46, 30, E.

ADENBURG. See ALTENBURG.

ADENSEN, a parochial village, in the principality of Calenberg, and district of Adensen, in Lower Saxony.

ADERBIGAN, a province of Persia; bounded on the N. by Armenia Proper; on the S. by Irac-Agemi; on the E. by Ghilan; and on the W. by Curdistan. The principal town is Tauris. Long. from 43 to 51, E. Lat. 36 to 39, N.

VOL. I. — No. 2.

ADERBORN, a town of Pomerania, in Germany, a little below Stetin, on the Oder; subject to Sweden.

ADERBURG, a small city of Brandenburg, on the Oder, nine leagues from Stetin.

ADERNO, in Latin Adranum, a small place in the Val di Demino, a province of Sicily, at the foot of mount Ætna; and watered by a river of its own name. Here was a temple dedicated to Adranus, god of the Sicilians, kept by above 1000 dogs, of which Ælian tells almost 1000 fables. Lat. 38, 5, N. Long. 15, 30, N.

ADIABENE, a province of ancient Assyria. The whole country has been sometimes called by the same name. See LYCUS.

ADIAZZO. See AJACCIO.

ADIGE, or ETSCH, anciently called Athesis, a river of Lombardy; rising in the Tirolese, or Rhætian Alps, in the valley of Mallersheld, near Slurentz. It passes by Trent and Verona, S. of the former and E. of the latter; and, after receiving the Eyssach, a league from Bolzana, discharges itself into the Adriatic Sea. It is the only considerable stream in Lombardy which does not fall into the Po.

ADIRBEITZAN, a province of Persia, in Asia, part of the ancient Media. It is bounded on the N. by the province of Chirvan; on the S. by the provinces of Eyracagem and Curdistan, or the ancient Assyria; on the E. by the province of Gilan and the Caspian Sea, and on the W. by Turcomania.

ADIS, anciently a city near Carthage, in Africa; which Attilius Regulus besieged, and took, in his Carthaginian expedition.

ADLSBERG, a famous mountain and cavern, in the duchy of Carniola; belonging to Austria, 27 miles from Fiume. About half way up the acclivity is the entrance into this large cavern, which is divided into several subterraneous passages. In the subterraneous passages of this cave you may rove above 2 miles, where are prodigious large places, or squares, in which houses of considerable bigness, and even villages, might stand. In some places also are uncommon depths. Many curious figures of stone, natural stone theatres, bridges, &c. are to be seen here; and, near the entrance of the cavern, the river Poig, which is about a mile's distance from it, issues out of a mountain, runs into an aperture in the rock, and then glides off under the cavern. The grotto of St. Mary Magdalen, which lies about three quarters of a mile distant from the town of the same name as the cavern, is uncommonly beautiful. A person would imagine he walks round the ruined walls of an old magnificent palace, lace, of which a part appears yet undamaged, and part broken, with ruined columns.

ADLSBERG, or ALDERSBERG, a well-built market-town; situated at the foot of the before-mentioned mountain, on which stands a citadel.

ADMAH, one of the five cities, supposed in the vale of Siddim, or Zoar; all of whom, except Bela, or Zoar, were destroyed by fire from heaven. Gen. xiv. 20. Deut. xxix. 23. Hos. xi. 8.

ADMIRALTY-ISLAND, an island, mentioned in the account of the N. W. passage to Japan, situated near Loms-bay; whose western shore is foul and shoally pretty far off at sea, and its soundings very uncertain. Lat. 75, 5, N. Long. 55, 50, E.

ADO, a handsome seat, belonging to the Upland jurisdiction, in Sweden; situated on the Maler-lake, near Stockholm.

ADOLPH-FREDERIKS-SCHACHT, a silver mine, in Sweden; which, between the years 1742 and 1747, produced 186 marks, 10 loths of silver.

ADOM, a territory on the Gold-coast of Guinea; which extends along both the rivers Chama and Ancober, 16 miles distant from each other. It is a republic, governed by 6 chiefs; but the inhabitants are merely an assembly of thieves. There are several gold mines here. The soil is good and fruitful, and the rivers abound with fish, as does the pasture with cattle.

ADON, a populous village in the province of Stuhl-Weissenburgh, in Hungary; situated in a fruitful country, near the Danube. Lat. 47, 30, N. Long. 19, 25, E.

ADONIS, or ADONIUS, a very remarkable river of Phœnicia, near the city of Byblos; which flows from mount Libanus, and is subject to inundations; when, at certain seasons, it is discoloured red; whence arose the fable of Adonis.

ADOUR, a river of Gascony, in France; rising in the mountains of Bigorre, at a place called Tremoula. It is navigable near Granade, in the territory of Marfan; and, through an opening, called Boucalt, which was made for it in 1579; by means of a sluice, it falls into the ocean. There are two other little rivers in France of the same name.

ADRA, a little strong sea-port of Granada, and and bishopric of Gaudix, in Spain, 23 miles S. of Gaudix.

ADRAMYTUM, now LANDRAMITI, called by the Turks Endromit, a city of Mysia, in Asiatic Turkey; situated at the foot of mount Ida, between Antandros and Elæa, on a gulph of the same name, near its mouth. It is the see of a bishop, subject to that of Ephesus; and Helladius, bishop of it, subscribed to the Ephesian council. Lat. 39, 50, N. Long. 26, 20, E.

A D

ADRANA, a river of Germany, generally called Eder, in Upper Hesse; which see.

ADRAON, ADRATON, or CASTRUM BERNARDI DE STAMPIS, a town of Arabia, in Asia; formerly a bishopric, under the archbishop of Botzra. This town is mentioned in the 6th session of the council of Chalcedon. Lat. 29, 30, N. Long. 40, 10, E.

ADRASTIA, a town of Troas, in Asia; so called from Adrastus, who built it, and was famous for the temple of Nemesis and the oracle of Apollo. Lat. 39, 40, N. Long. 28, 30, E.

ADRIA, or HADRIA, by Pliny called Atria, a town of Il Polesine di Rovigo, a province belonging to the republic of Venice, in Italy. It is an ancient city of Gallia Transpadana; situated on the river Tartaro, 26 miles S. of Venice. It was formerly a considerable place, and the see of a bishop, which has been removed to Rovigo, and gave name to the Adriatic Sea; but is now in a mean condition, by the inundations of the sea and other casualties. It lies about 5 miles from the confines of the Ecclesiastical-state. Lat. 45, 41, N. Long. 13, 15, E.

ADRIANE, ADRIANSMOUNT, or SIERRA DE ADRIANE, a chain of mountains in Guipuzcoa, a subdivision of Biscay, in Spain: it has its name from the hermit Adrian, who resided here. The road over it to Alaba and Old Castile is very difficult; just at its beginning is a darkish way, of between forty and fifty paces long, which has been cut through the rock; after this you must ascend a mountain reckoned the highest of the Pyrennees. These mountains are little inhabited; but here and there some cottages of shepherds may be seen.

ADRIANOPLE, or HADRIANOPLE, a large city, in a plain on the Maritz, in Romania, a province of European Turkey. It was first called Arestes; and had its present name from the improvements made in it by the emperor Adrian, who repaired it in the year 122. Before his time it was called Ascudam, and was the capital of Bessi. It is situated on a rising ground; and, on the plain, at the foot of it, and partly surrounded with hills, the ancient city appears to have stood, where great part of the walls remain, though they seem to be of the middle ages; and there are many inscriptions, which mention the later Greek emperors who repaired them. The river Meritz, which is the ancient Heber, runs to the S. of the town, and is joined by the other two rivers a little lower; one of which, called the Ardah, is navigable from Philopoli by floats, and must be the Heber above the conflux; the other is called the Tounfah. The Meritz is a fine river, when it is joined by the

the other two, and is navigable down to Enos, a town at the mouth of the river, which retains its ancient name; but as there are some shallows in the river they do not navigate it in the summer-months. Adrianople is very delightfully situated, in a beautiful plain, watered by three rivers. The shops, which are well-built and furnished, and the kanes, are within the city-walls. They have two or three beautiful mosques on the outside of the city; the largest may vie with the best in Constantinople, and is built in a good taste. There are two mosques in the city, which were churches; and there are two large verd antique pillars in the portico of one of them. This is one of the four royal cities, which the grand signiors have made their residence. The seraglio is at the W. of the town and of the river Meritz, which runs both on the W. and S. sides of the city; it is built on a fine plain spot. The city is governed by the janitzar-aga, who has an absolute authority, both in civil and criminal affairs. It is a place of great trade, supplying all the country with goods, brought by land from Constantinople, and from Smyrna and other parts by sea. In 1360, sultan Amarath I. took it from the Christians; after which time it was the residence of the Turkish emperors till they conquered Constantinople. It is built in a circular form, surrounded with walls and towers; being 8 miles in circuit, and has good houses; but the streets are narrow, uneven, and very dirty. The emperor sometimes comes to Adrianople, either for pleasure or security, when it is not safe staying at Constantinople on account of war or the plague. The things most worthy of notice in Adrianople are, some mosques, covered with copper, decorated with high and noble towers; with galleries, adorned with a great variety of large hewn pillars, cast pedestals, and plates of metal; costly marble, neatly carved doors, fine fountains, stately entrances, and curiously-wrought tapestry. The great trade, to which the navigable river here very much contributes, has drawn to this place persons of various nations. The circum-jacent soil is extremely fruitful. Sultan Selim's magnificent mosque, by its standing on the side of a hill, in the middle of the city, is seen from every part. On a hill, within the city, is a murada, or monastery, of Turkish monks. Adrianople is the second city in the empire, and lies 150 miles N. W. of Constantinople. Lat. 43, 12, N. Long. 28, 14, E.

ADRIANS-WALL, or GRAHAM'S-DYKE, of which great remains are to be seen, between Dunbriton-firth and the firth of Forth, in the shire of Sterling, Scotland. This wall was built by the Romans, as a fence against the incursions of the northern marauders, or wild clans of people, in the Highlands.

ADRUMETUM, now MAHOMETTA, a city built by the Phœnicians, and well fortified; situated in a fruitful country, between Carthage and the Syrtes: a council sat here, A. D. 394.

ADVENTURE-ISLAND, a small island in the South Sea; lying in 17, 4, S. Lat. and 144, 30, W. Long. So called from the ship Adventure, in which Capt. Furneaux sailed to the South-Sea.

ADUGAK, one of the Lyffie, Ostrovoe, or Fox islands. See FOX-ISLANDS.

ADULAH, a mountain in Navarre, in Spain; lying between Pamplona and St. Jean de Pied de Port, over which are a few passes into France.

ADULIS, one of the chief ancient ports of Æthiopia.

ADULLAM, a town to the west of Hebron, in the land of Canaan; mentioned frequently in the history of David's flight from Saul. Among the kings slain by Joshua, is mentioned the king of Adullam; a city assigned to the tribe of Judah, Chron. xi. 35. A cave in its neighbourhood is remarkable for the shelter David found in it.

ADUR, a river in Suffex, which runs into the North Sea, near Adrington.

ADWALTON, a village in the West-riding of Yorkshire, 5 miles S. W. of Leeds; with fairs on January 26, February 26, Thursday in Easter-week, Thursday fortnight after Easter, Thursday month after Easter, Whit-Thursday, and every Thursday fortnight after, till Michaelmas.

ADZEL; a mean place, in the general government of Riga; now belonging to Russia. Lat. 56, 30, N. Long. 38, 5, E.

ADZENETA, a small town of Valencia, in Spain; situated upon Mount Pegna Golosa, which abounds in several sorts of esculent plants.

ÆA, a city on the Phasis, in Colchis, 15 miles from the Euxine Sea. Some geographers think this to be the same city as Æapolis, mentioned by Ptolemy.

ÆBORA, ÆBURA, (see TALAVERA) a city of New Castile, in Spain; seated on the Tagus, 12 leagues W. of Toledo, in the road to Lisbon.

ÆELFORS, a gold mine, in the parish of Alshedra, in Jonkioping district; a subdivision of Smaland, in Sweden. It was discovered in the year 1738; and from its produce gold ducats were coined.

ÆEPRSUM, an ancient city of Eubœa, situated between Chalcis and the promontory Cœcerum; famous for its hot-baths.

ÆDESSA,

Æ G

ÆDESSA, or ÆGAS, formerly the capital city of Ematia, in Macedonia; situated on the river Erigonius, 32 miles W. of Pellā, and 58 W. of Thessalonica. The kings of Macedonia were buried here for many ages. The town is called Vodena, and the river Vistritza. See ÆDESSA. Lat. 40, 20, N. Long. 48, 45, E.

ÆDUI, an ancient and powerful people of Gallia Celtica; who were possessed of all that part of France we now call Autunois, the greater part of the duchy of Burgundy, the territories of Carolois, Chalons, and Auxois. They had the privilege of senators of Rome, styling themselves the brothers of the Romans.

ÆGADES, or ÆGATES, three small islands lying on the W. side of Sicily, opposite to the main-land between Marsella and Trapani. Their names are Levenzo, Favignana, and Maretamo.

ÆGÆ, a town of Macedonia; once the metropolis of the kingdom, and the burying-place of their kings. Also an episcopal city of Cilicia, under the archbishop of Anazarabenus, on the sea-coast. It is now in ruins.

ÆGIDA, now CAPO D'ISTRIA, the principal town in the N. of the territory of Istria; situated in a little island, joined to the land by a bridge. In an inscription, it is called Ægidis Insula. Long. 14, 20, E. Lat. 45, 50. It was afterwards called Justinopolis, after the emperor Justinus.

ÆGEAN-SEA. See ARCHIPELAGO-SEA.

ÆGINA, an island in the Archipelago, belonging to European Turkey; anciently called Ceone, and Myrmidonia. It lies in the bay of Engia, which derives its name from it: the island itself having the same appellation through the corruption of sailors. The ancient inhabitants, on account of the great pains they took in cultivating the land, were called Myrmidons; that is, pismires, or ants. Not far from its capital, which contains about 800 houses, with a castle, are the remains of a magnificent structure, probably one of the two famous temples that formerly graced this island. Lat. 37, 41, N. Long. 23, 56, E.

ÆGIRA, a city of ancient Greece; situated on a high hill, and almost inaccessible; was the capital of Achaia, and now supposed to be the small village of Hyolocastro, it having been ruined by an earthquake.

ÆGIS, the metropolis of Macedonia.

ÆGIUM, a city in Peloponnesus, in Greece; where the Greeks rendezvoused, in order for the invasion of Troy. It became the metropolis of Achaia.

ÆGLSTAWIK, a good harbour, about half a mile from Sodertelge, a town in Suder-torn, a subdivision of Sudermanland, in Sweden. Lat. 59, 20, N. 18, 40, E.

ÆGOS-POTAMOS, a river in the Thracian Chersonesus, falling, with a south-east course, into the Hellespont, to the north of Sestos; also a town, station, or road for ships, at its mouth. Here the Athenians, under Conon, through the fault of his colleague, Isocrates, received so fatal a blow from the Lacedæmonians, under Lysander, in a sea-engagement, as to cost them their liberty and their all.

ÆLEN, a district in Switzerland, belonging to the canton of Bern. This government, lordship, or county, after having been for some time subject to Savoy, came to the land-holders of the Valais; who, in 1536, exchanged it with Bern, for the district of Gundis; though others say, the city of Bern, assisted by the people of Sanen and Oesch, in the Burgundian war, took the castle, sword in hand, and erased it to the ground; and the town and district were, in 1533, confirmed to Bern. The district consists of a tract of fertile hills and vales; producing excellent wines, and breeding large herds of cattle. There are several salt-springs in the district, which turn to good account; and four villages, or towns: that of Ælen, or Elen, is a large market-town, seated on an eminence, which is the residence of the governor: it was, in 1740, greatly damaged by an inundation.

ÆLIA, a name frequently given to Jerusalem.

ÆLII-PONS, one of the fortresses near the wall, or rampart; or, in the words of the Notitia, through the line of the hither wall; built, as is thought, by Adrian. Now Porteland, (Camden) in Northumberland, between Newcastle and Morpeth.

ÆLST. See ALOST.

ÆMATHIA, the most ancient name given to that territory of Greece; afterwards called Macedonia. See MACEDONIA.

ÆMILIAN-WAY, VIA ÆMILIA, anciently the name of two consular ways; the one made by M. Æmilius Lepidus, who was consul with C. Flaminius Nepos, in the year of Rome 566. It begins at the bridge of Rimini, in the province of Romagna, in Italy, where the Via Flaminia terminated, passed through Cesena, Forli, Faenza, Imola, Bologna, Modena, Reggio Piacenza, Parma; and extended as far as Aquileia. The other Via Æmilia was paved by M. Æmilius Scaurus, censor, in the year of Rome 644; and passed through Pisa, Luna, Sabbatii, and and other towns, to Dertona, or Tortona. Nothing can be more pleasant than the Æmilian Way from Bologna to Bertinero; it has the appearance of a continued garden, being on both sides fides decorated with lovely eminences and fields, covered with fruit-trees. It is pretty straight, and so broad that two coaches can pass a-breast.

ÆMINIUM, a city of ancient Spain, in the province of Lusitania, now Portugal, near the northern bank of the Munda, a little to the south of Talabriga.

ÆMONIA, the ancient name of Thessaly.

ÆNON, a town (mentioned John iii. 23.) which stood near Salim, about 8 miles south of Scythopolis.

ÆOLIAE-INSULÆ, now ISOLE DI LIPARI, seven islands, situated between Sicily and Italy; so called from Æolus, who reigned there about the time of the Trojan war. The Greeks call them Hephæstides; and the Romans Vulcaniæ, from their fiery eruptions. They are also called Liparæorum Insulæ, from the chief island, Lipara.

ÆOLIAN-ISLANDS, lie off the coast of Sicily, in the Tyrrhenian or Tuscan Sea. They are also known by the name of the Vulcanian Islands; because some of them have volcanoes. See LIPARI and STROMBOLO.

ÆOLIS, or ÆOLIA, the ancient name of part of the W. coast of Asia Minor, in Asiatic Turkey; contiguous to Phrygia Minor, by which it is bounded on the N. the Ægean or Æolian Sea terminates it on the W. Ionia on the S. and Lydia on the E. It was only a narrow tract of land; but constituted the proconsular Asia in the time of the Romans. Its chief cities were Elæa, Myrina, Cuma, and Phocæa.

ÆRDENBURG. See ARDENBURG.

ÆRDING, or ERDING, a government, with a small town of the same name, in Lower Bavaria, in Germany; situated on the banks of the little river Sempt, and produces the best grain in all Lower Bavaria. In 1632 the greatest part of the town was set on fire by the Swedes; and, in 1648, entirely laid in ashes by them.

ÆRIA, a name given by the Greeks to Egypt.

ÆRNEN, in Latin ARAGNUM, a large village in the Valais, in Switzerland; surrounded by a wall, and the houses are slated. It is the principal town of the tything, and in its council-house are held the meeting. With this town is incorporated another village on the Deush-hill, otherwise stiled Auf-deisch, or Deistalden; and in Latin, Mons Dei; at the foot of which hill is a lofty stone-bridge over the Rhone.

ÆRSCHOT. See ARSHOT.

ÆTH. See ATH.

ÆTHIOPIA. See ETHIOPIA.

ÆTHRA, a river in South Halland, in Sweden, near the town of Falkenberg; it issues from the Allung-lake, and empties itself into the sea.

ÆTHUSA, or ÆGUSA, a little island, mentioned by geographers, lying a little to the westward of Lopadusa, on the coast of Africa Proper.

ÆTNA, (in the Itineraries ÆTHNA, supposed from aitō, to burn; according to Bochart, from Athuna, a furnace, or Ætuna, darkness), now Monte Gibello; a vulcano, or burning mountain, of Sicily, situated in Lat. 30, N. Long. 15, E.

This mountain, famous from the remotest antiquity both for its bulk and terrible eruptions, stands in the eastern part of the island, in a very extensive plain, called Val Demonj, from the notion of its being inhabited by devils, who torment the spirits of the damned, in the bowels of this vulcano.

Concerning the dimensions of mount Ætna, we can scarce extract any thing consistent, even from the accounts of the latest and most ingenious travellers. Pindar, who lived about 435 years before Christ, calls it the Pillar of Heaven, on account of its great height. All modern writers likewise agree that this mountain is very high and very large; but differ excessively both as to its height and magnitude: some making it no less than 12 miles high, others 8, others 6, some 4; while Mr. Brydone and Sir William Hamilton, who lately ascended to its highest summit, reduce its height to little more than 2 miles; nay, by some it is reduced to 10,036 feet, somewhat less than 2 miles. No less remarkable are the differences concerning its circumference: some making it only 60 miles round, others 100; and Signior Recuperò, from whom Mr. Brydone had his information in this respect, affirms it to be no less than 138 miles in circuit.

We are sorry to detract from the merit of Mr. Brydone, or to involve in obscurity what he hath been at so much pains to elucidate; but every person, who compares the account of mount Ætna's circumference, given by Signior Recuperò, and to which Mr. Brydone seems to have assented, with its apparent circumference, on the map prefixed to that gentleman's Tour through Sicily and Malta, must at once be struck with the prodigious disparity. Indeed, it is plain that in the map the geographer hath not left room for any such mountain; nor can we help thinking that, by comparing the distances of some of the Sicilian towns from one another, Signior Recuperò's dimensions will be found enormously exaggerated. Certain it is, that there the geographer hath placed Catania, which stands at the foot of mount Ætna, on one side no more than 28 miles from the most distant point of the river Alcantara, which forms the boundary on the opposite side; so that a circle, whose radius is 14 or 15 miles, must encompass as much space as we can possibly think is occupied by the basis of mount Ætna. Thus we will reduce the circumference of this famous mountain to between 80 and 90 miles; and even when we do so it must still be acknowledged to be very great.

But if we are embarrassed with the circumference of Ætna, we are much more so with the accounts relating to its height; and one circumstance particularly creates almost insurmountable difficulties. It is agreed upon by all travellers, and, among the rest, by Sir William Hamilton, that from Catania, where the ascent first begins, to the summit, is not less than 30 miles. The descent on the other side we have no account of; but, whatever supposition we make, the height of the mountain must be prodigious. If we suppose it likewise to be 30 miles, and that mount Ætna can be represented by an equilateral triangle, each of whose sides is 30 miles, we shall have an amazing elevation indeed, no less than 26 miles perpendicular!—Such a height being beyond all credibility we must contract the sides of our triangle in proportion to its basis. We shall begin with allowing 10 miles for the difference between a straight line from Catania to the summit, and the length of the road, occasioned by the inequalities of the mountain; and, supposing the descent on the other side to be somewhat shorter, we may call it 15 miles. Mount Ætna will now be represented by a scalene triangle, whose base is 30 miles, its longest side 20, and its shortest 15; from which proportions we shall still find its height to be between 8 and 9 miles. This is still incredible; and, when all the various relations concerning the height of Ætna are compared, we hope it will not be thought presumptuous in us to give it as our opinion, that the true dimensions of this mountain are as yet unknown.

Concerning the products and general appearance of this volcano, authors are much better agreed. The journey from Catania to its summit has been lately described by three travellers, M. D'Orville, Mr. Brydone, and Sir William Hamilton. All these agree that this single mountain affords an epitome of the different climates throughout the whole world: towards the foot it is very hot; farther up more temperate; and grows gradually more and more cold the higher we ascend. At the very top, it is perpetually covered with snow; thence the whole island is supplied with that article, so necessary in a hot climate, and without which the natives of Sicily could not be inhabited. So great is the demand for this commodity that the bishop's revenues, which are considerable, arise from the sale of mount Ætna's snow; and he is said to draw 1000*l.* a year from one small portion, lying on the north side of the mountain. Great quantities of snow and ice are likewise exported to Malta and Italy, making a considerable branch of commerce. On the north side of this snowy region Mr. Brydone was assured that there are several small lakes which never thaw; and that the snow, mixed with the ashes and salts of the mountain, are accumulated to a vast depth. The quantity of salts contained in this mountain, he, with great probability, conjectures to be one reason of the preservation of its snows; for salt increases the coldness of snow to a surprising degree. In the middle of the snowy region stands the great crater, or mouth of Ætna; from which, though contrary to the usual mode of travellers, we shall begin our particular account of this mountain. Sir William Hamilton describes the crater as a little mountain, about a quarter of a mile perpendicular, and very steep; situated in the middle of a gently inclining plain, of about 9 miles in circumference. It is entirely formed of stones and ashes; and, as Mr. Hamilton was informed by several people of Catania, had been thrown up about 25 or 30 years before the time (1769) he visited Ætna. Before this mountain was thrown up there was only a prodigious chasm, or gulph, in the middle of the above-mentioned plain; and it has been remarked, that about once in 100 years the top of Ætna falls in; which undoubtedly must be the case at certain periods, or the mountain obliged continually to increase in height. As this little mountain, though emitting smoke from every pore, appeared solid and firm, Mr. Hamilton and his companions went up to the very top. In the middle is a hollow, about 2 miles and a half in circumference, according to Mr. Hamilton; 3 miles and a half, according to Mr. Brydone; and 3 or 4, according to M. D'Orville. The inside is crusted over with salts and sulphur of different colours. It goes shelving down from the top like an inverted cone; the depth, in Mr. Hamilton's opinion, nearly corresponding to the height of the little mountain. From many places of this space issue volumes of sulphureous smoke; which, being much heavier than the circumambient air, instead of ascending in it, roll down the side of the mountain, till, coming to a more dense atmosphere, it shoots off horizontally, and forms a large tract in the air, according to the direction of the wind; which, happily for our travellers, carried it exactly to the side opposite to which they were placed. In the middle of this funnel is the tremendous and unfathomable fathomable gulph, so much celebrated in all ages, both as the terror of this life and the place of punishment in the next. From this gulph continually issue terrible and confused noises; which, in eruptions, are increased to such a degree as to be heard at a prodigious distance. Its diameter is probably very different at different times: for Mr. Hamilton observed, by the wind clearing away the smoke from time to time, that the inverted hollow cone was contracted almost to a point; while Mr. D'Orville and Mr. Brydone found the opening very large. Both Mr. Brydone and Mr. Hamilton found the crater too hot to descend into it; but Mr. D'Orville was bolder; and, accordingly, he and his fellow-traveller, fastened to ropes, which two or three men held, for fear of accidents, descended as near as possible to the brink of the gulph; but the small flames and smoke, which issued from it on every side, and a green sulphur, and pumice-stones quite black, which covered the margin, would not permit them to come so near as to have a full view. They only saw distinctly, in the middle, a mass of matter which rose, in the shape of a cone, to the height of above 60 feet; and which, towards the base, as far as their sight could reach, might be 600 or 800. While they were observing this substance some motion was perceived on the north side, opposite to that whereon they stood; and immediately the mountain began to send forth smoke and ashes. This eruption was preceded by a sensible increase of its internal roarings; which, however, did not continue; but, after a moment's dilatation, as if to give it vent, the volcano resumed its former tranquillity; but as it was by no means proper to make a long stay in such a place our travellers immediately returned to their attendants. On the summit of mount Ætna, Mr. Hamilton observes that he was sensible of a difficulty in respiration, from the too great subtilty of the air, independent of what arose from the sulphureous smoke of the mountain. Mr. Brydone takes no notice of this; which probably arose from the air being in a more rarefied state at the time of Mr. Hamilton's observation than of Mr. Brydone's; the barometer, as observed by the former, standing at 18 inches and 10 lines; by the latter, at 9 inches, 6½ lines. In these high regions there is generally a very violent wind; which, as all our travellers found it constantly blowing from the south, may possibly be commonly directed from that point. Here Mr. Brydone's thermometer fell to 27. The top of Ætna being above the common region of vapours the heavens appear with exceeding great splendor. Mr. Brydone and his company observed, as they ascended in the night, that the number of stars appeared infinitely increased, and the light of each of them appeared brighter than usual; the whiteness of the milky way was like a pure flame, which shot across the heavens; and, with the naked eye, they could observe clusters of stars that were invisible from below. Had Jupiter been visible, he is of opinion that some of his satellites might have been discovered with the naked eye, or at least with a very small pocket-glass. He likewise took notice of several of those meteors, called falling stars; which appeared as much elevated as when viewed from the plain: a proof, according to Mr. Brydone, that "these bodies move in regions much beyond the bounds that some philosophers have assigned to our atmosphere." To have a full and clear prospect from the summit of mount Ætna it is necessary to be there before sun-rise; as the vapours raised by the sun in the day-time will obscure every object: accordingly our travellers took care to arrive there early enough; and all agree, that the beauty of the prospect from thence cannot be expressed. Here Mr. Brydone and Mr. Hamilton had a view of Calabria, in Italy, with the sea beyond it; the Lipari islands, and Stromboli, a volcano, at about 70 miles distance, appeared just under their feet; the whole island of Sicily, with its rivers, towns, harbours, &c. appeared distinct, as if seen on a map. Massa, a Sicilian author, affirms, that the African coast as well as that of Naples, with many of its islands, have been discovered from the top of Ætna. The visible horizon here is not less than 800 or 900 miles in diameter. The pyramidal shadow of the mountain reaches across the whole island, and far into the sea on the other side, forming a visible tract in the air; which, as the sun rises above the horizon, is shortened, and at last confined to the neighbourhood of Ætna. The most beautiful part of the scene however, in Mr. Brydone's opinion, is the mountain itself, the island of Sicily, and the numerous islands lying round it. These last seem to be close to the skirts of Ætna; the distances appearing reduced to nothing. This mountain is divided into three zones; which might properly enough be distinguished by the names of Torrid, Temperate, and Frigid: they are however known by the names of the Piedmontese, or Regione Calta, the cultivated or fertile region; the Sylva, woody or temperate zone; and the Regione Deserta, the frigid, or desert zone, or region. All these are plainly distinguished from the summit. The Regione Deserta is marked out by a circle of snow and ice, which extends on all sides to the distance of about 8 miles, beginning at the foot of the crater. Greatest part of this region is smooth and even. This is immediately succeeded by the Sylvosa, or woody region; which forms a circle of the most beautiful green, surrounding the mountain on all sides. This region is variegated with a vast number of mountains, of a conical form, thrown up by Ætna in those eruptions which burst out from its sides. Mr. Hamilton counted 44 on the Catania side; each having its crater, many with large trees, flourishing both within and without the crater. All these, except a few of late date, have acquired a wonderful degree of fertility. The circumference of this zone, or great circle, according to Recupero, is not less than 70 or 80 miles. It is every where succeeded by the Regione Culta; which is much broader than the rest, and extends on all sides to the foot of the mountain. Here terrible devastations are sometimes committed by the eruptions; and the whole region is likewise full of conical mountains thrown up by them. The circumference of this region is, by Recupero, reckoned 183 miles; but we have already given our reasons for rejecting these dimensions. This region is bounded by the sea to the south and south-east; and on all other sides by the rivers Smetus and Alcantara, which form the boundaries of mount Ætna. About a mile below the foot of the great crater, are found the ruins of an ancient structure, called Il Torre de Filosofo; by some supposed to have been built by the philosopher Empedocles, who took up his habitation here, the better to study the nature of mount Ætna. By others they are supposed to be the ruins of a temple of Vulcan. They are of brick, and seem to have been ornamented with marble. Somewhere in this region also Mr. D'Orville found a great oblong block of polished marble, 8 or 10 feet high, and 3 or 4 thick; though how it came there, was quite unaccountable to him. From Mr. D'Orville's and Mr. Brydone's accounts, we must reckon this part of the mountain pretty steep; but Mr. Hamilton says, that the ascent was so gradual as not to be in the least fatiguing; and had it not been for the snows they might have rode on their mules to the very foot of the crater. The woody region descends 8 or 9 miles below the Regione Deserta, but differs greatly in the temperature of its climate. Mr. Hamilton observed a gradual decrease of the vegetation as he advanced; the under part being covered with large timber trees, which grew gradually less as he approached the third region; at last they degenerated into the small plants of the northern climates. He also observed quantities of juniper and tansey; and was informed by his guide that later in the season (he visited Ætna in June, 1769) there are a great many curious plants; and in some places rhubarb and saffron in great plenty. In Carrera's History of Catania there is a list of all the plants and herbs of Ætna in alphabetical order. This region is extolled by Mr. Brydone as one of the most delightful spots on earth. He lodged for a night in a large cave near the middle, formed by one of the most ancient lavas. It is called La Spelonca del Capriole, or the Goat's-cavern; because it is frequented by those animals, which take refuge there in bad weather. Here his rest was disturbed by a mountain, thrown up in the eruption 1766. It discharged great quantities of smoke, and made several explosions, like heavy cannon fired at a distance; but they could observe no appearance of fire. This gentleman likewise visited the eastern side of the Regione Sylvosa, intending to have ascended that way to the summit, and descended again on the south side to Catania, but found it impracticable; though, what the insurmountable difficulties were he does not mention. On this side part of the woody region was destroyed, in 1755, by an immense torrent of boiling water, which issued from the great crater. Its traces were still very visible, about a mile and an half broad, and in some places more. The soil was then only beginning to recover its vegetative power, which, it seems, this torrent had destroyed for 14 years. Near this place are some beautiful woods of cork and ever-green oak, growing absolutely out of the lava, the soil having hardly filled the crevices; and, not far off, our traveller observed several little mountains that seemed to have been formed by a late eruption. Each of these had a regular cup, or crater, on the top; and, in some, the middle gulph, or Voragine, as the Sicilians call it, was still open. Into these gulphs Mr. Brydone tumbled down stones, and heard the noise for a long time after. All the fields round, to a considerable distance, were covered with large burnt stones, discharged from these little volcanoes. The woody region, especially the east side, called Carpinetto, abounds with very large chestnut-trees; the most remarkable of which has been called, from its size, Castagno de Cento Cavalli, or chestnut-tree of an hundred horse. Mr. Brydone was greatly disappointed at the sight of this tree; as it is only a bush of five large ones growing together; but his guides assured him that all these five were once united into one stem; and Signior Recupero told him, that he himself had been at the expence of carrying up peasants, with tools, to dig round this bush of trees, and found all the the stems united below ground in one root. The circumference, as measured by Messrs. Brydone and Glover, who accompanied him, amounted to 204 feet. Another of these, about a mile and a half higher on the mountain, is called Castagno del Galea: it rises from one solid stem to a considerable height; after which it branches out, and is a much finer object than the other: this was measured 2 feet above the ground, and found to be 76 feet in circumference. A third, called Castagno del Nave, is pretty nearly of the same size; and Massa, one of the most esteemed Sicilian authors, affirms, that he has seen solid oaks there, upwards of 40 feet round. All these grow on a thick, rich soil, which seems originally to have been formed of ashes thrown out by the mountain. Here the barometer stood at 26 inches, 5 lines and an half, indicating an elevation of near 4000 feet. The Piedmontese district is covered with towns, villages, monasteries, &c. and is well peopled, notwithstanding the danger of such a situation: but the fertility of the soil tempts people to inhabit that country; and their superstitious confidence in their saints, with the propensity mankind have to despise danger which they do not see, render them as secure there as in any other place. Here, Sir William Hamilton observes, they keep their vines low, contrary to the custom of those who inhabit mount Vesuvius; they produce a stronger wine, but not in such abundance: here also many terrible eruptions have burst forth; particularly one in 1669. At the foot of the mountain, raised by that eruption, is a hole, through which Sir William Hamilton descended, by means of a rope, into several subterraneous caverns, branching out, and extending much farther than he chose to venture, the cold there being excessive, and a violent wind extinguishing some of the torches. Many other caverns are known in this and the other regions of Ætna; particularly one near this place, called La Spelonca della Palomba, (from the wild pigeons building their nests there.) Here Mr. Brydone was told that some people had lost their senses, from having advanced too far, imagining they saw devils and damned spirits. Some of these caverns are made use of as magazines for snow, which they are well adapted for, on account of their extreme cold. These are, with great probability, supposed to be the hollows made by the issuing of the lava in eruptions. In this region the river Acis, so much celebrated by the poets, in the fable of Acis and Galatea, takes its rise. It bursts out of the earth at once in a large stream, runs with great rapidity, and, about a mile from its source, throws itself into the sea. Its water is remarkably clear; and so extremely cold that it is reckoned dangerous to drink it: it is said, however to have a poisonous quality, from being impregnated with vitriol; in consequence of which, cattle have been killed by it. It never freezes; but is said often to contract a greater degree of cold than ice. Having thus given an account of this mountain, in its quiet and peaceable state, we must now describe the appearance it puts on during the time of an eruption, when it spreads destruction for many miles round, and is capable of striking the boldest with terror. Here we are surprised to find ourselves at a loss; for though there are many particular accounts of the eruptions of Vesuvius, we cannot, after the most diligent search, find that any writer hath accurately described the phenomena attending an eruption of Ætna. Borelli, indeed, an Italian writer, published a natural history of this mountain, for the year 1669, when a very terrible eruption happened; but as this treatise is not now to be found in this part of the world, at least we must supply the deficiency in the best manner we can, by such hints as can be obtained from the writings of Sir William Hamilton and Mr. Brydone; together with a very imperfect account, given by some English merchants, who happened to be in Catania at that time, and recorded in the Philosophical Transactions, No. 51. Sir William Hamilton, who has examined both Vesuvius and Ætna, in a very accurate manner, never had an opportunity of seeing an eruption of the latter; but as he is of opinion that the two volcanoes agree perfectly in all respects, only that the latter is on a much larger scale than the former, we hope it will not be unacceptable to our readers to give some account of the general appearances of Vesuvius when in a state of eruption, the better to help their ideas concerning Ætna. It has already been observed, that a smoke constantly issues from the top of Ætna, and that its internal noises never cease. The case is the same with Vesuvius: and Sir William Hamilton observed, that in bad weather the smoke was more considerable, as well as the noises much louder, than when it was fair; so that in bad weather, he had frequently heard the inward explosions of the mountain at Naples, six miles distant from Vesuvius. He also observed the smoke that issued from the mountain, in bad weather, to be very white, moist, and not near so offensive as the sulphureous steams from various cracks in the side of the mountain. The first symptom of an approaching eruption is an increase of the smoke in fair weather; after some time, a puff of black smoke is frequently seen to shoot up in the midst of the white to a considerable height. These puffs are attended with considerable explosions: for, while Vesuvius was in this state, Sir William Hamilton went up to its top, which was covered with snow; and perceiving a little hillock of sulphur, about six feet high, which had been lately thrown up, and burnt with a blue flame at the top, he was examining this phenomenon when suddenly a violent report was heard; a column of black smoke shot up with violence, and was followed by a reddish flame. Immediately a shower of stones fell; upon which he thought proper to retire. Phenomena of this kind, in all probability, precede the eruptions of Ætna in a much greater degree. The smoke, at length, appears wholly black in the day-time, and in the night has the appearance of flame; showers of ashes are sent forth, earthquakes are produced, the mountain discharges volleys of red-hot stones to a great height in the air. The force by which these stones are projected, as well as their magnitude, seems to be in proportion to the bulk of the mountain. Signior Recupero assured Mr. Brydone, that he had seen immensely large ones thrown perpendicularly upwards to the height of 7000 feet, as he calculated, from the time they took to arrive at the earth, after beginning to descend from their greatest elevation. The largest stone, or rather rock, that was ever known to be emitted by Vesuvius, was 12 feet long and 45 in circumference. This was thrown a quarter of a mile; but much larger ones have been thrown out by mount Ætna, almost in the proportion in which the latter exceeds Vesuvius in bulk. Along with these terrible symptoms the smoke that issues from the crater is sometimes in a highly electrified state. In this case, the small ashes, which are continually emitted from the crater, are attracted by the smoke, and rise with it to a great height, forming a vast black, and to appearance dense, column; from this column continual flashes of forked, or zig-zag, lightning issue, sometimes attended with thunder, and sometimes not; but equally powerful with ordinary lightning. This phenomenon was observed by Sir William Hamilton, in the smoke of Vesuvius, and has also been taken notice of in that of Ætna; and when this electrified smoke hath spread over a tract of land much mischief hath been done by the lightning proceeding from it. When these dreadful appearances have continued, sometimes 4 or 5 months, the lava begins to make its appearance. This is a stream of melted mineral matters, which in Vesuvius commonly boils over the top; but very seldom does so in Ætna; owing to the great weight of the lava, which, long before it can be raised to the vast height of mount Ætna, bursts out through some weak place in its side. Upon the appearance of the lava, the violent eruptions of the mountain generally, though not always, cease; for, if this burning matter gets not sufficient vent, the commotions increase to a prodigious degree. In the night-time, the lava appears like a stream of fire, accompanied with flame; but in the day-time it has no such appearance; its progress is marked by a white smoke, which, by the reflection of the red-hot matter, in the night assumes the appearance of flame. All the above-mentioned symptoms preceded the great eruption of Ætna, in 1669. For several months before the lava broke forth the old mouth, or great crater, on the summit was observed to send forth great quantities of smoke and flame; the top had fallen in so that the mountain was much lowered; the islands also of Volcan and Stromboli, two volcanoes to the westward of Sicily, were observed to rage more than usual. Eighteen days before the eruption, the sky was very thick and dark, with thunder, lightning, frequent concussions of the earth, and dreadful subterraneous bellowings. On the 11th of March, some time before the lava got vent, a rent was opened in the mountain, 12 miles in length; into which, when stones were thrown down, they could not be heard to strike the bottom. Burning rocks, 60 palms (15 of our feet) in length, were thrown to the distance of a mile; others, of a lesser size, were carried three miles off; the internal noises of the mountain were exceedingly dreadful, and the thunder and lightning, from the smoke, scarce less terrible than they. When the lava at last got vent, it burst out of a vineyard, 20 miles below the great crater, and sprung up into the air to a considerable height. Here it formed a mountain of stones and ashes, not less, as Sir William Hamilton conjectures, than half a mile perpendicular in height, and 3 miles in circumference. For 54 days neither sun nor stars had appeared; but soon after the lava got vent, the mountain became very quiet. The terrible effects of this fiery stream may be imagined from its amazing extent; being, as Sir William Hamilton observes, no less than 14 miles long, and in many places 6 in breadth. In its course it destroyed the habitations of near 30,000 persons; and meeting with a lake, 4 miles in circumference, it not only filled it up, though several fathoms deep, but made a mountain in the place of it. Having reached Catania, it destroyed part of its walls, and ran for a considerable length into the sea, forming a safe and beautiful harbour; which, however, was soon filled up by a fresh torrent of the same inflamed matter. It is not easy, for those who have never been present at those terrible operations of nature to represent to their minds the horror which must attend the breaking forth of a lava; for though the

the giving vent to this burning matter generally produces a cessation of the violent efforts of the internal fire; yet, at the very instant of its explosion, scarce any thing can be conceived so dreadful. As we cannot find a particular account of what happened, at the breaking forth of the lava in mount Ætna in 1669, we must content ourselves with giving the reader some idea of it from Sir William Hamilton's account of the breaking forth of a lava in Vesuvius, no more than a quarter of a mile's distance from the place where he stood. "I was making my observations," says he, "on the lava, which had already, from the spot where it first broke out, reached the valleys; when, on a sudden, about noon, I heard a violent noise within the mountain; and, about a quarter of a mile off the place where I stood the mountain split, and with much noise, from this new mouth, a fountain of liquid fire shot up, many feet high, and then, like a torrent, rolled on directly towards us. The earth shook, at the same time that a volley of pumice-stones fell thick upon us; in an instant, clouds of black smoke and ashes caused almost a total darkness; the explosions from the top of the mountain were much louder than any thunder I ever heard; and the smell of sulphur was likewise very offensive. My guide, alarmed, took to his heels; and, I must confess, I was not at my ease. I followed close, and we ran near three miles without stopping: as the earth continued to shake under our feet, I was apprehensive of the opening of a fresh mouth, which might have cut off our retreat. I also feared that the violent explosions would detach some of the rocks off the mountain of Somma, under which we were obliged to pass; besides, the pumice-stones, falling upon us, like hail, were of such a size as to cause a disagreeable sensation upon the part where they fell. After having taken breath, as the earth still trembled greatly, I thought it most prudent to leave the mountain, and return to my villa; where I found my family in a great alarm, at the continual and violent explosions of the volcano, which shook our house to its very foundation, the doors and windows swinging upon their hinges. The noise and smell of sulphur increasing, we removed from our villa to Naples: and I thought proper, as I passed by Portici, to inform the court of what I had seen; and humbly offered it as my opinion, that his Sicilian Majesty should leave the neighbourhood of the threatening mountain. I observed, in my way to Naples, which was in less than two hours after I had left the mountain, that the lava had actually covered three miles of the very road through which we had retreated. It is astonishing that it should have run so fast; as I have since seen, that the river of lava, in the Attrio di Cavallo, was 60 and 70 feet deep, and in some places near 2 miles broad. When his Sicilian Majesty quitted Portici, the noise was greatly increased; and the concussion of the air, from the explosions, was so violent, that, in the king's palace, doors and windows were forced open; and even one door there, which was locked, was nevertheless burst open. At Naples, the same night, many windows and doors flew open; (the windows at Naples open like folding-doors.) In my house, which is not on the side of the town next Vesuvius, I tried the experiment of unbolting my windows; when they flew open upon every explosion of the mountain. Besides these explosions, which were very frequent, there was a continual rumbling noise, which lasted this night about five hours. No doubt the same terrible appearances are put on by Ætna at the time its lavas break forth; but in a much greater degree, in proportion to the superior size of the mountain. The appearance, and indeed the effects, of the lava itself, are very dreadful. When it first issues, the lava appears very fluid, and runs with the rapidity of a swift river: but, even then it surprisingly resists the impressions of solid bodies; for Sir William Hamilton could not pierce that of Vesuvius with a stick, driven against it with all his force; nor did the largest stone he was able to throw upon it sink, but made a slight impression, and then floated along. This happened almost at the very mouth, when the lava appeared liquid as water, and when he saw it running with a rapidity equal to the river Severn, at the passage near Bristol. A description of the lava, issuing from mount Ætna in 1669, was sent to the court of England by Lord Winchelsea, who at that time happened to be at Catania, in his way home from his embassy at Constantinople. His account is not now to be procured; but Mr. Hamilton found a copy in Sicily, and hath given an extract, part of which follows: "When it was night, I went upon two towers, in diverse places; and I could plainly see, at ten miles distance, as we judged, the fire begin to run from the mountain in a direct line, the flame to ascend as high and as big as one of the greatest steeples in your majesty's kingdoms, and to throw up great stones into the air; I could discern the river of fire to descend the mountain, of a terrible fiery or red colour, and stones of a paler red to swim thereon, and to be some as big as an ordinary table. We could see this fire move in several other places, and all the country covered with fire, ascending with great flames in many places, smoking like to a violent furnace of iron melted, making a noise with the great pieces that fell, fell, especially those that fell into the sea. A cavalier of Malta, who lives there, and attended me, told me, that the river was as liquid, where it issues out of the mountain, as water, and came out, like a torrent, with great violence, and is five or six fathom deep, and as broad, and that no stones sink therein."—The account given in the Philosophical Transactions is to the same purpose. We are there told, that the lava is "nothing else than diverse kinds of metals and minerals, rendered liquid by the fierceness of the fire in the bowels of the earth, boiling up, and gushing forth, as water doth at the head of some great river; and, having run in a full body for a stone's-cast, or more, began to crush, or curdle; becoming, when cold, those hard, porous stones, which the people call fiscicarri."—Those, though cold, in comparison of what first issues from the mountain, yet retained so much heat, as to resemble huge cakes of sea-coal strongly ignited; and came tumbling over one another, bearing down or burning whatever was in their way. In this manner the lava proceeded slowly on till it came to the sea, when a most extraordinary conflict ensued betwixt the two adverse elements. The noise was vastly more dreadful than the loudest thunder, being heard through the whole country to an immense distance; the water seemed to retire and diminish before the lava, while clouds of vapour darkened the sun. The whole fish on the coast were destroyed, the colour of the sea itself was changed, and the transparency of its waters lost for many months. While this lava was issuing in such prodigious quantity, the merchants, whose account is recorded in the Philosophical Transactions, attempted to go up to the mouth itself; but durst not come nearer than a furlong, lest they should have been overwhelmed by a vast pillar of ashes; which, to their apprehension, exceeded twice the bigness of St. Paul's dome, in London, and went up into the air to a far greater height; at the mouth itself was a continual noise, like the beating of great waves of the sea against rocks, or like distant thunder; which sometimes was so violent as to be heard 60, or even 100 miles off, to which distance also part of the ashes were carried. Some time after, having gone up, they found the mouth, whence this terrible deluge issued, to be only a hole about 10 feet diameter. This is also confirmed by Mr. Brydone; and is probably the same through which Sir William Hamilton descended into the subterranean caverns already mentioned. Mount Ætna, as we have already remarked, has been a celebrated volcano from the remotest antiquity. Diodorus Siculus mentions eruptions of it, as happening

500 years before the Trojan war, or 1693 years before the Christian era. Many others are recorded by historians in different ages; but none are particularly described. The mountain seems sometimes to lie dormant for many years, or even centuries, when it breaks out again with great fury, and will sometimes burn for years together. Since 1669 there have been several eruptions; but none of them comparable to that one. The last happened in 1766. The lava sprung up into the air to a considerable height, 12 miles below the summit; but formed a stream only 6 miles in length, and 1 mile in breadth. These are the most remarkable circumstances we have been able to collect, that might serve to give an adequate idea of this famous mountain. Many things, however, concerning the extent, antiquity, &c. of the lavas, remain to be discussed, as well as the opinions of philosophers concerning the origin of the internal fire, which produces so much mischief; but the consideration of these belongs to the general article, Vulcano, to which the reader is referred. The fate of Catania and Hybla, which have often been destroyed by eruptions, falls to be mentioned under these two articles.

ÆTOLIA, a part of Greece, bordered on the east by the Locrians, Phocians and Ozæans, from whom it was separated by the river Evandus or Licormas. The Acar-nanians, were parted from them by the river Acholous, on the west; and on the north it had the Dorians, with part of Epirus; and on the south was the bay of Corinth, where it had a sea-port called Oenias.

AFGHANS, the general denomination of a people in Persia, who, under the late Kouli Khan, subverted the Persian monarchy. They are divided into three principal tribes; and, like most oriental nations, derive their genealogy from Noah, by Afghan, as they relate, the second son of Japhet; whose descendants multiplying greatly in process of time, quitted their country, and went to inhabit the foot of Suliman-Couh, a chain of mountains which separates the province of Kandahar from the Mogul's empire. This nation was formerly divided into two principal tribes; one of which lived on the mountains, under the general name of Afghan; and the other extended on the plains to the southward, and was distinguished by the name of Balanche. In the reign of Ismael Samani, that is, towards the end of the ninth century, a numerous colony of Afghans having quitted Kandahar, a third tribe was formed on Hassarai, the eastern part of Herat. The latter took the name of Abdolees, and soon after embraced the Mahometan religion.

religion: In the beginning of the eleventh century the tribe of Clige, a subdivision of that of Afghans, who inhabited Soliman-Cough, and the most numerous and powerful of the three, was almost entirely destroyed by the celebrated Mahommed, founder of the dynasty of the Gaznavids. This prince had established the seat of his empire at Ghoztavi, a city on the confines of Kandahar, in order to be the nearer to the Indies, which he intended to conquer. But having been obliged, in one of his successful campaigns, to return suddenly to his capital with a small body of troops, he ordered the rest to follow by slow marches. His army was returning in separate detachments, loaded with the spoils of those nations they had subdued, when the Cligis waited for them in the defiles of the mountains, through which they knew his troops must pass, and successively defeated several different bodies of Mahomed's army. No sooner did the prince receive the news of the defeat of his detachments than he assembled the best of his troops; and, notwithstanding the rigour of the season, entered the country of Kandahar with such expedition, that, attacking the Cligis briskly on every side, he made so terrible a slaughter that the whole was nearly extirpated. However, it was not till the reign of Tamerlane that they appeared as numerous and formidable as they had been before this memorable defeat. The Abdolcees, having quitted Kandahar 200 years before, were not involved in the same calamity. But contests arising between the Mogul and Shah of Persia, about Kandahar, the possession of it was at last secured to the latter: but the cruelty and avarice of the Persian governors alienates the people's minds.

AFRA, a strong castle on the frontiers of Zara, in Africa, built by Cherif Mahomet, king of Sus. It is always furnished with a strong garrison both of horse and foot, to suppress the incursions of the Arabs out of the desert into Numidia, at the entrance into which it stands, in a soil fruitful in dates, and abounding with goats; but producing little either of barley or wheat. Lat. 28, 20, N. Long. 23, 10, E.

AFRICA (according to Bochart, from a Punic word, signifying ears of corn) one of the four great divisions, by the moderns called quarters, of the world, and one of the three called by the Greeks ἡμέραι, or continents. By them it was also called Libya.

Africa lies S. of Europe, and W. of Asia. It is bounded on the north by the Mediterranean, which separates it from the former; on the north-east, by the Red-sea, which divides it from Asia; and to which it is attached by a neck of land called the Isthmus of Suez, about 60 miles over, separating the Mediterranean from the Red-sea. On the west, south, and east, it is bounded by the main ocean: so that it is properly a vast peninsula, bearing some faint resemblance of a pyramid, the base of which is the northern part, running along the shores of the Mediterranean; and the top of the pyramid is the most southerly point, called the Cape of Good Hope. Its greatest length from north to south is 4500 miles, and its greatest breadth from east to west is 3500 miles; reaching from Lat. 37, N. to 35, S. and from Long. 17, W. to 50, E.

Tho' the chief part of this continent had been in all ages unknown to the Europeans and Asiatics, its situation is more favourable than either Europe or Asia for maintaining an intercourse with other nations. It stands, as it were, in the center of the three other quarters of the globe; and has thereby a much nearer communication with Europe, Asia, and America, than any one of these has with another. For, (1.) It is opposite to Europe in the Mediterranean, for almost 1000 miles, in a line from east to west; the distance seldom 100 miles, never 100 leagues, and sometimes not above 20 leagues. (2.) It is opposite to Asia for all the length of the Red-sea, the distance sometimes not exceeding five leagues, seldom fifty. (3.) Its coast for the length of about 2000 miles lies opposite to America at the distance of, from 500 to 700 leagues, including the islands: whereas America, unless where it may be a terra incognita, is no where nearer Europe than 1000 leagues; and Asia than 2500, except on the north-west parts, lately explored. As the equator divides this continent almost in the middle, the far greatest part of it is within the tropics; and, of consequence, the heat is in some places almost insupportable by Europeans, it being there greatly increased by vast deserts of burning sand. It cannot be doubted, however, that, were the country well cultivated, it would be extremely fertile; and would produce, in great abundance, not only the necessities, but also the luxuries, of life. It has been asserted, that the sugars of Barbadoes and Jamaica, as also the ginger, cotton, rice, pepper, pimento, cocoa, indigo, &c. of these islands, would thrive in Africa to as much perfection as where they are now produced. Nor can it be doubted, that the East-Indian spices, the tea of China and Japan, the coffee of Mocha, &c. would all thrive in some parts of the African coast; as this continent has the advantage of feeling no cold, the climate being there very warm, warm, or very temperate. Whatever may be the case with the internal parts of Africa, it is certain that its coasts are well watered with many very considerable rivers. The Nile and the Niger may be reckoned among the largest in any part of the known world, America excepted. The first discharges itself into the Mediterranean, after a prodigious course, from its source in Abyssinia. The origin neither of the Nile nor of the Niger is certainly known; but that of the latter is supposed to run through a tract of land little less than 3000 miles. Both these rivers annually overflow their banks; fertilising, by that means, the countries through which they pass. The Gambia and Senegal rivers are only branches of the Niger. Many vast ridges of mountains also run through different parts of this continent; but their extent is very little known. Some of the most remarkable are, 1. Those called Atlas, lying between the 20th and 25th degree of north latitude, and supposed almost to divide the continent from east to west. 2. The Mountains of the Moon, so called on account of their great height; supposed to be the boundaries between Abyssinia and some of the interior kingdoms. 3. The mountains of Sierra Leona, so called on account of their abounding with lions; and likewise supposed to be the boundaries of some of the nations. 4. Those called by the ancients the mountains of God, on account of their being subject to perpetual thunder and lightning. Of all these, however, little more is known than their names. To what we have already said, concerning the produce of Africa, we may add, that no part of the world abounds with gold and silver in a greater degree. Here also are a prodigious number of elephants; and, it is surprising, that neither the ancient nor modern Europeans, notwithstanding their extravagant and insatiable thirst after gold and silver, should never have endeavoured to establish themselves effectually in a country much nearer to them than either America or the East-Indies; and where the objects of their desire are found in equal, if not greater, plenty. Next to gold and silver, copper is the most valuable metal; and, on this continent, is found in great plenty, insomuch that the mountains of Atlas, above-mentioned, are said all to be composed of copper ore. In short, Africa, though a full quarter of the globe, stored with inexhaustible treasure, and capable of producing almost every necessary, conveniency, and luxury of life, within itself, seems to be utterly neglected, both by its own inhabitants and all other nations: the former, being in a savage state, are incapable of enjoying the blessings offered them by nature; and the latter taking no farther notice of the inhabitants, or their land, than to obtain, at the easiest rate, what they procure with as little trouble as possible; or to carry them off for slaves to their plantations in America. Only a small part of this continent was known to the ancients, viz. the kingdom of Egypt and the northern coast, comprehending little more than what is now known by the name of Barbary. It was divided into Africa Propria and Africa Interior. Africa Propria comprehended only the Carthaginian territories. Africa Interior comprehended all other nations to the southward of these territories, or those at a greater distance from Rome. The only kingdoms, however, with which the Romans had any connection, were the Numidians, the Mauritanians, and the Gætuli. All these, as well as Egypt, were swallowed up by that enormous power, and reduced to the condition of Roman provinces. But the Romans seem never to have penetrated beyond the tropic of Cancer. There appears, indeed, to have been some intercourse between them and the Ethiopians; but the latter always preserved their liberty; and we find their queen, Candace, mentioned in the times of the apostles, when the Roman power was at its highest pitch. Between the tropic of Cancer and the equinoctial line a multitude of savage nations were supposed to have their residence; known by the names of Melanogætuli, Nigritæ, Blemmyes, Dolopes, Astacuri, Lotophagi, Ichthyophagi, Elephantophagi, &c. (which are taken notice of, as well as the others already mentioned, under their proper names); but that Africa was a peninsula, seems to have been totally unknown both to the Europeans and Asiatics, for many ages. It is probable, indeed, that some of the Phœnicians, and their offspring, the Carthaginians, were not so ignorant! as they carried navigation to a much greater height than either the Greeks or Romans: but their discoveries were all concealed with the greatest care, lest other nations should reap the benefit of them; and, accordingly, we can now find no authentic accounts concerning them. The navigation round Africa in particular, is recorded, by the Greek and Roman writers, rather as a strange, amusing tale, than as a real transaction; and, as neither the progress of the Phœnician and Carthaginian discoveries, nor the extent of their navigation, were communicated to the rest of mankind, all memorials of their extraordinary skill in naval affairs seem in a great measure to have perished when the maritime power of the former was annihilated by Alexander's conquest of Tyre, and the empire of the latter was overturned by the Romans. That the peninsula of Africa, however, was in reality sailed round by the Phœnicians we have on indisputable authority; for some of that nation undertook the voyage at the command of Necho, king of Egypt, about 604 years before the Christian era. They sailed from a port in the Red-sea,

Red-sea; and after three years returned by the Mediterranean: and the very objections that were made to the veracity of their accounts at that time are unanswerable proofs to us that this voyage was really accomplished. They pretended that, having sailed for some time, the sun became more and more vertical; after which he appeared in the north, and seemed to recede from them: that as they returned, the sun gradually seemed to move southwards; and, after becoming vertical once more, appeared then in the south side of them as before they set out. This, which we know must certainly to have been the case was deemed incredible at that time, and universal ignorance concerning the extent of this continent prevailed till the 15th century. The first attempts towards attaining a knowledge of Africa was made by the Portuguese in 1412. Notwithstanding their vicinity, they had never before ventured beyond Cape Non, situated in about N. lat. 27: it had received its name from a supposed impossibility of passing it. This year they proceeded 160 miles farther, to Cape Bojador; which stretching a considerable way into the Atlantic-ocean with rocky cliffs, appeared so formidable to the navigators that they returned without any attempt to pass it. In an attempt to double this formidable cape, they discovered the Madeira islands in 1419: but Cape Bojador continued to be the boundary of their continental discoveries till 1433, when they penetrated within the tropics, and in a few years discovered the river Senegal, Cape de Verd, and the islands which lie off that promontory. In 1449 the western islands, called the Azores, were discovered; and in 1471 they first penetrated beyond the Line, and were surprised to find that the torrid zone, contrary to the opinion of the ancients, who imagined it to be burnt up with heat, was not only habitable, but fertile and populous. In 1484 they proceeded 1500 miles beyond the Line; so that they began to entertain hopes of finding that way a passage to the East-Indies; and two years afterwards the Cape of Good Hope was discovered by Bartholomew de Diaz; but it was not till the year 1497 that the Portuguese, under Vazquez de Gama, actually doubled this cape, and discovered the true shape of the continent. Thus the coasts of Africa were made perfectly known; and probably the knowledge concerning its interior parts would have been much greater than it is had not the general attention been called off from this continent by the discovery of America in 1492.—The Romans for a long time maintained their power in Africa; but in the year 426 Bonifacius, supreme governor of all the Roman dominions in this quarter, being compelled to revolt by the treachery of another general, called Ætius, and finding himself unable to contend with the whole strength of the Roman empire, called in Genferic, king of the Vandals, to his aid; who thereupon abandoned the provinces he had seized in Europe, and passed over into Africa. Bonifacius however being soon after reconciled to his empress Placidia, endeavoured in vain to persuade the Vandals to retire. Hereupon a war ensued, in which the barbarians proved victorious, and quickly over-ran all the Roman provinces in Africa. In the year 435 a peace was concluded; when Numidia and some other countries were ceded to the Vandals, who soon after seized all the rest. These barbarians did not long enjoy their ill-gotten possessions; for, about the year 533 Belisarius drove them out, annexing the provinces to the eastern empire; and, in 647, the Saracens, having conquered Mesopotamia, Egypt (which anciently was not included in the meaning of the word Africa) Phoenicia, Arabia, and Palestine broke like a torrent into Africa, which they quickly subdued. Their vast empire being in 936 divided into 7 kingdoms, the African states retained their independency long after the others were subdued by the Turks: but in the beginning of the 16th century, being afraid of falling under the yoke of Spain, they invited the Turks to their assistance; who first protected and then enslaved them. They still continue in a kind of dependence on the Ottoman empire. They are not however, properly speaking, the subjects of the grand signior, but call him their protector, paying him an annual tribute. On the coasts the natives are almost all addicted to piracy; and with such success have they carried on their employment that the greatest powers in Europe are become their tributaries. Concerning even these states, which are nearest to Europe, very little is known: but the interior nations are scarce known by name; nor do almost any two of the most learned moderns agree in their division of Africa into kingdoms; and the reason is, that no traveller hath ever penetrated far into these inhospitable regions. In the year 1774, indeed, an account appeared in our news-papers and magazines of a Mr. Bruce, who had entered Abyssinia, probably the ancient Ethiopia, where he remained upwards of two years; after which he found means to return, bringing along with him many great curiosities: but this gentleman, contrary to the general disposition of travellers, could never be prevailed upon to make his discoveries public, and disclaimed what was published by others concerning his travels. According to the best accounts we have been able to procure concerning those regions of Africa, they are divided in the following manner:

The chief trade carried on by Europeans with the more savage African nations is the purchasing, or carrying off by force when it is in their power, slaves for their colonies in other countries; and because they have been remarkably successful in this iniquitous trade, it hath been gravely asserted that these barbarous nations are descended from Canaan the son of Ham, whom Noah cursed, and prophesied that he should be a servant of servants to his brethren: but, not to insist on the absurdity of supposing the villainy of any nation a punishment sent from God, it may justly be questioned whether the term "servant of servants" will not apply to ourselves, rather than to them. Certain it is, that the interior parts of Africa have never been conquered by any nation. A set of lawless banditti, pretending to be descended from other vagabonds driven out of Troy by the Greeks, enslaved the greatest part of the known world, and this island among the rest. After a number of ages, the Romans were driven out by other banditti, and these again by others; so that for a space of time much longer than the slave-trade hath yet existed, the European and most Asiatic nations were servants to those who had themselves been accounted the most contemptible of the human race; but during all this time the Africans enjoyed liberty, and do still enjoy it, notwithstanding the wicked advantages the Europeans take of the barbarism of the negroes to make them sell one another. No European nation hath ever made a nation of negroes yield up their country to them, or pay them an annual tribute; nor have they even been able to introduce their customs among them; so that, on the whole, instead of being the greatest slaves, we cannot help thinking the barbarous nations in Africa are the only people on earth that have never yet been enslaved by others. The most probable accounts concerning the towns and sea-ports of Africa we have been able to procure, are mentioned under their proper names, as they occur in the order of the alphabet.

AFRICA, or MEHEDIA, a sea-port town of Tunis, lying on the Barbary-coast, in the third general division of the terraqueous globe, bearing its name. The former it has from its ancient and famed capital, supposed by some to be Ptolemy's Aphrodisium; and the second from Mehedi, caliph of Kairwan, who caused the city to be fortified, and from him called Mehedia. It is seated on a neck of land, washed on both sides by the sea, and defended by good walls, towers, ditches, &c. on the land-side, and by banks of sand towards the sea. It has a spacious port, the entrance of which is extremely narrow, and the gate on the land-side very strong; and on its outside is an arched way 70 feet long, and so very dark as to strike strangers with with terror. This city had other curious and remarkable fortifications belonging to it whilst under the Roman dominion; but these were afterwards totally destroyed by the successors of Mahomet, together with those of Carthage; a description of which may be seen in Marmol. The fortifications mentioned above are those which caliph Mehedi caused to be erected in the strongest manner, who also transplanted hither a new colony, and made it his own residence. Since his death this city has often changed its masters, and been the occasion of many bloody wars; so that the emperor Charles V. having at length made himself master of it, and foreseeing the difficulty and expence of keeping it, and at the same time fearing lest it should again fall into the hands of the Infidels, caused all the fortifications to be blown up. This town is 70 miles S. of Tunis. Lat. 8, 20, N. Long. 36, 2, E.

AFUERA, one of the islands of Juan Fernandez, on the South-Sea coast, in the kingdom of Chili. Its long. is 30, 20, W. from the meridian of Callao, and about 400 leagues to the N. of Cape Horn. This coast swarms with sea-lions or wolves. See FERNANDO.

AFWESTAD, a place of Nafgards-lehn, which is a district of Dalecarlia, in Sweden; where is a large copper forge belonging to the crown. It is seated on the Dal-Elbe, and resembles a town, having its own church and community, and a royal post-house. Here the copper-plates are flatted; and it has a mint for small silver coin. Lat. 61, 20, N. Long. 14, 10, W.

AFWIOWARA, a village of Kautokeino, in Tornea-Lapmark, in Lapland; situated between high mountains, consisting of 22 houses, &c. or huts of Laplanders, who pay tribute to Norway. It has a prerogative and justiciary court, with a market-place.

AGA, or AGAC, a kingdom of Abyssinia, with a town of the same name. This country lies near the lake of Zaire, between the Nile and the provinces of Ambian and Nova.

AGADES, AGDES, EGDES, (kingdom of) in Africa; lies E. of Sguidi and Targa, with Sana-go on the S. and Bordoia and Bournow on the E. It lies near the river Ghir, and produces a great quantity of grass for the numerous herds that feed upon it, especially on the S. side. It is divided into 2 districts; namely, the northern, which is called Defart, or belonging to the Defart of Zahara, lying S. of Targa; and the southern or fertile towards the frontiers of Agades to the N. Here are found great quantities of manna, which the inhabitants gather in calabashes, and export for sale. The negroes dissolve it in the water they dress their meat in, and esteem it very cooling and wholesome; and they think it is owing to this that the people are more healthy here than in Tombut, though the air be not so good. De L'Isle takes notice of great quantities of good Sena gathered in this country; and, besides its capital of the same name, he mentions two others, namely, Degkir and Secmara.

AGADES, the capital of the above kingdom, called by the Arabs Andegast; and is situated, according to Le Croix, between high mountains, and near the source of a large river, which runs through the whole country, discharging itself into the Lake de Garda, and thence into the Sanaga. The town is surrounded with walls, and the houses built in the Morefque fashion; in the heart of it is the royal palace, built in the same taste. The inhabitants are mostly merchants and traders settled there; the rest are either tradesmen or soldiers belonging to the prince, who is said to be tributary to the king of Tombut, and dependent on a tribe called Zuinziga, in Libya, who have power to depose him, if dissatisfied with his government. Lat. 18, 58, N. Long. 12, 30, E.

AGAN, or PAGAN, one of the Ladrone, or islands of Thieves; where the famous Magellan was assassinated, going in search of the Molucca-Islands through the South-Sea. It is situated between the islands of Chomocoan and Guagan.

AGANARA, or AGANAGARA, a town of India, on this side the Ganges. Castaldus and Molesius mention it after Ptolemy, and tell us it stands on the sea-shore.

AGANIPPE, a famous fountain of mount Helicon, in Boeotia, a part of Turkey in Europe; sacred to Apollo and the Muses, of which were two more equally celebrated, namely, Hippocrene and Pegasus in the same mountain.

AGAR, a town of Africa Proper, a few miles W. of Leptis. The situation is remarkably rocky; and the ruins of its ancient splendor covers a great deal of ground. A village is now the only remains on the spot where the ancient town stood, and is now called by the Arabs Bob Hadjar.

AGATA (St.) a small place in the Farther Calabria, a province of the kingdom of Naples.

AGATHA (St.) a city of the Farther Principate, in the kingdom of Naples; it is a small place, but the see of a bishop. It is thinly peopled, and stands on a rock near the confines of the Terra de Lavoro, in the mid-way between Benevento to the E. and Capua to the W. that is, 14 miles from each. Lat. 41, 20, N. Long. 14, 46, E.

AGATHYRNA, or AGATHYRNUM, AGATHYRSA, AGATHYRSUM, a town of Sicily, now S. Marco; as old as the war of Troy, being built by Agathyrnus, son of Æolus, on an eminence. The gentilitious name is Agathyrnaus; or, according to the Roman idiom, Agathyrnenfis.

AGATTON, a town of Africa, near the mouth of the river Formosa, on the coast of Guinea; it lies 80 miles S. of Benin. Lat. 8, 5, N. Long. 5, 6, E.

AGDE, a city of France, in Lower Languedoc, in the territory of Agadez, with a bishop's see. The diocese is small; but it is one of the richest countries in the kingdom. It produces fine wool, wine, oil, corn, and silk. It is seated on the river Eraut, and a mile and a quarter from its mouth, where it falls into the gulph of Lyons, and where there is a fort built to guard its entrance. It is well-peopled; the houses are built of black stone, and there is an entrance into the city by 4 gates. The greatest part of the inhabitants are merchants or seamen. The public buildings are but mean: the cathedral is small, and not very handsome: the bishop's palace is an old building, but convenient enough. The city is extended along the river, where it forms a little port, wherein small craft may enter. There is a great concourse of pilgrims and other devout people to the chapel of Notre Dame de Grace. It is a little without the city, between which and the chapel there are about 13 or 14 oratories, which they visit with naked feet. The convent of the Capuchins is well-built; and on the outside are lodgings and apartments for the pilgrims who come to perform their neuvaine, or nine days devotion. The chapel, which contains the image of the Virgin Mary, is distinct from the convent. The city was attacked by the English in 1710, but without success. Long. 3, 20, E. Lat. 43, 19.

AGDENAS, a small district in the diocese of Drontheim, in Norway, bordering on Drontheim-bay. It is a good corn-country.

AGDESIDEN, a district in the diocese of Christianfand, in Norway; consisting of the 4 bailiwicks of Nidenas, Raabygdelaudet, Lister, and Mandal.

AGEN, a city of France, on the river Garonne, the capital of Agenois, in Guienne, and the see of a bishop. The gates and old walls which yet remain shew that this city is very ancient, and that its former circuit was not so great as the present; but there is no trace remaining of the castle so famous in history. The palace, wherein the presidial holds his sessions at this day, was heretofore called the castle of Montravel; and is seated without the walls of the old city, and on the side of the fosse. There are likewise the ruins of another castle called La Sagne, which was without the walls, close by a brook. Though the situation of Agen is very convenient for trade and commerce, the inhabitants are so very indolent that there is very little, of which the neighbouring cities take the advantage. It is seated on the bank of the river Garonne, in a pleasant country. Long. 0, 30, E. Lat. 44, 12, N.

AGENOIS, the most fruitful part of all Guienne. It formerly gave the title of count. The ancient inhabitants of this fine country were the Nitiobriges. It has Condomois on the S. Quercy on the E. Perigord on the N. and Bazadois on the W.

AGER, a small place of Catalonia, in Spain; of little consequence, but gives the title of Viscount.

AGFORD, one of the hamlets belonging to Fromesfelwood, in Somersetshire, and a sequestered village. It lies between that town and the neighbouring parish of Whatley; and is famous for having been the residence of the late ingenious Mrs. Elizabeth Rowe.

AGGA, ANJA, or AGONNA, a little kingdom on the Gold-Coast of Guiney, in Africa; where a custom prevails for a woman to govern. It is a pleasant fertile country; and the inhabitants live peaceably under their government, seldom or never going to war. Here the English had a small fort and settlement of the same name. It lies in lat. 6, N. and under the meridian of London.

AGGERHUUS, or CHRISTIANIA, the largest diocese in the southern parts of Norway, and the principal and most considerable in the whole kingdom, being from S. to N. about 300 miles, and from E. to W. in the S. part, about 120, terminated northward in a point. It consists of the united dioceses of Opflo and Hammer. To it belong the districts of Aggerhuus, Fredericstadi, Schmaalehne, Bratsberg, Ringering, Hallingdahlen, Eger, and Bascherud; 2 feudal counties, 4 provincial jurisdictions, 15 bailiwicks, and 14 probsteys, or priories. Aggerhuus is the S. E. part of Norway, and situated between the provinces of Bergen on the W. from which it is separated by vast mountains; Dalecarlia and Bahus belonging to Sweden on the E. the mouth of the Baltic or Categate on the S. and the province of Drontheim on the N. The land is mostly mountainous and woody; but the valleys are tolerably fruitful, being watered by many lakes and rivulets. Here are several sea-ports, particularly Fleckeren, where the fishing-trade is pretty flourishing.

AGGERHUUS, a considerable mountain-fortress of Aggers-herred, one of the districts of Aggerhuus diocese, in Norway; situated on the W. side of the same bay, under which lies the town of Christiania. The date of its foundation is not known. In 1310, it was in vain besieged by duke Erich of Sweden; and in 1567, the Swedish army, which which closely besieged it for 18 weeks, was shamefully defeated; in 1717, the like fruitless attempt was made upon it by the Swedes under Charles XII. Before the fortifications, stands a cluster of houses, called Hovedtangen. It lies 30 miles N. W. of Fredericshall. Lat. 59, 25, N. long. 10, 30, E.

AGGEROE, a fortress belonging to Fredericstadt, in the diocese of Christiania, in Norway. It stands on an island, and near the sea, with a particular commandant, who is under the governor of Fredericstadt.

AGGERS-HERRED, one of the districts in the diocese of Aggerhuus in Norway; containing 3 juridical places, as Ascher, Ost or West-Barum, and Ager; also the following places, Christiania, Opflo, Aggerhuus, Aggers, and Barum.

AGGERS, in the above district in Norway, is a very ancient church, which stands about a quarter of a Norway mile N. of Aggerhuus castle. It is said to have been built above 700 years, and is reckoned the oldest church in this diocese; mention is made of it in history before the castle of Aggerhuus was erected.

AGGSPACH, a market-town in the circle above the Manhartsberg in Austria, seated on the Danube; opposite to which, on the other side the river abovementioned, a Carthusian monastery of the same name lies.

AGHER, a town of Ireland, which sends 2 members to parliament. It is situated in the southern part of Ulster, not far from Clogher.

AGHRIM, a village and castle of Gallway, in the province of Connaught, in Ireland; where, in 1691, General Ginkle obtained a victory over the Irish and French; at which time Sr. Ruth, the French General, with about 7000 men, were killed, and about 650 taken prisoners.

AGHUNALASHKA, or UNALASHKA, one of the Lyfic Ostrova or Fox Islands. See FOX ISLANDS.

AGINCOURT, or AZINCOURT, a village of Ponthieu, a district of Picardy, in France, situated near the river Bresse. It is memorable in history, for a glorious victory, which the English, commanded by king Henry V. gained here over the French, on the 25th of October, 1415. The English lost but 1600 men, and the French 6000. Among the slain were the count of Nevers and Anthony duke of Brabant, who were brothers to the duke of Burgundy; the duke of Alençon, the Constable d'Aubert, who commanded the French; the duke of Bar, the marshal of Boucicaut, Admiral Dampierre, the archbishop of Sens, the viscount of Laonnois, and many other of the French nobility. Among the prisoners taken, were the dukes of Orleans and Bourbon, the counts of Vendosme and Richemont, with 1400 gentlemen. Agincourt lies seven miles N. of Heudin. Lat. 50, 35, N. long. 2, 0, E.

AGIRO, or AGYRA, a town in Sicily, called at present San Philipppo d'Agirone. It is noted for being the birth-place of Diodorus Siculus.

AGIRU, one of the 4 bailiwicks, or jurisdictions, into which the island of Corfu, in the Ionian sea, and belonging to European Turkey, is divided. It is the western part of this island: on it are twenty villages, which contain upwards of 8000 inhabitants. The castle of Angelo, situated on the S. promontory of Palacrum, and under which lies a handsome convent, called Paleo Castrezza, is the only remarkable place in this district.

AGISYMBBA, a district of Libya Interior, according to Agathemerus, situated to the S. E. of the Æthiopes Anthropophagi; the parallel passing through which, at 16 deg. to the S. of the equator, was the utmost extent of the knowledge of the ancients to the South.

AGLIA, a small village in Piedmont, Italy, that has a district, to which is annexed an earldom.

AGMET, or AGMAT, formerly the capital of Morocco Proper, in Africa; situated on the declivity of a hill belonging to Mount Atlas. It was once very populous, surrounded with high strong walls, and defended by a stout fortress. It stands on a river bearing its name, and in a delightful territory, abounding with gardens, orchards, vines, &c. but hath been so often destroyed, particularly by the Beni-merini, that it hath never recovered itself since. The castle is inhabited by the Morabites, who lead a kind of hermitical life, and principally subsist by the charity of those poor people who now live in the town, and are mostly gardeners, potters, or husbandmen. Near this place is a very large and deep lake, which receives all the water coming down from the adjacent mountain.

AGMONDESHAM. See AMERSHAM.

AGNABAT, or AGNETHIN, a town in the county of Altland, in that part of Transylvania which is inhabited by the Saxons. It is situated on the river Harbach, ten miles N. E. of Hermanstadt. Lat. 46, 40, N. long. 24, 10, E.

AGNADEL, or AGNADELLO, a small place of the Milanese, in Italy, situated on a canal between the rivers Adda and Serio. It is noted for a great victory which Lewis XII. of France gained over the Venetians, May 5, 1500; but much more since, by a battle fought between prince Eugene and the duke de Vendosme, in 1705. This battle commonly goes by the name of that of Cassano; but the hottest part of the action was at this place. It lies between five and six miles S. E. of Cassano.

AG-

AGNAN (St.) Fanum sancti Agnani, a small town of Berry, in France; situated on the river Cher, near the borders of Tourain and Blaisois, 20 leagues W. of Bourges. It was anciently no more than an hermitage; but afterwards grew up to a pretty large place. In 1663 it was erected into a duchy; and in 1665 into an earldom. Here is a castle and collegiate church, with two convents.

AGNANO (Lake of) near the city of Naples, in Italy, is situated in a valley between hills, and is supposed to have been anciently one of Lucullus's reservoirs. It is almost circular, and 3 miles round. Its waters are rather muddy, and partly covered with a green slime. Upon it are great numbers of small wild ducks and other water-fowl. In many places the water is seen to bubble up, but without the least heat. About 20 paces from its banks is the grotto Del Cane, named so from the frequent experiments on dogs in its suffocating steam, which seizes on every thing within its height. In the lake is store of tench and eels; and the Jesuits of Naples, who lately were the proprietors thereof, drew from it annually 15 or 1600 crowns, arising from the fishery and the macerating of hemp and flax, in order to beat these for use.

AGNEREINS, a small place of Ville-neuve, a chatellany in the government of Burgundy, in France. It was formerly the seat of the chatellany.

AGNES (St.) one of the Scilly-islands, lying westward of the Land's-end in Cornwall. See SCILLY.

AGNES (St.) a village in Cornwall, on the sea-coast, between St. Ives and St. Michael.

AGNETHLIN. See AGNABAT.

AGNO, a division of the government of Laufis, a landogtey of Swisserland, which contains above forty parishes or villages, and is situated on part of the Lugano-lake, to which it gives the name of Lago d'Agno, and receives into it the river of the same name.

AGNON, or ACNO, the Clanlus of the ancients, a river of Campania, in Italy. It rises in the neighbouring mountains, and runs to Acerra and Linternum, where it stagnates into a lake.

AGNONE, a small place of the Hither Abruzzo, a province in Naples.

AGON, an island belonging to the N. part of Helsingland, in Sweden; to which sea-faring people resort, it having a good harbour.

AGONALIS (Circus) a square in Rome, so called from the games and combats instituted in honour of Janus Agonales by king Numa, and where they used to be celebrated; now called Piazza Navona. It is the most magnificent and largest square in Rome, surrounded with stately buildings, and two churches, particularly that of St. Agnes, which is of admirable architecture.

AGONNA. See AGGA.

AGOSTA, a sea-port town of Sicily, with an excellent harbour. The greatest part of it was swallowed up by an earthquake in 1693, and what remains is inconsiderable. Long. 16, 15, E. lat. 37, 17, N.

AGRA, or INDOSTAN PROPER, so called from its being the principal kingdom of the Mogul empire in Asia, bounded by Bando on the W. by Dely on the N. by Sambal on the E. and by Gualcar and part of Narvar on the S. According to Sanfon, it is 270 miles where longest from E. to W. and 150 from N. to S. It is a plain country; and, though not so fruitful in wheat and other corn as Dely, it abounds with oranges, lemons, &c. besides rice, indigo, and cotton: and its manufactures of white cloth, stuffs made of silk, silver and gold lace, &c. render it one of the richest countries in the Indies. Its quota of forces to the Mogul army is 15,000 horse and 30,000 foot; and its revenue is computed at 3 millions sterling.

AGRA, the capital of the province, in the kingdom of Indostan Proper, in Asia. It was founded in 1566 by Eckbar, who called it Eckbabat, and made it the seat of his empire, which soon drew numbers of merchants and other people to it. Agra is seated on the great river Semana, or Jemina, which runs through the kingdom, and in the midst of a barren sandy plain, from which the sun reflects excessive heat on the town in the summer. The houses are so built as to have a prospect of the river. No part of the town is fortified, except the palace; but it is moated round; and in the palace is always a great army, especially if the Mogul be there. The Mahometan inhabitants are said to be most numerous; and it is a place of great traffic, being resorted to by merchants from China, Persia, all parts of India, and by the English and Dutch. Our nation once had a factory here; but the great distance from Surat, and the hazards and difficulties which they underwent in passing through the countries of many rajas and raioutes made them withdraw it, though they continue to trade here. The Dutch, who have still a factory in this city, deal principally in scarlet cloth, looking-glasses, silver, gold, and white lace, hardware, cloth of Jelapour, and spices. Here are above 60 very large caravanseras nobly built, and with most commodious apartments for the merchants. The baths are about 800, and the mosques 700; some of which last are sanctuaries. Here are about 30 palaces of the omrahs and other great men, which are built of brick or stone, in a line from that of the mogul; and, with many other less palaces and fine structures in the same line, form a charming prospect. The mogul's palace is a citadel, in the figure of a crescent, on the banks of the river; and the walls are mounted with cannon. It is built of red stone, like speckled marble, which in the sun looks very beautiful a great way off. It is encompassed with ditches, and a terrace-garden cut through with canals of running water, intermixed with green plots and pleasure-houses, that form an agreeable prospect. It is divided from the city by a large square, where the rajas keep guard by turns at the 2 outer-gates facing the principal streets; without which is a ditch, and bridges over it, with a large canal of running water inclosed by stone-walls, so broad on both sides that there is a way for elephants and passengers, whether foot or horse, with several guard-houses, other habitations, and shops, at proper distances. Here also are the apartments for the inferior officers of the mogul's court, and long galleries for the emperor's manufactures of stuffs of gold, silver, silk, tapestry, &c. and for goldsmiths and enamellers that work for the palace. At the end of the canal is a large round place of arms, where the troops are daily mustered. The whole palace is encompassed with tents for the inferior officers and soldiers; and these you must pass before you enter the first court of the palace, which is a large square, supported by arches, forming a shade at all times of the day; and on an eminence here is a concert of musical instruments at certain hours. This palace, in which also are held the courts of judicature, &c. father Tosi says is 4 miles in compass: but the accounts of it seem in a great measure fictitious, and therefore we have omitted them here. The habits of Agra differ but little from those of Persia; a particular account of which may be seen under that article. On the other side of the river, N. E. from the city, are two very magnificent sepulchres at Secandra, which were built by the great mogul Jehan Guir, for his father Eckbar and his own beloved queen. See SECANDRA. Agra stands in Lat. 26, 43, N. Long. 76, 49, E.

AGRAGAS. See AGRIGENTUM.

AGRAMONT, a small town of Catalonia, in Spain; yet the chief place of a jurisdiction.

AGREABLE, an island formed by the river Lisse, in the kingdom of Fez, in Africa.

AGREDA, a town of Old Castile, in Spain; is seated at the foot of mount Cayo, in the neighbourhood of which anciently stood Gracchuris. It is very populous, consisting of no less than 1000 families; has six parishes, three monasteries, and two hospitals. Lat. 41, 50, N. Long. 2, 30, E.

AGREVE (St.) a little town of Upper Vivarais, a subdivision of Languedoc, in France; situated at the foot of the mountains.

AGRI, or ACKI, a river of the kingdom of Naples; which, arising in the Appenine mountains, not far from Marisco Nuovo, falls into the gulph of Tarento.

AGRIA, called EGER by the Germans, and ER-LAW by the inhabitants, is situated between Buda and Cschaw, in the county of Heves, and middle of Hungary, on a little river of the same name. It is the see of a bishop under the archbishop of Gran; and is surrounded with old walls and bulwarks. Near it, on the other side of the river, is a strong castle, situated on a mountain. It had formerly good buildings; but by reason of the frequent sieges and conquests which it has undergone, is now in a mean condition; from which it may perhaps recover itself gradually, as a bishop resides here who has a rich revenue; and here also is a college, and academy of Jesuits. In the neighbourhood is produced excellent red wine; and not far from the town is a warm bath. It was first built by king Stephen the Saint. When Suliman II. emperor of the Turks besieged it in 1552 with 70,000 men, it was so gallantly defended, that after the Turks had battered it 40 days with 50 pieces of cannon, and made several assaults, in which they lost 8000 men, they were obliged to raise the siege. The garrison consisted only of 2000 Hungarians, and 60 of the chief nobility, with their families; who bound themselves by an oath to hold out to the last extremity. The courage of the women during the assaults was surprising. But in 1596 Mahomet III. took it, and, contrary to the capitulation, put the garrison to the sword. The Imperialists retook it in 1687, after they had blocked it up for 3 years, and thereby reduced all the neighbouring country to their obedience. In 1704 it was mastered by the malcontents under prince Ragotki; but in 1706 it fell into the hands of the Imperialists, who pillaged the town, and committed many outrages; but they could not master the castle. It was retaken by the Hungarians, who kept it till 1710, when it surrendered to the Imperialists. Agria lies 47 miles N. E. from Buda. Lat. 48, 10, N. Long. 20, 10, E.

AGRIGENTUM, or AGRAGAS, in Sicily; formerly as famous for its buildings as Syracuse itself. It stands 118 furlongs distance from the sea; but can conveniently import by water all sorts of provisions, &c. Some lakes near this city are said to be salt; and that men do not sink in them, but float like wood.

AGRIGNAN, one of the islands of the Lardones, which is about 40 miles in compass. Lat. 19, 40.

AGRIMONT, or AGROMONT, a town of the Basilicate,

A G

AGUEDA, or AGADA, a town of Estramadura, in Portugal; situated on the ruins of the old Emenium, mentioned by Ptolemy and Pliny.

AGUEPERSE. See AIGNEPERSE.

AGUER, a city of Africa, at the foot of mount Atlas, on a promontory, which was anciently called Visugrum. It was taken by the Portuguese in the year 1536. Not long after, Cheriff Mahomet sent his son, with 50,000 men, to besiege it; and he himself soon followed, with a numerous reinforcement, and took it, though with the loss of 18,000 men; and, to be revenged, he put all he found in the city to the sword; the governor, Monroi, and those who retired to the towers, were made prisoners. The said governor's daughter, Donna Mencia, with whom Mahomet fell passionately in love, after much solicitation, consented to marry him; but she proving with child, his other wives poisoned her: yet, out of regard for her memory, Mahomet gave her father his liberty. Lat. 29, 40, N. Long. 20, 15, E.

AGUESMORTES, is a town belonging to the diocese of Nismes, and government of Languedoc, in France. It is a strong place, on account of its situation in a morass, 2 leagues distant from the Rhone, and 5 from Montpellier. It formerly stood near the sea, and had a harbour; but at present it is 2 French leagues from it, and the harbour is choaked up. It is the seat of an admiralty, has a bailiwick, a royal court of justice, and a board of 5 large farms. In the neighbourhood of this place are several lakes; on which account the air is so unhealthy that the town is almost a desert.

AGUIAR, a town of Beira, in Portugal; contains 500 inhabitants, and has a district of 8 parishes.

AGUIAR, a mean place, belonging to Alentejo,

AGUIAR DE SOUSA, a concellio, or particular jurisdiction, in Entredouro e Minho, a province of Portugal; comprehending 47 parishes.

AGUIAS, an inconsiderable place, in Alentejo, a province of Portugal; containing between 500 and 600 inhabitants.

AGUILA, a town of the province of Habat, in the kingdom of Fez, in Africa; seated on the river Aguela, and subject to the king of Morocco.

AGUILAR DEL CAMPO, in Latin Agilaria, a small town of Old Castile, in Spain, with an old strong castle. It gives the title of marquis. It lies 24 miles W. of Estella.

AGUILLAR, a town of Spain, in the province of Navarre, about 26 miles W. of Estella.

AGURANDE, or AIGURANDE, a small town of Lower Berry, in France, with a castellany. It is surrounded with strong walls and deep ditches; and the river Creuse runs very near it. This town belongs to the lordship of Chateau-Roux, except one street, which is held by the county of La Marche. It is 4 leagues distant from La Chatro, to the S.

AHAUSZ, a small district and town, in the bishopric of Munster, in Westphalia; the town is situated on the river Aa, and contains a citadel. This place subsists chiefly by agriculture.

AHLDEN, a district of Lunenburg-Zell, in Germany; lying on both sides of the Aller, which, in this bailiwick, receives the Leine and Bohme rivers. It is one German mile and a half in length, and as much broad; and consists of champaign, heath, and sandy grounds; but, to the south of the Aller, has also good marsh-lands and pasturage. Its woods consist chiefly of oak, and great quantities of it are conveyed on floats to Bremen. The inhabitants carry on a considerable trade in horses, cattle, wool, honey, and wax. The bailiwick contains 2 towns, 12 villages, and a mill. The principal place in the district is Ahlden town, situated on the banks of the Old Leine, not far from the river Aller; and so called from the course of that river, which formerly ran through these parts. In the palace here, from 1694 to 1726, resided, after her separation, Sophia Dorothea, consort to king George I.

AHLEM, a district in Hanover quarter, in the principality of Calenberg, Germany; which contains 7 villages, and is situated near the Leine river.

AHLEN, a town in the bishopric of Munster, in Westphalia; situated on the river Werse, and which is summoned to land-diets. It contains a collegiate church, together with 2 nunneries of Augustines; and in it also is a princely and a rural court.

port. In 1280, one-third of it was destroyed by an accidental fire.

AHUN, a small town of Upper Marche, in France; situated on the river Creuse. It contains about 180 families, and is the seat of a royal court of justice. Near it is an abbey, of the Benedictine order, called Monastere d'Ahun; that is, the monastery of Ahun. It lies 2 leagues and a half from Gueret.

AHUS, AHUYs, in Latin Ahusia, a town of Schonen, in Sweden; situated on the Baltic, at the mouth of the river Halleau, 2 miles S. of Christianstadt. It has a large, safe, and much-frequented harbour; but the town is now ruinous, though formerly it was a considerable place. Lat. 56, 20, N. Long. 14, 10, E.

AJACCIO, AJAZZO, or ADIAZZO, a small town in the island of Corsica, and in that part of it which lies beyond the mountains; situated on a bay that takes its name from it. It is the see of a bishop, who is under the archbishop of Pisa. Near it is Uncivia, a strong tower, where the Greeks, residing in those parts, bravely defended themselves against the Corsicans, in 1732. It lies 160 miles S. of Genoa. Lat. 41, 46, N. Long. 9, 20, E.

AIAL, a town in the northern part of the province of Berdoa, in Africa.

AJALON, a city of the tribe of Dan, in Canaan, belonging to the Levites. It was taken by the Philistines; and, being recovered, was fortified by Rehoboam. It stood between Jerusalem and Gath, to the west of the former.

AJAN, a country and coast of Africa, bounded by the river Quilmanci on the S. by the mountains from which that river springs on the W. by Abyssinia and the streight of Babel-mandel on the N. and by the Eastern or Indian ocean on the E. In going from S. to N. along the coast, we find the republic of Brava, the kingdom of Magadoxa, that of Adel, and some others, more westward within land. The coast abounds with all the necessaries of life, and has plenty of very good horses. Most of the inhabitants are fair, with long black hair; but farther from the sea are negroes, who, intermarrying with the Beduins, a kind of Arabs, have children that are mulattos. The kings of Ajan are frequently at war with the emperor of the Abyssinians; and all the prisoners they take they sell to the merchants of Cambaya, those of Arden, and other Arabs, who come to trade in their harbours; and give them in exchange coloured clothes, glass-beads, raisins, and dates; for which they also take back, besides slaves, gold and ivory. They are all good muskmen, except the Beduins, who are of the sect of the Emsaides. The whole sea-coast, a few minutes N. of the equinoctial line, where the country of Zaquebar ends, up to the streight of Babel-mandel, is called in general the Coast of Ajan; a considerable part of which is stiled the Desert-coast. But the kingdoms no longer border on the country of the Abyssinians, a nation called the Galles, or Galli, lying between them.

AJARAFE, a very fertile, yet small, district in Seville, Spain; seated on the river Guadimar, and gives the title of Duke to the family of Guzman.

AJAS, a city of Arabia Felix, in Asia, two days journey from Aden; seated between two hills, in the midst of which is a fine valley, where the inhabitants keep their markets and fairs.

AICHA, a small town in Upper Bavaria, Germany; situated in a district of the same name, which belongs to the Knights of St. George. The town stands on the river Paar, with an old castle, two churches, and a house belonging to the order of St. John. In 1633 this town was taken by the Swedes; and, in 1634, laid in ashes by them.

AICHSTADT, or EICHSTADT, a bishopric; lying in the S. part of Franconia, between the marquise of Anspach and the burgraviate of Nuremberg on the N. the country of Oettingen and duchy of Newberg on the S. the duchy of Wirtemberg on the W. and the palatinate of Bavaria on the E. and S. It extends about 39 miles from E. to W. and is in some parts 15 or 16, though in others not above 7 or 8, from N. to S. It is a fruitful country, subject to its own bishop, who is lord of it, and chancellor and first suffragan to the archbishop of Mentz. He is a prince of the empire, and has a yearly revenue of between 9000 and 10,000*l*. It was founded by Boniface, archbishop of Mentz, at the same time with Wurtzburg, and has been richly endowed since by several emperors and princes. Its chapter consists of 16 capitular canons, and 15 domiciled, who must all be gentlemen. The minister has his hereditary officers, who are all counts. He is lord of several good fiefs possessed by princes and counts, of whom the prince of Saxe-Gotha is one; and his spiritual jurisdiction extends over the Upper Palatinate, and the duchy of Newburg. He has precedence of the bishop of Spire; and his police consists of a council of state, a consistory, an aulic council, and a chamber of finances.

AICHSTADT,

AICHSTADT, or ERCHSTADT, a pretty good town of Franconia, in Germany, and the capital of the bishopric of the same name; situated upon the river Altmühl, 12 miles N. of Newburg, 5 from Donawert, and 8 or 9 N. of the Danube. It is supposed to take its name from elch, i. e. an oak, because of its situation in a place where formerly stood a forest of those trees. It has a curious cathedral, to which one of its bishops presented a fine pyx for the host, which is of pure gold, in the form of a sun, weighs forty marks, is adorned with several diamonds, rubies, pearls, and other precious stones, the whole being valued at 60,000 guilders. In 1704 this town was taken by a French detachment. It is seated in a valley; but the Bishop mostly resides at the fortress of Willeboldsburg, commonly called Walperberg, which is about 2 miles off, on a hill. The principal things remarkable here are, the church of the Holy Ghost, contiguous to its stone-bridge over the Altmühl, with an hospital almost close to it, built by one of its bishops. There is also an hospital built on the bank of the Altmühl, by another of its bishops, whom Pope Pius II. styled the Golden Pillar of the church; St. Sebastian's church, and a priory called Bruderhaus, where the only pensioners are old men, who have nothing to do but to serve God; the cathedral dedicated to the Virgin; the parish-church of St. Walburg, and a nunnery of Benedictines; a church and convent of Dominicans; a church and college of Jesuits; a seminary capable of maintaining 30 students; an hospital for foundlings and orphans; an alms-house, and a convent of Capuchins, where is a round church, built after the model of the holy Sepulchre at Jerusalem, worth notice. The inhabitants are shop-keepers, artificers, husbandmen; or such as have offices about the bishop, or subsist by their attachment to the clergy, who are very numerous here. Lat. 48, 56, N. Long. 11, 10, E.

AIDAB, a town on the confines of Abassia, in Afric, opposite to Gjudda, or Jedda, in Arabia; where great numbers of African Mohammedans take shipping when they visit the holy city of Mecca.

AIDERBEZAN, or, as the Persians call it, AZERBEYAN, or ASAPAIKAN, a province of Persia, bordered on the E. by the provinces of Gilan and Tabristan; on the S. by Persian Irak; W. by Upper Armenia and the river Aras; and N. by Schirwan. The soil is fruitful, and the climate healthy, though cold.

AIELLO, a small place in the Hither Calabria, in Naples, with the title of a principality. Lat. 39, 5, N. Long. 17, 20, E.

AIELLO, a little place of the Farther Abruzzo, in the kingdom of Naples, with the title of duchy; which has fallen by marriage to the hereditary prince of Modena. Lat. 41, 20, N. Long. 13, 5, E.

AIGLE, a bailiwick, in the territory of Romand, in Switzerland; consists of mountains and valleys, the principal of which are the Aigle and Bex. Through these is the great road from Vallais into Italy. When you pass by Villeneuve, which is at the head of the lake of Geneva, you enter into a deep valley, 3 miles wide, bordered on one side with the Alps of Switzerland, and on the other with those of Savoy, and crossed by the river Rhone. Six miles from thence you meet with Aigle, a large town, seated in a wide part of the valley, where there are vineyards, fields, and meadows. The governor's castle is on an eminence that overlooks the town, and has a lofty marble tower. This government has nine large parishes; and is divided into 4 parts, Aigle, Bex, Olon, and Ormont. This last is among the mountains, and joins to Rougement. It is a double valley, abounding in pasture-lands. Ivorna, in the district of Aigle, was in part buried by the fall of a mountain, occasioned by an earthquake, in 1584.

AIGLE, a small town in France, in Upper Normandy, 23 miles from D'Evereux, and 38 from Rouen. It is surrounded with walls and ditches, has 6 gates, 3 suburbs, and 3 parishes. It trades in corn, toys, and more particularly in needles and pins. Long. 1, 5, E. Lat. 48, 35, N.

AIGLE, a river of Orleansois, in France, which rises near Mée, in Beauce, and falls into the Loire.

AIGNAN (St.) See AGWAN.

AIGREMONT, a barony belonging to the duchy of Langres in Bassigny and the Lower Champagne, in France.

AIGUEBELLE, a little town of Savoy Proper, in Italy, situated on the river Arc.

AIGUEPERSE, or AGUEPERSE, in Latin Aqua Sparsa, or Calidae, the capital of the duchy of Montpensier, a part of Upper Auvergne, in France; situated on the river Luzon, in a delightful plain, though only a small place, consisting properly but of one long street; yet it is a royal jurisdiction, consisting of one abbey and two chapters. Not far from this town is a boiling spring, which bubbles up with a strong ebullition both of water and air, yet is cold, and without any remarkable taste. The ruins of the ancient castle of Montpenher, demolished in 1634, are also in the neighbourhood of this town. It is 3 leagues distant from Riom, and 13 miles N. of Clermont. Lat. 44, 20, N. Long. 4, 30, E.

AIGUESCAUDES, a district in the valley of Olfau and district of Oleron, in the principality of Bearne, in France; remarkable for a warm spring, the waters of which are oily, saponaceous, and spirituous, smelling like rotten eggs. It is used with benefit, benefit, not only for wounds and swellings, but also for inward disorders.

AGUILLON, or EGUILLON, a town of Agenois, a territory of Guienne Proper, in France; situated on the Garonne at the junction of the Lot with it. Here is a castle; and it is a duchy and peerdom. At this place they drive a considerable trade in hemp, tobacco, corn, wine, and brandy. In 1346 it held out a siege against John duke of Normandy. It lies 12 leagues N.W. of Agen. Lat. 44. 20, N. Long. 14. E.

AILAH, a small but ancient town of Asia, in Arabia Petrea, seated on the eastern side of one of the N. bays of the Red-sea. It is near the road which the pilgrims take when they travel from Egypt to Mecca. Some think it the Elath mentioned in scripture. Long 35. 40, E. Lat. 29. 10, N.

AILS, ALISA, or ISLESAY, a steep uninhabited rock, and one of the western islands in the frith of Clyde, in Scotland, resembling the Bass in the frith of Forth, or Edinburgh-frith, is noted for Solan geese, besides abundance of sea-fowl, and multitudes of rabbits. Hither, once a year, repair a great number of vessels to fish for cod. On it is a spring of fresh water, a chapel, and tower 3 stories high. The rock rises in form of a sugar-loaf; but on its top is a plain large enough to draw up 1000 men, and belongs to the earl of Caithness, who has a revenue of 51. 10s. sterling, from the produce of hogs, fowl, fish, and down. It is accessible only on one side, where steps, or a kind of stairs, are cut out of the rock; at the bottom of which the fishermen live in tents, and have good anchorage for their vessels very near them. It is situated 24 miles from Arran.

AILESBUURY. See ALESBUURY.

AIMARGUES, in Latin Armasanica, a little town belonging to the diocese of Nîmes and Lower Languedoc, in France, situated on the river Visfre, amidst morasses. It gives the title of baron.

AIME, or AXIMA, a small place belonging to the county of Tarentaise, a territory of the duchy of Savoy Proper, in Italy. It is situated on the river Isere.

AIN, a small town in the province of Berdea, in Africa.

AINAON, or AHINAON, an island on the S. side of China; the capital of which has also the same name.

AINLING, a market town of the district of Aicha, in Upper Bavaria, in Germany; situated S.E. of Augsburg.

AINSA, a little town, but the principal place, in the principality of Sobrarbe, belonging to Arragon, in Spain; situated in a plain on the river Ara.

AIN SEMES, a small town on the N. of Memphis, and opposite to Grand Cairo, on the W. side of the Nile, under Mount Moccatta, famous for the garden of balm, or balsam, formerly growing there.

AINZURBA, a small town near the coast of Casarea, in the province of Cilicia, in Asiatic Turkey.

AIOMAMA, a mean place of Macedonia, in European Turkey, remarkable on account of the bay which takes its name from it. It is 25 miles S. of Sanichi, or Thessalonica.

AIR, a mountain of Arabia, about 2 leagues S. of Medina, where Mahomet's tomb is.

AIRE, shire of, a district in the S. part of Scotland. It is bounded on the N. by the shire of Renfrew, on the S. by Galloway, on the E. by Clydesdale, and on the W. by the frith of Clyde. It generally produces large quantities of grass and corn, is very populous, and the inhabitants extremely industrious. Aire comprehends the 3 great bailiwicks, or baileries, of Scotland, so called as being governed by bailiffs; namely, Carrick, Kyle, and Cunningham: but by the late act of parliament, for vesting the hereditary jurisdictions of Scotland in the crown, these, among the rest, have been purchased for a valuable consideration, and then annulled. According to Templeman, the square miles of Kyle and Carrick are 795, and those of Cunningham 229. In Aire is 1 considerable lough, or lake, called Dun, which is 6 miles long, and 2 broad, with an isle in it, upon which stands an old house, called Castle-Dun. Upon the water Dun, or Down, issuing from this lake, is a bridge of 1 arch, 90 feet long, which is much wider than the Rialto at Venice.

AIRE, the principal town of Kyle, 1 of the 3 divisions of the shire of Aire, in Scotland, and also the capital of the whole county; situated at the mouth of a river of the same name, in a sandy plain, having a good harbour, near the frith of Clyde, and is well situated for trade. Aire is a district and a royal burgh with those of Irwin, Rothsay, Inverara, and Cambel-town, which send alternately 1 member to the British parliament. It is an ancient town, and eminent for its privileges, having been built by patent from king Robert Bruce. Its jurisdiction extends 64 miles from the mouth of the Clyde to the borders of Galloway, which is the length of the shire; and its greatest breadth is 36 miles. Streams from the river drive several mills in the middle of the New Town, which is joined to the Old by a bridge of 4 arches. The Old Town was once called St. John's Town upon Aire, in contra-distinction to that upon Tay. It is situated amidst pleasant fertile fields. It is reckoned the principal market town in the W. of Scotland, next to Glasgow; has a beautiful stately church, and is at present the seat of a presbytery, to which belong 28 parishes, and with Glasgow constitutes a provincial synod. About a mile from the town, near the shore, shore, is a Lazar-house, commonly called the King's Chapel, which the above-mentioned Robert Bruce appropriated for maintaining lepers. This town, like a fine structure in ruins, plainly shews that formerly it was handsomer and larger than it is at present; but its trade has so declined, that the townsmen say, from having been the fifth town in Scotland it is now the worst. Aire is 65 miles S.W. from Edinburgh. Lat. 55, 30, N. Long. 4, 40, W.

AIRE, a small town in the little territory of Turlan, part of Gascony, in France. It is built on the declivity of a hill, on the river Adour, is the see of a bishop, who is a suffragan to the archbishop of Auch or Aix, and has a diocese of 241 parishes, an income of 30,000 livres, and an assignment of 1200 florins paid the court of Rome. In this city the kings of the Visigoths used to keep their courts, and on the bank of the river are still to be seen the ruins of Alarick's palace; since which time Aire has often suffered greatly from the Saracens, Normans, and other nations. It suffered very considerably in the religious disturbances of France. With regard to its civil government, it is under the courts of judicature at Bazas, from which appeals lie to the parliament at Bourdeaux. Aire is 35 miles E. of Dax. Lat. 43, 40, N. Long. 3, E.

AIRE, a district of Artois, belonging to the French Netherlands; its capital is also of the same name, in Latin Aris, or Aria. It is a considerable fortified town, situated on the Lys, dividing it into 2 unequal parts; and it lies near the borders of Flanders, having a morass surrounding it on 3 sides. On that side which is accessible, at the distance of a cannon-shot from the city and the Lys, stands Fort St. Francis, to which one goes from the city by a very regular canal. This last-mentioned fort, though small, is a pentagon, consisting of 5 bastions well lined, and encompassed by a ditch, a covert-way, and a glacis in the fosse. Here is a collegiate church, a monastery, several convents, and 2 hospitals; among which is 1 for soldiers. Notwithstanding the strength of this city, it was taken by the French in 1641; but soon afterwards retaken by the Spaniards. The French took it again in 1676, and it was confirmed to them by the peace of Nimuegen. On the 10th of November, 1710, it surrendered by capitulation to the Allies, after a vigorous siege, and the trenches had been open 6 weeks; and, even when it surrendered, the besiegers had not been able to demolish its flanks: but it was given up to the French by the peace of Utrecht, in 1713. It lies 25 miles W. from Lille. Lat. 50, 46, N. Long. 2, 32, E.

AIRE, a river in Yorkshire, England, which runs into the Ouse, a little above Hoke.

AIRE, a river in the government of Dauphiny, in France, which runs into the Isere. See ISERE.

AISAY-LE-DUC, a small place and castellany of La Montagne, a territory of Burgundy, in France.

AISNE, or AINE, one of the great rivers in the government of Champagne and Brie in France, which rises above Menehout, on the confines of Champagne and Lorrain, and unites with the Oise half a league above Compeigne. Near Chatteau Porcien it begins to be navigable; and near Bourbonne and Attencourt, 2 leagues from Vally, are several famous mineral springs.

AITIAT. See ETIAT.

AITOCZU, a considerable river of Lesser Asia, which, arising in the mountain Taurus, falls into the south part of the Euxine sea.

AITONA, or HITONA, a small town of Catalonia in Spain. It is the capital of a marquisate.

AIX, a small island on the coast of France, between the Isle of Oleron and the Continent. It is only memorable for an inglorious expedition of the English in 1758, when they were bound to Rochfort with a design of taking or burning the ships and stores in the river on which that town is seated; but returned without doing any thing, except demolishing the fort of this island. It is 12 miles N.W. of Rochfort, and 12 S.S.W. of Rochelle. Long. 1, 5, W. Lat. 46, 5, N.

AIX, a small but ancient town, in the duchy of Savoy, with the title of a marquisate. It is seated on the lake Bourget, at the foot of a mountain, between Chambery, Annecy, and Rumilly. There is here a triumphal arch of the ancient Romans, but it is almost entirely ruined. The mineral waters bring a great number of strangers to this place. E. long. 7, 10. N. lat. 45, 40.

AIX, an ancient city, the capital of Provence, in France. It is an archbishopric; and has a parliament, a court of aids, a chamber of accounts, a seneschal's jurisdiction, a generality, and an university. It is a well-built city; and most like Paris of any place in the kingdom, as well for the largeness of the buildings as in respect of the politeness of the inhabitants. It is embellished with abundance of fine fountains and several beautiful squares. The preacher's square is on the side of a hill; it is about 160 yards in length, and is surrounded with trees, and houses, built with stone, 3 stories high. The town-hall is at one end of the city, and is distributed into several fine apartments: the two lowest are taken up by the board of accounts, and by the seneschal; that above is designed for the sessions of parliament. The hall of audience is adorned with the pictures of the kings of France on horseback. The hotel of the city is a handsome building, but hid by the houses of the narrow street.

street in which it is placed. The cathedral church is a Gothic structure. The church of the fathers of the oratory is a handsome building; and not far from thence is the chapel of the blue penitents, which is full of paintings. The convent of preachers is very fine; in their church is a silver statue of the Virgin Mary almost as big as life. There are other churches and buildings, which contain a great number of rarities. The baths without the city, which were discovered not long since, have good buildings, raised at a vast expence, for the accommodation of those that drink the waters. E. long. 5, 32. N. lat. 43, 32.

AIX-LA-CHAPELLE, a fine city of Germany, in the circle of Westphalia and duchy of Juliers. All authors are agreed about its antiquity, it being mentioned in Caesar's Commentaries and the Annals of Tacitus. The Romans had colonies and fortresses there when they were at war with the Germans; but the mineral-water and the hot-bath so increased its fame, that, in process of time, it was advanced to the privileges of a city, by the name of Aquegranii, that is, the waters of Granius; that which it has now, of Aix-la-Chapelle, was given it by the French, to distinguish it from the other Aix. It is so called on account of a chapel built by Charlemagne in honour of the Holy Virgin. Having repaired, beautified, and enlarged the city, that was destroyed by the Huns, in the reign of Attila, in 451, he made it the usual place of his residence. The town is seated in a valley surrounded with mountains and woods; and yet the air is very wholesome. It may be divided into the inward and outward city. The inward is encompassed with a wall about 3 quarters of a league in circumference, having 10 gates; and the outward wall, in which there are 11 gates, is about a league and a half in circumference. There are rivulets which run through the town and keep it very clean, turning several mills; besides 20 public fountains, and many private ones. They have stone quarries in the neighbourhood, which furnish the inhabitants with proper materials for their magnificent buildings, of which the stadt-haus and the cathedral are the chief. There are likewise 30 parochial or collegiate churches. The market place is very spacious, and the houses round it stately. In the middle, before the stadt-haus, is a fountain of blue stones, which throws out water, from 6 pipes, into a marble basin placed beneath, 30 feet in circumference. On the top of this fountain is placed the statue of Charlemagne; of brass, gilt, holding a sceptre in his right hand and a globe in his left. The stadt-haus is adorned with the statues of all the emperors since Charlemagne. This fabric has 3 stories, the upper of which is a entire room, of 162 feet in length, and 60 in breadth. In this the new-elected emperor formerly entered tained all the elections of the empire. Aix-la-Chapelle is a free imperial city, and changes its magistracy every year on the eve of St. John Baptist. The mayor is in the nomination of the elector-palatine, in the quality of the duke of Juliers, as protector of the city. This place is famous for several councils and treaties of peace concluded here, particularly those between France and Spain in 1688, and between Great-Britain and France in 1748. The baths have been frequented for several centuries, of which some are hot and some are warm. The principal are called the Emperor's Bath, the Bath of St. Cornille, the Bath of Roses, the Bath of St. Quirin, the Little Bath, and the Bath of the Poor, besides several others. The Emperor's Bath has the name of Charlemagne, who repaired it, and bathed very often in its waters; it is the finest and most commodious. The Little Bath receives its waters from the Emperor's Bath, and contains 3 bathing places. That of St. Quirin has particular springs, but its virtues are the same as the former. The Bath of St. Cornille is so called from the sign of the house where it is seated; it is only warm, and is divided into 5 different baths. The Bath of Roses is so called from a citizen, called John Rosen, who built it. The Poor's Bath is free for every one, and is frequented by crowds of poor people. The men bathe in distinct baths from the women, and even private baths are to be had for money. There are 2 springs in the lower part of the city, over 1 of which there is the statue of the Virgin Mary and over the other that of Charlemagne. These are for drinking; and there are two pumps to raise up the waters. There are several galleries or piazzas, under which they walk during the time of drinking, to make them pass the more freely. About a quarter of a league from Aix, stands the abbey of Borzet, or Bursheit, which is a very magnificent pile of building. It was formerly a monastery, but serves for a nunnery, whose abbess is a princess of the empire and lady of Borzet. The baths here are much hotter than at Aix-la-Chapelle: some of them are so hot that they will boil eggs, which is frequently done by poor people; and if you throw in a dog he will be killed in an instant: therefore here, as at Aix, the water must stand till it is of a proper coolness. You may bathe here at 14 different houses; and there is likewise 1 open bath, where the poor may bathe gratis. Near this place are several mines of lead, coal, and lapis-examinaris. The time of drinking the waters, in the first season, is from the beginning of May to the middle of June; and, in the latter season, from the middle of August to the latter end of September. They are said to be efficacious in almost all tedious chronic diseases, whether internal or of the skin, particularly in all disorders disorders of the nerves, or in all cold diseases, and inward decays. We need not to mention, that there are all kinds of amusements common to other places of public resort; but the sharpeners appear more splendid here than elsewhere, assuming titles, with an equipage suitable to them: Aix-la-Chapelle is 36 miles from Liege, and 30 from Cologne. E. long. 5, 48. N. lat. 51, 55.

AIX-DAM-GILON, a village of Upper-Berry in France, with an ancient castle, in which is a chapter.

AKALZIKE, a town and castle of Gouria in the kingdom of Imeritia, in Georgia, in Asiatic Turkey. It is situated on the frontiers of that kingdom, on Mount Caucasus, and near the banks of the Kur: it belongs to the Turks, being the residence of a basha, and of a number of officers under him, who live not in the town itself, but in some of the neighbouring villages. It lies in a bottom between about 20 hillocks, from which the whole town and its fortifications might be battered on all sides with a great deal of ease. These fortifications consist only of a double wall, flanked with a few towers, all built in the ancient manner. Near the fortress stands the town, which consists of about 400 houses at most, the greatest part of them newly built. It is filled with Turks, Armenians, Greeks, Georgians, and Jews. The two Armenian churches are the only edifices of any antiquity; those of the Greeks and Georgians are mean in comparison of them; and so is the Jewish synagogue. Here is likewise a small caravanserai for travellers, which is built all of wood, as most of the houses in the town are. The fortress was built originally by the Georgians, but taken from them by the Turks towards the close of the 16th century. Lat. 41, 55. N. Long. 44, 55. E.

AKAM, a tract on the coasts of South Guinea, Africa; has Inta, or Affiante, on the west; Kin, on the south; unknown lands, north; and Quakoe and Tafoe, east. The Europeans on the coast are utter strangers to the natives of this country.

AKERMAN, AKKJIRMAN, BIELGOROD, or BULGOROD, and by the Moldavians called TSCHE-TATE ALBA; all denoting the white town. The first name was given it by the Turks and Russians. It is an old town of Bessarabia in European Turkey, and seated at the efflux of the Niester into the Black-sea, or rather on a gulph formed by that river as it falls into the sea. It is about 110 miles distant from Bender, towards the S. E. It is a strong fortress, and supposed to have arose from the ruins of two ancient cities which stood near it, in the angle made by the meeting of the Niester and the Black-sea; namely, Thyras, on a river bearing the same name.

AKERO, a considerable seat of a gentleman, situated on the Yngarn lake in Sudermanland, a province of Sweden Proper.

AKISSAT, the ancient Thyatira, a city in Nætolia, in Asia, situated in a plain 18 miles broad; which produces plenty of cotton and grain. The inhabitants, who are reckoned to be about 5000, are said to be all Mahometans, and not a Christian among them, except a few slaves. The houses are built of nothing but earth or turf dried in the sun, and are very low and ill contrived; but there are a few mosques built of marble. There are remarkable inscriptions on marble in several parts of the town, part of the ruins of ancient Thyatira. It is seated on the river Hermus, 50 miles from Pergamos. E. long. 28, 30. N. lat. 38, 50.

AKTUNAK, a small island in the Eastern ocean, and inhabited by the same kind of people as the Fox-Islands. It lies about 20 miles more to the east than the island of Kadyak. The Russians visited here in 1763.

AKUN, one of the Lyffie Ostrova or Fox-Islands. See FOX-ISLANDS.

AL-ABBAS, the region of; so the Turks call Taiffa, from the uncle of Mahomet, who fixed his residence there. See THAIFFA.

ALABA, or ALAVA, one of the 3 subdivisions of Biscay, in Spain, of which the other 2 are Biscay Proper and Guipuzcoa. It is pretty fertile in rye, barley, and several fruits. It has also tolerable good wine. Here are very plentiful mines of iron and steel. This small territory formerly had the title of a kingdom. It contains the following places, namely, Salvatierra, Cividad Vitoria, Trevigno, and Pegna Serrada. Alava is bounded by Biscay and Old Castile on the W. by Castile on the S. by Navarre on the E. and by Guipuzcoa and Biscay Proper on the N.

ALABANDA, a town of Caria in Asiatic Turkey. The founder of it is said to have been Alabandus, whom they worshipped as a god; and in the Roman division of the country this city was made the head of a jurisdiction, and the judicial conventus was held there. The town was situated on the E. side of a very high hill, and on a little hill to the E. of it: it was encompassed with strong walls, cased with hewn stone within and without, and filled up in the middle with rough stones; in the casing of the wall, one tier of stones lies flat, and another is set up on end, alternately; in some places this casing is fallen down, and the middle part is standing. The most easy ascent is on the N. side, by a paved way of very large stones, of an irregular shape, having the town-wall on the right. About the third part of the way up the hill, there are large ruins of a most magnificent palace, to which there was an entrance by a colonnade, nade, leading to an oblong-square court: to the right of this there was a portico of 20 oval pillars, of the same kind as those already described; they are of a very rustic order, and the capital is more simple than the Tuscan. Under it there were apartments, with entrances from without; and over that, another colonade, which is almost destroyed; as the floor of the grand gallery that belongs to it is entirely ruined: this gallery seems to have had a colonade all round. Opposite to this, on the W. side of the court, there appears to have been three artificial terraces, or galleries, one above another, with colonades to them, and small apartments within; and above this is another plain spot, where there appears to have been great buildings. Ascending the steep hill, another third part of the way, we come to a beautiful theatre, which, for the most part, is hollowed into the hill, and all but the front is entire. On each side is an arched entrance; and on the E. side, an arched way, which seems to have served for a passage towards the top of the hill; there is also a wall carried southward from the theatre, as a defence to the summit of the hill. The top of the hill is level, except a little rocky mount in the middle of it; and to the W. of this mount there is a square building entire, which probably was designed for a house of pleasure: from this the wall seems to have extended to the S. and then turned eastwards down to the lower hill. From the S. W. corner there was another wall, which was carried about a furlong S. to another summit of the hill, where there are remains of a strong oblong-square castle; and adjoining to it, to the S. are the walls of a smaller castle. On the little hill, or rising ground below, are remains of two buildings; one resembling a square castle, with a round tower at each corner; the other is built like a palace, with several doors and windows. These buildings are of red granite, in large grains, all the mountains here abounding both in the red and grey sort; probably, if quarries were dug down, many beautiful veins might be found. To the S. of the city, at the foot of the hill, there are a great number of sepulchres made in different manners; some are hewn down into the rock like graves, others are cut in the same manner into small rocks that rise up above the ground; some are built like pedestals, with 2 or 3 steps round them, and covered with large stones. There are also others like an oblong-square rock above ground, without any visible entrance, but by a small hole that appears to have been broke in, and one would imagine that there was some passage cut under ground to them. There are also several of them which are small buildings, about 12 feet square: some have a bench of stone round within, to lay the bodies on; others are built with 2 or 3 rooms; but the most beautiful are square buildings of very fine mason work channelled, with a cornish at top, a casement at bottom, and another cornish about 3 feet higher: some have also 2 square pillars within, and all of them have 2 or 3 steps round them. Some think, not without good grounds, that in the province of Caria stood 2 cities of this name; but if so, they have both sunk into such decay, as little or nothing is to be found of them but their names.

ALABASTER. See ELEUTHERA.

ALACARNES, islands of New Spain; so called from the great number of scorpions that breed therein. They are situated to the N. and within 20 leagues of Yucatan, in North America.

ALACRUEA, a town in the kingdom of Portugal, situated near Lisbon, in the road from that city to Oporto.

ALADULIA, the third province of Anatolia, or Asia Minor, in Asiatic Turkey; comprehending, in its largest sense, Cappadocia and the Lesser Armenia. It joins to the country or beglebergate of Munit or Marasch; which last is its capital, the seat of the governor, and gives name to the whole. This district is likewise by the Turks called Dul-gadir. That of Aladulia, or Anadolli, was given it from a prince of that name, who reigned here when the Turks made themselves masters of it; at which time its limits extended as far as Aleppo, on the side of Syria, and on that of Caramania and Cilicia to Adana and Tarsus. At present the Turks have curtailed those limits, and formed it into a beglebergate, containing only 4 sangiaes, and a proportionable number of ziamets and timariots. This province is rough and hilly, its land being unfit for tillage, but has abundance of fine pasture-grounds, on which the inhabitants breed vast numbers of cattle, especially horses and camels, besides great flocks of sheep and goats. Here is also plenty of venison, and other wild game; so that the people are divided between feeding the former and hunting the latter. They are however very warlike, and their arms are a sword, a bow and arrows; and they manage their horses with surprising dexterity and swiftness. But a third sort of them mind little else but plunder, and live mostly on the spoils which they get from the caravans and other passengers.

ALÆSA, or HALASA, was a very ancient city of Sicily, and stood, as Fazellus conjectures, near the place where the city of Caronia stands at present, on the river Alæus, or Fiume de Casonia. Near this Alæsa was a fountain, which (according to Salinus) used at the sound of a flute to bubble up so that it could not be kept within the basin.

ALAFÖENS, a small district belonging to the province of Beira, in Portugal; containing 37 parishes. In 1718 a place of the same name in it was erected into a duchy, upon John V. king of Portugal, tugal, declaring Peter, son of Don Miguel, the legitimated son of king Peter II. duke of Alagoens.

ALAGOA, a place in the land of San Miguel or St. Michael, one of the Azores, in the Atlantic-ocean, and lying between Africa and America, to which king John granted the privileges of a town in 1522. It contains 605 houses and 2 parish churches.

ALAGON, a small village of Arragon in Spain. It is situated on a peninsula formed by the rivers Ebro and Xalon.

ALAGNON, a river in the government of Auvergne, France; the source of which is at Cantal, and is rapid, but not very navigable, and falls into the Altier.

ALAINÉ, one of the small rivers in Nivernois, a government of France.

ALAINS, a barbarous people who overspread Europe and Africa in the 4th century. Some say they were the Messagetæ; others Scythians or Sarmatians: they were however the bloodiest people upon earth. In the 5th century they joined themselves to the Vandals and Goths, carrying terror and desolation wherever they came. They were known in Domitian's time; and in 505 their captain was Gonderic, son of Aodegigle. They fought against the French, and destroyed the country on the Rhine. They also ravaged Spain; but being defeated by the Visigoths they thought proper to pass over into Africa.

ALAIS, one of the 14 dioceses in Languedoc, in France. It lies in the Cevennes-mountains, and constitutes a part of the territory of Cevennes.

ALAIS, ALEZ, or ALET, a pretty large and populous city, in the diocese of the same name, belonging to Languedoc, in France. It is situated in a valley on the river Gardon, and at the foot of the Pyrennees. It is the capital of a collection, and has the title of county as well as barony; the former belongs to the prince of Conti; but the latter is divided between two proprietors. The bishop is a suffragan to the archbishop of Narbonne, has a diocese of 80 parishes, with a revenue of 16,000 livres; and he is taxed to the court of Rome at 500 florins. The bishopric was erected here in 1692, for the conversion of the great number of Protestants in this place; and 1689 a citadel was erected here, as a check upon the reformed. From this city is annually exported at least 1,200,000lb. of raw or unwrought silk. From the foot of one of the mountains round it, issues a spring of hot waters. Many openings in the rocks shew that mines have been formerly worked here: and it is certain that gold must be still in the bowels of those mountains, since the little rivulets springing from thence carry gold-sand along with their waters, which the country people gather; and they sometimes find enough to afford them a livelihood. In 1672, Mr. Colbert had these mines worked, but they found only a few veins of copper, which did not produce enough to defray the expences. Alais is 30 miles N. of Montpellier. Lat. 44, 15, N. 4, 20, E.

ALAJOR, one of the 4 quarters of Minorca, belonging to the Balearic islands, in the Mediterranean; the other 3 are Ciudadella, Mahon, and the united quarters of Mercadal and Ferrarias. It has its name from a small place in it.

ALAKSU, or ALACHSHAK, the remotest island to the eastward, in the Eastern-ocean. It was touched at by the Russians, commanded by Puskhareff, in 1761, when they wintered at it; but their irregular behaviour the summer following occasioned many of them to be killed by the natives. This island is said to contain rein-deer, bears, wild boars, wolves, otters, and a species of dogs with long ears, which are very fierce and wild; and, as the greatest part of those animals are not found upon the Fox-Islands, which lie more west, and nearer Kamschatka, it seems to prove from this circumstance that Alaksu is no great distance from the continent of America. Red, black, and grey foxes are seen in herds of 20 at a time. Wood is driven upon the coast in great abundance. The island produces no large trees, only some under-wood, and a great variety of bulbs, roots, and berries. Large flocks of sea-birds visit the coasts. The natives are very tall, and strongly made: their dress is the same as those of the Aleutian Isles, and their dwellings under ground; which have several openings of the side, through which they escape when the principal entrance is beset by an enemy. Their weapons are arrows and lances, pointed with bone, which they dart at a considerable distance.

ALALCOMENÆ, an ancient city of Boeotia, famous for the sepulchre of Tiresias, and a temple of Minerva. The town of Ithaca, in the island of the same name, was also called Alalcomenæ by Ulysses.

ALAN, or CAMEL, a river in Cornwall, England, which runs into the Severn at Padstow-haven.

ALANBY, a village in Cumberland, England; situated on the sea-coast near Bromfield, where a chapel was built in 1745. It has also a good charity-school.

ALAND, in Latin Alandia, an island in the sea, or mouth of the Baltic, between Upland in Sweden Proper to the eastward, and Finland towards the S. W. but nearer to the latter than the former. In the intermediate channel are many small islands, rocks, and mountains, which occasion great damage to the sea-faring people. It is about 6 miles long, and nearly of the same breadth. The soil is so fruitful that the inhabitants almost in general have a sufficiency of corn throughout the year.

The pastures are very good, and consequently the cattle also. It has great plenty of forests, which, as belonging to the king, are generally kept in good order. Here and there are lime-chalk-stone mountains to be found. It abounds with lynxes, hares, and foxes, but few bears. The inhabitants speak Swedish, and have their subsistence mostly from agriculture, breeding of cattle, fishery, hunting, and navigation; also from catching of sea-fowl, and the loppings or profits of the woods. They trade in butter, cheese, wooden-ware, coals, and chalk. In ancient times this island is said to have had its own kings; at least it did not then belong to Finland: and even after it came under the dominion of Sweden it had for some centuries its own stadtholders or governors. Since the year 1634, when it belonged to the territorial jurisdiction of Abo and Björneborg, it has consisted of 1 juridical district, and a bailiwick; in which are reckoned 8 churches or parishes, including the chapels that belong to them. The clergy are under the bishop of Abo. The most remarkable places on this island are Castelholm, Grellsby, and Haga; which are seats or domains belonging to the crown: in the first of these is a royal post-house; and in Hamno, a small island 3 miles S. E. of Aland, where there was a convent in the Popish times; and in Eckero, another island on the W. side of Aland, extending from N. to S. about 6 miles, and separated from it by a channel about 3 miles broad, are also royal post-houses. There are several other smaller isles, the principal of which are Flys, Landsweden, Rodan, and Nyan.

ALANDRA, or ALHANDRA, a small town of Portuguese Estremadura; situated on the banks of the Tagus, 15 miles above Lisbon. It has 1350 inhabitants, and a district of 2 parishes.

ALANDROAL, a small place in the ouvidoria of Aviz; belonging to the province of Alentejo, in Portugal.

ALANQUER. See ALENQUER.

ALANTA, a small city of Walachia, on the Alt, or Alanta; 30 miles S. W. of Rebnick.

ALAPAEWSKOI-SAWOD, an iron forge, at Alapawskoi, in the Catherinburg circle of Siberia, and Asiatic part of the Russian-empire.

ALARCON, a small town of Sierra, a subdivision of New Castile, in Spain; situated close by the river Xucar, having been built in the year 1178; but soon afterwards demolished by the Moors, from whom it was retaken by Alphonfus IX.

AL-ARAKH, a town of Arabia; seated on Agja.

ALATAMANA, a river in N. America; whose stream is the southern boundary of the colony of Georgia, as the Savannah river is its northern boundary. It rises in the Apalachian mountains, and, after a S. E. course through the province of Geor- gia, falls into the Atlantic-ocean below Frederica-town.

ALATRI, in Latin ALATRIUM, an episcopal city of the Campania di Roma, in Italy; situated on an eminence at the foot of some high hills, 4 miles N. of Veroli, and 48 E. of Rome, on the frontiers of the kingdom of Naples. It was known to most ancient geographers under the name of Aletrium, or Alatrium, and its inhabitants by that of Alatrini and Aletrinales. It is an ancient see, and subject only to the pope. Lat. 44. 44. N. Long. 14. 12. E.

ALATYR, a provincial or county town, in the circle of the same name, belonging to the government of Casan, in the Asiatic part of the Russian-empire. It is seated on the river Sura.

ALAVA. See ALABA.

ALAUTA, a river, which, running N. E. in Transylvania, turns S. and forms part of the boundary between Christendom and Turky; and, continuing farther in the same course through Walachia, empties itself into the Danube almost opposite to Nicopolis.

ALAXA, one of the Lyffie-Ostrova or Fox-Islands. See FOX-ISLANDS.

ALBA, surnamed POMPEIA, and celebrated by Ptolemy and other ancients as one of the principal cities of Old Liguria; but having passed through the hands of so many masters, has quite lost its ancient splendor. It is situated in the duchy of Montserrat, in Upper Italy; and is now only a small fortified town, pleasantly situated on the river Tanaro. By the treaty of Chierasco in 1631, it was ceded by the duke of Mantua to the duke of Savoy, who has kept possession of it ever since. Here is an episcopal see, under the archbishop of Milan. It lies 22 miles E. of Turin. Lat. 44. 50. N. Long. 8. 15. E.

ALBA, a town of Marfi, in Italy; situated on the north side of the Lacus Fucinus, still retaining its name. The inhabitants were called Albani and Albenfes.

ALBA-HELVIORUM, or ALBAGUSTA, in ancient geography; afterwards called Vivarium, now Viviers; in the S. E. of Languedoc, on the Rhone. In the lower age the inhabitants were called Albenfes, and their city Civitas Albensium, in the Notitia Galliarum. Long. 4. 45. E. Lat. 44. 50.

AL-BAHRIYA. Some Arabs divide the Delta or Lower Egypt into two parts, Al-Rif and Al-Bahriya. The latter is the eastern part according to several; though Sicard, a late traveller, more truly places Al-Bahriya, or, as he writes it, Beheir, beyond the western branch of the Nile.

ALBA-JULIA, a county of Transylvania, W. of Hermanstadt, and inhabited by Hungarians.

ALBA-JULIA, the capital of the foregoing, called by the Germans Wieselberg, and Gila-

Fejerwar by the Hungarians; is 26 miles W. of Hermanstadt, 79 N. E. from Temeswar, and 126 N. E. from Belgrade. It stands on a rising ground, amidst a fruitful country, and is watered by the rivers Ompay and Marisch, and is about 2 miles broad; but was much larger formerly, as appears from its old boundaries without the walls, which are 20 miles in compass. It continued a long time the capital of Dacia, and was the seat of its monarchs, having had a magnificent palace. It was the burial place of the ancient kings of Hungary. It was also formerly a bishopric, suffragan to Coloeza. It was inhabited by the Goths, and was a seat of the Roman-Legions. It owes its name to Julia Augusta, mother of Marcus Aurelius Antoninus Pius. The palace is splendid and impregnable.

ALBA-LONGA, a city built by Ascanius the son of Aeneas, in Italy; which he made the capital of his little kingdom; and afterwards became the seat of the Latin kings. By the victory of the 3 Horatii over the 3 Curiatii it lost its freedom; whereupon the town was ordered to be razed, and its inhabitants removed to Rome.

ALBA-REGIA, or REGALIS, a county of Lower Hungary; lying S. from that of Gran, and W. from that of Pelyez; it is 34 miles long, and about 28 broad. Its capital bears the same name. See STUHL WEISSENBURG.

ALBAN (St.) a village of Lower Forez, in the government of Lyonnois, a province of France; situated a league and a half from Roan; and near it are three mineral springs.

ALBANA, a town of Albania, in Asia. It is situated on the Caspian-Sea; and is considerable for its trade.

ALBANBURY. See CAMBODUNUM.

ALBANIA, a province of Turkey, in Europe, on the Gulf of Venice, bounded by Livadia on the S. by Thessaly and Macedonia on the E. and on the N. by Bosnia and Dalmatia. The people are strong, large, courageous, and good horsemen; but are said to be of a thievish disposition: the grand signior procures excellent soldiers from hence, particularly cavalry, known by the name of Arnauts. There are several large towns in this province; and the inhabitants are almost all Christians of the Greek church, and descended from the ancient Scythians. Formerly it was part of the kingdom of Macedonia. Their chief manufacture is carpets. The principal places are Durazzo, Velona, Antivari, Scutari, Croya, Alessio, Dibra, Dolcigno, and Albanapoli. Long. from 28 to 31, E. Lat. from 39 to 43, N.

ALBANIA, a country of Asia; bounded on the W. by Iberia, on the E. by the Caspian-sea, on the N. by mount Caucasus, on the S. by Armenia and the river Cyrus, now Kur; which, springing from the Moschian mountains that separate Colchis from Armenia, and watering the country of Mo-kan, receives the Aragus and Araxes, and falls into the Caspian-sea within a small distance from the southern borders of this country. The whole country formerly called Albania now goes under the names of Shirwan and East-Georgia, and is extremely fruitful and pleasant. The ancient historians take notice of the Albanian men being tall, strong-bodied, and, generally speaking, of a very graceful appearance; far excelling all other nations in comeliness as well as stature. Modern travellers take no notice of the appearance of the men; but extol the beauty of the women, which seems to be unnoticed by the ancients. The Albanians were anciently an independent and pretty powerful people; but we find no mention made of their kings till the reign of Alexander the Great, to whom the king of Albania is said to have presented a dog of an extraordinary fierceness and size.

ALBANO, in Latin ALBANUM; a well-built, little town of the Campagna, in Italy; formerly the celebrated Alba Longa, which was a city before Rome was built 487 years. It is one of those 6 bishoprics which are conferred on the 6 oldest cardinals. The modern Albano does not stand entirely on the same spot as the ancient, but a little more towards the N. near the Castle Gondolfo; and on the scite of the Villa Pompeii, as appears by the ruins of an amphitheatre built there by Dioclesian. This place is famous for its antiquities, and is much resorted to by the citizens of Rome in spring and autumn, for the benefit of the fresh air; it lying 12 miles S. E. of that city. It was formerly destroyed by Frederick Barbarossa; but has been since rebuilt and belonged to the dukes of Savelli; but they were obliged to part with it, and the Pope purchased it in 1697; since which time it has been subject to the see of Rome. This place is famous for its excellent wine, which Horace highly commends; and it still retains the character of being the best in all Italy. It has also beautiful prospects; and the Lago di Albano in its neighbourhood is entirely surrounded with mountains. Lat. 41, 46, N. Long. 13, 10, E. There is likewise another town of the same name in the Basilicate of the kingdom of Naples; remarkable for the fertility of the soil and the nobility of the inhabitants.

ALBANO (Lake) anciently called LACUS ALBANUS, near the town of the same name above-mentioned. It is about 8 miles in compass, very deep, and formerly very subject to overflow the adjacent country, notwithstanding the height of its banks, and discharged its waters into the Lake of Riccia, probably by some subterraneous way; which being in time choked up, caused this last to become quite dry. Since which the Romans cut a canal from the Lake of Albano, which passes quite under under the Castle Gandolpho, and runs through some parts of the territories of Rome, and thence falls into the Tyber. The Italians now call it the Lake of Gandolpho.

ALBANOPOLI, an inland town of Albania, a province of European Turkey, situated on the river Drin, near the frontiers of Macedonia, and on the declivity of a hill; 42 miles from Alessio to the E. and 50 from Durazzo towards the S. E. It was anciently a strong town and the capital of the province, which took its name from it; but now it is without walls, and almost a desert. Lat. 42, 6, N. Long. 20, 42, E.

ALBAN's (St.) a town in the hundred of Cassio, which arose out of the ancient Verulam; so called from a river of the same name running by it. It is a borough-town, in Hertfordshire, 21 miles from London. It owes its name to St. Alban, the first martyr of Great-Britain, who suffered in the persecution under Dioclesian, June 17, 293. A synod was held here, 429, against the heresy begun by Pelagius the Monk; and two bishops, sent for from France, preached against it in a chapel here, now converted into a barn. King Edward I. erected here a stately cross in memory of queen Eleanor; and king Edward VI. gave this borough a charter. The town is divided into 4 wards, in each of which is a constable and 2 church-wardens. Here is held a gaol-delivery 4 times a year, viz. on the Thursdays after the quarter-sessions at Hartford; and it has 3 churches, namely, St. Peter's, St. Stephen's, and St. Michael's; besides that called St. Alban's. When St. Andrew's, the ancient parish-church, was demolished, the corporation purchased of king Edward VI. the cathedral that belonged to the monks for 400l. and having made it their parish-church, they called it St. Alban's. Many curious coins and medals, to be seen in this church, were dug out of the ruins of Old Verulam. Here are the funeral monuments, of king Offa, its founder, whose statue is placed on a throne; of St. Alban the Martyr; and of Humphry called the Good Duke of Gloucester, whose leaden coffin being opened about 80 years ago, his corpse appeared entire, having been preserved in a pickle. In St. Michael's is a monument for the famous Sir Francis Bacon, lord viscount Verulam, whose statue in alabaster is seated in an elbow-chair. In niches on the S. side of St. Alban's church are those of 17 kings. The stone-screen of the communion-table is a very light and elegant piece of work, set up in 1434. The west end of the choir has a noble piece of Gothic workmanship. In the center of the nave is a remarkable echo; and the roof is throughout painted in devices and the arms of the benefactors; and, though of so many ages standing, is remarkably fresh. Near the west end of the church is the old gateway of the abbey; now used as a prison. The government of this town, by later charters than that of Edward VI. is vested in a mayor, high-steward, recorder, 12 aldermen, a town-clerk, and 24 assistants. Its fairs are on March 25, June 22, Aug. 15, and Sept. 29. Its weekly market on Saturday. This borough is a peculiar liberty both for ecclesiastical and civil government, the jurisdiction of which reaches to the 15 adjacent parishes. In the town are two charity-schools, the one for boys and the other for girls. Here Caesar obtained a victory over Cassibelan; and this was the scene of Boadicea's victory and cruelty, when she massacred 70,000 Romans and Britons who adhered to them. Near this place were fought two bloody battles between the houses of York and Lancaster, the first on May 23, 1455, when the Yorkists obtained the victory; the second on Shrove-Tuesday, in the 39th year of Henry VI. 1461, when the martial queen Margaret overcame the Yorkists. Near the town are the ruins of a fortification, commonly called Oyster-hills; supposed to have been a camp of Ostorius, the Roman proprætor. The neighbourhood of St. Alban's is well-furnished with gentlemen's seats and lordships. At Holloway-house the late duchess dowager of Marlborough caused a fine marble statue of queen Anne to be erected, on the pedestal of which is her majesty's character, both in public and private life, with this remarkable conclusion: "All this I know to be true. SARAH MARLBOROUGH, 1738." St. Alban sends 2 members to parliament. At Gornhambury, in this neighbourhood, is a statue of Henry VIII.

ALBANUS-MONS, now called Mont Albano; 16 miles from Rome, near where Alba Longa stood.

ALBANUS-MONS, to the north of Misa, called Albius by Strabo; the extremity of the Alps, which, together with the mountains to the east joining it, called Montes Bœii, separates the farther Liburnia and Dalmatia from Pannonia.

ALBANY, or ALBIN, in Latin ALBANIA (See BRAYDALBIN) a district of Perthshire, in Scotland. It gave the title of duke to the sons of the royal family. The first on whom it was conferred was lord Darnley, first cousin and husband to Mary queen of Scots; and the last that enjoyed it was his present Majesty's brother, prince Edward duke of York and Albany.

ALBANY, a county in the province of New-York, N. America; containing a vast quantity of fine low land. Its principal commodities are wheat, pease, and pine-boards. The winters in this country are commonly severe; and Hudson's river freezes so hard 100 miles to the southward of Albany, as to bear sledges loaded with heavy burdens. The great quantities of snow that commonly fall here are very serviceable to the farmers, not only in protecting their grain from the frost, but in facilitating the transportation of their boards, and other produce, to the banks of the river against the ensuing spring.

ALBANY, the capital of a county of its own name, in the province of New-York, N. America; 150 miles from that city, and 140 from Quebec. It is governed by a mayor, recorder, 6 aldermen, and as many assistants; was incorporated by colonel Dongan, has a city-hall, and a fort, composed of a square with 4 bastions. It has also a sheriff, town-clerk, chamberlain, clerk of the markets, constables, and a marshal. It is situated on Hudson's river, only 5 miles below the place where the east branch of the river leaves the southern, and runs up almost to the lake of the Iroquois, about 200 miles within land. After the first reduction of this place by the English, it was called New Albana, the Duke of York's Scotch title; and a strong stone-fort was built here, instead of the old one. This town contains between 200 and 300 families. At this place the governor of the northern provinces meets the sachems, or kings, of the Five Nations, or Iroquois, in order to renew their alliances, to settle matters of traffic, and to concert measures against their common enemy; and is reckoned the barrier of New-York against the Hurons. Lat. 43, 10, N. Long. 44, 49, W.

ALBANY, a fortress of New Wales, or the W. Main, N. America, where the Hudson's-bay company have a fort and settlement. It lies S. W. of the said bay. Lat. 53, 20, N. Long. 84, 20, W.

ALBALEGALIS. See STUL WEISSENBURG.

ALBAGARIA, a poor town in Alentejo, a province of Portugal; but has an audience court of its own.

ALBARGARIA DE PENELA, a district of Portugal, in the province of Entre Dourou-e-Minho, consisting of 11 parishes.

ALBARRACIN, or ALBARRAZIN, a city of Arragon, in Spain. It was the ancient Lobetum and Turia, from the river Turo, near which it stands, on the side of a craggy hill, by the river of the Guadalquivir; and is now distinguished by the title of Santa Maria Albarrazinensis. Its bishop is a suffragan to the archbishop of Saragosa, and has a yearly revenue of 6000 ducats. The number of its inhabitants is about 5000, divided into 3 parishes, besides a monastery and a nunnery. It is surrounded with high scarped mountains near the S. W. frontiers, towards Castile, and with a strong wall and castle. King James (or James) II. of Arragon raised it to the dignity of a city anno 1300. It is about 15 miles distant from Tervel, and 70 S. of Saragosa. Lat. 40, 40, N. Long. 2, 10, E.

ALBASIN, a fort built by the Russians on the river Amoor, in Siberia; and which was destroyed by the Chinese about the year 1650; but it was afterwards rebuilt by the Russians, and sustained a siege in 1764 against the Chinese, who were repulsed. It lies in 30 N. lat.

ALBAZETE, a little town of La Sierra, a subdivision of New Castile, in Spain.

ALBAZIN, a town of Great Tartary, with a strong fortress to defend it against the Chinese and Mogul Tartars. It is on the road from Moscow to Pekin. Long. 103, 30, E. Lat. 54, 0, N.

ALBE, or AUBE, a lordship now belonging to the duchy of Lorraine and Bar; formerly an ancient fief dependent on the bishopric of Metz; but which the dukes of Lorraine entirely assumed to themselves, together with its territorial jurisdiction, or paramount-superiority, in the year 1561.

ALBE, or SAR-ALBE, in Latin Sarac Albe, or Alba ad Saravum, the principal place of the last-mentioned lordship; lying on the river Saar, and 10 miles below Feneffrange.

ALBE. See ALBA.

ALBECK, a district and a small town with a castle belonging to the imperial city of Ulm, in the circle of Swabia, in Germany; north of the Danube, on the river Alb.

ALBEGNE, a small town of France, in Quercy, a district of the government of Guienne and Gascony.

ALBEMARLE, or AUMARLE, in Latin Albamaria, a little town in the territory of Caux, belonging to Upper Normandy, in France. It is situated on the declivity of a hill, near a meadow watered by the river Bresle; is the principal place of a duchy and peerdom, now belonging to the duke of Maine, one of Lewis XIV.'s legitimated sons; and from which he takes his titles of duke and peer. It is the seat of particular district, a viscounty, and forest-court. In it are 2 parishes, besides an abbey, and 2 convents. From Albemarle the Keppel family in England takes the title of earl; the first of whom was of Dutch extraction, and a particular favourite of the prince of Orange, afterwards king William III. It also gave the title of duke to the famous general Monk, who restored the royal family. The sergeants made in this town are very much esteemed; and they also make here a coarse sort of woollen stuffs, called frocks, for the use of the common people. It lies 20 miles S. of Abbeville, 35 N. E. of Rouen, and 70 N. W. of Paris. Lat. 49, 50, N. Long. 2, 20, E.

ALBEMARLE-RIVER, the most northerly part of North-Carolina, in America, confining on Virginia. It is full of creeks on both sides of it, which, for breadth, deserve the name of rivers; but they do not run far into the country. At the entrance of this river are Colliton-island and Roanoke-island. This river is separated from the Atlantic-ocean by a sand-bank, called Hatteras. On the the banks of this river are very extensive swamps; and near the bottom of it, on Chowan-river, is the town of Edenton. The Roanoke empties itself into Albemarle-river, or sound. Next to Albemarle-river, southward, is Pamlico-river, and between them is Cape-Hatteras. Albemarle district was more planted than any of the rest at the first settlement of Carolina, and consisted of near 300 families; but the plantations upon Ashley-river grew in time so superior to it that most of the planters here removed thither.

ALBEMARLE, a county in Virginia, N. America; which has the river Fluvanna flow on the S. side of it, several branches from which run up this county. It is bounded on the E. by Goochland county; and by a ridge of mountains is divided from Augusta county on the W. and it has Louisa county on the N.

ALBEN, in Latin Albanum, a mountain of Carniola, where are mines of quick-silver.

ALBENGA, by the ancients called Albium Ingaunum, Albigaunum, and Albingaunum, a small city in the Riviera di Ponente, or western division of the Genoese territories, on the main-land, in Italy. It lies on the coast, and appears, by some ancient towers and other ruins to have been formerly a very considerable place. Its site is on a spacious fertile plain, surrounded at some little distance with high mountains. The territory about it is covered with fine olive plantations and other trees; and the ground is well cultivated: here also grows abundance of hemp. But, with all these advantages, it is unhealthy even to a proverb. Here is the see of a bishop, founded by pope Alexander in 1179, when the city, which had been burnt by the Pisanes about a years before, was rebuilt. The bishop is a suffragan to the archbishop of Genoa; but the city has fallen very much from its ancient splendor. Opposite to it is a little island, or rather unformed rough rock, near a mile in circuit, called also Albenga, but by the inhabitants Isola d'Albenga, or the Small Island of Albenga; but its true name is Gallipara. It lies 36 miles from Genoa. Long. 8, 13. E. Lat. 44, 4. N.

ALBENQUE, a small town of Lower-Quercy, a subdivision of Guienne, in France.

ALBERARIN. See ALBARRACIN.

ALBERGARIA, a mean place in the province of Alentejo, in Portugal. It belongs to the dukes of Cadaval; and has an ouvidor, or audience-judge, of its own.

ALBERGARIA DE PENELA, a district in the Correição of Viana, and province of Entre Douro e Minho, in Portugal. It contains 11 parishes.

ALBERT; ANERE, or ENERE, a small town in Lower-Stattholdership of Santerre, a territory of Picardy, in France.

ALBI, anciently Alba Fucentes, a small place in the Ulterior Abruzzo, a province in the kingdom of Naples, in Italy.

ALBI, or ALBY, in Latin Albige, the capital of Albigeois, or diocese of Alby, in the government of Languedoc, in France, built on the river Tarn. It is situated in a very fruitful country, 40 miles N. E. of Toulouse. It was formerly only a bishop's see, subject to the metropolitan of Bourges; but pope Innocent XI. erected it into an archbishopric in the year 1678. It is the seat of a collection, viguery, royal jurisdiction, marshalsea, and forest-district. The prelate of this city is also its temporal lord; though the king has the higher and lower jurisdiction, as also the supreme demesne or dominion: his suffragans are the bishops of Rhodes, Castres, Cahors, Valres, and Mende; his diocese or province contains 327 parishes, and his annual income amounts to 95,000 livres, paying to the court of Rome a tax of 2000 florins. The cathedral is one of the richest and most beautiful in the kingdom, and the archbishop's palace is a fine structure. The little town of Chateavieux is a suburb to it. The public walk called La Lice, which is out of the city, and lies higher than it, is a most charming place. The doctrine of the Albigenes was condemned in a council held here in the year 1176. Lat. 43, 56. N. Long. 2, 14. E.

ALBI, or ALBY, a diocese of Upper Languedoc; constituting the northern part of the province of Albigeois, from which the Albigenes take their name. This country is extremely fruitful in corn, wine, fruits, and saffron: it is also populous, yet poor at the same time; which may be attributed not only to the misfortune in 1693, but likewise to the heavy taxes laid upon the people. The Albigeois is a small territory about 27 miles in length and 20 in breadth; abounding in corn, wood, grapes, saffron, plumbs, and sheep; and the inhabitants drive a great trade in dried prunes, grapes, a coarse sort of cloth, and wines of Gaillac. These wines are the only sorts hereabouts that are fit for exportation: they are carried down to Bourdeaux, and generally sold to the British. They have likewise several coal-mines.

ALBINTEMELIUM, ALBINTIMILIUM, or, at full length, ALBIUM INTEMELIUM, now Vintimiglia; situated in the S. W. of the territory of Genoa, near the borders of the county of Nice; with a port on the Mediterranean, at the mouth of the rivulet Rotta, almost about half-way between Monaco and S. Remo. Long. 7, 40. E. Lat. 43, 17.

ALBIOECE, or ALEBECE, otherwise called Reii Apollinares, from their superstitious worship of Apollo; also Civitas Reienfium; now Riez, in Provence, about 18 leagues to the N. E. of Toulon, on the N. side of the rivulet Verdon; was originally a Roman colony. It is sometimes written Regium.

ALBOLODUY, a little town belonging to Granada, in Spain. Lat. 37, 15, N. Long. 1, 59, E.

ALBON, a small place of Viennois, a territory of the Lower Delphinate, and government of Dauphiny, in France. It had formerly the title of a county; and among the counts that possessed the present delphinate, was one who had been christened Dauphin. Of this illustrious family are several branches still remaining in France, namely, the marquises of Forgeaux, Fronfac, &c.

ALBONA, in Latin Albunum, a little town of Istria, a province belonging to the republic of Venice. It is situated at the foot of the Monte di Vena, and on the confines of the Austrian territories in the same country.

AULBOURG. See AALBORG.

ALBRET, a duchy and subdivision of Gascony, one of the provinces of France; in Latin Albretum, Lepretum, or Leporetum, which, and Labrit, denote a hare, as great numbers are to be met with in the woods here; and the natives still call a hare Bret. In 1556 Henry II. of France erected it into a duchy, including the town of the same name, and other places in Bazadois. And from the noble family of Albret were descended two kings of Navarre; the last of which was Henry IV. king of France, whose mother, Jane d'Albret, was married to Antony of Bourbon. Of this family was Charles d'Albret, who opposed the English in Gascony, A. D. 1402, but in 1415 was killed in the battle of Agincourt; where he commanded the van of the French army. Lewis XIV. gave this duchy to the duke of Bouillon, as an indemnification for the principalities of Sedan and Raucourt, which that monarch had seized.

ALBRET, or LEBRET, a small town of Gascony, in France, in the duchy of the same name. It is situated 35 S. of Bourdeaux. Lat. 44, 20, N. Long. 50, W.

ALBUFEIRA, a small town in the district of Lagos, a jurisdiction belonging to the kingdom of Algarve, in Portugal. It contains 1000 inhabitants, and includes a district of 2 parishes. Its ancient castle is one of those which are borne in the royal arms. Its judge is under the Comarca.

ALBUFERA, a lake in the island of Majorca or Mallorca, one of the Balears, in the Mediterranean. The name Albufera signifies a small sea. It is 12,000 paces in circuit, and with it the sea forms a bay called Grac-mayor, the waters of which intermingle with those of Albufera.

ALBUQUERQUE, corrupted from the Latin Alba Quercus, a walled town of Spanish Estremadura, not far from the frontiers of Portugal. It is situated on an eminence, and defended by a very strong castle, which stands on a high hill. Here they have a good trade in wool and woollen cloth. The town was built about the middle of the 13th century, and contains about 2000 houses. In 1705 it was taken by the Portuguese, who kept possession of it till the peace of Utrecht in 1713. It lies 22 miles S.W. of Alcantara, and 17 miles N. of Badajoz. Lat. 39, N. Long. 7, W.

ALCACAR, a name given by the inhabitants to a spacious royal palace, which is situated on one side of the city of Toledo, in New Castile, a province of Spain, and stands on the top of a steep rock; from which is a prospect over the city, the river Tagus running at its foot through the neighbouring fields.

ALCACERE, or ALCAZAR DO SAL, a walled town in the audience of Setuval, a district of Estremadura, in Portugal. It is situated on the river Sandao; has its name from the large quantities of salt which this territory produces; and for the same reason it was called Salagia by the Romans, who built it. The country round it is quite barren, affording little else than rushes, which are carried to Lisbon, and there worked into fine mats. It has an old castle on a rock, impregnable; about 400 inhabitants, 2 parishes, 2 monasteries, a nunnery, hospital, hospital, and house of Mercy; and lies 30 miles S. E. of St. Ubes. Lat. 38, 18, N. Long. 9, 10, W.

ALCASOVA, a citadel fortified in the modern stile, which defends the town of Santarem, in Portuguese Estremadura. See SANTAREM.

ALCALA DE GUADEIRA, a small town of Spain, in Andalusia, upon the river Guadeira. Here are abundance of springs, whence they convey water to Seville by an aqueduct. W. long. 6, 16. N. lat. 37, 15.

ALCALA DE LOS GAZULES, a very old town of Seville, a subdivision of Andalusia, in Spain; situated on a mountain. Lat. 37, N. Long. 6, W.

ALCALA DE HENARES, a beautiful and large city of Spain, in New Castile; seated upon the river Henares, which washes its walls. It is built in a very agreeable plain, and is of an oval figure. The streets are handsome and pretty strait; one of them is very long, running from one end of the city to the other. The houses are well built; and there are several squares, the largest of which is an ornament to the city; it is surrounded on all sides with piazzas, where tradesmen have their shops, to expose several sorts of commodities to sale, of which there is as great plenty and variety as in most towns of Spain. The university was founded by cardinal Ximenes, archbishop of Toledo, about the beginning of the 16th century. The land about Alcala is watered by the Henares, well cultivated and very fruitful, while that at a distance is dry and sterile: it yields grain in plenty, very good muscat wine, and melons of a delicious kind. Without the walls is a spring, the water of which is so pure and so well tasted that it is inclosed and shut up for the king of Spain's own use, from whence it is carried to Madrid. This city is 10 miles south-west of Guadalaxara, and 13 miles east of Madrid. W. long. 4, 20. N. lat. 40, 30.

ALCALA-REAL, a small city of Spain, in Andalusia, with a fine abbey. It is built on the top of a high mountain, in a mountainous country; and the road to it is incommodious, rough, and unequal; but to make amends for this, here are several kinds of exquisite fruit and wine. W. long. 4, 15. N. lat. 37, 18.

ALCAMO, a town of Val di Mazara, one of the three territories or valleys into which the island of Sicily, in Lower Italy, is subdivided. It has the title of a barony.

ALCANEDE, a town in the district of Santarem, in Portuguese Estremadura. It belongs to the knights of the order of Aviz. Lat. 39, N. Long. 6, W.

ALCANIO, or ALCANIUS, in the island of Sicily, a town with the title of a barony; situate near the Gulph of Castle à Mare, at the foot of Mount Bonifati, about 3 miles from the sea-coast, and 16 from Palermo, in the way to Trapani.

ALCANIZ, a pretty town of Arragon, in Spain. It is situated on the river Guadalope, 12 miles from Caspe, and belongs to the knights of Calatrava, with a fortress for its defence. Here also is a collegiate church, and is surrounded with gardens and fruit-trees. Lat. 41, N. Long. 2, E.

ALCANTARA, or VALENZA DE ALCANTARA, a fortified town of Spanish Estremadura, situated on the Tagus, in a fruitful country, near the frontiers of Portugal. It takes its name (which signifies a stone-bridge) from an ancient stately one of that kind, built on this river in the reign of the emperor Trajan, and at the expence of several Lusitanians, being 200 feet high, 670 long, and 28 broad; and near the junction of the river Alcantara with the Tagus, falling into the latter with surprising rapidity; whence appears the prodigious strength of this famous bridge, having stood so many centuries firm and undamaged. This town anciently belonged to the Vettones, but was enlarged and beautified by Julius Cæsar or Augustus, and called Norba Cæsarea, and by Pliny, Colonia Norbensis. The Moors intended to have built Alcantara round the aforesaid bridge. In 1212 king Alphonfus IX. took it from the Castilians, and gave it to the knights of Calatrava, who afterwards had their name from Alcantara. It lies 45 miles N. of Bajadox. Lat. 39, 18, N. Long. 7, 12, W.

ALCANTARA, or ALCANTARILLA, a small town of Seville, a subdivision of Andalusia, in Spain. It is situated on an eminence, where the Romans built a famous bridge over a morass, and which is very worthy of notice, with a tower at each end; so that the bridge can be shut on occasion. Lat. 37, 40, N. Long. 5, 10, W.

ALCANTARA, a river in Sicily. See CANTARA.

ALCARAZ, or ALCAREZ, a city of La Mancha, a territory of New Castile, in Spain. It has a good wall, and a fortress, on a high mountain, for its defence; is situated in a very fruitful country, and near the banks of the river Guadarmena, which rises about 12 miles from it, and runs through charming pastures, on which great numbers of fine horses are bred. It is remarkable for an ancient aqueduct. The inhabitants are about 600 families, in 5 parishes, with 5 monasteries and 2 nunneries. It lies 100 miles N. W. of Cartagena, 25 N. of the confines of Andalusia; 108 S. of Cuenza, and 138 S. E. of Madrid. Lat. 38, 28, N. Long. 1, 50, W.

ALCASSAR, a city of Barbary, seated about 2 leagues from Larache, in Asga, a province of the kingdom of Fez. It was of great note, and the feat of the governor of this part of the kingdom. It was built by Jacob Almanzor, king of Fez, about the year 1180, and designed for a magazine, and place of rendezvous for the great preparations he was making to enter Granada, in Spain, and to make good the footing Joseph Almanzor had got some time before. It is said his father first invaded Spain with 300,000 men, most of whom he was obliged to bring back to Africa, to quiet a rebellion that had broke out in Morocco. This done, he returned to Spain again with an army, as is said, of 200,000 horse and 300,000 foot. The city is now fallen greatly to decay, so that of 15 mosques there are only 2 that are made use of. The reason, probably, is the bad situation of the town; for it stands so low, that it is excessively hot in summer, and almost overflowed with water in the winter: this they affirm to be owing to a curse of one of their faints. Here are a great number of storks, who live familiarly with the people, walking about the town, possessing the tops of the houses and mosques without molestation; for they esteem them sacred birds, and account it sinful to disturb them. At present, the bathaw of Tetuan appoints a governor to this town, which is the last of his dominions towards Mequinez. Near this city there is a high ridge of mountains, running towards Tetuan, whose inhabitants were never brought entirely under subjection, and whenever it was attempted, they revenged themselves by infesting the roads, and robbing and destroying the travellers; when they were pursued, they retired into their woody mountains, where none could safely follow them. Not far from hence is the river Elmahassen, famous for the battle fought between Don Sebastian king of Portugal and the Moors, in which the Portuguese were defeated, and their king slain. W. long. 12, 35. N. lat. 35, 15.

ALCATIL, according to the Jesuits, is a very large and populous city of Indostan, or the empire of the Great Mogul. It is situated in the peninsula within the Ganges, and W. of Ayenkolam. It is but ill-built, and dirty, like most of the cities in this country. The Bramins here daily worshipped the devil, by the name of Poolear; and the Jesuits found here a sect, called the Linganists, from a monstrous and abominable figure, called Ligan, which some of the idolaters wore about their necks, as a token of their devotion to Priapus. Here they also saw, hanging on the boughs of trees, the necklaces, bracelets, and other ornaments, of a woman that had been just burnt upon the funeral-pile with her deceased husband; a diabolical practice which the Moors of this country have long endeavoured to abolish. Lat. 9, 10, N. Long. 79, 15, E.

ALCAUDETE, a small town of Cordova, one of the 3 subdivisions of Andalusia, a province of

ALCESTER. See AULCESTER.

ALCHESTER, in Oxfordshire, England, a Roman station near Bicester; where the quadrangular foss is still to be seen, notwithstanding the area or site has been time immemorial part of a common field, many antiquities having been turned up by the plough. Near it passes the Roman consular way, called Akeman-street.

ALCINO, Mont, anciently Mont Alcinai, a small town in the territory of Sienna and Grand Duchy of Tuscany, in Italy. It is situated on a mountain, a great part of which it seems at a distance to cover; and its steeples also may be observed a considerable way off. It is the residence of a bishop, who is immediately subject to the pope. In the neighbourhood of this place grows the most exquisite wine in Italy, called Muscatello di Mont-Alcino; but the inhabitants are not allowed to sell a single pipe of it till the Great Duke has first ordered what number he judges proper for his own use. At the time that the Florentines, assisted by the forces of the emperor Charles V. besieged the city of Vienna, the principal families of the latter withdrew to Mont-Alcino, fortified it, and maintained themselves, under the protection of the king of France, against all the efforts of the enemy, and could not be dislodged from thence. It lies between 2 and 3 miles from Torrineri, to the left in coming from that place. Lat. 42, 50, N. Long. 12, 10, E.

ALCMAER, a city of the United Provinces; seated in North Holland, about 4 miles from the sea, 15 from Haerlaem, and 18 from Amsterdam. It is a handsome city, and one of the cleanest in Holland. The streets and houses are extremely neat and regular; and the public buildings are very beautiful. It had formerly 2 parish-churches, dedicated to St. Matthew and St. Lawrence. The latter had so high a tower that it served for a sea-mark to the vessels that were in the open sea; but, in 1464, it tumbled tumbled down, and damaged the other church so much that they were both demolished in 1470, and one church was built in their stead, dedicated to the same saints. The Spaniards, under the command of Frederic of Toledo, son of the duke d'Alva, came to besiege it, after they had taken Haerlem, in 1573; but were forced to raise the siege, after 3 months lying before it, as well on account of the infection of the air as the stout resistance of the inhabitants and soldiers. It has given birth to several learned men. In 1637 was a public auction in this city of 120 tulips, which, all together, sold for 90,000 guilders; a single one of them, named the Viceroy, sold for 4203 guilders; and not only the name and price, but the weight of these flowers, are particularly set down in the city-registers: so that the passion of giving exorbitant prices for flowers and flower-roots, by which many were ruined, was come to such a height in Holland that the states were obliged to put a stop to it by severe penalties. Lat. 52, 38, N. Long. 5, 21, E.

ALCMINA, a marquisate of the Val di Mazara, one of the 3 subdivisions of the island of Sicily, in Italy.

ALCOA, a river of Portuguese Estremadura, between which and Baca, Alcobaca is situated.

ALCOBACA, a small town of Leiria, in Portuguese Estremadura, situated between the little river Alcoa and Baca. It contains 950 inhabitants; and here is a famous Cistercian convent, the most considerable and richest abbey in all Portugal: to its jurisdiction belongs one parish. Lat. 38, 40, N. Long. 5, 49, W. in the province of Alentejo, in Spain. It is situated on the Guadiana; is indeed in Algarve province, but lies on the frontiers of Alentejo, and belongs to its jurisdiction. It contains about 1000 inhabitants, and comprehends a district of 6 parishes. It has a castle for its defence. Lat. 37, 30, N. Long. 7, 30, W.

ALCOY, a small but neat town of Valencia, in Spain. It is situated on a river bearing the same name with it. In its neighbourhood was discovered an iron-mine in the year 1504.

ALCUDIA, a city and good port of Majorca, one of the Balearic islands, in the Mediterranean, belonging to Spain. It consists of about 1000 houses, and is situated between the 2 large harbours of Port-major and Port-minor. Lat. 40, 10, N. Long. 5, 35, E.

ALCYONE, a town of Thessaly, in European Turkey; situated on the Sinus Maliacus.

ALCYONIUM STAGNUM, a lake in the territory of Corinth, whose depth was unfathomable, and in vain attempted to be discovered by Nero; through this lake Bacchus is said to have descended to hell, to bring back Semele.

ALDAN, one of the many rivers which fall to the right hand into the Lena, in Asiatic Russia.

ALDBOROUGH, a well-situated town of Suffolk, in a valley on the sea-shore. It has 2 streets, each near a mile long. It abounds with sea-faring people. The river All, or Ald, runs not far from its S. end, affording a good quay. It has a good harbour. The town trades to Newcastle for coals; and hence corn is exported. Aldborough is pretty well situated for strength, with a battery of several pieces of cannon. The church, which stands on a hill a little W. of the town, is a good edifice. It is a town corporate, governed by 2 bailiffs, 10 capital burgesses, and 24 inferior officers; and sends 2 members to parliament. Its fairs are March 1 and May 3; markets are Wednesdays and Saturdays. It lies about 3 miles from Orford, and 88 miles N.E. of London. Lat. 52, 20, N. Long. 1, 25, E.

ALDBOROUGH, a borough-town in the W. Riding of Yorkshire, on the side of which stood an ancient city and Roman colony, called Isurium Brigantium; of which, though not so much as the ruins are now to be seen, yet the coins, urns, pavements, &c. frequently dug up there, are a proof of such a place once existing. It is situated on the Ouse, and sends 2 members to parliament. The present Borough-bridge, or Brigg, seems to have risen out of Aldborough. It is situated 15 miles N.W. of York, and 200 N. of London, 3 miles from Ripon.

ALDBY, a village in the E. Riding of Yorkshire, England, on the river Derwent, 4 miles from Stanford-bridge.

ALDEA GALLEGA, a town in the audience of Setuval and province of Estremadura, in Portugal, situated on the Tagus, 10 miles from Lisbon.

ALDEA-GALLEGA DE MERCIANA, in the audience of Alenquer, and province of Estremadura, in Portugal, is a small place opposite to Lisbon, consisting of 760 inhabitants, and has one parish belonging to its jurisdiction.

ALDENBURG, in Germany and Hungary. See ALTENBURG.

ALDERBOROUGH in Wiltshire, England, a village 2 miles from Salisbury, on a healthy hill, near the Avon river. It carries on a manufacture of cottons and fustians; but received considerable damage by a fire in September, 1777, and had 200 houses destroyed.

ALDERHOLM, a pleasant island of Sweden, formed by the 3 arms of a river running through Gentle, a town of Noruland, in Sweden. Here is a wharf, a repository for planks and deals, 2 packing-houses, a large custom-house for taking toll of the ships, an arsenal for cannon, and a granary.

ALDENHAM, a village in Hertfordshire, England, 2 miles from Watford, and 5 miles from St. Alban's.

ALDERMARSTON, in Berkshire, England, a village 3 miles from Alchester, on the borders of Hampshire, and 3 miles from Reading, is a neat village on an eminence that overlooks the river Kennet, and has fairs May 6 and July 7.

ALDERNEY, an island subject to Great-Britain, situated about a league and a half from Cape la Hogue, in Normandy, and 30 leagues from the nearest part of England. It is in circumference about 9 miles, lies high, and on the S. side has a harbour for small vessels, called Crabby. On it is a church, with a town containing about 200 houses, in which live to the number of 1200 inhabitants. The soil is good for corn or pasture. Their manure is the sea-weed, called vraic, or wreck. The straight which divides this isle from France, called by the French, Le Ras de Blanchart, and by us, The Race of Alderney, is reckoned dangerous in stormy weather, when the wind happens to encounter the strong currents in this channel; but in calm weather it is very safe; and there is depth of water sufficient for the largest ships to ride here with ease: so that in 1692-3 part of the French fleet escaped this way after the blow which they had met with at La Hogue. Alderney is a dependence of Guernsey. To the westward is a range of rocks for 3 leagues together, which, having several eddies, are dreadful to mariners, who call them the Caskets, from that principal rock which advances at the head of all the rest, with a spring of excellent fresh water, and looks into the Channel; from the middle of which may be seen, in a clear day, not only the Casket, but the head of Portland. Here the sons of Henry I. were cast away in their passage to Normandy; and Admiral Balchen, a brave and excellent officer, was lost, October 5, 1744, in the Victory, a first-rate man of war, of 100 guns and 1000 men. On the E. side of the above-mentioned harbour is an old fort, with a dwelling-house near it. The land under the fort is overwhelmed with sand driven on it by the N.W. wind. Here is a bailiff and other officers of justice; from whom lies an appeal to the courts of Guernsey. The inhabitants are poor, occasioned by a custom like that prevailing in some parts of Kent, which is called gavel-kind, whereby lands are equally divided into parcels among the last proprietor's children. Lat. 49, 50, N. Long. 2, 17, W.

ALDERNEY, in Gloucestershire, England, a village near Wotton Underedge, whose parish is about 5 miles in compass, and lies on the side of a hill, between 2 rivulets, which join and fall into the Avon. On some of the hills near it are found immense quantities of fossils, in the form of oysters and cockle-shells, &c.

ALDERTON, in Gloucestershire, England, near Tewkesbury; near which village a great quantity of land removed itself, about 70 years ago, and slipped into the neighbouring county of Worcester, which spot yet retains the name of The Slip.

ALDERWAS, or ALREWAS, in Staffordshire, England, between Litchfield and Burton on Trent; which village has a market on Tuesdays, and a fair on July 19, 26, and 27.

ALDINGTON, in Kent, England, near Limme, a place where the officers belonging to Romney Marsh and its manors are yearly elected; and at the parish-church of this place the inhabitants of Hurst attend, since the decay of their own church.

ALDOBRANDINA, (Villa of) or BELVEDERE, a fine seat of Fascati, in Italy, built by Cardinal P. Aldrobandini, and the architect Giacomo de la Porta. It now belongs to the house of Pamphili.

ALDUABIS, a river of Celtic Gaul, which, rising from Mount Jura, separating the Sequani from the Helvetii, and running through the county of Burgundy, or the Franche Comté, environs almost on every side the city of Besançon; and, running by Dole, falls into the Saone near Chalons. In Cæsar it is called Alduadubis; now Le Doux.

ALED, a river in Denbighshire, Wales, which runs into the Elney, west of Llanafydd.

ALEFCHIMO, one of the 4 subdivisions, or bailiwicks, of the island of Corfu, in the Mediterranean, towards the E. It contains 28 villages and near 10,000 men. The village of Potami resembles a middling town. Towards the S.W. are still still to be seen some remains of the ancient city of Gradichi.

ALEGRANSA, a little island near the Canaries, in the Atlantic ocean; with a convenient harbour, defended by a strong castle.

ALEGRE, in Latin Alegra, a town of Lower Auvergne, in France, situated at the foot of a high hill, on which stands a large and strong castle, which commands the town. It gives the title of Marquis. On the top of the hill is a large lake, said to be fathomless; and at its foot is a rivulet, which rises from several ponds, and runs into the river Borne. Long. 3, 50, E. Lat. 45, 10, N.

ALEGRETTE, a small town of Portugal, in Alentejo, on the confines of Port Alegre, on the river Caja, which falls into the Guadiana, a little below Bajadoz, near the frontiers of Spanish Estremadura. It is a very pretty town, and finely situated; 7 miles south-east of Port Alegre, and 30 north of Elvas. W. long. 5, 20; N. lat. 39, 6.

ALEX, a large river of Asiatic Russia, which falls to the left into the Ob, or Obi.

ALEKSIN, or ALEXSIN, a small place in the government of Moscow.

ALEMANIA, or ALLEMANIA, a name of Germany, but not known before the time of the Antonines, and then used only for a part. After the Marcomanni and the allies had removed from the Rhine, a rabble, or collection of people from all parts of Gaul, as the term Alamanni denotes, prompted either by levity or poverty, occupied the Agri, called Decumates by Tacitus, because they held them on a tithe; now supposed to be the duchy of Wittenburg. Such appear to be the small beginnings of Alemania, which was in after-times greatly enlarged; but still it was considered as a distinct part; for Caracalla, who conquered the Alamanni, assumed the surname both of Alamannicus and Germanicus.

It contains 2100 inhabitants, has 5 parish churches, 1 casa da misericordia, or house of mercy, a hospital, and 3 convents. It is the principal place of the ouvidoria, or district belonging to the queen. It is also the residence of an ouvidor, who is at the same time a provedor and a juiz da fora. To its districts belong 13 parishes.

ALENTAKIEN, a subdivision of the province of Esthonia, or general government of Reval, in European Russia.

ALENTEJO, the 5th province, and one of the largest, in Portugal. It is bounded to the N. by Estremadura and Beira, on the E. by Spain, on the S. by Algarve, and westward by the sea. Some reckon its extent from N. to S. to be 40 miles, and from S. to W. 30; but others make each of these 34. It has its name from its situation, as in regard of Estremadura and the other provinces lying farther to the N. and first conquered. It is situated on the other side of the Tagus (Alem do rio Tejo). It is watered both by this and the Guadiana. In this province are some mountains, though it is mostly level, and but thinly inhabited. Its greatest riches consist in wheat and barley, with which in general the whole province abounds. In many places they have also wine, oil, fruits, wild game, pastures, and plenty of fish. Several places likewise yield precious stones and fine vessels; as the white marble of Estremoz and Viana, the green stone of Borba and Villa-Vieosa, the white and red sort of Setuval and Arrabida, with the vases of Montemor and Estremoz, very much valued in Spain. The exuberant plenty of this province, especially with regard to the necessaries for the support of an army, is the reason that it is the usual theatre of war, which, among others, it experienced in the two last wars that were concluded by the treaties of peace in 1668 and 1715; and on the same account the kings of Portugal have reason for keeping up good fortresses in this province, the whole of which contains 4 cities, 88 towns, and in general 356 parishes; and to these belong 268,082 souls. It is divided into 8 jurisdictions, namely, the 3 correicoes of Evora, Elva, and Portalegre; and the 5 ouvidorias of Beja, do campo de Ourique, de Villa Vieosa, de Crato, and de Aviz. The far greater part of the inhabitants in this province are farmers; and the land is so rich, and well watered by several rivers that fall into the Tagus, or Guadiana, both which last run quite across this province, that they are industrious, and have few poor people among them. What money they get by farming, they generally lay out a considerable part of in the education of their sons, whom they send to the universities; and they improve themselves so well as in time to fill all the courts in this kingdom; and, of farmers, even to become ministers of state. They mostly become such proficient in the study of the law as to raise themselves sometimes to the highest places, and acquire immense estates; and at length come to settle in their own native place, and live in such splendor that this is a constant incentive to the rest for trying their fortune in the same way. This territory not only yields sufficient maintenance for its own inhabitants, but likewise supplies some of the adjacent provinces, which are more barren or less cultivated: and this exportation is very much facilitated by those rivers which intersect the country; among which, besides the great ones above mentioned, are the Enxarama, which empties itself into the Zatus or Zadao, as this last doth into the sea at Setuval. The Odior and Teva run, after a long winding course, into the Tagus. This province lies between lat. 37, 30 and 39, 30, W. and between long. 7 and 9, W.

ALENZON, a large handsome town of France, in Lower Normandy, with the title of a duchy. It is surrounded with good walls and flanked with towers. The castle was formerly a place of great consequence, and has held out long sieges. It has but one parish-church, which has a bold and noble front. Among the nunneries, that of St. Clair is most remarkable. It is seated on the river Sarthe, in a vast open plain, which produces all sorts of corn and fruit. Near it there are quarries of stone fit for building, wherein are found a fort like Bristol stones. The linen made at Alenzon is very good, and sells at Paris. It is 20 miles N. of Mans, 63 S. by W. of Rouen, and 88 S. W. of Paris. Long. 0, 10. N. lat. 48, 25.

ALEPPO, or HALEB, the metropolis of Syria, is built on 8 small hills or eminences, on the highest of which the castle is erected, and is now generally agreed to be the ancient Beræa. This mount is of a conic form, and seems in a great measure to be raised with the earth thrown up out of a deep broad ditch which surrounds it. The suburbs to the N. N. E. are next in height to this, and those to the W. S. W. are much lower than the parts adjacent, and than any other part of the city. It is encompassed by an old wall considerably decayed, and by a broad ditch now in most places turned into gardens. It is about 3 miles and a half in circumference, but the suburbs 8. The mosques in Aleppo are numerous, and some of them magnificent. Before each of them is an area, with a fountain in the middle, designed for ablutions before prayers; and behind some of the larger there are little gardens. There are many large khans, or caravanferas, consisting of a capacious square, on all sides of which are a number of rooms, built on a ground-floor, used occasionally for chambers, ware-houses, or stables. Above stairs there is a colonade or gallery on every side, in which are the doors of a number of small rooms, wherein the merchants, as well strangers as natives, transact most of their business. The streets are narrow, but well paved, and kept very clean. The bazars, or market-places, are long covered narrow streets, on each side of which are a great number of small shops, just sufficient to hold the tradesman and his goods, the buyer being obliged to stand without. Each separate branch of business has a particular bazar, which is locked up, as well as the streets, at an hour and a half after sun-set; but the locks are of wood, though the doors are cased with iron. The slaughter-houses are in the suburbs, open to the fields. The tanners have a khan to work in near the river. To the southward in the suburbs they burn lime; and a little beyond that there is a village where they make ropes and cat-gut. On the opposite side of the river, to the westward, there is a glass-house, where they make a coarse white glass in the winter only, for the greatest part of this manufacture is brought from a village 35 miles westward. The city is supplied with good water from springs near the banks of the river Heylen, about 5 miles to the N. E. which is conveyed thence by an aqueduct, and distributed all over the town by earthen pipes. This is sufficient for drinking, cookery, &c. but the fountains are supplied by wells of brackish water, of which there is one in every house. Their fuel is wood and charcoal in the house; but they heat their bagnios with the dung of animals, leaves of plants, parings of fruit, and the like. The inhabitants of Aleppo, though of different religions, seem to be much the same sort of people. The number of souls in the city and suburbs is computed at about 235,000; of whom 200,000 are Turks, 30,000 Christians, and 5000 Jews. Of the Christians the greater number are Greeks, next to them the Armenians, then the Syrians, and lastly the Maronites; each of whom have a church in the city, called Judida, in which quarter and the parts adjacent most of them reside. The common language is the vulgar Arabic; but the Turks of condition use the Turkish. Most of the Armenians can speak the Armenian, some few Syrians understand Syriac, and many of the Jews Hebrew; but scarce one of the Greeks understand a word of Greek; however, in their manners they all are much alike. Aleppo is 70 miles E. of Scanderoun, on the sea-coast, and 175 N. by E. of Damascus. Long. 37, 25, E. Lat. 35, 45, N.

ALEPPO (Old) is computed to be about 12 miles to the S. of the present Aleppo, and near 2 leagues to the E. of the high-road. This place seems to have been Chalcis, the ancient capital of the district of Chalcidene, and not the ancient Beræa, which, without doubt, stood where Aleppo now is. The remains of it are about a mile S. of the river of Aleppo, which is called the Caia, and runs at the foot of the hills which are between this place and that city. There are some remains of the foundations of the city-walls, which are about 10 feet thick: they are not above a mile in circumference, and were built with square towers at equal distances. At the S. E. side of the city is a rising ground, on which there are foundations of an ancient castle, which was about half a mile in circumference; cumference; a confused heap of ruins, except on the N. E. side without the town, where, on an advanced ground, are foundations of an oblong-square building, which might be a temple. There is a high hill to the W. of the city, on which the fortress probably stood, which was the great defence of all this country. On the top of it there are 3 or 4 very fine large cisterns, like arched vaults, cut down in the rock, with a hole in the top to draw up the water, and steps down to them on one side. There is likewise a mosque on a mount, which is the highest part of the hill; and at the E. end of the mosque are the foundations of a semi-circular building. At the foot of this hill, to the N. there is cut, over the door of a grotto, a spread-eagle, in relief, which might be the work of the Romans, probably during the government of the Flavian-family, who might be benefactors to the city, as the name of it was changed in compliment to some of them, probably Trajan; for there is a medal of this city with Trajan's head on it.

ALERIA, ALALIA, or ALARIA, a town of Corsica; situated near the middle of the E. side of the island, on an eminence, near the mouth of the river Rotanus mentioned by Ptolemy; built by the Phœceans. Afterwards Sylla led a colony thither. It is now in ruins, and called Aleria Distrutta.

ALERSBERG, a trading town in Bavaria.

ALESA, ALESA, or HALESA, a town of Sicily, on the Tuscan-sea; built by Archonides of Herbita, in the 2d year of the 94th olympiad, or 400 years before Christ; situated on an eminence about a mile from the sea, now in ruins. It enjoyed immunity from taxes under the Romans. The inhabitants were called Halefimi, Alefimi, and Alæfimi.

ALESBURY, or AYLESBURY, the largest and best borough-town in Buckinghamshire. In William the Conqueror's time it was a royal manor; and his favourites held it of him by tenure, that they should find litter and straw for the king's bed-chamber, to provide him 3 eels in winter, and 3 green geese in summer; besides herbs for his chamber. The town, standing on a hill, consists of several large streets, which lie round the market-place in a kind of quadrangle, where there is a town-house for the summer-sittings, the sessions, and other public meetings of the county. Under it is the gaol, with other public buildings, erected by Sir John Baldwin, lord chief justice of the common-pleas. It was incorporated by queen Mary in 1553, consisting of a bailiff, 10 aldermen, and 12 capital burgesses. The country round Alesbury is low and dirty. The fairs are on the Saturday before Palm-Sunday, on the 14th of June, and 25th of September. Its chief officer is now a constable. This was a strong town at the beginning of the Saxon times. Many of the poor here are employed in making lace for edgings; but much inferior to those from Flanders. Here provisions are plentiful and cheap. All round this town is a large tract of the richest land in England; extending for many miles, almost from Tame, on the edge of Oxfordshire, to Leighton, in Bedfordshire; which, from this town, is called the Vale of Alesbury. It is famous for fattening cattle and sheep. Here a ram for breeding is frequently sold for 10*l*. Alesbury sends 2 members to parliament; and is situated near the Thames, by means of which the products of this country are conveyed in barges to London. It lies 16 miles S. E. of Buckingham, and 44 miles N. W. of London.

ALESHAM, a market-town in Norfolk; 9 miles N. of Norwich, and 121 N. of London. It is populous; but consists chiefly of knitters of stockings. Its markets are on Saturdays; and its fairs on March 23 and the last Tuesday in September. A court is kept here for the duchy of Lancaster, and of this manor, that of Sextons is held by the rod, at the will of the lord, and granted by copy of court-roll.

ALESIA, called Alexia by Livy and others, a town of the Maridubii, a people of Celtic Gaul; situated, according to Cæsar, on a very high hill, whose foot was washed on 2 sides by rivers. The town was of such antiquity that Diodorus Siculus says it was built by Hercules. It is supposed to be the city of Alife, in the duchy of Burgundy, not far from Dijon.

ALESSANI, a district in that part of Corsica which lies on this side the mountains, or in its N. E. part. It can raise 450 men who are able to bear arms.

ALESSANO, or ALESSINO, a small town, but the residence of a bishop, in the Terra d'Otranto, a province in the kingdom of Naples, in Italy. It is situated on the S. E. part of it, near the sea, 12 miles S. of the city of Otranto. Lat. 40, 20. N. Long. 19, 27. E.

ALESSIO, or ALESIO, in Latin Lissus, or Lissum, a town of Turkish Dalmatia, in the kingdom of Hungary, with the see of a bishop. It is situated on a mountain.

ALESSIA, Lissus, a town of Albania, in European Turkey, not far from the Drin's mouth; where it forms a gulph, now called the Gulph of Drino, anciently Illyric Bay. It is defended by a castle, where the valiant Scanderbeg died in 1467, and was buried: for whom the Turks have such a veneration that they carry away pieces of his tomb for relics, and esteem these as an effectual charm for animating their courage in battle. It lies 50 miles S. W. of Ragusa. Lat. 42, 10. N. Long. 20, 16. E.

ALET, a diocese of Lower-Languedoc, in France, and a part of the county of Razes, which derives its name from the town of Redda, long since destroyed.

ALET,

ALET, ALECTA, or ELECTA, a small town of the above diocese; situated at the foot of the Pyrennees, near the river Aude. It is the principal place of a collection, and owes its origin to a Benedictine-abbey, which was afterwards turned to a bishopric. Its bishop is lord of the place, but subject to the archbishop of Narbonne; he has a diocese of 80 parishes, an income of 18,000 livres, and pays a taxation to the court of Rome of 1500 florins. From the foot of one of the mountains surrounding this town issues a spring of hot waters, which cures several distempers. From these mountains the Romans dug gold; and that their bowels still contain this metal is certain, since the little rivulets which spring from thence carry down with their waters gold-sand. It lies 10 miles S. of Carcassone. Lat. 43, 20, N. Long. 2, 5, E.

ALETUM, or ALETA, a town of Celtic Gaul, now extinct. From its ruins arose St. Malo, in Brittany, at the distance of a mile. Its ruins are called Guich Aleth.

ALEUTIAN-ISLES, (the nearest) a cluster of islands stretching from 52 to 54 degrees N. latitude, in the sea of Kamtschatka. They were discovered in 1745 by Michael Nevodtsikoff, a native of Tobolski, who sailed from Kamtschatka Sept. 10 of the same year; and falling in with three of these islands, wintered upon one of them, in order to kill sea-otters. The inhabitants of these islands ornament themselves with different figures sewn into the skin: and have two small holes cut through the bottom of their under lips, through each of which they pass a bit of sea-horse tusk, worked into the form of a tooth, with a small button at one end to keep it within the mouth when it is placed in the hole. This cluster of islands contains about 1000 souls, whose dwellings have no other furniture than benches and mats of platted grass. Their dress consists of a kind of shirt made of bird-skins, and of an upper garment of intestines stitched together: they wear wooden-caps, ornamented with a small piece of board projecting forwards, seemingly for a defence against the arrows. They are all provided with stone-knives, and some of them have iron ones; their only weapons are arrows, with points of bone or flint. On some of these islands there are no trees; but there are the cow-parsnips, cloud-berries, crane-berries, bilberries, and services; and the climate of them is not very severe, the snow not lying upon the ground above a month in the year. They are all subject to Russia; and pay a tribute of furs into the chancery of Kamtschatka, which are found in great plenty, and which occasions them to be visited very often by the Russians and the people of Kamtschatka, who kill great numbers of sea-otters, different sorts of foxes, bears, sea-ions, seals, sea-cows, and sea-horses. The principal food of the natives is the flesh of the sea-animals, which they harpoon with their lances; and the different berries which these islands produce; they navigate from one island to another, in boats of skin sewed together with leather thongs, and which are called baidars. They are much attached to the Russians; and some of them speak that language, having been carried to Kamtschatka on purpose to learn it. For an account of the farthest Aleutian-Isles see FOX-ISLANDS.

ALEXANDER Newski's convent. See NEWSKI.

ALEXANDREA (anc. geogr.) a mountain of Mysia, on the sea-coast; forming a part of mount Ida, where Paris gave judgment on the three goddesses.

ALEXANDRETTA, by the Turks called Scanderoon; a town in Syria, at the extremity of the Mediterranean-sea. It is the port of Aleppo, from which it is distant 28 or 30 leagues. It is now little else but a heap of ruined houses, chiefly inhabited by Greeks, who keep tipling-houses for sailors. The air is very unwholesome; and therefore the better sort of inhabitants, during the hot weather, live at a village called Bayland, on a mountain about 10 miles off, where there is wholesome water and excellent fruit. What surprises strangers most, when they arrive at this place, are the pigeons which carry letters to Aleppo, which they reach in about 3 hours; these pigeons are of a singular kind, and are very much celebrated throughout the east. Long. 37, 5, E. Lat. 36, 35, N.

ALEXANDRIA, now SCANDERIA, a city of Lower Egypt, and for a long time its capital. This city was built by Alexander the Great soon after the overthrow of Tyre, about 333 years before Christ. It is situated on the Mediterranean, 12 miles W. of the mouth of the Nile, anciently called Canopicum; and lies in long. 30, 19, E. Lat. 31, 10, N. Alexander is said to have been induced to build this city on account of its being conveniently situated for a fine port; and so sudden was his resolution, that, after he had directed where every public structure was to be placed, fixed the number of temples, and the deities to whom they should be dedicated, &c. there were no instruments at hand proper for marking out the walls, according to the custom of those times. Upon this, a workman advised the king to collect what meal was among the soldiers, and to sift it in lines upon the ground, whereby the circuit of the walls would be sufficiently marked out. This advice was followed; and the new method of marking out the walls was, by Aristander, the king's soothsayer, interpreted as a presage of the city's abounding with all the necessities of life. Nor was he deceived in his prediction; for Alexandria soon became the staple, not only for merchandise, but also for all the arts and sciences of the Greeks. All authors agree, that this city was very commodiously situated. Its form resembled resembled that of a soldier's coat. The streets were wisely contrived, so as to admit the cooling breezes to refresh the air. One large beautiful street passed from gate to gate, being 100 feet broad, and 5 miles long. It had a broad and high wall round it, so as to have the sea close on one side and a great lake on the other, with a narrow pass at each end. The architect employed by Alexander in this undertaking was the celebrated Dinocrates, who had acquired so much reputation by rebuilding the temple of Diana, at Ephesus. The city was first rendered populous by Ptolemy Soter, one of Alexander's captains; who, after the death of the Macedonian monarch, being appointed governor of Egypt, soon assumed the title of king, and took up his residence at Alexandria, about 304 years before Christ. In the 30th year of Ptolemy Soter's reign, he took his son Ptolemy Philadelphus partner with him in the empire; and by this prince the city of Alexandria was much embellished. In the first year of his reign the famous watch-tower of Pharos was finished. It had been begun several years before by Ptolemy Soter; and, when finished, was looked upon as one of the wonders of the world. The same year the island of Pharos itself, originally 7 furlongs distant from the continent, was joined to it by a causeway. This was the work of Dexiphanes, who completed it at the same time that his son put the last hand to the tower. The tower was a large square structure of white marble; on the top of which fires were kept continually burning for the direction of sailors. The building cost 800 talents; which, if Attic, amounted to 165,000*l.* if Alexandrian, to twice that sum. The architect employed in this famous structure fell upon the following contrivance to usurp the whole glory to himself.—Being ordered to engrave upon it the following inscription, "King PTOLEMY to the Gods the Saviours, for the benefit of Sailors;" instead of the king's name he substituted his own, and then filling up the hollow of the marble with mortar, wrote on it the above-mentioned inscription. In process of time, the mortar being wore off, the following inscription appeared: "SOSTRATUS the CNIDIAN, the son of DEXIPHANES, to the Gods the Saviours, for the benefit of Sailors." This year also was remarkable for the bringing of the image of Serapis from Pontus to Alexandria. It was set up in one of the suburbs of the city called Rhacotis, where a temple was afterwards erected to his honour, suitable to the greatness of that stately metropolis, and called, from the god worshipped there, Serapeum. This structure, according to Ammianus Marcellinus, surpassed in beauty and magnificence all others in the world, except the capitol at Rome. Within the verge of this temple was the famous Alexandrian library. It was founded by Ptolemy Soter, for the use of an academy he instituted in this city; and, by continual additions by his successors, became at last the finest library in the world, containing no fewer than 700,000 volumes. The method followed in collecting books for this library was, to seize all those which were brought into Egypt by Greeks or other foreigners. The books were transcribed in the museum, by persons appointed for that purpose; the copies were then delivered to the proprietors, and the originals laid up in the library. Ptolemy Evergetes, having borrowed from the Athenians the works of Sophocles, Euripides, and Æschylus, and returned them only the copies, which he caused to be transcribed in as beautiful a manner as possible; presenting the Athenians at the same time with 15 talents (upwards of 3000*l.* sterling) for the exchange. As the museum was at first in that quarter of the city called Bruchion, near the royal palace, the library was placed there likewise; but when it came to contain 400,000 volumes, another library, within the Serapeum, was erected by way of supplement to it, and on that account was called the daughter of the former. In this second library 300,000 volumes, in process of time, were deposited; and the two together contained the 700,000 volumes already mentioned. In the war carried on by Julius Cæsar against the inhabitants of this city, the library in the Bruchion, with the 400,000 volumes it contained, was reduced to ashes. The library in the Serapeum however still remained; and here Cleopatra deposited 200,000 volumes of the Pergamean library, which Marc Antony presented her with. These, and others added from time to time, rendered the new library at Alexandria more numerous and considerable than the former; and though it was often plundered during the revolutions and troubles of the Roman empire, yet it was again and again repaired, and filled with the same number of books. This library continued to be of great fame and use in these parts, till the year 642, when the Saracens made themselves masters of Alexandria. At that time John, surnamed the Grammarian, a famous Peripatetic philosopher, being in the city, and in high favour with Amri-Ab-nol-As, the Saracen general, begged of him the royal library. Amri replied, that it was not in his power to grant such a request; but that he would write to the khalif on that head; since, without knowing his pleasure, he dared not to dispose of a single book. He accordingly wrote to Omar, who was then khalif, acquainting him with the request of his friend; to which the ignorant tyrant replied, That if those books contained the same doctrine with the Koran, they could be of no use, since the Koran contained all necessary truths; but if they contained any thing contrary to that book, they ought not to be suffered; and therefore, whatever their contents were, he ordered them to be destroyed.

ed. Pursuant to this order, they were distributed among the public baths; where, for the space of six months, they served to supply the fires of this place, of which there was an incredible number in Alexandria. This city, as we have already observed, soon became extremely populous, and was embellished both by its own princes and the Romans; but, like most other noted cities of antiquity, hath been the seat of terrible massacres. About 141 years before Christ, it was almost totally depopulated by Ptolemy Physcon. That barbarous monster, without the least provocation, gave free liberty to his guards to plunder his metropolis and to murder the inhabitants at their pleasure. The cruelties practised on this occasion cannot be expressed; and the few who escaped were so terrified that they fled into other countries. Upon this, Physcon, that he might not reign over empty houses, invited thither strangers from the neighbouring countries; by whom the city was repopled, and soon recovered its former splendor. On this occasion many learned men having been obliged to fly, proved the means of reviving learning in Greece, Asia-Minor, the islands in the Archipelago, and other places, where it was almost totally lost. The new inhabitants were not treated with much more kindness by Physcon than the old ones had been; for, on their complaining of his tyrannical behaviour, he resolved on a general massacre of the young men. Accordingly, when they were one day assembled in the Gymnasium, or place of their public exercises, he ordered it to be set on fire; so that they all perished, either in the flames, or by the swords of his mercenaries, whom the tyrant had placed at all the avenues. Though Julius Cæsar was obliged to carry on a war for some time against this city, it seems not to have suffered much damage, except the burning of the library already mentioned. Before Cæsar left Alexandria, in acknowledgment of the assistance he had received from the Jews, he confirmed all their privileges there, and even engraved his decree on a pillar of brass. This, however, did not prevent the massacre of 50,000 of them in this city about the year of Christ 67. The city of Alexandria seems to have fallen into decay soon after this; and to have forfeited many of its ancient privileges, though for what offence is not known: but when Adrian visited Egypt, about the year 141, it was almost totally ruined. He repaired both the public and private buildings; not only restoring the inhabitants to their ancient privileges, but heaping new favours upon them; for which they returned him their solemn thanks, and conferred upon him what honours they could while he was present; but as soon as he was gone, they published the most bitter and virulent lampoons against him. The sickle and satirical humour of the Alexandrians was highly disliked by Adrian, though he inflicted no punishment upon them for it; but when they lampooned Caracalla, he did not let them escape so easily. That tyrant, in the year 215, when he visited their city, having become the subject of their foolish satires, ordered a general massacre by his numerous troops, who were dispersed all over the city. The inhuman orders being given, all were murdered, without distinction of age or sex; so that in one night's time the whole city floated in blood, and every house was filled with carcases. The monster who occasioned this had retired during the night to the temple of Serapis, to implore the protection of that deity; and, not yet satisfied with slaughter, commanded the massacre to be continued all the next day; so that very few of the inhabitants remained. As if even this had not been sufficient, he stripped the city of all its ancient privileges; suppressed the academy; ordered all strangers who lived there to depart; and, that the few who remained there might not have the satisfaction of seeing one another, he cut off all communication of one street with another, by walls built for that purpose, and guarded by troops left there. Notwithstanding this terrible disaster, Alexandria soon recovered its former splendor, as Caracalla was murdered a short time after. It was long esteemed the first city in the world next to Rome; and we may judge of its magnificence and the multitude of people contained in it, from the account of Diodorus Siculus, who relates that in his time (44 years before Christ) Alexandria had on its rolls 300,000 freemen. Nor does it seem to have been at all inferior at the time it was taken by the Saracens; for the general abovementioned seems to have been astonished at its wealth and beauty, as appears by the following passage in his letter to the khalif, mentioned by Eutychius: "I shall not pretend to give a particular description of the city I have taken, nor send you an account of all the curious and valuable things contained in it. At present it will be sufficient to observe, that I have found in it 4000 palaces; 4000 baths; 40,000 Jews that pay tribute; 400 royal circi, or places set apart for public diversions; and 12,000 gardeners, who supply the city with all kinds of herbs in great plenty." At this time, according to the Arabian historians, Alexandria consisted of three cities, viz. Menna, or the port, which included Pharos, and the neighbouring parts; Alexandria, properly so called, where the modern Scanderia now stands; and Nekita, probably the Necropolis of Josephus and Strabo. After the city was taken, Amri, the Saracen general, thought proper to pursue the Greeks who had fled farther up the country; and therefore marched out of Alexandria, leaving but a very slender garrison in the place. The Greeks, who had before fled on board their ships, being apprised of this, returned on a sudden, surprised the town, and put all the Arabs

Arabs they found therein to the sword: but Amri, receiving advice of what had happened, suddenly returned, and drove them out of it with great slaughter; after which the Greeks were so intimidated, that he had nothing farther to fear from them. A few years after, however, Amri being deprived of his government by the khalif Othman, the Egyptians were so much displeased with his dismissal that they inclined to a revolt; and Constantine the Greek emperor, having received intelligence of their disaffection, began to meditate the reduction of Alexandria. For this purpose he sent one Manuel, an eunuch, and his general, with a powerful army, to retake that place; which, by the assistance of the Greeks in the city, who kept a secret correspondence with the imperial forces while at sea, and joined them as soon as they had made a descent, he effected without any considerable effusion of Christian blood. The khalif, now perceiving his mistake, immediately restored Amri to his former dignity. This step was very agreeable to the natives; who, having had experience of the military skill and bravery of this renowned general, and apprehending that they should be called to an account by the Greeks for their former perfidious conduct, had petitioned Othman to send him again into Egypt. Upon Amri's arrival, therefore, at Alexandria, the Copts, or natives, with the traitor Al-Mokawkas (who had formerly betrayed to Amri the fortress of Mefr) at their head, not only joined him, but supplied him with all kinds of provisions, exciting him to attack the Greeks without delay. This he did; and, after a most obstinate dispute, which lasted several days, drove them into the town, where, for some time, they defended themselves with great bravery, and repelled the utmost efforts of the besiegers. This so exasperated Amri, that he swore, "If God enabled him to conquer the Greeks, he would throw down the walls of the city, and make it as easy of access as a hawdy-house, which lies open to every body." Nor did he fail to execute this menace; for, having taken the town by storm, he quite dismantled it, entirely demolishing the walls and fortifications. The lives of the citizens, however, were spared, at least as far as they lay in the general's power; but many of them were put to the sword by the soldiers on their first entrance. In one quarter particularly, Amri found them butchering the Alexandrians with unrelenting barbarity; to which, however, by his reasonable interposition, he put a stop; and on that spot he erected a mosque, which he called the Mosque of Mercy. From this time Alexandria never recovered its former splendor. It continued under the dominion of the khalifs till the year 924, when it was taken by the Magrebians, two years after its great church had been destroyed by fire. This church was called by the Arabs Al-

Kaisaria, or Cæsarea; and had formerly been a pagan temple, erected in honour of Saturn, by the famous queen Cleopatra. The city was soon after abandoned by the Magrebians; but in 928 they again made themselves masters of it: their fleet being afterwards defeated by that of the khalif, Abul Kafem, the Magrebian general retired from Alexandria, leaving there only a garrison of 300 men; of which Tharnaal the khalif's admiral being apprised, he in a few days appeared before the town, and carried off the remainder of the inhabitants to an island in the Nile, called Abukair. This was done to prevent Abul-Kafem from meeting with any entertainment at Alexandria, in case he should think proper to return. According to Eutychius, above 200,000 of the miserable inhabitants perished this year. What contributed to raise Alexandria to such a prodigious height of splendor as it enjoyed for a long time was, its being the center of commerce between the eastern and western parts of the world. It was with the view of becoming master of this lucrative trade that Alexander built this city, after having extirpated the Tyrians, who formerly engrossed all the East-India traffic. Of the immense riches which that trade afforded we may form an idea from considering that the Romans accounted it a point of policy to oppress the Egyptians, especially the Alexandrians; and, after the defeat of Zenobia, there was a single merchant of Alexandria who undertook to raise and pay an army out of the profits of his trade. The Greek emperors drew prodigious tributes from Egypt; and yet the khalifs found their subjects in so good circumstances as to screw up their revenues to 300,000,000 of crowns. Though the revolutions which happened in the government of Egypt, after it fell into the hands of the Mahometans, frequently affected this city to a very great degree; yet still the excellence of its port, and the innumerable conveniencies resulting from the East-India trade to whomsoever were masters of Egypt, preserved Alexandria from total destruction, even when in the hands of the most barbarous nations. Thus, in the 13th century, when the barbarism introduced by the Goths, &c. began to wear off from the European nations, and they acquired a taste for the elegancies of life, the old mart of Alexandria began to revive; and the port, though far from recovering its former magnificence, grew once more famous by becoming the center of commerce: but having fallen under the dominion of the Turks, and the passage round the Cape of Good Hope being discovered by the Portuguese in 1499, a fatal blow was given to the Alexandrian commerce, and the city has since fallen into decay. At present, the city of Alexandria is reckoned to have about 14,000 or 15,000 inhabitants; a strange mixture of different nations, as well as from various parts of the Turkish empire. They are in general given to thieving and cheating; and, like their predecessors, seditious above all others, were they not kept in awe by the severity of their government. The British and French carry on a considerable commerce with them, and have each a consul residing here. Some Venetian ships also sail thither yearly, but with French colours, and under the protection of France. The subjects of those kingdoms, which keep no consul here, are subjected to a tax by the grand signior; but the Jews have found out a method of indemnifying themselves for this disadvantage, namely, by selling their commodities cheaper than other foreigners can afford. They are also favoured by the farmers of the revenue, who know that if they do not pay some private regard to them, the Jews have it in their power to cause fewer merchandizes to come into their port during the 2 years that their farm lasts. The city is governed like others in Egypt. It hath a small garrison of soldiers, part of which are Janissaries and Assassins, who are very haughty and insolent, not only to strangers, but to the mercantile and industrious part of the people, though ever so considerable and useful. The government is so remiss in favour of these wretches, that Mr. Norden informs us, one of them did not hesitate to kill a farmer of the customs, for refusing to take less of him than the duty imposed, and went off unpunished; it being a common salvo among them, that what is done cannot be undone. The present condition of Alexandria is very despicable, being now so far ruined, that the rubbish in many places overtops the houses. The famous tower of Pharos has long since been demolished; and a castle, called Farillon, built in its place. The causeway which joined the island to the continent is broken down, and its place supplied by a stone-bridge of several arches. Some parts of the old walls of the city are yet standing. They are flanked with large towers, about 200 paces distant from each other, with small ones in the middle. Below are magnificent casedomates, which may serve for galleries to walk in. In the lower part of the towers is a large square hall, whose roof is supported by thick columns of Thebanic stone. Above this are several rooms, over which there are platforms more than 20 paces square. The next piece of antiquity is the pillar of Pompey, said to be built by Julius Caesar, in commemoration of his victory at Pharsalia. It stands upon an eminence, about 200 paces from the city, and is placed upon a square pedestal about 7 or 8 feet high; and the pedestal stands upon a square base, 1 of whose sides is 20 feet. Sandys says, it is 36 palms round, and 86 in height, each palm consisting of 9 inches. The shaft is a single stone, by some called Theban marble, by others granite. On the top is a very fine capital. It is hard to say what machines they had in former times to raise such a vast stone as this; for Thevenot, in his last visit, by measuring the shadow, found it to be 75 royal feet of Paris, which is equal to 80 English. A few paces from hence stood Caesar's palace; but the remains are only a few porphyry pillars, and the front, which is almost entire, and looks very beautiful. The palace of Cleopatra was built upon the walls facing the port, having a gallery on the outside, supported by several fine columns. Not far from Cleopatra's palace are 2 obelisks: one of which is thrown down, and almost buried in the sand; and though the other stands upright, the pedestal is hid by the sand that surrounds it: they are of granite; and each of the 4 sides are covered with hieroglyphics. About 70 paces from Pompey's pillar is the khalis, or the canal of the Nile, which was dug by the ancient Egyptians, to convey the water of the Nile to Alexandria, and fill the cisterns under the city. On the side of the Khalis, are gardens full of orange and lemon trees, and the fields are full of caper and palm trees. On the top of a hill is a tower, on which a centinel is always placed, to give notice, by means of a flag, of the ships that are coming into the port. From this hill may be seen the sea, the whole extent of the city, and the parts round it. On the south-west side of the city, at a mile's distance, there are catacombs cut out of a rock, to enter which persons must creep upon all four; but the roof is 10 feet high: on each side are sepulchres, cut out of the rock, of which there are 4 rows, one above another. The bones in these places were very hard, and looked very fresh. Over-against this there is another, that runs a long way, but will not admit a man to stand upright. These were doubtless burying-places belonging to the city. The Romans called such places catacombs. Alexandria is about 50 leagues north of Cairo. E. long. 30, 22. N. lat. 31, 1.

ALEXANDRIA, a strong and considerable city of Italy, belonging to the duchy of Milan, with a good castle, built in 1178 in honour of Pope Alexander III. This pope made it a bishopric, with several privileges and exemptions. Prince Eugene of Savoy took this city in 1706, after 3 days siege. The French took it in 1745; but the king of Sardinia, to whom it belongs by the treaty of Utrecht, retook it in 1746. The fortifications of the town are trifling, but the citadel is considerable. It is 15 miles S.E. of Casal, 33 N. by W. of Genoa, and 26 S. by W. of Milan. E. long. 8, 45. N. lat. 44, 53. The country about this town is called the Alexandrin.

ALEXANDRIA, a city of Arachosia, called also Alexandropolis, on the river Arachotus. Another Alexandria in Gedrosia, built by Leonatus, by order of Alexander. A third, Alexandria in

Aria;

Aria, situated at the lake Arias; but, according to Pliny, built by Alexander, on the river Arius. A fourth, in the Bactriana. A fifth, Alexandria, an inland town of Carmania. A sixth, Alexandria, or Alexandropolis, in the Sogdiana. A seventh, in India, at the confluence of the Acefines and Indus. An eighth, called also Alexandretta, near the Sinus Ificus, on the confines of Syria and Cilicia; now Scanderoon, the port-town to Aleppo. A ninth, Alexandria of Margiana, which, being demolished by the barbarians, was rebuilt by Antiochus, the son of Seleucus, and called Antiochia of Syria; watered by the river Margus, which is divided into several channels, for the purpose of watering the country, which was called Zotalé. This city was 70 stadia in circuit, according to Pliny; who adds, that, after the defeat of Crassus, the captives were conveyed to this place by Orodes, the king of the Parthians. A tenth, of the Oxiana, built on the Oxus by Alexander, on the confines of Bactria. An eleventh, built by Alexander, at the foot of Mount Paropamisus, which was called Caucasus. A twelfth, Alexandria in Troas, called also Troas and Antigonía. A thirteenth, on the Iaxartes, the boundary of Alexander's victories towards Scythia, and the last that he built on that side.

ALEXANDRIA, a town of Susiana, in Persia, the birth-place of Dionysius, a geographer, mentioned by Pliny; but its situation is not known.

ALEXANDRION, a fortress in Judea, built by Alexander Jannæus, from whom it had its name, father of Aristobulus. It was situated on a high mountain, in the very entrance into Judea, near the town of Corea, which was the first place in Judea on the Samaritan side, and upon the road to Jericho on the frontiers of Judah and Benjamin. Alexandrion was afterwards the burying-place of the Jewish kings; and, notwithstanding it was demolished by the Romans, Herod rebuilt it, and sent his sons there to be buried.

ALEXIN, a town in the province of Vorotin, in Western Muscovy.

ALFACQS, some islands so called, in the province of Catalonia, in Spain, near the mouth of the Ebro.

ALFANDEGA DA FE, a mean place belonging to the district of Torre de Moncorvo, and province of Tras los Montes, in Portugal, with only one parish, but its district consists of 15.

ALFARIG, a place in Ross-shire, in Scotland, near which are large woods of fir, and some of them 15 or 20 miles long.

ALFAYTES, a town subject to the district of Pinhel, in the province of Beira, in Portugal. It contains 500 inhabitants, and has a district of 2 parishes. Lat. 40, 36, N. Long. 7, 32, W.

ALFECHIMO, one of the 4 bailiwicks of the island of Corfu, belonging to the Turks. It contains 28 villages, and about 10,000 inhabitants.

ALFEIZERAO, a small town subject to the district of Leiria, in the province of Estremadura, in Portugal. It is situated on the sea, and contains 700 inhabitants. Lat. 39, 30, N. Long. 9, 10, W.

ALFELD, a town of Lower Saxony, in the bishopric of Hildesheim, in Germany, subject to that prelate. It is situated 10 miles S. of the city of Hildesheim. Lat. 52, 10, N. Long. 9, 56, E.

ALFIDENA, an ancient town of the Nether Abruzzo, in the kingdom of Naples, in Italy. It is now but a small place, though it gives the title of Marquis, and was formerly famous in the war of the Samnites. Lat. 41, 50, N. Long. 13, 40, E.

ALFORD, a town in Lincolnshire, with a market on Tuesdays; and 2 fairs, on Whit-Tuesday and November 8. It is seated on a small brook that runs through the town, and is a compact place. It is 6 miles from the sea, and 20 N. of Boston.

ALFORD, a village in Somersetshire, 5 miles from Burton, on the banks of the Bruido, and is noted for its mineral waters.

ALFORD, or AFORD, a small town of Aberdeenshire, in Scotland. It is situated on the S. side of the Don, at its junction with the Leochel. Here is the seat of a presbytery, which comprehends 16 parishes. In this part of the country, at the source of the river Dovern, or Divern, is a valley called Calbrach, situated between the steep mountains of Buck, or Buychk, which abounds with pasture; where the people live in tents, or shealings, (a customary way in the mountainous parts of the Highlands) during summer, but generally remove to the towns in winter. It lies 22 miles W. from Aberdeen, and 79 N. from Edinburgh.

ALFRETON, or ALVERTON, a market-town in the hundred of Scarsdale, in Derbyshire; noted for good ale, and also for being the burial-place of Alfred the Great. It lies 6 miles from Chesterfield, and 135 from London. Near it begin those vast extensive moors in this country which are so dangerous by reason of their bogs and rocks. It has a fair on July 20; market on Friday.

ALFRISTON, a village in Suffex, England, 8 miles from Lewes, which has fairs on May 12 and November 30.

ALGÆ, a city in Eubœa, an isle in the Ægean-sea, stood over against Anthedon, the last maritime city of Boœtia, on the side of Locris. Strabo calls it the Euboic Ægeæ, and also Ages, to distinguish it from 2 other cities of that name; the one in Achaia, near the river Cratis; the other in Æolis. The same author thinks that from this place, once famous for a temple of Neptune, the Ægean sea borrowed its name. See ÆGEAN SEA.

ALGAGIOLA, a small town in the district of Balagna, on this side the mountains, in Corfica. It has walls, and is fortified by a few bastions. In 1731 it was almost entirely destroyed by the malcontents of that island, but has since that time been repaired. Lat. 42, 20, N. Long. 9, 45, E.

ALGARRIA, the third subdivision of New Castile, in Spain. It constitutes the northern part of that province; and in it is situated Madrid, the capital of all Spain.

ALGARVE, or ALGARBE, in Latin Algarbium, a province of Portugal, and formerly erected into a kingdom by the Moors. It is bounded to the N. by the province of Alentejo, from which it is divided by the mountains Caldeirao and Monachique; to the E. by Andalusia; to the S. and W. by the sea. Its extent from E. to W. is between 27 and 28 miles, but from N. to S. only between 5 and 6. Some old authors call it Coneus; that is, the Wedge, as being wedged in by the ocean and the Guadiana. Its ancient inhabitants were the Turdetani, Bastuli, and Turduli; and afterwards the Romans had here some considerable colonies. Its present name it had from the Moors, since before their arrival in this country it was not known in Spain. Geographers are not agreed, whether it signifies a level and fruitful country, or a country lying towards the west. In Algarve are 3 famous promontories, namely, Cabo de S. Vincente, Cabo de Carveiro, and Cabo de S. Maria, or the Capes of St. Vincent, Carveiro, and St. Mary. Anciently Algarve comprehended a larger tract of land than it does at present; for it extended beyond the whole coast of Cape St. Vincent, as far as the town of Almeria, in the kingdom of Granada; and even to that tract of Africa which is opposite to it. At present it includes only the above-mentioned district; and though, in the title of the king of Spain, he be styled also king of Algarve, Algezira, &c. yet the addition of the town of Algezira restrains the meaning of the word Algarve, and has respect to the ancient geography of Spain, after shaking off the Moorish yoke; or to that strip of land on the sea-coast, from the country of Niebla as far as Almeria; as also to that tract in Africa lying opposite to it, where are situated the towns of Ceuta and Tangiers, including even the kingdom of Fez; and consequently does not relate to Algarve in Portugal. The fertility of this country, mostly mountainous, consists, exclusive of oil, wine, and wheat, of which articles they have great plenty in some parts, principally in an uncommon quantity of figs, raisins, almonds, and other fruits; though not of so exquisite a flavour as those of Spain. In this kingdom are reckoned 4 cities, 12 towns, and 60 villages, some of which are very populous. The number of all the parishes amounts to 67; and these are supposed to contain 60,688 souls. This kingdom of Algarve belongs of right to the crown of Portugal, though the kings of Castile and Leon have disputed it, as might be made appear from several authentic documents and treaties; but such a recital would here prove too tedious. The word Algarve having such an extensive meaning, as has been above mentioned, the kings of Portugal have styled themselves kings of Algarve, both on this and the other side of the sea, in Africa: though they only possessed a part of the Hither Algarve, yet afterwards they made themselves masters of the towns of Ceuta, Tangiers, and many other parts of Algarve, on the farther side of the sea, in Africa. This kingdom is subdivided into 3 jurisdictions, namely, the comarca of Faro, the districts of Lagos and Tavira; the 2 last consisting of lands that belong to the crown, and the first of such lands as the queens of Portugal are donataires or dowagers of. As palm-trees abound in Algarve, the poor people employ themselves in working up the leaves of them into a variety of forms; yet, upon the whole, this province, notwithstanding its maritime situation, commodious harbours, and inland fertility, seems to have been treated by the kings of Portugal rather as a conquered province than a part of their own native kingdom.

ALGERI, ALGER, or ALGERI, a town of Cape Lugatori, 1 of the 2 subdivisions of the island of Sardinia, in Upper Italy, and on its N. part. It is situated on a bay, in which is an esteemed coral-fishery. It is also the residence of a bishop, who is suffragan to the archbishop of Sassari, and lies 16 miles S. of that city. Lat. 36, 2, N. Long. 4, 2, E.

ALGEZIRAS, or ALGEZIRE, an old town of the kingdom of Seville, 1 of the 3 subdivisions of Andalusia, in Spain, and by some called Old Gibraltar. It has a harbour, mostly ruinous, and situated on an angle of the sea, or narrow gulph. At present it consists of scattered houses, which stand between the rubbish of decayed buildings; so that in general the place is in a poor, mean condition. Algezira in Arabic signifies an island; and from its harbour being formed by 2 islands, the town has been called Algeziras, in the plural number. In its neighbourhood anciently stood the city of Kalpe. Here the Moors made their first landing in Spain, in 1713; and it was retaken from them in 1744, after an obstinate siege, remarkable for being the first where cannon were made use of. Between the mountain and promontory of Algeziras, and the mountain ALGIBARROTA, or ALJUBARROTA, a small town, subject to the district of Leiria, in Portuguese Estremadura. It contains 1600 inhabitants, who are divided into 2 parishes. Not far from this place king John I. defeated the Castilians in the year 1385. Lat. 39, 30, N. Long. 8, 40, E.

ALGIERS, a kingdom of Africa, now one of the states of Barbary. According to the latest and best computations, it extends 460 miles in length from east to west, and is very unequal in breadth; some places being scarce 40 miles broad, and others upwards of 100. It lies between Long. 0, 16, and 9, 16, W. and extends from Lat. 30, 55, to 44, 50, N. It is bounded on the north by the Mediterranean; on the east, by the river Zaine, the ancient Tusca, which divides it from Tunis; on the west, by the Mulvya, and the mountains of Trava, which separate it from Morocco; and on the south, by the Sahara, Zaara, or Numidian desert. The climate of Algiers is in most places so moderate that they enjoy a constant verdure; the leaves of the trees being neither parched up by heat in summer, nor nipped by the winter's cold. They begin to bud in February; in April the fruit appears in its full bigness, and is commonly ripe in May: the soil, however, is excessively various; some places being very hot, dry, and barren, on which account they are generally suffered to lie uncultivated by the inhabitants, who are very negligent. These barren places, especially, such as lie on the southern side, and are at a great distance from the sea, harbour vast numbers of wild creatures, as lions, tigers, buffaloes, wild boars, stags, porcupines, monkeys, ostriches, &c. On account of their barrenness they have but few towns, and those thinly peopled; though some of them are so advantageously situated for trading with Beldulgerid and Negroland as to drive a considerable traffic with them. The Algerine kingdom made formerly a considerable part of the Mauritania Tingitania, which was reduced to a Roman province by Julius Cæsar, and from him also called Mauritania Cæsariensis. In our general account of Africa we have related, that the Romans were driven out of that continent by the Vandals; these by Belisarius, the Greek emperor Justinian's general; and the Greeks in their turn by the Saracens. This last revolution happened about the middle of the 7th century; and the Arabs continued masters of the country, divided into a great number of petty kingdoms, or states, under chiefs of their own choosing till the year 1051. This year, one Abubeker-ben-Omar, or, as the Spanish authors call him, Abu-Texofien, an Arab of the Zinhagian tribe, being provoked at the tyranny of those despots, gathered, by the help of his marabouts, or saints, a most powerful army of malcontents, in the southern provinces of Numidia and Libya. His followers were nicknamed Marabites or Morabites; by the Spaniards, Almoravides; probably from their being assembled principally by the saints, who were also called Morabites. The khalif of Kayem's forces were at this time taken up with quelling other revolts in Syria, Mesopotamia, &c. and the Arabs in Spain engaged in the most bloody wars; so that Texofien having nothing to fear from them, had all the success he could wish against the Arabian cheyks, or petty tyrants, whom he defeated in many battles, and at last drove them not only out of Numidia and Libya, but out of all the western parts, reducing the whole province of Tingitania under his dominion. Texofien was succeeded by his son Yusef, or Joseph, a brave and warlike prince. In the beginning of his reign, he laid the foundation of the city of Morocco, which he designed to make the capital of his empire. While that city was building, he sent some of his marabouts ambassadors to Tremecen, now a province of Algiers, at that time inhabited by a powerful and insolent sect of Mahometans, called Zeneti. The design of this embassy was to bring them back to what he termed the true faith; but the Zeneti, despising his offers, assembled at Amaf, or Amfa, their capital, murdered the ambassadors, and invaded Joseph's dominions with an army of 50,000 men. The king, hearing of their infamous proceedings, speedily mustered his army, and led it by long marches into their country, destroying all with fire and sword, while the Zeneti, instead of opposing his progress, retired as fast as possible towards Fez, in hopes of receiving assistance from thence. In this they were miserably deceived: the Fezzans marched out against them in a hostile manner, and coming up with the unhappy Zeneti, encumbered with their families and baggage, and ready to expire with hunger and weariness, they cut them all to pieces, except a small number who were mostly drowned in attempting to swim across a river; and some others, who, in their flight, perished by falling from the high adjacent rocks. In the mean time Joseph reduced their country to a mere desert; which was, however, soon repopled by a numerous colony of Fezzans, who settled there under the protection of reigning kings. In this war it is computed that near a million of the Zeneti, men, women, women, and children, lost their lives. The restless and ambitious temper of Joseph did not let him remain long at peace. He quickly declared war against the Fezzans, reduced them to become his tributaries, and extended his conquests all along the Mediterranean. He next attacked some Arabian cheyks who had not yet submitted to his jurisdiction; and pursued them with such fury that neither the Libyan deserts nor ridges of the most craggy rocks could shelter them from his arms. He attacked them in such of their retreats, castles, and fortresses, as were till then deemed impregnable; and at last subdued them, to the great grief of the other African nations, who were greatly annoyed by the ravages committed by his numerous forces. Thus was founded the empire of the Morabites: which, however, was of no long duration; that race being in the 12th century driven out by Mohavedin, a marabout. This race of priests was expelled by Abdulac governor of Fez; and he in the 13th century stripped of his new conquests by the sharifs of Hascen, the descendants of those Arabian princes whom Abu-Texefien had formerly expelled. The better to secure their new dominions, the sharifs divided them into several little kingdoms or provinces; and among the rest the present kingdom of Algiers was divided into four, namely, Tremecen, Tenez, Algiers Proper, and Bujeyah. The first four monarchs laid so good a foundation for a lasting balance of power between their little kingdoms that they continued for some centuries in mutual peace and amity; but at length the king of Tremecen, having ventured to violate some of their articles, Abul-Farez king of Tenez declared war against him, and obliged him to become his tributary. This king dying soon after, and having divided his kingdom among his three sons, new discords arose; which Spain taking advantage of, a powerful fleet and army was sent against Barbary, under the count of Navarre, in 1505. This commander soon made himself master of the important cities of Oran, Bujeyah, and some others; which so alarmed the Algerines that they put themselves under the protection of Selim Eutemi, a noble and warlike Arabian prince. He came to their assistance with a great number of his bravest subjects, bringing with him his wife Zaphira, and a son then about 12 years old. This however was not sufficient to prevent the Spaniards from landing a number of forces near Algiers that same year, and obliging that metropolis to become tributary to Spain. Nor could prince Selim hinder them from building a strong fort on a small island opposite to the city, which terrified their corsairs from sailing either in or out of the harbour. To this galling yoke the Algerines were obliged to submit till the year 1516; when, hearing of the death of Ferdinand king of Spain, they sent an embassy to Aruch Barbarossa, who was at this time no less dreadful for his valour than his surprising success, and was then sent on a cruise with a squadron of galleys and barks. The purport of the embassy was, that he should come and free them from the Spanish yoke; for which they agreed to pay him a gratuity answerable to so great a service. Upon this Barbarossa immediately dispatched 18 galleys and 30 barks to the assistance of the Algerines; while he himself advanced towards the city with 800 Turks, 3000 Jigelites, and 2000 Moorish volunteers. Instead of taking the nearest road to Algiers, he directed his course towards Sharshel, where Hassan, another famed corsair, had settled himself. Him they surprised, and obliged to surrender; not without a previous promise of friendship: but no sooner had Barbarossa got him in his power than he cut off his head; and obliged all Hassan's Turks to follow him in his new expedition. On Barbarossa's approach to Algiers he was met by prince Eutemi, attended by all the people of that metropolis, great and small; who looked for deliverance from this abandoned villain, whom they accounted invincible. He was conducted into the city amidst the acclamations of the people, and lodged in one of the noblest apartments of prince Eutemi's palace, where he was treated with the greatest marks of distinction. Elated beyond measure with this kind reception, Barbarossa formed a design of becoming king of Algiers; and, fearing some opposition from the inhabitants, on account of the excesses he suffered his soldiers to commit, murdered prince Eutemi, and caused himself to be proclaimed king; his Turks and Moors crying out as he rode along the streets, "Long live king Aruch Barbarossa, the invincible king of Algiers, the chosen of God to deliver his people from the oppression of the Christians; and destruction to all that shall oppose, or refuse to own him as their lawful sovereign." These last threatening words so intimidated the inhabitants, already apprehensive of a general massacre, that he was immediately acknowledged king. The unhappy princess Zaphira, it is said, poisoned herself, to avoid the brutality of this new king, whom she unsuccessfully endeavoured to stab with a dagger. Barbarossa was no sooner seated on the throne than he treated his subjects with such cruelty that they used to shut up their houses and hide themselves when he appeared in public. In consequence of this a plot was soon formed against him: but being discovered, he caused 20 of the principal conspirators to be beheaded, their bodies to be buried in a dunghill, and laid a heavy fine on those who survived. This so terrified the Algerines that they never afterwards durst attempt any thing against either Barbarossa or his successors. In the mean time, the son of prince Eutemi having fled to Oran, and put himself under the protection of the marquis of Go-marez, laid before that nobleman a plan for putting the city of Algiers into the hands of the king of Spain. Upon this the young Selim Eutemi was sent to Spain, to lay his plan before cardinal Ximenes; who, having approved of it, sent a fleet with 10,000 land-forces, under the command of Don Francisco, or, as others call him, Don Diego de Vera, to drive out the Turks and restore the young prince. But the fleet was no sooner come within sight of land than it was dispersed by a storm, and the greatest part of the ships dashed against the rocks. Most of the Spaniards were drowned; and the few who escaped to shore were either killed by the Turks or made slaves. Though Barbarossa had nothing to boast on this occasion, his pride and insolence were now swelled to such a degree that he imagined himself invincible, and that the very elements conspired to make him so. The Arabians were so much alarmed at his success that they implored the assistance of Hamidel Abdes, king of Tenez, to drive the Turks out of Algiers. That prince readily undertook to do what was in his power for this purpose, provided they agreed to settle the kingdom on himself and his descendants. This proposal being accepted, he immediately set out at the head of 10,000 Moors; and upon his entering the Algerine dominions was joined by all the Arabians in the country. Barbarossa engaged him only with 1000 Turkish musqueteers and 500 Granada Moors; totally defeated his numerous army; pursued him to the very gates of his capital, which he easily made himself master of; and, having given it up to be plundered by his Turks, obliged the inhabitants to acknowledge him as their sovereign. This victory, however, was chiefly owing to the advantage which his troops had from their fire-arms; the enemy having no other weapons than arrows and javelins. No sooner was Barbarossa become master of the kingdom of Tenez than he received an embassy from the inhabitants of Tremecen, inviting him to come to their assistance against their then reigning prince, with whom they were dissatisfied on account of his having dethroned his nephew; and forced him to fly to Oran; offering him even the sovereignty, in case he accepted of their proposal. The king of Tremecen, not suspecting the treachery of his subjects, met the tyrant with an army of 6000 horse and 3000 foot: but Barbarossa's artillery gave him such an advantage that the king was at length forced to retire into the capital; which he had no sooner entered, than his head was cut off, and sent to Barbarossa, with a fresh invitation to come and take possession of the kingdom. On his approach, he was met by the inhabitants, whom he received with great complaisance and many fair promises; but beginning to tyrannise, as usual, his new subjects soon convinced him that they were not so passive as those of Algiers. Apprehending, therefore, that his reign might prove uneasy and precarious, he entered into an alliance with the king of Fez; after which he took care to secure the rest of the cities in his new kingdom, by garrisoning them with his own troops. Some of these, however, revolted soon after; upon which he sent one of his corsairs, named Escander, a man no less cruel than himself, to reduce them. The Tremecenians now began to repent in good earnest of their having invited such a tyrant to their assistance; and held consultations on the most proper means of driving him away, and bringing back their lawful prince, Abuchen Men; but their cabals being discovered, a great number of the conspirators were massacred in the most cruel manner. The prince had the good luck to escape to Oran, and was taken under the protection of the marquis of Gomarez, who sent immediate advice of it to Charles V. then lately arrived in Spain with a powerful fleet and army. That monarch immediately ordered the young king a succour of 10,000 men, under the command of the governor of Oran; who, under the guidance of Abuchen Men, began his march towards Tremecen; and they were joined by prince Selim, with a great number of Arabs and Moors. The first thing they resolved upon was, to attack the important fortress of Calau, situated between Tremecen and Algiers, and commanded by Escander at the head of about 300 Turks. They invested it closely on all sides, in hopes Barbarossa would come out of Tremecen to its relief, which would give the Tremecenians an opportunity of keeping him out. That tyrant, however, kept close in his capital, being embarrassed by his fears of a revolt, and the politic delays of the king of Fez, who had not sent the auxiliaries he promised. The garrison of Calau in the mean time made a brave defence; and, in a sally they made at night, cut off near 300 Spaniards. This encouraged them to venture a second time; but they were now repulsed with great loss, and Escander himself wounded: soon after which they surrendered upon honourable terms; but were all massacred by the Arabians, except 16, who clung close to the stirrups of the king and of the Spanish general. Barbarossa being now informed that Abuchen Men with his Arabs, accompanied by the Spaniards, were in full march to lay siege to Tremecen, thought proper to come out at the head of 1500 Turks and 5000 Moorish horse, in order to break his way through the enemy; but he had not proceeded far from the city before his council advised him to return and fortify himself in it. This advice was now too late; the inhabitants being resolved to keep him out, and open their gates to their own lawful prince as soon as he appeared. In this distress Barbarossa saw no way left but to retire to the citadel, and there defend himself till he could find an opportunity of stealing out with his his men and all his treasure. Here he defended himself vigorously; but, his provisions failing him, he took advantage of a subterranean back-way, which he had caused to be digged up for that purpose; and, taking his immense treasure with him, stole away as secretly as he could. His flight, however, was soon discovered; and he was so closely pursued, that to amuse, as he hoped, the enemy, he caused a great deal of his money, plate, jewels, &c. to be scattered all the way, thinking they would not fail to stop their pursuit to gather it up. This stratagem, however, failed through the vigilance of the Spanish commander; who, being himself at the head of the pursuers, obliged them to march on till he was come up close to him on the banks of the Huexda, about 8 leagues from Tremecen. Barbarossa had just crossed the river with his vanguard when the Spaniards came up with his rear on the other side, and cut them all off; and then crossing the water, overtook him at a small distance from it. Here a bloody engagement ensued, in which the Turks fought like as many lions; but being at length overpowered by numbers, they were all cut to pieces, and Barbarossa among the rest, in the 44th year of his age, and 4 years after he had advanced himself to the royal title of Sigel and the adjacent country; 2 years after he had acquired the sovereignty of Algiers, and scarce a twelvemonth after the reduction of Tremecen. His head was carried to Tremecen on the point of a spear; and Abuchen Men proclaimed king, to the joy of all the inhabitants. A few days after the fight the king of Fez made his appearance at the head of 20,000 horse near the field of battle; but, hearing of Barbarossa's defeat and death, marched off with all possible speed, to avoid being attacked by the enemy. The news of Barbarossa's death spread the utmost consternation among the Turks at Algiers; however they caused his brother Hayradin to be immediately proclaimed king. The Spanish commander now sent back the emperor's forces without making any attempt upon Algiers; by which he lost the opportunity of driving the Turks out of that country; while Hayradin, justly dreading the consequences of the tyranny of his officers, sought the protection of the grand signior. This was readily granted, and himself appointed bashaw or viceroy of Algiers; by which means he received such considerable reinforcements that the unhappy Algerines durst not make the least complaint; and such numbers of Turks resorted to him that he was not only capable of keeping the Moors and Arabs in subjection at home, but of annoying the Christians at sea. His first step was to take the Spanish fort abovementioned, which was a great nuisance to his metropolis. The Spaniards held out to the last extremity; but being all slain or wounded, Hayradin easily became master of the place. Hayradin next set about building a strong mole for the safety of his ships. In this he employed 30,000 Christian slaves, whom he obliged to work without intermission for 3 years; in which time the work was completed. He then caused the fort he had taken from the Spaniards to be repaired, and placed a strong garrison in it, to prevent any foreign vessels from entering the harbour without giving an account of themselves. By these two important works Hayradin soon became dreaded not only by the Arabs and Moors, but also by the maritime Christian powers, especially the Spaniards. The viceroy failed not to acquaint the grand signior with his success, and obtained from him a fresh supply of money; by which he was enabled to build a stronger fort, and to erect batteries on all places that might favour the landing of an enemy. All these have since received greater improvements from time to time, as often as there was occasion for them. In the mean time the sultan, either out of a sense of the great services Hayradin had done, or perhaps out of jealousy lest he should make himself independent, raised Hayradin to the dignity of a bashaw of the empire, and appointed Hassan Aga, a Sardinian renegade, an intrepid warrior and an experienced officer, to succeed him as bashaw of Algiers. Hassan had no sooner taken possession of his new government than he began to pursue his ravages on the Spanish coast with greater fury than ever; extending them to the Ecclesiastical State and other parts of Italy. But pope Paul III. being alarmed at this, exhorted the emperor Charles V. to send a powerful fleet to suppress those frequent and cruel piracies; and, that nothing might be wanting to render the enterprise successful, a bull was published by his holiness, wherein a plenary absolution of sins and the crown of martyrdom was promised to all those who either fell in battle or were made slaves. The emperor on his part needed no spur; and therefore set sail at the head of a powerful fleet, consisting of 120 ships and 20 gallees, having on board 30,000 chosen troops, an immense quantity of money, arms, ammunition, &c. In this expedition many young nobility and gentry attended as volunteers, and among these many knights of Malta, so remarkable for their valour against the enemies of Christianity. Even ladies of birth and character attended Charles in his expedition; and the wives and daughters of the officers and soldiers followed them with a design to settle in Barbary after the conquest was finished. All these meeting with a favourable wind, soon appeared before Algiers; every ship displaying the Spanish colours on the stern and another at the head, with a crucifix to serve them for a pilot. By this prodigious armament the Algerines were thrown into the utmost consternation. The city was surrounded only by a wall with scarce any outworks. The whole garrison consisted of 800 Turks and 6000 Moors, without fire-arms, and poorly disciplined and accoutred; the rest of their forces being dispersed in the other provinces of the kingdom, to levy the usual tribute on the Arabs and Moors. The Spaniards, landed without opposition, and immediately built a fort, under the cannon of which they encamped, and diverted the course of a spring which supplied the city with water. Being now reduced to the utmost distress, Hassan received a summons to surrender at discretion, on pain of being put to the sword with all the garrison. The herald was ordered to extol the vast powers of the emperor both by sea and land, and to exhort him to return to the Christian religion: but to this Hassan only replied, that he must be a madman who would pretend to advise an enemy, and that the adviser must still act more madly who would take counsel of such an adviser. He was, however, on the point of surrendering the city, when advice was brought him that the forces belonging to the western government were in full march towards the place; upon which it was resolved to defend it to the utmost. Charles, in the mean time, resolving upon a general assault, kept a constant firing upon the town, which, from the weak defence made by the garrison, he looked upon as already in his hands: but while the douwan, or Algerine senate, were deliberating on the most proper means of obtaining an honourable capitulation, a mad prophet, attended by a multitude of people, entered the assembly, and foretold the speedy destruction of the Spaniards before the end of the moon, exhorting the inhabitants to hold out till that time. This prediction was soon accomplished in a very surprising and unexpected manner; for, on the 28th of October, 1541, a dreadful storm of wind, rain, and hail, arose from the north, accompanied with violent shocks of earthquakes, and a dismal and universal darkness both by sea and land; so that the sun, moon, and elements, seemed to combine together for the destruction of the Spaniards. In that one night, some say in less than half an hour, 86 ships and 15 galleys were destroyed, with all their crews and military stores; by which the army on shore was deprived of all means of subsisting in these parts. Their camp also, which spread itself along the plain under the fort, was laid quite under water by the torrents which descended from the neighbouring hills. Many of the troops, by trying to remove into some better situation, were cut in pieces by the Moors and Arabs; while several galleys, and other vessels, endeavouring to gain some neighbouring creeks along the coast, were immediately plundered, and their crews massacred by the inhabitants. The next morning Charles beheld the sea covered with the fragments of so many ships, and the bodies of men, horses, and other creatures, swimming on the waves; at which he was so disheartened, that abandoning his tents, artillery, and all his heavy baggage, to the enemy, he marched at the head of his army, though in no small disorder, towards Cape Malabux, in order to re-embark in those few vessels which had outweathered the storm. But Hassan, who had caused his motions to be watched, allowed him just time to get to the shore, when he sallied out and attacked the Spaniards in the midst of their hurry and confusion to get into their ships, killing great numbers, and bringing away a still great number of captives; after which he returned in triumph to Algiers, where he celebrated with great rejoicings his happy deliverance from such distress and danger. Soon after this, the prophet Yusef, who had foretold the destruction of the Spaniards, was not only declared the deliverer of his country, but had a considerable gratuity decreed him, with the liberty of exercising his prophetic function unmolested. It was not long, however, before the marabouts, and some interpreters of the law, made a strong opposition against him; remonstrating to the bashaw how ridiculous and scandalous it was to their nation to ascribe the deliverance of it to a poor fortune-teller, which had been obtained by the fervent prayers of an eminent saint of their own profession. But though the bashaw and his douwan seemed, out of policy, to give into this last notion, yet the impression which Yusef's predictions and their late accomplishment had made upon the minds of the common people, proved too strong to be eradicated; and the spirit of divination and conjuring has since got into such credit among them, that not only their great statesmen, but their priests, marabouts, and santouns, have applied themselves to that study, and dignified it with the name of Mahomet's Revelations. The unhappy Spaniards had scarce reached their ships, when they were attacked by a fresh storm, in which several more of them perished; one ship in particular, containing 700 soldiers, besides sailors, sunk in the emperor's sight, without a possibility of saving a single man. At length, with much labour, they reached the port of Bujayah, at that time possessed by the Spaniards, whither Hassan, king of Tunis, soon after repaired with a supply of provisions for the emperor, who received him graciously, with fresh assurances of his favour and protection. Here he dismissed the few remains of the Maltese knights and their forces, who embarked in 3 shattered galleys, and with much difficulty and danger reached their own country. Charles himself staid no longer than till the 16th of November, when he set sail for Carthage, and reached it on the 25th of the same month. In this unfortunate expedition upwards of 120 ships and galleys were lost, above 300 colonels and other land and sea sea officers, 8000 soldiers and marines, besides those destroyed by the enemy on their reembarkation, or drowned in the last storm. The number of prisoners was so great that the Algerines sold some of them, by way of contempt, for an onion a head. Hassan, elated with this victory, in which he had very little share, undertook an expedition against the king of Tremecen, who, being now deprived of the assistance of the Spaniards, was forced to procure a peace by paying a vast sum of money, and becoming tributary to him. The bashaw returned to Algiers, laden with riches; and soon after died of a fever, in the 66th year of his age. From this time the Spaniards were never able to annoy the Algerines in any considerable degree. In 1555 they lost the city of Bujeyah, which was taken by Salha Rais, Hassan's successor, who next year set out on a new expedition, which he kept a secret, but was suspected to be intended against Oran; but he was scarcely got 4 leagues from Algiers, when the plague, which at that time raged violently in the city, broke out in his groin, and carried him off in 24 hours. Immediately after his death the Algerine soldiery chose a Corsican renegado, Hassan Corso, in his room, till they should receive farther orders from the Porte. He did not accept of the bashawship without a good deal of difficulty, but immediately prosecuted the intended expedition against Oran, dispatching a messenger to acquaint the Porte with what had happened. They had hardly begun their hostilities against the place, when orders came from the Porte, expressly forbidding Hassan Corso to begin the siege, or, if he had begun it, enjoining him to raise it immediately. This news was received with great grief by the whole fleet and army, as they thought themselves sure of success, the garrison being at that time very weak: nevertheless, as they dared not disobey, the siege was immediately raised. Corso had hardly enjoyed his dignity 4 months, before news came that 8 galleys were bringing a new bashaw to succeed him, one Tekelli, a principal Turk of the grand signior's court; upon which the Algerines unanimously resolved not to admit him. By the treachery of the Levantine soldiers, however, he was admitted at last, and the unfortunate Corso thrown over a wall in which a number of iron hooks were fixed, one of which catching the ribs of his right side, he hung 3 days in the most exquisite torture before he expired. Tekelli was no sooner entered upon his new government than he behaved with such cruelty and rapaciousness that he was assassinated, even under the dome of a saint, by Yusuf Calabres, the favourite renegado of Hassan Corso, who for this service was unanimously chosen bashaw, but died of the plague 6 days after his election. Yusuf was succeeded by Hassan the son of Hayradin, who had been formerly recalled from his bashawship when he was succeeded by Selha-Rais, and now had the good fortune to get himself reinstated in his employment. Immediately on his arrival he engaged in a war with the Arabs, by whom he was defeated with great loss. The next year the Spaniards undertook an expedition against Mostagau, under the command of the count d'Alcandela; but were utterly defeated, the commander himself killed, and 12,000 taken prisoners. This disaster was owing to the inconsiderate rashness, or rather madness, of the commander, which was so great, that, after finding it impossible to rally his scattered forces, he rushed, sword in hand, into the thickest of the enemy's ranks, at the head of a small number of men, crying out, "St. Jago! St. Jago! the victory is ours, the enemy is defeated;" soon after which he was thrown from his horse, and trampled to death. Hassan having had the misfortune to disoblige his subjects by allowing the mountaineers of Cuco to buy ammunition at Algiers, was sent in irons to Constantinople, while the aga of the Janisaries, and general of the land forces, supplied his place. Hassan easily found means to clear himself; but a new bashaw was appointed, called Achmet, who was no sooner arrived than he sent the 2 deputy-bashaws to Constantinople, where their heads were struck off. Achmet was a man of such insatiable avarice, that, upon his arrival at Algiers, all ranks of people came in shoals to make him presents, which he the more greedily accepted, as he had bought his dignity by the money he had amassed while head-gardener to the sultan: he enjoyed it, however, only 4 months; and, after his death, the state was governed other 4 months by his lieutenant; when Hassan was a third time sent viceroy to Algiers, where he was received with the greatest demonstrations of joy. The first enterprise in which Hassan engaged, was the siege of Marfalquiver, situated near the city Oran, which he designed to invest immediately after. The army employed in this siege consisted of 26,000 foot and 10,000 horse, besides which he had a fleet consisting of 32 galleys and galliots, together with 3 French vessels laden with biscuit, oil, and other provisions. The city was defended by Don Martin de Cordova, brother of the count d'Alcandela, who had been taken prisoner in the battle where that nobleman was killed, but had obtained his liberty from the Algerines with immense sums, and now made a most gallant defence against the Turks. The city was attacked with the utmost fury by sea and land, so that several breaches were made in the walls. The Turkish standards were several times planted on the walls, and as often dislodged; but the place must have in the end submitted, had not Hassan been obliged to raise the siege in haste, on the news that the famed Genoese admiral Doria was approaching with considerable considerable succours from Italy. The fleet accordingly arrived soon after; but missing the Algerine galleys, bore away for Pennon de Velez, where they were shamefully repulsed by an handful of Turks who garrisoned that place, which, however, was taken the following year. In 1567 Hassan was again recalled to Constantinople, where he died 3 years after. He was succeeded by Mahomet, who gained the love of the Algerines by several public-spirited actions. He incorporated the Janisaries and Levantine Turks together, and by that means put an end to their dissensions, which laid the foundation of the Algerine independency on the Porte. He likewise added some considerable fortifications to the city and castle, which he designed to render impregnable. But while he was thus studying the interest of Algiers, one John Gascon, a bold Spanish adventurer, formed a design of surprising the whole piratic navy in the bay, and setting them on fire in the night-time, when they lay defenceless, and in their first sleep: for this he had not only the permission of king Philip II. but was furnished by him with proper vessels, mariners, and fireworks, for the execution of his plot. With these he set sail for Algiers, in the most proper season, viz. the beginning of October, when most, if not all the ships lay at anchor there; and easily sailed near enough, unsuspected, to view their manner of riding, in order to catch them napping, at a time when the greater part of their crew were dispersed in their quarters. He came accordingly, unperceived by any, to the very mole-gate, and dispersed his men with their fireworks; but, to their great surprise, they found them so ill mixed, that they could not with all their art make them take fire. In the mean time Gascon took it into his head, by way of bravado, to go to the mole-gate, and give 3 loud knocks at it with the pomel of his dagger, and to leave it fixed in the gate by its point, that the Algerines might have cause to remember him. This he had the good fortune to do without meeting with any disturbance or opposition: but it was not so with his men; for no sooner did they find their endeavours unsuccessful than they made such a bustle as quickly alarmed the guard posted on the adjacent bastion, from which the uproar quickly spread itself through the whole garrison. Gascon, now finding himself in the utmost danger, sailed away with all possible haste; but he was pursued, overtaken, and brought back a prisoner to Mahomet, who no sooner got him into his power than he immediately caused a gibbet of considerable height to be erected on the spot where Gascon had landed, ordering him to be hoisted up, hung up by the feet to a hook, that he might die in exquisite torture; and, to shew his resentment and contempt of the king his master, he ordered his commission to be tied to his toes: he had not, however, hung long in that state, when the captain who took him, accompanied by a number of other corsairs, interceded so strongly in his behalf, that he was taken down, and put under the care of some Christian surgeons; but 2 days after, some Moors reporting that it was the common talk and belief in Spain, that the Algerines durst not hurt a hair of Gascon's head, &c. the unfortunate Spaniard was hoisted up by a pulley to the top of the execution-wall, and let down again upon the hook, which in his fall caught him by the belly, and gave him such a wound that he expired without a groan. Thus ended the expedition of John Gascon, which has procured him a place among the Spanish martyrs; while, on the other hand, the Algerines look upon his disappointment to have been miraculous, and owing to the efficacious protection of the powerful saint Sidi Outtededda, whose prayers had before raised such a terrible storm against the Spanish fleet. Mahomet, being soon after recalled, was succeeded by the famous renegado Ochali, who reduced the kingdom of Tunis; which, however, remained subject to the viceroy of Algiers only till the year 1586, when a bashaw of Tunis was appointed by the Porte. The kingdom of Algiers continued to be governed, till the beginning of the 17th century, by viceroys, or bashaws, appointed by the Porte; concerning whom we find nothing very remarkable, farther than that their avarice and tyranny was intolerable both to the Algerines and the Turks themselves. At last the Janisaries and militia becoming powerful enough to suppress the tyrannic sway of these bashaws, and the people being almost exhausted by the heavy taxes laid upon them, the former resolved to depose these petty tyrants, and set up some officers of their own at the head of the realm. The better to succeed in this attempt, the militia sent a deputation of some of their chief members to the Porte, to complain of the avarice and oppression of these bashaws, who sunk both the revenue of the state, and the money remitted to it from Constantinople, into their own coffers, which should have been employed in keeping up and paying the soldiery; by which means they were in continual danger of being overpowered by the Arabians and Moors, who, if ever so little assisted by any Christian power, would hardly fail of driving all the Turks out of the kingdom. They represented to the grand vizir how much more honourable, as well as easier and cheaper, it would be for the grand signior to permit them to choose their own dey, or governor, from among themselves, whose interest it would then be to see that the revenue of the kingdom was rightly applied in keeping up its forces complete, and in supplying all other exigencies of the state, without any farther charge or trouble to the Porte than that of allowing them its protection. On their part they engaged always to acknowledge the grand signiors as their sovereigns, and to pay them their usual allegiance and tribute, to respect their bashaws, and even to lodge and maintain them and their retinue, in a manner suitable to their dignity, at their own charge. The bashaws, however, were, for the future, to be excluded from assisting at any but general douwans, unless invited to it; and from having the liberty of voting in them, unless when their advice was asked, or the interest of the Porte was likely to suffer by their silence. All other concerns, which related to the government of Algiers, were to be wholly left under the direction of the dey and his douwan. These proposals having been accepted by the Porte, the deputies returned highly satisfied; and having notified their new privileges, the great douwan immediately proceeded to the election of a dey from among themselves. They compiled a new set of laws, and made several regulations for the better support and maintenance of this new form of government, to the observation of which they obliged all their subjects to swear; and the militia, navy, commerce, &c. were all settled pretty nearly on the footing upon which they now are, and which shall be afterwards described; though the subsequent alterations that frequently happened between the bashaws and deys, the one endeavouring to recover their former power, and the other to curtail it, caused such frequent complaints and discontents at the Ottoman court as made them frequently repent their compliance. In the year 1601 the Spaniards, under the command of Doria, the Genoese admiral, made another attempt upon Algiers, in which they were more fortunate than usual, their fleet being only driven back by contrary winds, so that they came off without loss. In 1609 the Moors being expelled from Spain, flocked in great numbers to Algiers; and, as many of them were very able sailors, they undoubtedly contributed to make the Algerine fleet so formidable as it became soon after; though it is probable the frequent attempts made on their city would also induce them to increase their fleet. In 1616 their fleet consisted of 40 sail of ships between 200 and 400 tons, their admiral 500 tons. It was divided into 2 squadrons; one of 18 sail, before the port of Malaga; and the other at the Cape of Santa Maria, between Lisbon and Seville, both of which fell foul on all Christian ships, both English and French, with whom they pretended to be in friendship, as well as Spaniards and Portuguese, with whom they were at war. The Algerines were now become very formidable to the European powers. The Spaniards, who were most in danger, and least able to cope with them, solicited the assistance of England, the pope, and other states. The French however were the first who dared to shew their resentment of the perfidious behaviour of these miscreants; and in 1617 M. Beaulieu was sent against them with a fleet of 50 men of war, who defeated their fleet, took 2 of their vessels, while their admiral sunk his own ship and crew rather than fall into his enemies hands. In 1620 a squadron of English men of war was sent against Algiers, under the conduct of Sir Robert Mansel; but of this expedition we have no other account than that it returned without doing any thing; and the Algerines becoming more and more insolent, openly defied all the European powers, the Dutch only excepted, to whom, in 1625, they sent a proposal, directed to the prince of Orange, that in case they would fit out 20 sail of ships the following year, upon any good service against the Spaniards, they would join them with 60 sail of their own. The next year the Coulolies, or Colloglies, (the children of such Turks as had been permitted to marry at Algiers,) who were enrolled in the militia, having seized on the citadel, had well nigh made themselves masters of the city, but were attacked by the Turks and renegadoes, who defeated them with terrible slaughter. Many scores of them were executed, and their heads thrown in heaps upon the city-walls, without the eastern gate. Part of the citadel was blown up; and the remaining Coulolies were dismissed from the militia, to which they were not again admitted till long after. In 1623 the Algerines and other states of Barbary threw off their dependence on the Porte altogether, and set up for themselves. What gave occasion to this was the 25 years truce which Sultan Amurath IV. was obliged to make with the emperor Ferdinand II. to prevent his being over-matched by carrying on a war against him and the sophi of Persia at the same time. As this put a stop to the piratical trade of the Algerines, they proceeded as above-mentioned; and resolved that whoever desired to be at peace with them must, distinctly and separately, apply to their government. No sooner was this resolution taken than the Algerines began to make prizes of several merchant-ships belonging to powers at peace with the Porte. Nay, having seized a Dutch ship and poleacre at Scanderoon, they ventured ashore; and finding the town abandoned by the Turkish aga and inhabitants, they plundered all the magazines and warehouses, and set them on fire. About this time Lewis XIII. undertook to build a fort on their coasts, instead of one formerly built by the Marillians, and which they had demolished. This after some difficulty he accomplished; and it was called the Bastion of France: but the situation being afterwards found inconvenient, the French purchased the port of La Calle, and obtained liberty to trade with the Arabians and Moors. The Ottoman court in the mean time was so much embarrassed with the Persian war that there was no leisure to check the Algerine piracies. This gave an opportunity to the vizir and other courtiers to compound matters with the Algerines, and to get a share of their prizes, which were very considerable. However, for form's sake, a severe reprimand, accompanied with threats, was sent them; to which they replied, that "these depredations deserved to be indulged to them, seeing they were the only bulwark against the Christian powers, especially against the Spaniards, the sworn enemies of the Moslem name:" adding, that "if they could pay a punctilious regard to all that could purchase peace or liberty to trade with the Ottoman empire, they would have nothing to do but set fire to all their shipping, and turn camel-drivers for a livelihood." In the year 1635, four younger brothers of a good family in France entered into an undertaking so desperate that perhaps the annals of knight-errantry can scarce furnish its equal. This was no less than to retort the piracies of the Algerines upon themselves; and as they indiscriminately took the ships of all nations, so were these heroes indiscriminately to take the ships belonging to Algiers; and this with a small frigate of 10 guns! In this ridiculous undertaking 100 volunteers embarked; a Maltese commission was procured, together with an able master, and 36 mariners. They had the good fortune, on their first setting out, to take a ship laden with wine, on the Spanish coast; with which they were so much elated, that 3 days after they madly encountered two large Algerine corsairs, one of 20 and the other of 24 guns, both well-manned, and commanded by able officers. These two large vessels having got the small frigate between them, plied her furiously with great shot, which soon took off her main-mast; notwithstanding which the French made so desperate a resistance that the pirates were not able to take them, till the noise of their fire brought up 5 more Algerines; when the French vessel, being almost torn to pieces, was boarded and taken. The young knights-errant were punished for their temerity by a dreadful captivity; from which they redeemed themselves in 1642 at the price of 6000 dollars. The Algerines prosecuted their piracies with impunity, to the terror and disgrace of the Europeans, till the year 1652; when a French fleet being accidentally driven to Algiers, the Admiral took it into his head to demand a release of all the captives of his nation, without exception. This being refused, the Frenchman without ceremony carried off the Turkish viceroy, and his cadi or judge, who were just arrived from the Porte, with all their equipage and retinue. The Algerines, by way of reprisal, surprised the Bastion of France, already mentioned, and carried off the inhabitants, to the number of 600, with all their effects; which so provoked the admiral, that he sent them word that he would pay them another visit the next year with his whole fleet. The Algerines, undismayed by the threats of the French admiral, fitted out a fleet of 16 galleys and galliots, excellently manned and equipped, under the command of admiral Hali Pinchinin. The chief design of this armament was against the treasure of Loretto; which, however, they were prevented by contrary winds from obtaining. Upon this they made a descent on Puglia, in the kingdom of Naples; where they ravaged the whole territory of Necotra, carrying off a vast number of captives, and among them some nuns. From thence steering towards Dalmatia, they scoured the Adriatic; and, loading themselves with immense plunder, left those coasts in the utmost consternation and resentment. At last the Venetians, alarmed at such terrible depredations, equipped a fleet of 28 sail, under the command of admiral Capello, with express orders to burn, sink, or take, all the Barbary corsairs he met with, either on the open seas, or even in the grand signior's harbours, in opposition to a treaty of peace with the Porte. On the other hand, the captain-bashaw, who had been sent out with the Turkish fleet to chase the Florentine and Maltese cruisers out of the Archipelago, understanding that the Algerine Squadron was so near, sent express orders to the Admiral to come to his assistance. Pinchinin readily agreed; but having first resolved on a descent upon the island of Lissa, or Lifina, belonging to the Venetians, he was overtaken by Capello, from whom he retired to Valona, a sea-port belonging to the grand signior, whither the Venetian admiral pursued him; but the Turkish governor refusing to eject the pirates, according to the articles of the peace between the Ottoman court and Venice, Capello was obliged to content himself with watching them for some time. Pinchinin was soon weary of restraint, and ventured out; when an engagement immediately ensued, in which the Algerines were defeated, and 5 of their vessels disabled; with the loss of 1500 men, Turks and Christian slaves; besides 1600 galley-slaves who regained their liberty. Pinchinin after this defeat returned to Valona, where he was again watched by Capello; but the latter had not lain long at his old anchorage before he received a letter from the senate, desiring him to make no farther attempt on the pirates at that time, for fear of a rupture with the Porte. This was followed by a letter from the governor of Valona, desiring him to take care lest he incurred the 'sultra's displeasure by such insults. The brave Venetian was forced to comply; but, resolving to take such a leave of the Algerines as he thought they deserved, observed how they had reared their tents, and drawn their booty and equipage along the shore. He then kept firing among their tents, while some well-manned galliots and brigantines were ordered among their shipping; who attacked them with such bravery that without any great great loss they towed out their 16 galleys, with all their cannon, stores, &c. In this last engagement a ball from one of the Venetian galleys happening to strike a Turkish mosque, the whole action was considered as an insult on the grand signior. To conceal this, Capello was ordered to sink all the Algerine ships he had taken, except the admiral; which was to be conducted to Venice, and laid up as a trophy. Capello came off with a severe reprimand; but the Venetians were obliged to buy, with 500,000 ducats, a peace from the Porte. The grand signior offered to repair the loss of the Algerines by building 10 galleys for them, upon condition that they should continue in his service till the end of the ensuing summer; but Pinchinin, who knew how little the Algerines chose to lie under obligations to him, civilly declined the offer. In the mean time, the news of this defeat and loss filled the Algerines with the utmost grief and confusion. The whole city was on the point of a general insurrection; when the bashaw and douwan issued out a proclamation, forbidding not only complaints and outcries under the severest penalties; but all persons whatever to take their thumbs from within their girdles while they were deliberating on this important point. In the mean time they applied to the Porte for an order that the Venetians settled in the Levant should make up their loss; but with this the grand signior refused to comply, and left them to repair their losses, as well as build new ships, in the best manner they could. It was not long, however, before they had the satisfaction to see one of their corsairs land with a fresh supply of 600 slaves, whom he had brought from the coast of Iceland, whither he had been directed by a miscreant native taken on board a Danish ship. Our pirates did not long continue in their weak and defenceless state; being able, at the end of two years, to appear at sea with a fleet of 65 sail. The admiral Pinchinin equipped 4 galliots at his own expence; with which, in conjunction with the chiayah, or secretary of the bashaw of Tripoli, he made a second excursion. This small squadron, consisting of 5 galleys and 2 brigantines, fell in with an English ship of 40 guns; which however Pinchinin's captains refused to engage; but being afterwards reproached by him for their cowardice, they swore to attack the next Christian ship which came in their way. This happened to be a Dutch merchantman of 28 guns and 40 men, deeply laden, and unable to raise her sails by reason of a calm. Pinchinin immediately summoned her to surrender; but receiving an ironical answer, drew up his squadron in form of an half-moon, that they might pour their shot all at once into their adversary. This however the Dutchman avoided, by means of a breeze of wind which fortunately sprung up and enabled him to turn his ship; upon which the galleys run foul of each other. Upon this Pinchinin ran his own galley along-side of the merchantman, the upper deck of which 70 Algerines immediately took possession of, some of them cutting the rigging, and others plying the hatches with hand-grenadoes; but the Dutchmen, having secured themselves in their close quarters, began to fire at the Algerines on board from 2 pieces of cannon loaded with small shot; by which they were all soon killed, or forced to submit. Pinchinin, in the mean time, made several unsuccessful attempts to relieve his men, as well as to surround the Dutchmen with his other galleys: but that ship lay so deep in the water that every shot did terrible execution among the pirates; so that they were obliged to remove farther off. At last the Dutch captain, having ordered his guns to be loaded with cartouches, gave them such a parting volley as killed 200 of them, and sent the rest back to Algiers in a most dismal plight. But though Pinchinin thus returned in disgrace, the rest of the fleet quickly came back with vast numbers of slaves, and an immense quantity of rich spoils; insomuch that the English, French, and Dutch were obliged to cringe to the mighty Algerines, who sometimes vouchsafed to be at peace with them; but swore eternal war against Spain, Portugal, and Italy, whom they looked upon as the greatest enemies to the Mahometan name. At last, Lewis XIV. provoked by the grievous outrages committed by the Algerines on the coasts of Provence and Languedoc, ordered in 1681 a considerable fleet to be fitted out against them, under the marquis Du Quesne, vice-admiral of France. His first expedition was against a number of Tripolitan corsairs; who had the good fortune to out-row him, and shelter themselves in the island of Scio, belonging to the Turks. This did not, however, prevent him from pursuing them thither, and making such terrible fire upon them as quickly destroyed 14 of their vessels, besides battering the walls of the castle. This severity seemed only to be designed as a check to the piracies of the Algerines; but, finding they still continued their outrages on the French coast, he sailed to Algiers in August 1682, cannonading and bombarding it so furiously that the whole town was in flames in a very little time. The great mosque was battered down, and most of the houses laid in ruins, insomuch that the inhabitants were on the point of abandoning the place; when on a sudden the wind turned about, and obliged Du Quesne to return to Toulon. The Algerines immediately made reprisals, by sending a number of galleys and galliots to the coasts of Provence, where they committed the most dreadful ravages, and brought away a vast number of captives; upon which a new armament was ordered to be got ready at Toulon and Marseilles against the next year; and the Algerines, having received timely notice, put themselves into as good a state of defence as the time would allow. In May 1683 Du Quesne with his squadron cast anchor before Algiers; where, being joined by the marquis d'Affranville at the head of 5 stout vessels, it was resolved to bombard the town next day. Accordingly 100 bombs were thrown into it the first day, which did terrible execution; while the besieged made some hundred discharges of their cannon against them, without doing any considerable damage. The following night the bombs were again thrown into the city in such numbers that the dey's palace and other great edifices were almost destroyed; some of their batteries were dismounted, and several vessels sunk in the port. The dey and Turkish bashaw, as well as the whole soldiery, alarmed at this dreadful havoc, immediately sued for peace; and, as a preliminary, the immediate surrender was insisted on of all Christian captives who had been taken fighting under the French flag; which being granted, 142 of them were immediately delivered up, with a promise of sending him the remainder as soon as they could be got from the different parts of the country. Accordingly Du Quesne sent his commissary-general and one of his engineers into the town; but with express orders to insist upon the delivery of all the French captives without exception, together with the effects they had taken from the French; and that Mezomorto, their then admiral, and Hâli Rais, one of their captains, should be given as hostages. This last demand having embarrassed the dey, he assembled the douwan, and acquainted them with it: upon which Mezomorto fell into a violent passion, and told the assembly that the cowardice of those who sat at the helm had occasioned the ruin of Algiers; but that for his part he never would consent to deliver up any thing that had been taken from the French. He immediately acquainted the soldiery with what had passed; which so exasperated them, that they murdered the dey that very night, and on the morrow chose Mezomorto in his place. This was no sooner done than he cancelled all the articles of peace which had been made, and hostilities were renewed with greater fury than ever. The French admiral now kept pouring in such volleys of bombs that in less than 3 days the greatest part of the city was reduced to ashes, and the fire burnt with such vehemence that the sea was enlightened with it for more than 2 leagues round. Mezomorto, unmoved at all these disasters, and the vast numbers of the slain, whose blood ran in rivulets along the streets; or rather, grown furious and desperate, sought only how to wreak his revenge on the enemy; and, not content with causing all the French in the city to be cruelly murdered, ordered their consul to be tied hand and foot, and fastened alive to the mouth of a mortar, whence he was shot away against their navy. By this piece of inhumanity Du Quesne was so exasperated that he did not leave Algiers till he had utterly destroyed all their fortifications, shipping; almost all the lower part and above two-thirds of the upper part of the city; by which means it became little else than an heap of ruins. The haughty Algerines were now thoroughly convinced that they were not invincible; and therefore immediately sent an embassy into France, begging in the most abject terms for peace; which Lewis immediately granted, to their inexpressible joy. They now began to pay some regard to other nations, and to be a little cautious how they wantonly incurred their displeasure. The first bombardment by the French had so far humbled the Algerines that they condescended to enter into a treaty with England; which was renewed upon terms very advantageous to the latter in 1686. It is not to be supposed, however, that the natural perfidy of the Algerines would disappear on a sudden: notwithstanding this treaty, however, they lost no opportunity of making prizes of the English ships when they could conveniently come at them. Upon some infringement of this kind, captain Beach drove ashore and burnt 7 of their frigates in 1695; which produced a renewal of the treaty 5 years after: but it was not till the taking of Gibraltar and Port Mahon that Britain could have a sufficient check upon them to enforce the observation of treaties; and these have since proved such restraints upon Algiers, that they still continue to pay a greater deference to the English than to any other European power. The present century furnishes no very remarkable events with regard to Algiers; except in 1775 the Spaniards made a fruitless attempt on this city, but were obliged to desist after considerable loss; and the taking of the famed city of Oran from the Spaniards in 1708, (which however they regained in 1737); and the expulsion of the Turkish bashaw, and uniting his office to that of the dey in 1710. The dey is now absolute monarch; and pays no other revenue to the Porte than that of a certain number of fine boys or youths, and some other presents, which are sent thither yearly. His own income probably rises and falls according to the opportunities he hath of fleecing both natives and foreigners; whence it is variously computed by different authors. Dr. Shaw computes the taxes of the whole kingdom to bring into the treasury no more than 300,000 dollars; but supposes that the eighth part of the prizes, the effects of those persons who die without children, joined to the yearly contributions raised by the government, presents from foreigners, fines and oppressions, may bring in about as much more. Both the dey and officers under him enrich themselves by the same laudable methods of rapine and fraud; which it is no wonder to find the common people practising upon one another, and especially upon strangers, seeing they themselves are impoverished by heavy taxes and the injustice of those who are in authority. We have already hinted that the first deys were elected by the militia, who were then called the douwan, or common-council. This elective body was at first composed of 800 militia-officers, without whose consent they dey could do nothing; and upon some urgent occasions, all the officers residing in Algiers, amounting to above 1500, were summoned to assist. But since the deys, who may be compared to the Dutch stadtholders, have become more powerful, the douwan is principally composed of 30 chiah-bashaws, or colonels, with now and then the musti and cadi upon some emergencies; and, on the election of a dey, the whole soldiery are allowed to come and give their votes. All the regulations of state ought to be determined by that assembly, before they pass into a law, or the dey hath power to put them in execution: but, for many years back, the douwan is of so little account that it is only convened out of formality, and to give assent to what the dey and his chief favourites had agreed on before-hand. The method of gathering the votes in this assembly is agreeable to the characters of those who compose it. The aga, or general of the janisaries, or president pro tempore, first proposes the question, which is immediately repeated with a loud voice by the chiah-bashaws, and from them echoed again by 4 officers called bashaldalas; from these the question is repeated from one member of the douwan to another, with strange contortions and the most hideous growlings if it is not to their liking. From the loudness of this growling noise the aga is left to guess as well as he can whether the majority of the assembly are pleased or displeased with the question; and from such a preposterous method it is not surprising that these assemblies should seldom end without some tumult or disorder. As the whole body of the militia is concerned in the election of a new dey, it is seldom carried on without blows and bloodshed; but when once the choice is made, the person elected is saluted with the words ALLA BARICK, "God bless you, or prosper you;" and the new dey usually causes all the officers of the douwan who had opposed his election to be strangled, filling up their places with those who had been most zealous in promoting it. From this account of the election of the deys it cannot be expected that their government should be at all secure; and as they arrive at the throne by tumult, disorder, and bloodshed, they are generally deprived of it by the same means, scarcely one in ten of them having the good fortune to die a natural death. In this country it is not to be expected that justice will be administered with any degree of impartiality. The Mahometan soldiery in particular are so much favoured that they are seldom put to death for any crime, except rebellion; in which case they are either strangled with a bow-string or hanged to an iron-hook. In lesser offences they are fined, or their pay stopped; and if officers, they are reduced to the station of common soldiers, whence they may gradually raise themselves to their former dignity. Women guilty of adultery have a halter tied about their necks, with the other end fastened to a pole, by which they are held under water till they are suffocated. The bastinado is likewise inflicted for small offences; and is given either upon the belly, back, or soles of the feet, according to the pleasure of the cadi; who also appoints the number of strokes. These sometimes amount to 200 or 300, according to the indulgence the offender can obtain, either by bribery or friends; and hence he often dies under this punishment, for want of powerful enough advocates. But the most terrible punishments are those inflicted upon the Jews, or Christians, who speak against Mahomet or his religion: in which case, they must either turn Mahometans or be impaled alive. If they afterwards apostatise, they are burned or roasted alive; or else thrown down from the top of the city-walls, upon iron hooks, where they are caught by different parts of their body, according as they happen to fall, and sometimes expire in the greatest torments; though by accident they may be put out of pain at once, as we have already related of the Spanish adventurer Don Gascon. This terrible punishment, however, begins now to be disused. The officer next in power to the dey is the aga of the janisaries, who is one of the oldest officers in the army, and holds his post only for two months. He is then succeeded by the chiah, or next senior officer. During the two months in which the aga enjoys his dignity the keys of the metropolis are in his hands; all military orders are issued out in his name; and the sentence of the dey upon any offending soldier, whether capital or not, can only be executed in the court of his palace. As soon as he is gone through this short office he is considered as mazoul, or superannuated; receives his pay regularly like the rest of the militia every two moons; is exempt from all farther duties, except when called by the dey to assist at the grand-council, to which he hath, however, a right to come at all times, but hath no longer a vote in it. Next to the aga in dignity is the secretary of state, who registers all the public acts; and after him are the 30 chiahs, or colonels, who sit next to the aga in the douwan, and in the same gallery with him. Out of this class are generally chosen those who go ambassadors to foreign courts, or who disperse the dey's orders throughout the realm. Next to them are 800 bolluck-bashaws, or eldest captains, who are promoted to that of chiah-bashaws, according to their seniority. The oldack-bashaws, or lieutenants, are the next; who amount amount to 400, and are regularly raised to the rank of captains in their turn, and to other employments in the state, according to their abilities. These, by way of distinction, wear a leather strap, hanging down to the middle of their back. One rule is strictly observed in the rotation of these troops from one deputy to a higher; viz. the right of seniority; one single infringement of which would cause an insurrection, and probably cost the dey his life. Other military officers of note are the vekelards, or purveyors of the army; the peys, who are the four oldest soldiers, and consequently the nearest to preferment; the soulacks, who are the next in seniority to them, and are part of the dey's body-guard, always marching before him when he takes the field, and distinguished by their carbines and gilt scymiters, with a brass gun on their caps; the kayts, or Turkish soldiers, each band of whom have the government of one or more adowars, or itinerant villages, and collect their taxes for the dey; and the sagiards, or Turkish lancemen, 100 of whom always attend the army, and watch over the water appointed for it. To these we may add the beys, or governors of the three great provinces of the realm. All the above-mentioned officers ought to compose the great douwan or council above-mentioned; but only the 30 chiah-bashaws have a right to sit in the gallery next after the dey: the rest are obliged to stand on the floor of the hall, or council-chamber, with their arms across, and as much as possible without motion; neither are they permitted to enter with their swords on, for fear of a tumult. As for those who have any matters to transact with the douwan, they must stand without, let the weather be ever so bad; and there they are commonly presented with coffee by some of the inferior officers, till they are dismissed. The kingdom of Algiers is at present divided into three provinces or districts, viz. the eastern, western, and southern. The eastern or Levantine government, which is by far the most considerable of the three, and is also called Beylick, contains the towns of Bona, Constantina, Gigeri, Bujeyah, Steffa, Tebef, Zamoura, Biscara, and Necanz, in all which the Turks have their garrisons: besides which it includes the two ancient kingdoms of Cuco and Lahez, though independent of the Algerine government, to whose forces their country is inaccessible; so that they still live under their own cheyks, chosen by each of their adowars or hords. To these we may add a French factory at Callo, under the direction of the company of the French Bastion. The western government hath the towns of Oran, Tremecen, Mostagan, Tenez, and Secrelly, with its castle and garrison. — The southern government hath neither town, village, nor even a house, all the inhabitants living in tents, which obliges the bey and his forces to be always encamped. The most considerable rivers of Algiers are the Zha, or Ziz, which runs across the province of Tremecen, and the desert of Anguid, falling into the Mediterranean near the town of Tabecrita, where it has the name of Sirut. 2. The Haregol, supposed the Sign of Ptolemy; comes down from the great Atlas, crosses the desert of Anguid, and falls into the sea about five leagues from Oran. 3. The Mina, supposed the Chylematis of Ptolemy; a large river, which runs through the plains of Bathala, and falls into the sea near the town of Arzew. This river hath lately received the name of Cerna, who built the town of Bathalah after it had been destroyed. 4. The Shelliff, Zilef, or Zilif, descending from the mount Gnanexeris, runs through some great deserts, the lake Titteri, the frontiers of Tremecen and Tenez, falling into the sea a little above the city of Mostagan. 5. The Celef, supposed to be the Carthana of the ancients; falls into the sea about 3 leagues west of Algiers, after a short course of 18 or 20 leagues. 6. The Hued-al-quvir, supposed to be the Nalabata, or Nafaba, of the ancients, and called by the Europeans Zinganir; runs down with a swift course through some high mountains of Cuco, and falls into the sea near Bujeyah. Whilst the city of Bujeyah was in the hands of the Christians, the mouth of this river was so choaked up with sand that no vessel could come up into it; but in 1555, very soon after it was taken by the Moors, the great rains swelled it to such a degree, that all the sand and mud was carried off; so that galleys and other vessels have ever since entered it with ease, where they lie safe from storms, and all winds but that which blows from the north. 7. Suf-Gemar, or Suf-Gimmar-al-Rumiel, supposed to be the Ampsaga of Ptolemy, hath its source on mount Auras, on the confines of Atlas; thence it runs through some barren plains, and the fruitful ones of Constantina, where its stream is greatly increased by some other rivers it receives; from thence running northward along the ridges of some high mountains, it falls into the sea a little east of Gigeri. 8. The Ladag, or Ludeg, runs down from mount Atlas through part of Constantina, and falls into the sea a little east of Bona. 9. Guadi, or Guadel Barbar, springs from the head of Orbus, or Urbs, in Tripoli, runs through Bujeyah, and falls into the sea near Tabarea. Besides these there are many others of less note; of which, however, we do not find that the Algerines avail themselves as they might do, their genius leading them too much to the piratical trade to mind any real advantage that might be derived from their own country. The corsairs, or pirates, form each a small republic, of which the rais or captain is the supreme bashaw; who, with the officers under him, form a kind of douwan, in which every matter relating to the vessel is decided in an arbitrary way. These corsairs are chiefly instrumental in importing whatever commodities are brought into the kingdom either by way of merchandise.

chandise or prizes. These consist chiefly of gold and silver stuffs, damasks, cloths, spices, tin, iron, plated brass, lead, quicksilver, cordage, sail-cloth, bullets, cochineal, linen, tartar, alum, rice, sugar, soap, cotton raw and spun, copperas, aloes, brazil and logwood, vermillion, &c. Very few commodities, however, are exported from this part of the world; the oil, wax, hides, pulse and corn produced being but barely sufficient to supply the country; though, before the loss of Oran, the merchants have been known to ship off from one or other of the ports of Barbary several thousand tons of corn. The consumption of oil, though here in great abundance, is likewise so considerable in this kingdom, that it is seldom permitted to be shipped off for Europe. The other exports consist chiefly of ostriches feathers, copper, rugs, silk-fashes, embroidered handkerchiefs, dates, and Christian slaves. Some manufactures in silk, cotton, wool, leather, &c. are carried on in this country; but mostly by the Spaniards settled here, especially about the metropolis. Carpets are also a manufacture of the country, which, though they are much inferior to those of Turkey both in beauty and fineness, are preferred by the people to lie upon, on account of their being both cheaper and softer. There are also at Algiers looms for velvet, taffaties, and other wrought silks; and a coarse sort of linen is likewise made in most parts of the kingdom. The inhabitants along the sea-coasts are a mixture of different nations; but chiefly Moors and Morecos, driven out of Catalonia, Arragon, and other parts of Spain. Here are also great numbers of Turks, who come from the Levant to seek their fortune; as well as multitudes of Jews and Christians taken at sea, who are brought hither to be sold for slaves. The Berebers are some of the most ancient inhabitants of the country, and are supposed to be descended from the ancient Sabæans, who came hither from Arabia Felix, under the conduct of one of their princes. Others believe them to be some of the Canaanites driven out of Palestine by Joshua. These are dispersed all over Barbary, and divided into a multitude of tribes under their respective chiefs: most of them inhabit the mountainous parts; some range from place to place, and live in tents, or portable huts; others in scattered villages: they have, nevertheless, kept themselves for the most part from intermixing with other nations. The Berebers are reckoned the richest of all, go better clothed, and carry on a much larger traffic of cattle, hides, wax, honey, iron, and other commodities. They have also some artificers in iron, and some manufacturers in the weaving branch. The name of Bereber is supposed to have been originally given them on account of their being first settled in some desert place. Upon their increasing in process of time, they divided themselves into 5 tribes, probably on account of religious differences, called the Zinbagians, Musamedins, Zeneti, Hoares, and Gomerers; and these having produced 600 families, subdivided themselves into a great number of petty tribes. To these we may add the Zwowahs, by European authors called Azuages, or Affagues, who are likewise dispersed over most parts of Barbary and Numidia. Great numbers of these inhabit the mountainous parts of Cuco, Labez, &c. leading a wandering pastoral life; but the most numerous inhabitants are the Moors and Arabians. The former are very stout and warlike, and skilful horsemen; but so addicted to robbing that one cannot safely travel along the country at a distance from the towns without a guard, or at least a marabout, or saint, for a safeguard: for, as they look upon themselves to be the original proprietors of the country, and not only as dispossessed by the rest of the inhabitants, but reduced by them to the lowest state of poverty, they make no scruple to plunder all they meet by way of reprisal.

ALGIERS, a city, the capital of the above kingdom, is probably the ancient Icosium; by the Arabians called Algezair, or rather Al-Jezier, or Al-Jezerah, i.e. the island; because there was an island before the city, to which it hath been since joined by a mole. It is built on the declivity of a hill by the sea side, in the form of an amphitheatre: at sea it looks like the top-sail of a ship. The tops of the houses are quite flat and white; insomuch that when it is first discovered, one would take it to be a place where they bleach linen: one house rises above another in such a manner that they do not hinder each other's prospect. The streets are so narrow that they will scarce admit 2 persons to walk a-breast, and the middle part is lower than the sides. When any loaded beasts, such as camels, horses, mules, or asses, pass along, you are forced to stand up close to the wall to let them pass by. There is but one broad street, which runs through the city from east to west, in which are the shops of the principal merchants, and the market for corn and other commodities. The lower part of the walls of this city are of hewn stone, and the upper part of brick; they are 30 feet high on the land side, and 40 towards the sea; the fosses, or ditches, are 20 feet broad, and 7 deep. There is no sweet water in the city; and though there is a tank, or cistern, in every house, yet they often want water, because it rains but seldom: the chief supply is from a spring on a hill, the water of which is conveyed by pipes to above 100 fountains, at which a bowl is fastened for the use of passengers. The common reservoir is at the end of the mole, where the ships take in their water. Every one takes his turn at these places, except the Turks, who are first; and the Jews last. There are 5 gates, which are open from sun-sun-rising till sun-setting; and 7 forts, or castles, without the walls, the greatest of which is on the mole without the gate, all of which are well supplied with great guns. There are 10 large mosques, and 50 small ones; 3 great colleges, or public schools, and a great number of petty ones for children. The houses are square, and built of stone and brick, with a square court in the middle, and galleries all round. There are said to be about 100,000 inhabitants in the city, comprehending 5000 Jewish families, besides Christians. There are 4 fundics, or public inns, such as are in Turkey; and 6 cazernes, or barracks, for the unmarried Turkish soldiers, which will hold 600 each. There are no inns for Christians to lodge in; but only a few tippling-huts kept by slaves, for the accommodation of Greeks and the poorer sort of travellers, where any thing may be had for money. Here are bagnios, or public baths, in the same manner as in Turkey, at a very moderate rate. The women have baths of their own, where the men dare not come. Without the city there are a great number of sepulchres, as also cells or chapels, dedicated to marabouts, or reputed saints, which the women go to visit every Friday. The Turkish soldiers are great tyrants; for they not only turn others out of the way in the streets, but will go to the farm-houses in the country for 20 days together, living on free quarters, and making use of every thing, not excepting the women. The Algerines eat, as in Turkey, sitting cross-legged round a table about 4 inches high, and use neither knives nor forks; before they begin, every one says, Be isme Allah, "In the name of God." When they have done, a slave pours water on all their hands as they sit, and then they wash their mouths. Their drink is water, sherbet, and coffee. Wine is not allowed, though drank immoderately by some. E. long. 2, 18. N. lat. 36, 50.

ALGODRES, a town belonging to the district of Pinhel, in the province of Beira, in Portugal. It contains 450 inhabitants, with a district which comprehends 8 parishes. Lat. 40, 30, N. Long. 7, 20, W.

ALGONQUINS, a savage nation, inhabiting part of Canada, on the north side of Lake Huron; generally at war with the Iroquois, by whom they would have been exterminated before now, had it not been for the French. They subsist chiefly by hunting, in which they are very expert. The few Algonquin nations that are now to be seen seem entirely ignorant of agriculture. They allow themselves a plurality of wives, notwithstanding which they daily decrease in populousness, few or none of their nations containing above 6000 souls, and many of them not 2000. Their language is one of the 3 radical ones in North-America, being understood from the river St. Laurence to the Mississippi.

ALGOZO, a small town belonging to the district of Miranda, in the province of Traz los Montes, in Portugal, situated on the river Masas, containing 400 souls. To its district belong 20 parishes. Lat. 41, 50, N. Long. 7, 10, W.

ALHAMA, by the ancient Romans called Ar-tigi, and by the Moors, Al-Rama, or the Baths, a fine, well-built, and populous town of Granada, in Spain. It is situated in a narrow valley, between very high and very steep mountains. In its neighbourhood are celebrated warm-baths, the waters of which may also be drank. They invigorate the body, and cure rheumatic and other pains in the limbs; and are therefore greatly frequented by cripples. It contains 800 houses, has 1 parish, 2 monasteries, a nunnery, and hospital. King Ferdinand retook it from the Moors in the year 1482. It lies 25 miles S. W. of Granada, and 190 S. of Madrid. Lat. 37, 10, N. Long. 4, 7, W.

ALHAMA, a village belonging to the province of Arragon, in Spain; where there are medicinal baths. Lat. 41, 5, N. Long. 1, 10, W.

ALHAMBRA, a small river of Arragon, in Spain, which empties itself into the Ebro.

ALHANDRA, or ALLANDRA, a small town in Portuguese Estremadura. It is situated on the banks of the Tagus; contains 1350 inhabitants, has a district of 2 parishes, and a monastery. Lat. 38, 50, N. Long. 8, 5, W.

ALHANGA, a small town of Spanish Estremadura. It is situated on a rising ground, and belongs to the order of St. Jago, or the Knights of St. James. It is defended by a very strong castle built on a rock. Lat. 39, 10, N. Long. 5, 50, W.

ALIACMON, one of the chief rivers of the ancient kingdom of Thessaly and of Macedonia, rising in the mountains above the city Elymea, and which runs quite across the country, and empties itself into the Ægean Sea, by the gulph of Thessalonica, anciently called Sinus Thermaicus.

ALIANDRA, a town in the kingdom of Portugal, situated near Lisbon, on the road from that city to Oporto.

ALIBALUC, an island in the Caspian-sea, opposite to the province of Terristan, belonging to Persia. It is situated near the mouth of the Araxis.

ALICANT, a large sea-port town, in the province of Valencia and territory of Segura. It is seated between the mountains and the sea, and has a castle deemed impregnable. The port is defended by 3 bastions furnished with artillery. To prevent the visits of the Algerine pirates, watch-towers were built to give notice of the approach of an enemy's ship. It was taken from the Moors in 1264. The castle was taken by the English in 1706, and held out a siege of 2 years before it was retaken by the French and Spaniards, and at last last surrendered upon honourable terms, after part of the rock was blown up on which the castle stood, and the governor killed. The houses are high, and well built; and a very great trade is carried on here, particularly in wine and fruit. It is seated in the Mediterranean, on a bay of the same name, 37 miles north-east of Murcia, and 75 south of Valencia. W. long. 0, 36. N. lat. 38, 24.

ALICATA, a mountain of Sicily, near the valleys of Mazara and Noto, upon which was situated (as is generally thought) the famous Dædalion, where the tyrant Phalaris kept his brazen bull.

ALICATA, a town of Sicily, remarkable for corn and good wine. It was plundered by the Turks in 1543; and is seated on a fort of peninsula near the sea, 22 miles S. E. of Girgenti. E. long. 15, 20. N. lat. 37, 11.

ALJESUR. See ALGEZUR.

ALIFE, or ALIPHA, a small town of the Terra di Lavoro, a province of Naples, in Lower Italy. It is a bishop's see. Lat. 41, 15. N. Long. 14, 50, E.

ALINDA, or HALYNDA, a town on the frontiers of Caria, in Asiatic Turkey. It was situated, according to ancient geographers, between Stratonice and Bedessus; and is said by Pliny to have been built by, and to have taken its name from, the Halydienfes. It was an episcopal see.

ALINGRAHS, or ALINGSÄHS, an inland town of West-Gothland, a province of Sweden. It is situated on the river Sewelanga, and peopled by the burghers of Ny-lodese, a town the enemy had destroyed. At this place are fine silk and woollen manufactories, and a manufacture of tobacco, and making pipes. It has no magistrate, but is governed by a justiciary of the said manufactures, who has 4 counsellors as his assessors. This is the 81st town in the general diet of this kingdom. Lat. 50, 20. N. Long. 13, 20, E.

ALIPHERA, a city of Arcadia, which was reduced to the obedience of Philip, king of Macedonia, when decamping from Olympia; and having laid a bridge over the Alpheus, he entered the territory of the Triphalians, on the sea-coast of the Peloponnesus, pretty near the year of the flood 2782. This city, according to Polybius, was seated on the top of a high and steep hill, which was defended by a strong fortress. In this fortress was to be seen a brazen statue of Minerva, famous for the size and excellence of the workmanship. The inhabitants themselves, as our author tells us, could give no clear account why it was placed there, nor at whose charge. It was the work of Hecabodorus and Sostratus, and generally esteemed the most beautiful and finished piece they ever performed.

ALISA, or ATLSA, or ISLESAY, one of the Western Isles in the frith of Clyde, Scotland, 6 miles south of Arran. It is a steep uninhabited rock, like the Bass in Edinburgh frith; but noted for Soland geese, multitudes of sea fowl, and rabbits. A great fleet of vessels comes to it once a year for cod. Here is a spring of fresh water, a chapel, and a tower of 3 stories high. The said rock rises in form of a sugar-loaf, but has a plain on its top large enough to draw up 1000 men, and belongs to the earl of Cassils, who receives yearly about 100 marks Scots from this small piece of ground, for the produce of hogs, fowl, fish, and down. It is only accessible on one side, where stairs are cut out in the rock, at the bottom of which the fishermen reside in tents, and have good anchorage near them for their vessels.

ALISE, or SAINTE REINE, a town which gives name to the territory, in Burgundy, France; at which place are 2 minerals, to which great virtues are attributed.

ALISI. See AQUINO.

ALISIO, a little town of Capo Corso, a district containing the greatest part of the most northerly point of land, in the division of Corsica, which is situated on this side the mountains. Lat. 42, 49. N. Long. 9, 30, E.

ALISO, the river now called the Yssel, or Issel, in the Netherlands.

ALJUBARROTA. See ALGIBARROTA.

ALJUSTREL, a small town of the ouvidoria do Campo de Ourique, a territory of Alentejo, in Portugal. It contains 1500 inhabitants, with a district of one parish. Lat. 39, 5. N. Long. 7, 10, W.

ALKANSAS, a savage nation in Louisiana, situated in lat. 34. N. America, on the west side of the river Mississippi, near a river of the same name.

ALLA, a spacious well-built town, resembling a small but handsome city, in the bishopric of Trent, in Austria. It is situated near the Adige, in that called the province of Etzchland, and near the confines of the state of Venice, and has a castle. It lies 18 miles S. of Trent, and 20 N. of Verona. Lat. 45, 39. N. Long. 11, 16, E.

ALLANIPEGON, a considerable river, taking its rise from a lake of the same name, in the north-west part of Canada, in North-America, and falls into Lake Superior on the north side.

ALLANIPEGON, (Lake of) situated on the confines of New South Wales, in Canada, North-America; and has a communication with Hudson's Bay, by means of the river Peray; and with the lakes Asseniponals and Christinaux, by another river, which is not named. Lat. 50. N. Long. 83, 27, W.

ALLASS, a town of Lambock, one of the islands in the East Indies. It is situated on the shore, and gives its name to a strait lying between it and Combiava. Lat. 10, 20, N. Long. 86, 14.

ALLCHURCH, a village in Worcestershire, England, 5 miles from Bromsgrove, in the Leicester road; which has a good charity-school and a fair on St. Laurence's day.

ALLE, one of the principal rivers in the kingdom of Prussia. It has its source in Ermeland, and near Wehlau empties itself into the Pregel.

ALLEGRAZZA, a small island of Africa, and one of the Canaries, lying to the N. of Graciosa, to the N.W. of Rocca, and to the E. of St. Clare. There are several castles that defend the harbour.

ALLENBACH, or ELLENBACH, a district of the principality of Hersfeld, belonging to the Palgrave of Deuxponts Birkenfeld, and is situated between the rivers Nake and Glans.

ALLENBURG, a narrow and dark little town, in the jurisdiction of Tapan, belonging to the circle of Tapan and Insterburg, in the kingdom of Prussia. It is commodiously situated on the river Alle. Lat. 51, 30, N. Long. 22, 10, E.

ALLEN-CASTLE, or AHLEN-CASTLE, in the duchy of Brunswick-Lunenbourg, belonging to the elector of Hanover, in Germany. Lat. 51, 50, N. Long. 10, 10, E.

ALLENDORF, a small town of Hesse-Cassel, and circle of the Upper Rhine, in Germany, remarkable for its salt-works. It is situated on the Weser, 15 miles E. of Cassel. Lat. 51, 31, N. Long. 10, 5, E.

ALLER, a river of Germany; having its source in the duchy of Magdeburgh; then running N.W. through the country of Lunenburg, in Lower Saxony; and, passing by Zell, continues the same course till it falls into the Weser, below Verdun.

ALLERIA, an open and very ruinous little town of Fiumorbo, a district in that part of Corsica which lies on this side the mountains. It is situated on the river Tavignani, close by the sea; and was with difficulty taken from the malcontent Corsicans in the year 1730. The bishop of Alleria commonly resides at Corte. This is an ancient see under the archbishop of Pisa; and here Theodore, baron of Neuhof, first landed on the island in 1736. This place was anciently a Roman colony, founded by Sylla; and not far from thence, on the sea-shore, they make salt. The air here being unhealthy, the inhabitants were forced to abandon it; so that, besides the cathedral, not much above a dozen houses are now left standing in it. Lat. 42, 5, N. Long. 8, 50, E.

ALLERSHEIM, a bailiwick in the principality of Wolfenbittel, in Germany, which contains 4 villages. The bailiwick-house lies near Bevern, and was formerly called Ellersford.

ALLERSTEIN, in Polish, Oststreck, a small town and castle of Ermeland, a bishopric in Polish

A L

Prussia. The castle was built on the Aller in 1367. It belongs to the cathedral or chapter, who holds a provincial court here.

ALLERTON. See NORTHALLERTON.

ALLERTOWN, a village in Northumberland, England, 8 miles S.W. of Hexham, which has fairs May 10 and Nov. 11.

ALLHALLOW, is a small island, but noted for a good fishery, at the N.W. corner of Pomona, one of the Orkney Isles, Scotland.

ALLIA, a river of Italy; which, running down a very steep channel from the mountains of Crustumium, mixes with the Tiber at 40 miles from Rome; famous for the great slaughter of the Romans by the Gauls, under Brennus; hence Allienis Dies, an unlucky day. Our ancestors, says Cicero, deemed the day of the fight of Allia more fatal than that of taking the city.

ALLIER, one of the principal rivers in France. It rises at Chabellier, in the Gevaudan of Languedoc; when, after watering the provinces of Nivernois, Bourbonnois, and Auvergne, it begins to be navigable near Vial, not far from Maringue, and at length falls into the Loire.

ALLIGANY MOUNTAINS. See APALACHIAN.

ALLINGTON-CASTLE, a village in Kent, England, near the river Medway; which in the time of the Saxons was called the Castle of Medway. It has a market on Tuesday, and a fair on St. Laurence's day.

ALLOBROGES, an ancient people of Gaul. They inhabited Savoy, a small part of Dauphiny, the Greek Alps, or Lake Lemai, and the rivers Rhone and Isere. Their principal cities were Chambery, Geneva, Grenoble, Mulsiers, and Nienne. They were famous for their courage, were commended by Cicero for their fidelity, and discommended by Horace on account of their fondness for novelty.

ALLOBROGES (the country of the) were the regions at the foot of the Alps, known by the names of Savoy, Dauphiny, and Piedmont.

ALLON-BACHUTH, signifying the Oak of Mourning; the place mentioned Genesis xxxv. 8. where Deborah, nurse to Rebekah, died, and was buried under an oak at the foot of the hill of Bethel. A learned commentator observes, it is not easy to conceive how so very old a woman should be found in Jacob's retinue; as she could not be less than 170 years of age, unless that we suppose she was sent by Isaac to enquire after Jacob's welfare.

ALLOWAY, or ALLOA, a small town, or village, but the most considerable, in the shire of Clackmannan, in Scotland, with a harbour on the frith of Forth, where that river begins to be navigable, and in which ships of burden may safely ride. The Glasgow merchants have erected warehouses here for for their tobacco and sugars, and other goods imported from the British colonies; and likewise for stowing such commodities as they import from Sweden, Russia, Livonia, &c. The high-street of Alloway reaches down to the harbour: it is spacious and well-built, with rows of lime-trees all the way. Here is a large deal-yard, or place for laying up all sorts of Norway goods, in which they carry on a considerable commerce. They have warehouses of naval stores, such as pitch, tar, hemp, flax; two sawing-mills for flitting deals, and a rope-walk. In the neighbourhood of this town is a noble seat of the late unfortunate earl of Mar, formerly called the Castle of Alloway; but which is now so metamorphosed by modern improvements as to have no appearance of a castle. The gardens consist of about 40 acres of ground, and the contiguous wood, which has been adapted to the house in several avenues and vistas, upwards of three times that quantity. Alloway is situated within 4 or 5 miles E. of Stirling by land, but scarcely within 24 by water; occasioned by those unusual windings and reaches in the river Forth, which yield so beautiful a prospect from Stirling-castle. The river Alloway is as broad as the Thames at London-bridge; the water deep, that ships may lay their sides to the wharf, which is at some distance from the town, and deliver and load without the least difficulty. All along this shore are salt-pans for boiling of salt, which is sold reasonable, the country abounding in coals, and is fetched away in great quantities by ships that import hither goods from Bremen, Hamburg, the Baltic, Norway, &c. Lat. 56, 10, N. Long. 3, 45, W.

ALLOW-EAST, a river in the bishopric of Durham, England, which runs into the Tyne, near Lees.

ALLOW-WEST, a river in Northumberland, which also runs into the Tyne. Another river of that name in Anglesea, in Wales; runs into the Irish-sea below Llanvôrog.

ALL-SAINTS, some small islands near Guadaloupe. See XANTES.

ALL-SAINTS, a captainship in Brasil, South-America; so called from a large bay of that name, hereafter described: bounded on the N. by the Ria Real; on the S. by that of Las Ilheos; on the E. by the Atlantic-ocean; and on the W. by three unconquered nations of Indians. It is reckoned one of the richest and most fertile captainships in all Brazil, producing vast quantities of sugar, &c.

ALL-SAINTS-BAY, or BAHIA DE TODOS OS SANTOS, a large bay and capacious harbour of Brasil, in South-America. It is situated on the Atlantic-ocean, near San Salvador; being about 3 leagues over, and in some places has 12 fathoms of water, in others 18. It is intersected by a number of small, but pleasant islands; producing among other things abundance of cotton. This bay is in some measure divided into sundry branches, or channels, and runs up above 14 leagues into the continent, being of vast advantage to all the inhabitants around it; and has three large rivers that fall into it from the inland. The first, which is nearest to San Salvador, the capital of all Brasil, is called Pitangi; and the other two Gerefipa and Cachocra. The bay opens towards the S. and runs into the northward; and at the entrance into it is seen the continent of Brasil on the right, and the long island of Taparica on the left; which last helps to secure its mouth, being about 3 leagues wide between it and the Terra Firma; and on its point stands Fort St. Antonio, and the little town of Veya, within which a point of land forms an inlet like a half-moon, on which stands San Salvador. This incurvature ends in an acute angle, on the inside of which stands the castle of Agapipe. Besides these there are two more forts on the cape; namely, St. Maria, situated between that of St. Antonio and San Salvador; and the fort of St. Philip, at about the same distance on the other side of it. Between the coast and the island of Taparica the depth of the channel is from 24 fathom at the entrance to 12 over against the city. Besides the island which guards the mouth of the bay, are several smaller ones; of the two most considerable ones, that called Mare is about a league in length, and, extending between the mouth of the Pitangi, leaves only a channel of about 2 leagues in breadth; the other, called the Island of Monks, lies more towards the W. and is of a triangular form, whose base faces the main-land. Nearer the shore are 4 more islands, but less considerable. Lat. 12, 3, S. Long. 40, 10, W.

ALLSTAT, a bailiwick in the principality of Eissenach, in Germany, and in Thuringia, on the frontiers of Hesse, and is remarkably fertile. It lies between the bailiwicks of Sangerhausen, in Saxony, the principality of Querfurt, and the bailiwick of Bockstedt, in Mansfield. Its principal town is also called Allstat; it has a castle of great antiquity, and 13 villages in its district.

ALMACARON, though entitled a city, is only a small town of Murcia, in Spain. It is situated on the sea, near the mouth of the Guadalquivir. Here are made great quantities of alum. It lies 18 miles S. W. of Carthage. Lat. 37, 40, N. Long. 1, 15, W.

ALMACTA, a territory in the neighbourhood of Sigüenza, formerly Segontia; watered by the Duero and Montacuto, in Old Castile, Spain.

ALMADA, a little place in the district of the same name, in Portuguese Estremadura. It is situated on a small bay of the Tagus, and opposite to Lisbon: has a castle on a rock. A corregidor resides here. Lat. 38, 50, N. Long. 8, 50, W.

ALMADE,

ALMADE, a town of Spain, in the province of La Mancha, in the kingdom of Castile; situated upon the top of a mountain, where are the most ancient as well as the richest silver mines in Europe.

ALMADEN, a little place of Seville, a subdivision of Andalusia, in Spain. Near it are quick-silver mines. Lat. 37, 30, N. Long. 5, 10, E.

ALMAGRA, or ALMAGUER, a little town of Popayan, in South-America, near the head of the river Cauca. Lat. 3, 10, N. Long. 76, 20, W.

ALMAGRO, a small town of La Mancha, a subdivision of New Castile, in Spain. It belongs to the knights of Calatrava, and is the capital of the district called Campo de Calatrava. It is situated in a fruitful plain, and has near it a medicinal spring. Lat. 39, 30, N. Long. 3, 10, W.

ALMAND, or AMAN, a river of Athol, in Scotland, about a mile from Dunkeld. It is a branch of the Tay. It has a cascade near 30 yards high, called the Rumbling Brigg, from its noise. Close by it are two rocks over the river, which meet, and make a natural bridge. This the country-people have covered with sticks and clods of peat, it being the only bridge over that river.

ALMANNARA, a small town of Spain, in the province of Valencia, near the Mediterranean; where general Stanhope, on July 6, 1710, defeated the troops under Philip II. of Spain.

ALMANZA, a small place belonging to La Sierra, a subdivision of New Castile, in Spain. It has been rendered remarkable for a battle fought in its neighbourhood, April 14, 1707, O. S. between the Confederates, commanded by earl Galway, and the French and Spaniards under the duke of Berwick, in which the former were defeated. The unsuccessful event of this action proved so detrimental to them that from that time their affairs in Spain began to decline. Most of the English troops were either killed or taken prisoners; many of both having been horribly mangled. This misfortune principally arose from their being abandoned by the Portuguese cavalry at the first onset. Almanza is situated in a plain on the borders of Castile, and near those of Valencia; 47 miles S. W. of the capital of the latter, which bears the same name. Lat. 38, 56, N. Long. 1, 19, W.

ALMANZE, in Latin Almentia, situated two leagues from Nancy; was formerly the principal town of Gallia Belgica, in Lorraine.

ALMARAZ, a town of Estremadura, in Spain. It is situated on the Tagus, in a delightful plain.

ALMAESA. See MARSALQUIVIR.

ALMARSTAK, a considerable seat or castle of Uplandia, in Sweden Proper, of which Dahlberg has a view.

ALMAS, a mean-looking town of the banat of Temesvar, in Hungary Proper. It is situated in an open field, from which the neighbouring country also takes its name. Lat. 48, 10, N. Long. 18, 30, E.

ALMAYDA, or ALMEIDA, a frontier-town of Beira, and district of Pinhel, in Portugal. It is situated on a pleasant eminence near the river Coa, from which the whole territory is called Riba de Coa, or the Banks of Coa. The Moors had formerly built it on those banks, calling it Talmayda, which signifies a table, from the level ground on which it stood. But king Dennis, who retook it from them, removed it to the higher part. It has a good wall regularly fortified, and a strong castle, with a parish-church, house of mercy, hospital, and convent. It belongs to the infantia; and its district comprehends two parishes. The number its inhabitants is between 2100 and 2200. Lat. 40, 38, N. Long. 6, 14, W.

ALMAZAN, a small but neat place belonging to Old Castile, in Spain, with the title of a marquiseate. Here the inhabitants venerate the pretended head of St. Stephen, the Christian protomartyr.

ALMEDIA, a frontier-town of Traz los Montes, in Portugal, on the confines of Leon. Near this place was a sharp action between the Spaniards and Portuguese in 1663. The Spaniards besieged and took it in 1762. It is situated 17 miles N. W. of Rodrigo. Lat. 40, 40, N. Long. 7, 10, W.

ALMEDINA, a town of Ducala, a province of Morocco, in Africa. It is situated in a large fertile plain, between Azamor and Sallee; surrounded with old walls, flanked with towers, and was once rich and populous; and the capital of the province; there being scarce a more fertile spot in the whole empire with regard to corn, fruits, and pasture, than the territory round it. For some time it was in the hands of the Portuguese, on which account it was destroyed by the king of Fez, yet it has been since re-peopled. But a grievous famine happening in 1521, the inhabitants, being unable to subsist any longer, sold themselves, wives, children, &c. for bread; so that it has nothing left of its pristine grandeur but some noble ruins, and a few garden-grounds.

ALMEDINA, one of the principal towns in the province of Hascora, and kingdom of Fez, in Africa. It is built on the declivity of part of mount Atlas; and inclosed by three other hills on the other sides. It is now subject to the sharifs. This city is only surrounded with an ancient wall, flanked with towers, and filled with merchants and artificers; besides many others who cultivate the rich lands about it, and pay a small tribute to the Arabs. They are polite, and have some learned men amongst them; and, since their subjection to the sharifs, live very orderly; though before that they had continual wars with the inhabitants of the other Almedina in the province of Ducala before-mentioned. The women are esteemed very handsome, and particularly ticularly fond of strangers. Lat. 34, 10, N. Long. 2, 15, E.

ALMEIDA, a town of Beira, in Portugal. It is situated in the comarca of Pinhel, 10 miles S. of Lisbon, and on the opposite side of the Tagus. See also ALMAYDA. Lat. 38, 40, N. Long. 9, 15, E.

ALMELOO, a small place belonging to the country of Twente, and province of Overissel, in the United Netherlands. Lat. 52, 40, N. Long. 6, 50, E.

ALMERIA, a sea-port town in the kingdom of Granada, in Spain; in a fine bay at the mouth of the river Almería, on the Mediterranean. Long. 2, 15, W. Lat. 36, 51, N. This town is by some thought to have risen upon the ruins of the ancient Abdera, and was formerly a place of great consequence. It was taken from the Moors in 1147, by the emperor Conrad III. in conjunction with the French, Genoese, and Pisans. It was at that time the strongest place in Spain held by the Infidels; from which their privateers, which were exceedingly numerous, not only troubled the sea-coasts inhabited by Christians, but gave equal disturbance to the maritime provinces of France, Italy, and the adjacent islands. The city, being well-fortified, having a strong castle, a numerous garrison, and excellently provided with every thing necessary, made a vigorous resistance; but was at last taken by storm in 1489 by king Ferdinand; when the victor put to the sword all the inhabitants who were found in arms, distributing the best part of the plunder among his allies, whom he sent away thoroughly satisfied. The Genoese particularly acquired here that emerald vessel which still remains in their treasury, and is deemed invaluable. Upon its reduction by the Christians, Almería became a bishopric; but is at present very little better than a village, indifferently inhabited, and has nothing to testify so much as the probability of its former greatness, except certain circumstances which cannot be effaced even by the indolence of the Spaniards themselves. What these are Udal ap Rhys, a Welchman, thus describes in his Tour through Spain and Portugal: "Its climate," says he, "is so peculiarly blessed, that one really wants words to express its charms and excellence." It is situated on a bay, into which a small river empties itself, and has a safe and pleasant harbour. Its climate is so moderate that the fields are green all the year. Its walls, which are washed by the sea, are about three miles in circuit, and has only two gates, one of which is towards the sea, and the other towards the plain on which it stands. It is the see of a bishop, who is under the archbishop of Granada, and has a yearly revenue of 4000 ducats. Not far from this place the land stretches out into the sea towards the S. W. and forms a point which the ancients called the promontory of Charideme, but the moderns Cape de Gatt or Gates, or Cabo de Gata or Gaeta; which is supposed to be a corruption of Cabo de Agathas, or the Cape of Agates; as, besides great quantities of amethysts, emeralds, and garnets, those precious stones in particular were formerly dug in its neighbourhood. This city, though thinly peopled, is still divided into 4 parishes, has 3 monasteries, a nunnery, a noble hospital, and 10 chapels. The Spanish writers pretend that St. Ctesiphon, the companion of St. James the apostle, was the first prelate here. Its diocese comprehends only 70 parishes; and the cathedral hath but 6 dignitaries, 6 canons, and the like number of minors. Here is also an old castle belonging to the dukes of Maqueda. It stands about 64 miles S. E. from Granada, and 210 in the same direction from Madrid. Lat. 37, 5, N. Long. 3, 20, W.

ALMERIA, by the Spaniards also called Villa Ricca, on account of the gold which they found on their arrival here, is situated on the coast, in the province of Tlascala, and audience of Mexico, in North-America. It has but an indifferent port; yet better air than Vera Cruz, with a small river, good springs of fresh water, and a dry country behind: all which are wanting at Vera Cruz, from which it is distant above 20 leagues to the N. A clandestine trade they say is carried on here between some Spanish merchants on shore, and the French of St. Domingo and Martinico. Lat. 20, 10, N. Long. 100, 15, W.

ALMIPIGON, or ALEMIPIGON, a lake of Canada, in North-America, between 700 and 800 leagues above the mouth of the river St. Laurence. It discharges itself into the Upper or Superior lake, which is the largest of all the lakes in that northern country; and this into that of Huron, and this again into that of Erie or Conti, and this last into that of Frontenac or Ontario-lake.

ALMISSA, an Episcopal city in the ancient duchy of Chulm, and Venetian Dalmatia, in Hungary. This town is the old Peguntium, and is situated at the mouth of the river Cettina, between two high mountains, on a steep rock; from which they can level their cannon, and consequently batter and keep off all the ships that would come in. Its inhabitants employed themselves formerly in piracy; for which reason the neighbouring towns of Spalatro, Trau, and Sebenico, uniting their forces with those of Venice, exterminated this nest of thieves. From that era this town has not been able to recover itself entirely; while at the same time it has been long in the hands of the Turks. It stands 16 miles E. of Spalatro, and directly opposite to the isle of Braffa. Lat. 43, 56, N. Long. 39, 33, E.

ALMO, a brook in the Campagna de Roma; which falls into the Tiber at Rome. In this stream Cybele's victims were washed.

ALMODAVAR, a small town belonging to the ouvidoria do Campo de Ourique, and province of Alentejo.

Alentejo, in Portugal. It contains 1800 inhabitants, and has a district of 5 parishes. Lat. 38, 50, N. Long. 7, 15, W.

ALMODAVAR DEL CAMPO, a little town of La Mancha, one of the three subdivisions of New Castile, in Spain. It belongs to the knights of Calatrava. Lat. 38, 48, N. Long. 3, 32, W.

ALMON-DIBLATHAIM. This place being mentioned only in Numbers, chap. xxxiii. ver. 46, as that where the Israelites, removing from Dibon-Gad, pitched once their camp, which was one of their last encampments spoken of by Moses, on the east of Jordan; it must be supposed to lay between Dibon-Gad and the mountains of Abarim. There is a Diblath mentioned in the 4th verse of the 6th chapter of Ezekiel.

ALMONDBURY, a famous town in the time of the Romans, contiguous to Huthersfield in the N. Riding of Yorkshire, and called Campodunum; but it is now only a village. It is situated on the Calder.

ALMONTE, a small but genteel town of Seville, one of the 3 subdivisions of the province of Andalusia, in Spain. It is encompassed with a wood of olive-trees. Lat. 37, 30, N. Long. 5, 25, W.

ALMOPIANS, (the territory of) in Macedonia, lay west from the country of Joria, in which stood the city of Jorum; where were situated the cities of Europus, Albanopolis, and Apfalus; directly south of which we find the region of the Æstrians.

ALMOUCHIQUOIS, savages of America, that dwell towards the river Chovocovet, and the island of Bacchus, in Canada, in North-America. They shave from their foreheads to their crown, wearing long locks behind, which they tie in knots and adorn with feathers. They paint their faces with red and black. They do not change their habitations, like the other savages of those parts.

ALMUDEVAR, a little place belonging to the province of Arragon, in Spain, in a country which produces grain, wine, and saffron. Lat. 41, 42, N. Long. 21, W.

ALMUGNA, a large and beautiful village in Arragon, a province of Spain, at the junction of the river Grió with the Xalon. Lat. 41, 30, N. Long. 1, 10, W.

ALMUNECAR, an ancient city of Granada, in Spain, formerly very considerable, especially in the time of the Moors, being a commodious port on the Mediterranean, and well sheltered from the W. winds. Though it has still a strong wall, it is but a small town, with scarce 280 families in it; and has one parish, and a monastery. A strong citadel defends its harbour, which is an excellent one. It is situated almost 35 miles S. of Alhama. Lat. 36, 40, N. Long. 3, 45, W.

ALNE, a river of Northumberland, England; near which is situated the town of Alnwick, and empties itself into the German ocean at Aylmouth; another river of that name is in Cumberland, which runs into the Tyne below Kirk-Haugh; and a third in Warwickshire, which runs into the Arrow at Round-Alne.

ALNEY, a little island near the city of Gloucester, England; famous for the interview between Edmund Ironside and Knute the Dane, for adjusting their separate claims to the crown of England, when a compromise took place, and they reigned in conjunction: Edmund had the south of the Humber, and Knute the north.

ALNWICK, or ALANWICK, commonly pronounced ANWICK, a market-town of Northumberland, near the river Alne, 34 miles from Newcastle, and 30 from London. It has been frequently taken and retaken by the English and Scots; between whom a battle was fought here in 1174, in which William, king of Scots, was taken prisoner, and presented to Henry II. king of England. Its old castle being besieged by Malcolm III. king of Scots, in 1093, and on the very point of surrendering, a soldier who presented him the keys at the point of his sword, stabbed him with it; and his son Edward, in an attempt to revenge his death, was also killed. It was reduced to ashes in 1215. This famous castle, the residence of the noble family of the Percies, earls of Northumberland, who first become possessed of it in 1309, from which period it has continued in their possession, and now belongs to the present duke; seems to have been as fine a palace as it was a fortress for strength and defence. All round the octagon towers are the ruins of several effigies, now defaced by time and the weather. It has had every embellishment that art can contribute or expence procure. The town has a spacious square for the market, and a large town-house, where the quarter-sessions and county-courts are held. The town has been formerly walled, the vestiges of which may be traced; and 3 gates yet remain almost entire. The town-hall has a tower like a church, and his grace the duke has built handsome shambles, with piazzas. It is governed by 4 chamberlains and 24 common-council-men. It lies in the London road to Berwick, and is 8 miles N. of Felton bridge. The customs, words, habits, and even the buildings of this town, as well as all over Northumberland, imitate those of the Scots; and they are very strict here in the observation of their religious duties. Its fairs are on Palm-Sunday eve; May 12; if on a Sunday, the Saturday before; the last Monday in July; the first Tuesday in October; and the Saturday before Christmas.

ALOPECONESUS, anciently a city of the Thracian Chersonesus, a peninsula inclosed on the south south by the Ægean Sea, west by the gulph of Melas, and east by the Hellespont; situated on the said gulph of Melas, at the entrance into the peninsula; and had its name from the great number of foxes (Alopex being Greek for a fox) which infested its territory. Pliny, misled by the name, which signifies in the original Greek the island of foxes, took it to be an island; but all the other geographers speak of it standing on the Chersonesus.

ALORNA, a strong town on the coast of Malabar, near Goa, in the East-Indies; and which the Portuguese took by storm in 1747.

ALOST, or, as the Flemish pronounce and write it, Aelst, a town of Flanders, in the Netherlands, on the river Dender, and is the capital of what is called Imperial Flanders, as having been formerly a free imperial city, on which account the earls of Flanders stiled themselves Princes of the Holy Empire. This is the most eastward part of Flanders, and lies between the Dender, the Scheld, and the province of Hainault. This city is under the jurisdiction of the archbishop of Mechlin, has but one parochial church, which is also collegiate, and dedicated to St. Martin. Here are several convents of friars and nuns. In 1576 this city was taken by the Spaniards, who committed a thousand disorders in it; and by the duke of Alençon in 1582. After this the English garrisoned it; but it was betrayed to the duke of Parma. The French took it in 1667, Louis XIV. claiming it in right of his queen; but he restored it to the Spaniards by the peace of Nimègue, after dismantling it. Upon the death of Charles II. king of Spain, in 1700, the French seized it again; but abandoned it to the confederates in that general evacuation of the Netherlands which ensued soon after the battle of Ramillies, May 26, 1706. It was restored at the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle, 1748. Alost lies 15 miles N.W. of Brussels, and the same S.E. of Ghent. Lat. 51, 5, N. Long. 4, 10, E.

ALOST, a territory which gives the title of earldom, and extends even within the city of Ghent to the bridge called the Bridge of Brabant. It contains, besides three other cities, 172 villages; which in spiritual matters belong to the diocese of Mechlin, except Gavre, Melsene, and Ghent-brugge; and these are in the diocese of Ghent. In it are several hills, and many small rivers take their rise here. This country abounds in excellent pastures, and is very fruitful, especially in rye. Here are 5 ancient baronies; namely, those above-mentioned, over which are 5 high-bailiffs, and have been erected into a principality since the year 1553, in favour of the counts of Egmont. Besides which, here are the principalities of Steenhuyse and Marnes; the earldom of Hasselt; the marquissate of Lede; the baronies of Lickereke, Rasselghien, Herdershem, Meere, and Oudenhove; the viscounty of Oombergh; and the priory of Melle, consisting of regular canons of Augustines, founded in 1431 by Lewis Van Hole, a rich citizen of Ghent. In this territory are also the cities of Dendermonde, Ninove, and Grandmont. All which see under their names respectively.

ALOVENT, one of the highest and most famous mountains in all Persia. It is a branch of mount Taurus; which crosses the N. part of Persian Irak, and separates it from Fabristan. It lies three leagues from the city of Kaspin.

ALPALHAO, a small town belonging to the district of Portalegre and province of Alentejo, in Portugal. Lat. 39, 15, N. Long. 7, 30, W.

ALPEDRINHA, a small place belonging to the district of Castello-Branco, in the province of Beira, in Portugal. The judge of this place and Castlenovo is subject to the comarca. Lat. 40, 32, N. Long. 7, 21, W.

ALPEDRIZ, a small town belonging to the district of Leiria, and province of Portuguese Estremadura. Lat. 39, 25, N. Long. 8, 20, W.

ALPHEN, a town situated about 8 miles to the S. of Leyden, in Holland; one of the seven United Provinces. Lat. 52, 8, N. Long. 4, 3, E.

ALPHEUS, now Orphea, and by Italian seamen Carbon, a large river of the Morea, in European Turkey.

ALPHINGTON, or APHINGTON, a village in Devonshire, two miles S. of Exeter; with two fairs, the first Thursday in June and October 16.

ALPS, one of the two principal chains of mountains in Italy, the Appenines being the other. The Alps are a long range of high mountains, separating Italy from Gaul and Germany, in the form of a crescent. They take their rise from the Vada Sabatia, or Savona; and reach to the Sinus Flanaticus (now Golfo di Carnaro of the Adriatic) and the springs of the river Colapis (now the Kulpe); extending, according to Livy, 2000 stadia in length, or 250 miles; they are divided into several parts, and accordingly have different names. From Savona to the springs of the Varus, where the Alps lie against the sea of Genoa, they are called Maritimæ, or le Montagne di Tenda. These extend from south to north, between Gaul to the west, and Genoa to the east; beginning at Monaco on the Mediterranean, then running out through the east of the county of Nice, and between that and the marquissate of Saluzzo, terminate at length at mount Viso, between Dauphiné and Piedmont. Hence to Susa run the Alpes Cotticæ, or Cottanæ; mountains extremely high, separating Dauphiné from Piedmont, and extending from mount Viso to mount Cenis, between the Alpes Maritimæ to the south, and the Graie to the north. The Alpes Graie, so called from the passage of Hercules, begin from mount Cenis, where the Cotticæ terminate; and run out between Savoy and the Tarentese to the west, and Piedmont and the Duché d'Aouste to the east, quite to the Great St. Bernard, where the Alpes Penninæ begin. They are also called by some Graiaæ Alpes, and Graius Mons, which extend from W. to E. between St. Bernard and the Adula, or St. Gerdard; and thus they run out between the Vales to the north, and the Milanese to the south. With these are continued the Alpes Rhætica, to the head of the river Piava; a part of which are the Alpes Tridentinæ, to the north of Trent. To these join the Alpes Noricæ, reaching to Doublach, in Tyrol, to the north of the river Tadjamento: thence begin the Alpes Carnicæ, or of Carniola, extending to the springs of the Save: and the last, called Alpes Pannonicæ and Juliæ, extend to the springs of the Kulpe. Some, however, extend the Alps to the north of Dalmatia; others again to Thrace and the Euxine. But their termination at the Kulpe, as above, is more generally received. They were formerly called Albia, and Alpionia. Through these mountains Annibal forced his passage into Italy, by pouring vinegar on the rock, heated by burning large piles of wood on them, by which means they became crumbled. They are covered with perpetual snow. Alpes or Alpen is a Celtic term for high mountains. Cluverius makes the height of some 30, of others 50 miles; a height altogether incredible, even supposing we reckon from the level of the sea: the manner by which he found this height is nowhere said. According to the calculations of some geometricians, these mountains are somewhat less than two miles in perpendicular height.

ALPUJARAS, or ALPUXARRAS, a famous ridge of very high mountains in Grenada, a province of Spain. It branches out from those of Sierra Nivada, or the snowy hills, on the south side next to the Mediterranean, having the city of Almeria on the E. the town of Motril on the W. and Granada on the N. They are upwards of 60 miles long and 30 broad, all generally craggy, high, and difficult of access. But their bottoms are extremely fertile and delightful, producing all sorts of grain, fruit, and wine; feeding vast numbers of cattle, and yielding great quantities of silk; so that no part of Spain is so well cultivated, and the profits hence accruing are very considerable. This ridge is divided into eleven taas, an Arabic word signifying cantons or districts, but by the Spaniards called Cabeça de Partido. The principal of these is taa de Orgiva, and taa de Pitros, situated between the two villages of Pitros and Porrujos. These, whilst under the Moors, were governed by Alcaydes, and within them were also comprehended a city called Cobda, and about 120 villages, most of them thinly peopled, and some of them quite deserted, since the banishing of the bulk of those infidels out of this kingdom. The Moors who dwelt here received the Roman Catholic religion, but at the same time retained their old way of living. Their language was a medley of the Arabic and Spanish.

ALRE, a river in Hampshire.

ALRESFORD, a market-town in Hampshire, 60 miles from London, in the road to Winchester, and ten miles from that city. It lies on the little river Alre, as it is called by Camden, though in the maps, and by the common people, Itching. It has a bailiff and eight burgesses. Its market is on Thursdays, and its fair on June 24. This was once a flourishing market-town; and though it had no great trade, and very few, if any manufactures, there was no collection made in the town for the poor, nor one alms-man in the parish. But this happy circumstance, which so distinguished Alresford from all her neighbours, was brought to an end in 1710, when this town, with the church and market-house, was burnt down by a sudden fire, which broke out in several places almost at the same time; and except a few poor huts at the remotest ends of the town, not a house was left standing. The town has since been very handsomely rebuilt; and the neighbouring gentlemen have contributed liberally towards the relief of the inhabitants, especially by furnishing them with timber for their buildings. Both the market-house and many private houses, are now built of brick. Near this town is a pond of water, to which serves as a head, bank, or dam, part of the great Roman causeway, or highway, leading from Winchester to Alton; and, as supposed, on to London, though no remains of it are any where to be seen, except between the two former places, and principally between Alresford and Alton. Of the same name with this town, but distinguished by the addition of Old Alresford, is another place in the hundred of Fawley, and in the same county.

ALRIFF, some Arabs divide the Delta of Egypt into two parts, Al Riff and Al Bahriya. Al Riff being the west part is supposed by Bochart to be the Rahab of the Scriptures, and was so called because of its form resembling a pear, which the Egyptians call Rib or Ribi, Rahab.

ALROA, or ALROE, an island in the bay of Horsa, belonging to the district of Aakiar, in the diocese of Aarhus, and province of North Jutland, in Denmark.

ALSA, a river of Carniola, now Ausa, running near Aquileia, with a short course from North to South, into the Adriatic; where Constantine, the son of Constantine the Great, fighting against Constantius his brother, lost his life.

ALSACE, a province of France, bounded on the east by the Rhine, on the south by Swisserland, on the west by Lorrain, and on the north by the palatinate of the Rhine. It was formerly a part of Germany, but was given to France by the treaty of Munster. It is one of the most fruitful and plentiful provinces of Europe, abounding in corn, wine, wood, flax, tobacco, pulse, fruits, &c. The mountains which divide it from Lorrain are very high; and generally covered with fir, beech, oak, and horn-beam. Those on the side of Swisserland are less high; and furnished with all sorts of wood, as well for fuel as building. The country itself is diversified with rising hills and fertile vales, besides large forests; but that between the rivers Ill, Hart, and the Rhine, as far as Strasburgh, is inferior to the rest, on account of the frequent overflow of the Rhine. In High Alsace, there are mines of silver, copper, and lead. They however work none but those of Gironnany, from which are annually drawn 1600 marks of silver, each mark being eight ounces, and 24000 pounds of copper: but the expence of working them is almost equal to the profit. There are iron-works in several parts of Alsace, and particularly at Bettford. There is a mineral spring at Sultzbach, near Munster, in High Alsace; which is in great reputation for the palsy, weakness of the nerves, and the gravel.—The original inhabitants of Alsace are honest and good-natured, but wedded to their own manners and customs. The fruitfulness of their country renders them indolent and inactive; for the Swiss make their hay and reap their corn, as well as manage the vintage of High Alsace, which sends a great deal of money out of the province. The common language is the German: however, the better sort of people speak French in the towns; and even in the country, they speak French well enough to be understood.

ALSCHAUSEN, ALTSCHAUSEN, or ALS-HAUSEN, a commandery of the Teutonic order, in the circle of Swabia, Germany, belonging to Alsace and Burgundy; to which belongs a castle of the same, which is the residence of the commandery of the bailwic, and lies between the district of Altorf and Konigseck and Scheer. The place of the same name situate near it, is a free imperial village.

ALSCHWANGEN, a village of Courland Proper, near which is a castle of the same name; both in the parish of Alschwaugen. Lat. 56, 54, N. Long. 24, 15, E.

ALSEN, an island in the East-sea, comprehending the districts of Sonderburg and Norburg, belonging to the duchy of Sleswick in Denmark. Alsen is near the mainland, and separated from Sleswick by a very narrow strait called Alsen-fund. This island is upwards of 12 miles in length from S. to N. and between 4 and 6 miles in breadth, from E. to W. It is populous and fruitful all over, being a rich and pleasant spot, having an exuberance of all sorts of grain, wheat alone excepted. It produces excellent fruits of trees, and garden-vegetables; and has also no want of woods, in which great numbers of wild-game are to be met with. Here and there, especially in its northern part, are several fresh-water lakes abounding with fish. It is divided into the Suder and Norder Harde, or the jurisdictions of Sonderburg and Norburg. It was taken by Margaret of Denmark in 1409, and by Frederick of Denmark in 1568. It formerly belonged to the dukes of Holstein; and gave name to two branches of that family, namely, Sonderburg and Norburg. But it has been sold to the king of Denmark, to whom it belongs at present. Duke Christian Augustus of Sleswick Holstein Augustenburg, is governor of the whole island, and amtmann or supreme judge of its south division, its northern part having a distinct judge. In ecclesiastical matters, the seven parishes of the Suder-harde, and the five of the Norder-harde, in this island, are subject to the Bishop of Funen; but the parishes of Sonderburg, and Keynas or Kekenis, belong to the provost or priory of Sonderburg. Besides several villages, Alsen contains two towns, namely, Sonderburg and Norburg; which see. Lat. 55, 12, N. Long. 10, 12, E.

ALSFELDT, or ASFIELD, one of the most ancient town of Hesse, in Germany. It had formerly very considerable privileges, even power of life and death; but many years ago it lost its charter, by an accidental fire, so as now to have only a slight memorial of it, by the chief magistrate's having a sword carried before him. Here is a handsome town-house, over the door of which is a monument in remembrance of the said fire, with a Latin inscription, importing, that when things have been irrecoverably lost, it is the best way to forget them. This was the first town in Hesse that embraced Luther's reformation. It is situated twelve miles E. of Marburg. Lat. 50, 40, N. Long. 9, 5, E.

ALSERIG, a place in Cromartyshire in Scotland, noted for large fir-woods near it.

ALSHAM, ALYSHAM, or ALESHAM, a small town of Norfolk, noted for knitters. Here a court is kept for the duchy of Lancaster. The manor of Sextons is held of this manor of Alsham by the rod, at the will of the Lord, and the investiture is granted by copy of court-roll, military fees being often held so. Its fairs are on March 23, and the last Tuesday in September for lean cattle, ordinary horses, and pedlary wares. It is situated six miles from Walsham, nine from Norwich, and 117 from London.

ALSHASH, a very beautiful city in Bukharia, supposed to be the same with that which is now called Tasheant, the capital of the eastern part of Turkistan, possessed by the Kassats. It is situated on the river Schün, now Sir, and had a well watered garden for every House; but was ruined by Jenghiz Khan, who took the city, and caused a great number of its inhabitants to be massacred.

ALSEDA,

ALSHEDA, one of the nine parishes of Jonkoping territory, a subdivision of Smaland, a province of East Gothland or Ostro Gothia, in Sweden. It is noted for a gold-mine called Aedelfors, which was discovered here in 1738, and gold ducats coined from the metal found in it.

ALSIUM, a city of ancient Etruria, occupying (according to Cluverius) the spot on which Pala now stands. We are told by Dionysius Halicarnassensis, that Alsium was built by the Aborigines long before the Tyrsenians invaded Italy. In this case it must have been founded not long after the dispersion in the days of Peleg. Its founder is said to have been one Alæsus, Alesus, or Alisa; whom some conjecture to have been Alifash, or Elifsha, the son of Javan, mentioned in scripture.

ALSO-SAJO, in Latin Sajo Inferior, a place resembling a town in the county of Gomor, one of the subdivisions of the feat of the ten Lancemen, as it is called, situated in the circle of Upper Hungary, on this side the Theiss. Here great quantities of cinabar are dug. It lies on the river Sajo. It has a mineral spring.

ALSO-SDANY, a place belonging to the jurisdiction of Rowisch, and province of Barsch, in the circle on this side the Danube, in Lower Hungary. Here is a mineral spring.

ALSTADT, one of the three towns that compose Koninsberg. See KONINSBERG.

ALSTON-MORE, a town in Cumberland, with a market on Saturdays; and two fairs, on the last Thursday in May and the first Thursday in September. It is seated on a hill, at the bottom of which runs the river Tyne, with a stone-bridge over it, and near it is plenty of lead-ore. It is 20 miles E. by S. of Carlisle, and 250 N. N. W. of London. Long. 2, 4, W. Lat. 54, 45, N.

ALSVIG, an island on the N. W. corner of that of Sky, one of the Hebrides in Scotland. It is two miles in circuit; is fruitful in grain and pasture, and noted for the vast shoals of herrings about it, which sometimes entangle the fishing-boats.

ALSUNGEN, an inland lake of South Halland, a subdivision of South Gothland in Sweden. From it issues the river Aethra or Falkenberg, near the town of the latter name.

ALSZA, a small place of the Tarter districts in European Turkey, in the country lying between the Nieper and the efflux of the Don. Lat. 40, 40, N. Long. 30, 35, E.

ALT, a river in Lancashire, England, which runs into the Irish Ocean at Altmouth, north of Liverpool.

ALT, ALTWA, OLT, ALUTA, one of the principal rivers in Transylvania. It falls into the Danube.

ALTAISCH, i. e. Gold-mountains; that tract of the mountains of Siberia in the Asiatic part of the Russian empire, is so called that is between the rivers Irtsch and Ob. But this name has since been changed; and especially the range of them lying between Jenesei and Baikal, denominated the Sajanisch mountains.

ALTALA, a small district of the territory on the further side of the mountains, or S. W. division of the island of Corsica, in the Mediterranean.

ALTAMIRA, a county of Galicia, one of the provinces of Spain.

ALTAMONT. See AL TOMONTE.

ALTAMURA, a small place in the province of Bari, in the kingdom of Naples, in Lower Italy. It has the title of a principality. Lat. 40, 56, N. Long. 17, 10, E.

ALTAYEF, a town of Hejaz, a district of Arabia Felix, about 60 miles east of Mecca, behind mount Gazwan; where the cold is more intense than in any other part of the district, but the air very wholesome. Its territory abounds in fountains, and produces excellent raisins. The town is surrounded with a wall, but is not very large.

ALT BUNZLAU, in Latin Boleslawia vetus, in the circle of Bunzlau, or Boleslawsko, Bohemia, a town founded by Wratislaus in the 915, and improved by his son Boleslaw the Cruel in 937; but which in the troubles in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries was reduced to an inconsiderable place. The collegiate church of St. Cosmus and Damian here is very ancient, and the dean thereof lord of this place.

ALTDORF, a good trading town in Hungary, and one of those belonging to the Lower or Larger Seat, as it is called, in the country of Zips and circle of Upper Hungary, on this side the Theiss. It is situated not far from the confines of Poland. Lat. 49, 12, N. Long. 21, 15, E.

ALTDORF, a large handsome town of Switzerland, and the chief of the canton of Uri, below the lake of the four cantons, in a plain, at the foot of a mountain, whose passages are difficult, and serve instead of fortifications. It has four churches and two convents; St. Martin's church and that of the Holy Cross are the finest. The town-house and the arsenal are also worth seeing. E. Long. 8, 30. N. Lat. 46, 30.

ALTEA, a small sea-port town of Valencia, one of the provinces of Spain, on the Mediterranean, and abounds in wine, flax, silk, and honey. From hence, during the first part of the war in queen Anne's time, about the Spanish succession, the confederate fleet riding in Altea-bay, had frequent supplies of fresh-water and provisions, till the unfortunate battle of Almanza in 1707. It lies 45 miles S. of Valencia city. Lat. 38, 40, N. Long. 15, W.

ALTE-LAND, in the duchy of Bremen, Germany. Lies on the Elbe, and is separated by the Schwinge from the country of Kedington. Through this district the Lube and Este, both navigable rivers rivers make their way into the Elbe. Its length is about three German miles and a half, but its breadth only from half a mile to three-quarters. It consists of marsh-land, and abounds in wheat, rye, barley, oats, beans, hemp, and flax; as likewise in common fruit. A great part of the inhabitants subsist by navigation. The whole district is divided into 3 districts; the first of these reaches from the Schwinge, or from Stade to the Lube; the second from the Lube to the Este; and the third from the Este to the village of Mohrburg, belonging to Hamburg. It is again subdivided into 12 capitaineries, and 6 prefecturates. Lastly, it is divided into 10 parishes, in which are lower courts of justice, with a prefect over each. Some of these courts comprehend above one parish; and there are some parishes have more than one of these courts. The supreme authority is exercised by 2 counts, one of whom is nominated by the sovereign, and the other chosen out of 4 persons presented by the freeholders. The Alteland præpositurship contains 13 parochial churches.

ALTEN, a place in West Finmark, and one of the 13 districts belonging to the Danish mission in Finmark, and diocese of Drontheim, in Norway.

ALTENA, a large and populous village of Stormar, a province of Danish Holstein, where a governor for the king of Denmark resides. It is joined to Hamburg by a row of houses on the Elbe, as Westminster is to London. The origin of its name is commonly accounted for as follows: deputies from Hamburg, in a remonstrance to the king of Denmark against building this town too near their city, frequently made use of the words, "dat is all ta nae," i. e. that is too near; the king taking particular notice of the 3 last monosyllables, said banteringly to the deputies, he could not excuse himself from going on with the building; but that, to oblige them, he would call it by the name they had given it. Formerly it was a refuge, not only for insolvent debtors, but even malefactors, that came from Hamburg; and, though it depended entirely on the trade of that city, yet it was quite out of its jurisdiction. It is noted for a treaty concluded here in 1689, between the king of Denmark and the duke of Holstein-Gottorp, about the partition of the duchy of Holstein. The government of the town is vested in an upper president chosen by the king, the burgher-master, and corporation. The court of appeal is held at Glückstadt. In it are about 3000 houses and 30,000 inhabitants; with 2 churches for the Lutherans, 2 for the Calvinists, 1 for the Calvinist French; another for the Roman Catholics, and 2 Menonite churches, exclusive of other sects. The Jews here are numerous, and have a large synagogue; but pay 2000 ducats per annum protection money. Here is a royal gymnasium, an anatomical theatre, with variety of manufactures and fabrics, and 3 docks for building ships. In 1710 it lost 200 houses by fire; and in 1712 it was burnt by the Swedish army, commanded by Steinbeck; and about the same time suffered very much by the plague. It was originally a village in conjunction with the lordship of Pinneburg; but in 1640, coming with the lordship under the dominion of Denmark, it soon became a town, and in 1644 obtained a charter. The Danes would have fortified this town long ago; but the Hamburgers having obtained a grant from one of the emperors of Germany, that no fort should be built within 2 miles of them, would never permit it. Altena is now the emporium, or market, for the sale of goods brought by the Danish East-India company from the Indies. It is situated on the Elbe, 2 miles N. W. of Hamburg. Lat. 53, 56, N. Long. 10, 3, E.

ALTENAU, a mine-town in the principality of Grubenhagen, in the territories of Brunswick Lunenburg, Germany, seated in a vale, and surrounded by rugged mountains and a rock. Here is a house for the smelting of silver, the aqua fortis from which runs into the river Ocker.

ALTENBURG, in Hungarian Ovar, a fine town, and the capital of the province of Wieselburg, or Moson, in the circle beyond the Danube, in Lower Hungary, situated in an island, and has a strong castle, standing on a small arm of the Danube, and on the Leitha: and is besides surrounded with a deep and broad ditch full of water. It is the principal demesne, or estate, among those belonging to Hungary, in this province. Here is a Jesuit's-college; and an annual fair is here, which holds for a week. In these parts is no other road out of Hungary into Germany, but close by the castle; and consequently it is reckoned the best frontier-town of the house of Austria on this side. In 1529 it was taken by the Turks, in 1605 burnt down, in 1619 reduced by Bethlen Gabor, and in 1621 by the Imperialists. In 1663 the Imperial army assembled here; and it was one of the places taken by prince Ragotski. It is situated 12 miles S. of Presburg. Lat. 48, 15, N. Long. 17, 20, E.

ALTENBERG, a district in the circle of Erzgebirg, near Leipsick, in Germany; which contains 2 immediate, 5 mediate vassals, and 12 villages.

ALTENBERG, a little open free mine-town in the above district, under immediate vassalage, and having both seat and voice at the land diets. This town lies near the source of the 2 little rivers Weisseritz. It contains about 200 houses, part of which are in a valley, the other part on an eminence, are called the New Town. The rich tin-mines discovered here in 1458 occasioned the building this town, which is reckoned the best next to the English and Bohemian. Here is also a cement spring. Great quantities of lace are made here.

The town was nearly burnt down in 1531, and in 1576, as well as in 1678; and the Swedes set fire to it in 1639.

ALTENBURG, a principality of Germany, annexed to Saxe-Gotha. It is part of the ancient Osterlands, and borders to the west on the upper principality of Schwarzburg, the part of the lordship of Kranichfeld belonging to the princes of Hatzfeld, and the principality of Weimar; to the north, on the diocese of Naumberg, and the circle of Thuringia and Leipzig; to the east, the circle of Leipzig and the lordship of Schonburg in the circle of Erzgebirg; and to the south, on the circles of Erzgebirg and Neustadt. It is divided from N. to S. into 2 parts, by the lordship of Gera. The soil is fertile in corn, and abounds with good pasturage, and their graziery is considerable. It has in particular a large breed of horses. Here is plenty of wood, and the mines yield copper, cobalt, vitriol, and other minerals. The religion of the country is Lutheranism. Its principal river is the Pleisse.

ALTENBURG, anciently called Plisne, the capital of the principality of Altenberg, Germany; standing high on an uneven spot of ground, and is extensive and populous. Its castle, seated on a rock, was the residence of the former electors and dukes; and was the place from whence the young princes Ernest and Albert, the founders of the two principal lines of the Saxon house, were carried off in 1455 by Kunz von Kauffing. In the town is a stately building, where the public business is transacted; a Magdalen, or place for educating young ladies of decayed families; a house belonging to the Teutonic order; a gymnasium illustre, founded in 1703; with a museum and library, and orphan-house and house of correction. Altenburg was anciently an imperial city, and the capital of the country of Pleissen. From the year 1172 we meet with accounts of the burgraves of Altenburg, after which the emperors often made it their head-quarters, and held a diet in it. Frederick with the bitten cheek, who was margrave of Meissen, in 1308, taking the town, it came under the dominion of the said margraves, and afterwards passed to the house of Saxony. At the different periods of 1403, 1427, 1430, and 1445, it suffered very considerably by fires. La Forest says, that the dukes of Saxe-Gotha have had possession of it since 1672. It was taken by the Imperialists in 1632, and suffered very much by the civil war before the treaty of Westphalia. In 1568 a conference was held here between the divines of Thuringia and Saxony, which lasted from October the 21st to the 9th of March following. Lat. 50, 52, N. Long. 12, 44.

ALLEN-FAHR, a village in the principality of Rugen, duchy of Pomerania, in Germany. It is situated on the strait opposite Stralsund, and derives its name from the ferry, which, from time immemorial, has been in those parts.

ALTENHEIM, a village on the Rhine near Straßbourg, in Alsace, Germany; rendered remarkable for a battle near its bridge, wherein the celebrated Marshal Turenne met his fatal wound in 1675.

ALTEN-KIRCHEN, a district and town of the same name in the county of Sayn, in Westphalia, Germany; which is the residence of the administration of Onolzbach-Sayn, and also of the chancery. It contains a citadel, together with a Lutheran and Calvinist church.

ALTENMARK, in Upper Bavaria, in Germany, is a market-town seated on the banks of the river Alza.

ALTENSTADT, a district and town belonging to the Imperial city of Ulm, in Germany. It is seated on the river Fils, and anciently belonged to the courts of Spitzbergen.

ALTENSTEIG, a district of Wurtemberg, in Germany, which contains 8 parochial villages, among which is one of the same name, situate on the river Schwarzwolde, in the ancient Nagoldgau. It was purchased by the margrave of Baden, in 1400, of the count of Hohenberg; and resold in 1603 to the ducal house of Wurtemberg.

ALTESSON, a town of Piedmont, in Upper Italy, between the Dora and Stura. During the siege of Turin, in 1706, the French were in possession of this place. It stands almost 2 miles E. from La Venerie. Lat. 44, 36, N. Long. 27, 24, E.

ALTEZEY, a town and castle of Germany, in the Lower Palatine, and capital of a territory of the same name; seated upon a brook, 15 miles S.W. of Mentz. Long. 7, 30, E. Lat. 49, 44, N.

ALTHUUS, a castle of Culmerland, or prefecture of Culm, in Polish Prussia. It stands on a hill upon the Vistula, with a village contiguous to it. In Polish it is called Starigrod.

ALTIERI, one of the most considerable palaces in Rome for largeness. It was raised by Pope Clement X. and Ross the architect. The structure alone cost 1,100,000 crowns. It has a most magnificent stair-case, with numberless curiosities in statues, busts, paintings, tapestries, all over the palace, &c. also a fine hall, painted in fresco, and a curious library.

ALTIN, one of the principal inland lakes situated in the Asiatic part of the Russian empire. In the Russ language it is called Teleskoi Osero; which name it has taken from a Tartar nation dwelling on that lake, who stile themselves Telessi. The Tartars call it Altin-kul, and the Kalmycs, Altinnor. It is about 18 German miles long, and 12 broad. The northern half of it is frozen over sometimes in winter, so as travellers may walk upon it; but the southern half never.

It has a deep and rocky bottom. The water in this lake, as well as that in the rivers of this district, contrary to the usual way in other countries, rises only in the middle of summer, when the excessive heat at that time of the year melts the snow on the high mountains, on which the spring sun could have no impression towards thawing of it.

ALT KIRCH, a small town and castle of the district, or prefecture, of the same name, in the Sundgau, of which it was formerly the capital, and now belonging to Alsace, and subject to France, at the rest of this country. It is situated on the Rh. Altkirch, with 30 villages more, constitutes a lordship. Here resides the bishop of Basil's official for that part of his diocese which is subject to France. It lies 7 miles S. of Mulhausen, and 13 from Basil. Lat. 51, 10, N. Long. 10, 22, E.

ALT LAND, one of the five districts of the royal Saxon territory of Transylvania, Hungary; containing 6 towns. See HERMANSTADT.

ALTMANSTEIN, in Upper Bavaria, Germany, is a market-town situated near the river Altmühl.

ALTMORE, a small town in the county of Tyrone and province of Ulster, in Ireland. It lies 7 miles N. W. of Dungannon. Lat. 54, 34, N. Long. 6, 58, W.

ALTOMONTE, or ALTAMONT, a small but pretty place of the Hither Calabria, belonging to the kingdom of Naples, in Lower Italy; near which are gold and silver mines. It lies 15 miles N. W. of Bagnano. Lat. 39, 40, N. Long. 38, 26, E.

ALTOMUNSTER, in the district of Aicha, Upper Bavaria, Germany, a pretty market town, not far from the river Paar, with an abbey of nuns of the order of St. Bridget.

ALTON, a market town of Hampshire. It is of little note, having no considerable manufactures in all the neighbouring parts, except druggets and shaloons and sergedenims; but it has a charity-school for 40 boys and 20 girls, and a weekly market on Saturday. It has a small mean church, and the river Way runs through it. Its fair is on December 20. It is situated in the road from Winchester to London, and 50 miles distant from the latter.

ALTMUL, or ALTAMULT, a considerable river of Franconia, in Germany, in which province it rises; and running S. E. by the city of Ansbach, continues its course E. by Papenheim and Aichstat, till it afterwards falls into the Danube at Kelheim, 12 miles above Ratisbon. Lat. 49, 10, N. Long. 12, 10, E.

ALTORF, or ALTDORF, a district belonging to the jurisdiction of Nurnberg, in the circle of Franconia, Germany; in which is a town of the same name, containing about 200 houses. It consists chiefly of one street, which is called the Markt; and of several little ones; but these are rendered disagreeable by the many dunghills in them. The citadel here is an ancient stone building, consisting of 12 large courts, in which the administrator of the district has his residence. In 1575 an academy was founded here, which in 1578 obtained of the emperor academical immunities, was consecrated in 1580, and in 1623 raised to the dignity of an university, which now contains above 200 students. The fine university structure consists of a building 3 stories high, terminated by 2 wings, and contains in it a valuable library, an anatomical theatre, and a chemical laboratory. In the main body of it is an observatory. Without the town lies a large botanical garden, well stocked, and kept in good condition. This town is a place of antiquity, mention being made in its records as early as 112. It belonged anciently to the counts of Nassau, from whom it descended through the Palatine family to the burgraves of Nurnberg. The burgrave Frederick conferred it in 1390 on his daughter Anna, in marriage with duke Suantibor of Pomerania. That ducal house sold it in 1393 to the palgrave Rupert, who was afterwards emperor. It continued with the palgrave till 1504, when he was put under the ban of the empire; and, among other imperial states, the execution of it was conferred on the town of Nurnberg, which took possession of it, being also adjudged by right of conquest, and retained by virtue of the agreement in 1521 with the palgrave. In 1448 it was stormed by the margrave Albert, and the greatest part of it was destroyed by fire. In the 16th century it was often taken, and in 1553 again nearly reduced to ashes by margrave Albert the younger. This town has at a little distance from it a fine castle, named Burghan; and about 15 miles from it is another village of the same name, called the Old Town, which with this was anciently a fief dependent on the Elector Palatine. Lat. 49, 22, N. Lat. 6, 52, E.

ALTORF, WEINGARTON, i. e. Vineyard, is a famous town belonging to the circle of Suabia, in Germany. It gave the title of count to a family, from which sprung a great branch of the ancient dukes of Bavaria, and the present duke of Brunswick-Lunenbourg, elector of Hanover and king of Great-Britain. Anciently the Guelph family, from which are descended the last-mentioned dukes, had a burying-place in a monastery here, whose abbot is a prince of the empire. Altorf belongs to the house of Austria, and is the seat of the emperor's lieutenants, who keeps a court here, under a deputy or high-commissioner, to determine in all cases brought before him from the Imperial towns in Suabia. It lies 20 miles N. E. of Constance. Lat. 47, 56, N. Long. 9, 35, E.

ALTORFT, or ALTDORFF, in Latin Altorfium, the capital of the canton of Uri, in Switzerland, and the seat of its juridical court, in a plain on the Lucern-lake, near the mouth of the river Rues, and the foot of the Alps. The houses in Altorf are neat, and the streets well-paved, having delightful gardens and country-houses round it. But it is a place of very difficult access, and an important pass into Italy, as standing about 3 leagues from the dangerous precipices of mount St. Gothard, near which rise the rivers Rues, Tefin, Rhine, and Rhone. Here are 3 churches, with a town-house, and arsenal. An engine was erected here in 1688 for cutting and polishing of crystal; and a large granary in 1733. The provincial armoury is kept here; and here is a Capuchin convent, and a nursery of Carolists. In 1400 it was nearly destroyed by a fire, and in 1693, 75 of its houses were burnt down. It lies 20 miles S. E. of the city of Lucern. Lat. 46, 50, N. Long. 8, 30, E.

ALT-RANSTADT, a town in Saxony, famous for the treaty between Charles XII. king of Sweden, and Augustus, elector of Saxony, in 1706; wherein the latter resigned the kingdom of Poland.

ALTRINGHAM, a market-town of Cheshire, near the borders of Lancashire, on the river Mersey; and is a place of so much note as to be governed by a mayor of an ancient institution; but has nothing else remarkable. It lies 24 miles N. W. of Chester and 152 N. W. of London, and a little farther to the northward than Northwich. Its market is on Tuesday, and fairs on the 5th of August and the 2d of November.

ALTRIP, in the Bisthopric of Spire, and circle of the Upper Rhine, in Germany, though now only a small village, was formerly fortified, commanding a passage of the Rhine, a little above Mannheim. In the Notitia Imperii it is called Alta Ripa; the bank of the Rhine being here very high. It was formerly a place of such importance that the Romans kept a garrison in it. Lat. 49, 28, N. Long. 7, 18, E.

ALTSOHL, or ALTENSOL, a district in the circle lying on the latter side of the Danube, in Lower Hungary. It is 10 miles in length, and in some places front 4 to 5 in breadth, but in others much narrower. The country is almost entirely mountainous; yet its mountains are partly rich in ores and minerals; as in them is found some gold and silver, but especially a large quantity of the finest copper ore, also iron, orpiment, quick-silver, chrysocola, and terra-sigillata. The rivers of this county are the Gran, Bisritza, Szalatha, and Carpona or Krupenitza. Among its mineral springs the most famous are those of Ofasirofski, half a mile from the castle of Vigles; the Altsohl, on the river Gran; the Ribar, Flatsin, and Batsuch; but its warm baths are at Neusohl and Ribar. At Hersengrund is a cupreus water. Agriculture is very little followed here; though they have good breeds of cattle, especially great numbers of sheep. The inhabitants are Bohemian slaves. Among the gentry are several Hungarians, and among the burghers numbers of Germans. This county consists of two districts, namely, the Upper and Lower. The Upper comprehends 3 royal free-towns, 2 fortresses, 3 castles, 3 small towns, and 52 villages. The Lower district contains 2 royal free-towns, 3 fortresses, 4 castles, 6 small towns, and 66 villages.

ALTSOHL, one of the royal free towns of Hungary, in the Lower district of the above county, is the capital of the county; but of itself only a little place. Its situation is delightful, and near it run the rivers Gran and Szalatha. In the year 1708 it was burnt by the partisans of prince Rakotzi. This place is noted for silver-mines, and lies 9 miles to the S. of Neusohl or Newfol. Lat. 18, 56, N. Long. 19, 8, E.

ALSTADT, a village belonging to the other general bailiwick or prefecture of Preulmarck, and circle of Mohrung and Marienwerder, in Royal Prussia; dependent on the count of Wallenrodt, who has a stately palace here.

ALTZHEIM, or ALTZEY, formerly the capital of a county, but now only a bailiwick, in the palatinate of the Rhine, in Germany. It stands on a brook of the same name that falls into the river of Saltz, which, after running a little to the N. unites with the Rhine below Ingelheim; is a good town, fortified with a castle, and is walled round; and here once the elector resided. It was taken in 1691 by the French, but afterwards restored. It lies 42 miles N. W. of Heidelberg. Lat. 49, 45, N. Long. 7, 52, E.

ALVA, one of the 22 towns belonging to the donatories or queen-dowagers, in the district of Viseu and province of Beira, in Portugal. It contains only 260 inhabitants, which are comprehended in one parish. Lat. 40, 35, N. Long. 7, 10, W.

ALVA DES TORMES, a small town of Leon, a province of Spain, on the river Tormes or Salamania; and is the principal place of a duchy bearing the same name, which belongs to the house of Alvarez. This town lies 16 miles S. E. of Salamanca. Lat. 41, 2, N. Long. 6, 1, W.

ALVALLADE, a small place in the district of ouvidoria do Campo de Ourique and province of Alentejo, in Portugal. It contains 1200 souls; and is situated between two rivers. Lat. 38, 15, N. Long. 7, 20, W.

ALVARO, a small town in the district of Thomar, and province of Estremadura, in Portugal; containing between 1800 and 1900 souls. Lat. 38, 46, N. Long. 8, 24, E.

ALVARENGA, one of the 22 concelhos belonging longing to the district of Lamego, and province of Beira, in Portugal. It consists of two parishes.

ALVARES, a little town in the district of Thomar, and province of Estremadura, in Portugal. It contains upwards of 1200 inhabitants. Lat. 38, 36. N. Long. 8, 26, W.

ALVAYAZERE, a small town subject to the district de Coimbra, in the province of Beira, in Portugal. It has one parish containing very nearly 100 souls. Its district comprehends two parishes. Lat. 40, 27, N. Long. 6, 50, W.

ALVENSLEBEN, a bailiwick constituting one half of the lordship of Alvensleben, in the bishopric of Magdeburg, Germany. This bailiwick gave title to counts (the other half belongs to the Veltheim family); but count Albert being killed in 1253, fighting for the archbishops of Magdeburg and Halberstadt, against the margrave of Brandenburg, and his estates lost, his descendants relinquished the title of counts, and stiled themselves only lords of Alvensleben. It formerly contained three burgs; one belonging to the counts, the others to the bishop of Halberstadt and the margrave of Brandenburg, as lords paramount. The margrave Otho being taken in the battle above-mentioned, was obliged to cede his burg to the bishop of Halberstadt; whose successor, Ludolphus II. mortgaged his burgs to a margrave of Brandenburg. But in 1597 bishop Volrath, his successor, sold these estates to the see of Magdeburg; to which see, the year following, they were resigned by the margrave of Brandenburg. To this bailiwick belongs at present one-half of the burg of that name, with Mark Alvensleben, the old village of Alvensleben, Irxbeben, and Great Sanderleben.

ALVERCA, a small place belonging to the district of Torres Vedras, in Portuguese Estremadura. It contains 1200 inhabitants, and in its district is only one parish. Lat. 38, 40, N. Long. 8, 15, W.

ALVERNO (Monte de) in Latin Alvernus, a mountain in Italy, in the neighbourhood of Florence.

ALVING, ALVILTS, or BINTS, was formerly a famous seat or castle in the county of Weissenburg, belonging to Transylvania, in the kingdom of Hungary; but it has now lost much of its pristine beauty by an accidental fire.

ALVINGTON, a village in Gloucestershire, near Lidney in the forest of Dean; which was anciently one of the Roman stations, though now only a small obscure place.

ALVITO, a small town in the district of Beja, and province of Alentejo, in Portugal. It contains 2000 inhabitants, and belongs to count Barao. Lat. 37, 42, N. Long. 7, 39, W.

ALVITA (Villa nova de) or New Alvito, a small place in the district of Beja, and province of Alentejo. It has 900 inhabitants; and also belongs to count Barao. Lat. 37, 39, N. Long. 7, 28, W.

ALUNTIIUM, ALONTIUM, a town in the north of Sicily; situated on a steep eminence at the mouth of the Chydas; said to be as old as the war of Troy; now in ruins; from which arose the hamlet St. Filadelfo in the Val di Demona. The inhabitants were called Haluntini.

ALVOCO DE SERRA, a small place subject to the corregidor of Guarda, in the province of Beira, in Portugal. It contains 220 inhabitants. Lat. 40, 15, N. Long. 7, 10, W.

ALVOR, or ALBOR, a small place subject to the comarca of Faro, in the province of Algarve, an earldom in Portugal. It contains 460 inhabitants; and is situated between Villa Nova de Portimao and Lagos. Lat. 37, 1, N. Long. 8, 20, W.

ALVORNINHA. See ALBURNINHA.

ALUTA, one of the three principal rivers in Transylvania, a province of the kingdom of Hungary. Its Latin name is Oluta. This river rises at the foot of the Carpathian mountains, in the northern parts of that territory of Transylvania called Terra Sicularum; and runs through the eastern and southern parts into Walachia. On this river is situated a small city of the same name, 130 miles S. W. of Rebnick.

ALWASTRA, anciently a famous convent, but now a mere heap of ruins; situated in Wadstein-lehn, a territory belonging to East-Gothland, in Sweden. In this monastery are buried four kings of the Suercher race, with other persons of distinction.

ALWEN, a river in Denbighshire, Wales; which runs into the Dee, near Langer.

ALWOS, a well-inhabited village in the county of Comorra, on the Danube, in Lower Hungary; and is remarkable on account of an aqueduct built here, in the year 1747, by order of the royal chamber, under the direction of M. Samuel Mikomini.

ALWYE, or OLWY, a river in Monmouthshire; which runs into the Usk at Ragland-castle.

ALZEY, anciently called Alceia; the seat of the Upper Ampt-office; lying on the river Selz, in the palatinate of the Rhine, Germany. Here is a citadel, in which resides a burgrave; and here the Roman king Henry, who designed to have poisoned his father, the emperor Frederick II. lay prisoner for some time. In 1689 the town was stripped of its walls and set on fire by the French. The Calvinists, Roman Catholics, and Lutherans have each a church here. Not far from the town is a stone monument, erected in memory of the dangerous leap the elector Frederick IV. made in 1603, on horseback, over a broad ditch.

ALZYRA, or ALCIRA, a small town of Valencia, a province of Spain. It contains about 800 families; and is situated in the heart of the kingdom.

on the river Xucar. It hath a fair suburb, with two bridges over the said river. A considerable silk-trade is carried on at this place. It lies 18 miles S. of the city of Valencia. Lat. 39, 10, N. Long. 0, 20, W.

ALY, a small city of Georgia, in Asiatic-Turkey, between two hills. About six miles beyond it is a defile shut up with a wooden-gate, which separates the kingdom of Georgia from that of Imiritia. It stands 36 miles W. of Gori, and almost in the same latitude; namely, 43, 10, N. and long. 36, 40, E.

AM, a city of Armenia, in Asia; which Vincent St. Antonio says had 100,000 houses and 1000 churches. It was taken by the Tartars after a siege of 12 days.

AMACAXI, a people of Brasil, in S. America, towards the prefecture of St. Sebastian del Rio Janeiro.

AMADABAT, AMANDABAT, AMADAVER, or ARMADABAT, a large, trading, and strong city, the capital of Cambaya, a province of the Mogul, in the East-Indies. Here resides the emperor's viceroy, who has the title of rajah, or prince; he lives very splendidly, and maintains 12,000 horse and 50 elephants for the mogul's service. Amadabat is situated in a most delightful plain, watered by the rivulet Sabremetty. It has 12 gates, and is surrounded with walls built of stone and brick, and flanked with round towers 40 feet high and 15 thick, and strongly garrisoned. Including the suburbs, the city is a league and a half in length, and about seven leagues in circuit. The streets are wide, but they are not paved. That part called the Meidan, or Royal-square, where the courts of judicature are held, is 700 paces long and 400 broad, encompassed with noble arches, and planted round with palm, date, orange, and citron trees; with the emperor's palace on one side, and a castle built of free-stone on the other, and of the magnitude of a little town: and on two other sides is the grand caravanserai for lodging strangers and travellers, and one of the mogul's palaces, which is of brick, over the gate of which is a large balcony, where the country music and trumpets play morning, noon, and night. The manseldars, who command 1000 horse each, keep guard under the windows, as the omrahs do in the rooms and balconies. In the middle of the Meidan is a tall tree, on the top of which is a ball for the archers to shoot at as a mark. The mogul keeps constantly a stout garrison here for repelling the inroads of the Badures, who dwell 25 leagues off. Besides smaller mosques, here are 30 large ones; and particularly, among these is one very magnificent; also 16 pagods, one of which was converted into a mosque by Aurengzebe, who ordered a cow to be killed in the temple during the ceremony; being assured that the Gentiles would never enter it again after it had been thus polluted.

Here the Armenians, Abyssinians, and Jews have also their respective places of worship. In the town is such an intermixture of groves and gardens that afar off it looks like a forest. In the emperor's two gardens, without the walls by the river-side, are all Indian fruits to be met with; a noble summer-house, a fish-pond which the ladies use for a bathing-place, and a fine stone-bridge from one side to the other, about 400 paces. Here are many of those hospitals which are usually built and endowed by the Pagans for sick and lame birds and beasts; and numbers of apes, according to Tavernier, are also fed here, which have acquired a haunt of coming to town for that purpose, and then withdrawing. Here the English have a handsome lodge, with convenient courts, and warehouses full of the linen and cotton goods of Lahor and Deli, fine chintz, calicoes, and other Indian goods: and Thevenot says that the Dutch merchants had also a factory here, and dealt principally in painted calicoes. And Pelsart the Dutch factor says, that when he was at Amadabat, all sorts of curious Indian cloths, satins, silks, and stuffs formerly brought from China; cushions wrought with gold-wire, spikenard, assa-foetida, and other drugs, white sugar, and stuffs of Patna and Bengal, &c. were imported hither from Agra; and that from hence they exported scarves for turbans, women's head-dresses wrought with gold, velvet, satins, cocoa-nuts of Malabar, European cloth, lead, pewter, vermilion, quick-silver, and all sorts of spices bought of the Dutch at Surat; insomuch that, according to Mandlesloe, scarce any nation in the world, or any commodity of Asia or Europe, but might be seen in Amadabat. Here is a vast manufactory for silk, calicoes, gold and silver brocades. But these are slight and dear; so that the inhabitants principally use Chinese silks, which are finer and cheaper. When he was there they traded much in taffetas, carpets, sugar both powdered and candied, cummin, honey, lac, opium, borax, ginger, mirabolands, tamarinds, with other preserved fruits; also salt-petre, sal-amoniac, and indigo. They sell likewise diamonds brought from Visapour, with ambergrease and musk from Pegu, Bengal, Mofambique, and Cape Verd. Besides the English and Dutch, other European nations have also factors here. All goods exported or imported here are custom-free, only that for every waggon fifteen pence is paid to the mogul's receiver. Foreigners may export any thing, except gunpowder, lead, and salt-petre, without the governor's leave. According to Ogilbie, this is one of the four cities which the mogul honours with his court: and Mandlesloe says that it has 25 large towns, besides 2098 villages, under its jurisdiction. Here is a straight walk from the town to a village six miles off, which is planted with a double row of cocoa-trees on each side; where are vast numbers of

of apes, wild-fowl, and parrots of all sorts, the largest of which are called Indian-crows. These are all white or cream-coloured, with a tuft of carnation feathers on their crowns: this is indeed a bird very common over all India, where they do a deal of damage to the fruits and the rice. They build their nests under the eaves of houses, or in the woods, on the extremity of the top-branches. The adjacent country, which resembles a wilderness, abounds with all sort of fallow-deer, roe-bucks, wild asses, boars, hares, panthers, tame buffaloes, tigers, and elephants; and here also are crocodiles, serpents, and snakes. The water is good here; and, as they have no wines, they drink the liquor drawn from the cocoa-tree, and a sort of aqua-vitæ, better than ours, which is distilled from rice, sugar, and dates. Both in and out of the town are great numbers of cata-mountains, which are very detrimental to the fruit-trees. The panthers taken here are trained up for hunting, and sent by the viceroy to the mogul's court. Round this city the Moors have several tombs, which are more stately than their dwelling-houses. The highways in the neighbourhood are hedged on each side with a certain plant, without fruit or leaves, but which has long green stalks all the year; having a milky juice like that of green figs, but of a very corrosive quality. The fields indeed next the highway are full of tamarinds and amber-trees, bearing a fruit which resembles large olives. We are told by Tavernier that the little river here overflows the country during the four rainy months; and is not practicable by boats till the waters fall, which is between six and eight weeks. It was taken by the forces of our East-India company on Feb. 15, 1780, with the loss of only 100 men, under general Goddard. Amadabat is situated 40 miles N. E. of the city and gulph of Cambaya. Lat. 23, 0, N. Long. 72, 12, E.

AMADAN, or HAMADAN, in the province of Eyrac-Agim, or Persian-Irac. It is a large and considerable city of Persia, in Asia, at the foot of a mountain; from which rises such numbers of springs as water the whole neighbouring country; and by this means it is rendered so fruitful in corn as to supply all the adjacent parts. It also abounds with cattle, butter, cheese, hides, and tobacco. It is a stage for the caravans going to Mecca, as lying on the road to Bagdat. Though it is indeed a very large town, yet it contains many void places, gardens, and even ploughed fields within it. The houses here are low, and built only of bricks baked in the sun. It has no large street, but that where they sell stuffs, ready-made clothes, and the like. This is straight, long, and broad, and the shops in it are well-furnished. Amadan is a considerable town for trade; and in former times it was very strong. It had a handsome castle, which long since has been demolished by the Turks, who have also impaired the town very much. Here the air is extremely bad, and so is the water; and they have no wine in this place, but only brandy: though Thevenot is contradicted in this last particular by Paul Lucas, who asserts that the wine here is excellent. At Amadan are more Jews than in any other town of Persia, flocking thither in pilgrimage to visit the tombs of Esther and Mordecai, which they alledge to be there. These tombs are in the place which serves them for a synagogue. It was formerly a large building; but nothing now remains of it but the little chapel containing the tombs above-mentioned; which last are of brick, covered over with wood painted black. Amadan lies 150 miles N. W. of Ispahan, and 225 N. E. of Bagdat. Lat. 35, 11, N. Long. 47, 4, E.

ALMADANAGAR. See ANDANAGAR, AMADIA, a city of Curdistan, or Assyria, in Asiatic Turkey; situated on a high mountain, about 100 miles N. of Moussul, or Nineveh, opposite to the former, on the Tigris. Lat. 36, 25, N. Long. 43, 1, E.

AMAECK. See AMAK. AMAGOR, a town of Hea, or Haha, the most western province of all Morocco, in Africa. It was built by the natives, and contains about 800 houses, on a high and rugged mountain, surrounded with craggy rocks; has two handsome rivers, and a castle to defend it, which is strong from its natural situation. The inhabitants of the adjacent territory breed vast quantities of horses. This country was full of villages, and pretty rich, till ruined by the wars with the Christians. Lat. 34, 30, N. Long. 5, 30, W.

AMAGUANA, an island of N. America. It is one of the Lucayes, and situated near Hispaniola.

AMAK, an island joined to Copenhagen, the capital of Denmark, by Knippel's-bridge and Long-bridge; is about 6000 paces long and 2000 broad. It is quite level, and has no woods; and the soil being uncommonly fertile, it is looked upon as the garden of Copenhagen; where the inhabitants carry, twice a week, all sorts of vegetables, with milk, butter, and cheese, for sale. Christian II. by the advice of Elizabeth his queen, a native of the Netherlands, invited hither, in 1516, the ancestors of most of the inhabitants from Waterland, in North-Holland, in order to introduce gardening; and this colony was settled in the village of Magelbye, to which they gave the name of Hollanderbye, and is the name of one of the two parishes the island is divided into. The other is called Taorneby; and both are inhabited by a mixture of Danes and Hollanders, to the amount of about 800 families, who maintain themselves by navigation, fishing, and standing pilots, as well as by gardening. Their dialect being a medley of Low-Dutch, Danish, and German, their ministers preach in those languages. Their magistracy, or inferior court, consists of one bailiff, assisted by four justices. In the second court the king's prefeet, who presides over the prefecture of Copenhagen, sits as judge; and from the other court, which is the supreme college, or court of judicature, there lies no appeal. There are excellent quarries of stone for lime and building on this island. In 1288 it was burnt by Haquin king of Norway, and taken in 1568 by Gustavus king of Sweden.

AMAL, a town of West-Gothish-Daland, a subdivision of West-Gothland, in Sweden, in the northern and stony part of the province, which is very mountainous, and on the Wener-lake; the river which waters the town divides both it and the market-place into two parts. The foundation of it was laid in the year 1640. Here is a weigh-house or still-yard, and a harbour on the aforelaid lake. It carries on a good trade, especially in timber for building, deal-boards, and tar. It has recovered itself from the damages occasioned by two fires which happened in 1645 and 1675. It ranks as the 89th town in the general diet of the kingdom; and we find a good view of it in Dahlberg. Lat. 58, 50, N. Long. 12, 40, E.

AMALEKITIS, or the land of the Amalekites. The situation of the kingdom of Amalek is pretty clearly, if not self-evidently, settled, by remarking that it had intercourse and commerce with Egypt; as seems clearly from Josephus, who makes Amalekitis to extend between Pelusium and the Red-sea; and the Arabian historians represent them as even masters of Egypt; and in the xxxth chapter of the First Book of Samuel we find they left behind them an Egyptian on their return from facking Ziklag. Moreover, it is expressly said in the xxviii chapter of the First Book of Samuel that they had of old inhabited the land, even unto the land of Egypt. It is apparent too they had a way leading into Palestine and into the land of Canaan, by the expedition against Ziklag. Whence it is concluded their country was bounded by Canaan N. Egypt or its dependent country S. Edom E. and the deserts towards the sea W. or perhaps by the sea itself. The Arabians indeed fix for them on the country about Mecca, whence they were expelled by the Jorhamite kings. The same people make Amalek to have been some generations before Abraham himself, and but the fifth in descent from Noah. It is indeed said in the xivth chapter of Genesis, that when Chedorlaomer, king of Elam, &c. smote the Rephaims, Zuzims, Ezims, and Horites, they smote also the country of the Amalekites. Now therefore, being assured by scripture that Amalek was the grandson of Esau, and consequently that there could be no such people in the days of Abraham, the meaning must be, they smote in those days the country, (in after-time, when Moses wrote) called the land of the Amalekites.

AMALFI, AMALFIS, or AMALFA, anciently a city of the Picentini, but now a small ill-inhabited place, in the Hither principate of Naples, in Lower Italy, on the sea and bay of Salerno, the W. part of which is called La Costa d'Amolfi. Some say that it was built in the year 600; however, it was formerly very considerable and potent, having been the seat of a republic, which maintained its freedom till the year 1075. It has the title of a principality, belonging to the house of Piccolomini; and is the see of an archbishop, under whom are the bishops of Scala, Minori, Lettere, and the island of Capri. Here Flavius Blendus, or Gicia, was born, who, it is said, first discovered the mariner's compass, about the year 1300; and here are preserved also the pretended reliques of the apostle St. Andrew. It lies 10 miles W. of the city of Salerno. Lat. 40, 35, N. Long. 15, 20, E.

AMALIE, or AMELIAS, an island in the province of Georgia, in N. America; 7 leagues N. of St. Augustin. It is scarce 2 miles broad, but about 13 long; extending to the southern mouth of the great river Alatomha, the present southern boundary of the colony of Georgia, and within a league of St. John's-river, which is about 5 leagues from St. Augustin. Lat. 30, 1, N. Long. 80, 26, W.

AMANA, a mountain of Cilicia, in Asia. It is thought to be that mentioned by Solomon in the Canticles.

AMANA, one of the Bahama-islands, in N. America.

AMANA, a town of Lorrain, 7 miles N. of Nancy, and 28 S. of Metz. Lat. 48, 45, N. Long. 25, 48, E.

AMANCE, an open place, but formerly fortified, in the bailiwick of Nancy; belonging to the duchy of Lorrain, which, with Bar, is now one of the French governments. It is the seat of a prévôt or castellan, and lies 7 miles N. E. of Nancy. Lat. 48, 40, N. Long. 6, 10, E.

AMANCE, a small place, which Busching places in the bailiwick of Amont, or Gray; belonging to the government of Franche-comté, in France.

AMANCIE-PYLÆ, AMANIDES-PYLÆ, AMANI-PORTÆ, straits or defiles in mount Amanus; through which Darius entered Cilicia, at a greater distance from the sea than the Pylæ Ciliciæ or Syriæ, through which Alexander passed.

AMAND (St.) in Latin Amandopolis, oppidum, or fanum Sancti Amandi in Pabula, small town in French-Flanders, on the Scarpe; and anciently belonged to the Tournaisis, or castellany of Tournay; but, by the peace of Utrecht in 1713, it has been annexed to that of Orchies, and thereby came to that of France. Here is a famous abbey of the Benedictine order, and dedicated to a saint of the same name with that of the city, who is said to have founded it. The annual revenue of this abbey abbey amounts to 100,000 livres; and the abbot is also lord of the place. Not far from St. Armand is a mineral spring, the water of which is very clear and insipid; but said to be good for curing the gravel, and removing obstructions. It lies 6 miles N. W. of Valenciennes, 9 S. of Tournay, and was taken and dismantled by the French in the year 1676. Lat. 50, 35, N. Long. 3, 30, E.

AMAND (St.) a small town belonging to the government of Bourbonnois, in France, on the river Cher, 25 miles S. of Bourges. Lat. 46, 40, N. Long. 2, 35, E.

AMAND (St.) a little town belonging to the small territory of Puifaye and government of Orleansois, in France. Lat. 46, 10, N. Long. 0, 3, E.

AMANT (St.) a small town of Lower Auvergne, belonging to the government of the same name, in France. Lat. 45, 5, N. Long. 3, 20, E.

AMANTEA, AMANTIA, or ADAMANTIA, a small town and see of a bishop namely, that of Reggio, in the Hither Calabria, a province of Naples, in Lower Italy, on the S. W. coast of the Tuscan-sea, near the gulph of S. Euphemia. It was an ancient city of the Brutii; lies 20 miles S. W. of Cosenza, and belongs to the prince of Bisignano. Lat. 39, 15, N. Lon. 16, 20, E.

AMANUS, a mountain of Syria, separating it from Cilicia; a branch of mount Taurus; extending chiefly eastward, from the sea of Cilicia to the Euphrates: now called Monte Negro, or rather Montagna Neres, by the inhabitants; that is, the Watery Mountain, as abounding in springs and rivulets.

ALMANZIRIFDIN, the principal city of the kingdom of Oman, in Arabia Felix, a province of Asiatic Turkey, in the very heart of it, and about 200 miles N. from Fartach and the Arabian-gulph. Lat. 20, 10, N. Long. 41, 10, E.

AMAPALLA, a city and port of Guatemala Proper, and New-Spain or Mexico, in N. America, on a fine bay, to the E. of St. Michael's, and 235 miles S. E. of Guatemala. It carries on a brisk trade in cochineal, cocoa, hides, Indigo, &c. The bay, Dampier says, is a large arm of the sea, which runs about 10 leagues in land, and full of islands, as fine as those of Panama, but all desert. Lat. 12, 30, N. Long. 93, 20, W.

AMARA, or AMHARA, a small kingdom of Africa, W. of that of Angot, bounded by Bagemder on the N. by Oleca on the S. and by Goyama on the W. from which it is separated by the Nile. It has some celebrated mountains (See AFRICA). It is but a small and narrow kingdom, and under the dominion of the Abyssinian monarchs; yet it is divided into 36 districts, of which we know only the names, and therefore omit them. In this country they speak a distinct dialect from all the rest; but which, by a new line of monarchs, is now become the language of the court, and the most in vogue among the great as well as the politer part of the people. Here are but few towns, none of which have any thing worth notice.

AMARANTE, a town within the district of Guimaraens in Entre Douro e Minho, a province of Portugal, on the river Douro, with the rivulet of Locia running through the middle of it. Here is only one parish, which contains 1100 inhabitants, with a monastery and hospital. In this town is a linen manufactory. Lat. 41, 10, N. Long. 7, 52, W.

AMAREINS, a small place belonging to the castellany of Castleward of Toissey, and principality of Dombes, in the government of Burgundy, in France. Lat. 47, 5, N. Long. 4, 56, E.

AMARIA, a castle in the territory of Rettims, one of the four districts of the inland of Candia in the Mediterranean, in the middle of the country. Lat. 35, 25, N. Long. 25, 30, E.

AMARIN, or DAMARIN, (St.) a small town belonging to Murbach, a princely ecclesiastical foundation of the empire, in Upper Alsace, and government of the same name. It is the seat of a supreme bailiwick. Of the old castle, or fortress, of Fredericksburg, in its neighbourhood, only one tower is now standing. Near the village of Urbis is a pass that leads into Lorraine. Lat. 48, 30, N. Long. 7, 34, E.

AMASIA, one of the four parts or governments of Asia Minor, or Natolia, and its northern division lying on the S. shore of the Euxine sea, in Asiatic Turkey, which consequently is its boundary to the N. It has Armenia on the E. Anatolia Proper on the W. and Caramania and Anadolua on the S. It is subdivided into 3 different districts, or provinces, as anciently, that is, Pontus Galaticus, Pontus Polemoniatus, and Pontus Cappadociæ. See each under its proper article. Amasia hath a particular begleberg, or Turkish viceroy, whose residence is in the metropolis of this whole province, bearing the same name with it. And here it is to be observed, that the whole Regio Pontica, so called from Pontus, i. e. any kind of sea, is yet applied by ancient geographers more particularly to some seas, as Negropont, Hellespont, Pontus Euxinus, &c. and this last emphatically Pont Pontus, and Pontica Regio, from that very sea on whose southern coast it is situated. Formerly it extended quite from the river Halys to Colchis; that is, to the utmost southern verge of the Euxine towards the east. Pliny and Ptolemy added Cappadocia to it; but Strabo divided them, because those 2 kingdoms were naturally separated by a long ridge of high mountains; and Pontus belonged to Mithridates, and the other to Ariarethes. The former was indeed at first confined to much narrower bounds, and only spread itself wider by degrees to the Halys and Colchis.

A M

The Romans, after becoming masters of it, made several divisions in it; and the Notitiæ Episcopales divided it only into 2 provinces, namely, the Pontus Bithyniæ, and Pontus Polemoniæ, extending these to the province of Anatolia Propria.

AMASIA, AMASIS, or AMASÆA, and by the Turks AMNASAN, the capital of Pontus Galaticus, one of the three subdivisions of the province of the same name above mentioned. It is situated on the declivity of an eminence, a league distant from the banks of the Iris, now Cafalmach, a canal, according to Tavernier; being thus far cut through a hard rock, which conveys the water from it into the city. The said river, that falls about 60 miles below the town into the Euxine sea, is navigable for ships of large burthen, that can come up even to the city. Over it is a wooden bridge, but so narrow that only three men can go a-breast. The city is large, and from its noble ruins seems to have formerly made a better figure than it does at present; neither is its commerce considerable, notwithstanding its vicinity to so fine a river and to the sea; so that in the town are only two caravanseras, and those ordinary and mean, in comparison of some to be seen in this country. The other buildings here are not much better. High mountains surround the city, except towards the south, where it has the prospect of a beautiful champaign country. Upon one of these mountains stands the citadel, which is strong both by art and nature, but without any water, except what is saved from the clouds in a cistern: yet about the middle of the mountain is an excellent spring, and in its neighbourhood several chambers cut into the rock, where some dervises reside. This city is famed for being the residence of several of the presumptive heirs before they came to the Ottoman throne. Mustapha, the son of Mahomed II. commanded here in person, when Jusufge, general of Usuncasanes, king of Persia, took and plundered Tocat in the year 1472; after which the young prince pursuing the Persian general, defeated him in Caramania. Here Selim I. emperor of the Turks, was born, who affected to be stiled Amasi. Several other persons of eminence had also their birth here, particularly Strabo, the famous ancient geographer and historian. It was formerly the seat of the kings of Cappadocia, and still exhibits no small number of ruins of magnificent structures, that plainly indicate its ancient opulence. It was also an archiepiscopal see very early, and became celebrated for some eminent persons who suffered martyrdom in it, particularly its worthy metropolitan in the persecution raised by Licinius in the year 319. Signior d'Adda, nuncio in England to king James II. was archbishop of Amasia, and in 1689 made a cardinal by Innocent XI. It stands about 50 miles N. W. of Tocat, and near 20 miles north of the high road for the caravan that goes from Smyrna into Persia. Lat. 42, 26, N. Long. 36, 10, E.

AMASTRIS, now AMASTRE, or AMASTRO, a sea-port town of Paphlagonia (with Pontus included therein) one of the three parts of Galatia, in the province of Anatolia Proper, belonging to Asiatic Turkey, at the mouth of the river Parthenius, and was formerly a place of great strength, having been built by the famous queen of the same name, who invited the inhabitants of the four little towns of Sefanne, Cytore, Cromna, and Tio, to come and live in it. It was very advantageously situated on the isthmus of a peninsula, so that the creeks on each side made a commodious harbour for large ships. It became a famous sea-port under the Roman and Greek emperors, and thence became subject to those of Trebizonde; from them it passed to the Genoese, who having declared war against Mahomed II. on account of his seizing Constantinople and Pera, the emperor came with such a powerful army that the terrified inhabitants opened their gates to him. This prince left but one third of them in it, transporting the rest to Constantinople, since which time Amastris has dwindled to a poor, mean town, the two harbours having been long ago choked up with sand; so that nothing remains now of its ancient splendour but some ruins. It stands about 60 miles almost E. of Eregli. Lat. 41, 20, N. Long. 32, 53, E.

AMASUS, SEMESO, now AMID, stands at the bottom of a small gulph on the Euxine-sea, east of the mouth of the Cafalmach.

AMATHUS, a town, from which, as well as Venus being worshipped in it, the island of Cyprus, one of the largest in all Asia Minor, was stiled Amathunta, on the S. E. coast of that island; and, like the city of Paphos, was consecrated to that goddess, who had a stately temple here. The inhabitants having, according to the poets, taken it into their heads to sacrifice strangers to her, she was so exasperated as to turn the men into bulls, that they might serve also for victims; and the women she stripped of all natural modesty, that they prostituted themselves to their customers in the most scandalous and public manner. After this city had embraced Christianity, it was made an episcopal see; and Heliodorus, one of its prelates, is mentioned in the council of Chalcedon. However, so little is now left of either the city or temple that our modern geographers hardly know where to place it; some taking the present site of the town of Limisso, or Lissaf, for that of the old one, and others affirming that it stood above 7 miles distant from it.

AMATICUE, in Latin Amaticueus, a river of New Spain, in North America. It empties itself into the Pacific-ocean, on the confines of the province of Guazecca.

AMATRICE. See LEONESSA.

AMATO, in Latin Amatius and Lametus, a river of Calabria, in Italy. It rises in the Appennines, and discharges itself into the Mediterranean, near the town of St. Euphemia.

AMATIQUE, a sea-port town at the mouth of the river Guanaos, that runs into a Lagune, which empties itself into the gulph of Honduras, in the province of Vera Paz, in Mexico, or New Spain. The inhabitants are chiefly logwood-cutters; and on the south of the gulph is a tract of land, called Amatique Land. Long. 89. Lat. 15, 23.

AMAYA, a village of Old Castile, in Spain. It is situated at the foot of a very high rock; and Roderick I. count of Castile, formerly resided there, and held his court.

AMAXIA, an ancient city of Troas, in Asia, memorable for the altar consecrated by Agamemnon to the 12 gods. Also a city of Cilicia, abounding with timber for shipping, which Marc Antony gave to Cleopatra.

AMAZONS, (the river of) called by the Spaniards Maranon, is the greatest river in the world. It received the name of Amazons, because the Spaniards who first passed through the country on its banks, having some smart skirmishes with the natives, and afterwards examining the slain, found the bodies of some women among them. Orellana was the first who discovered this river, about the year 1539. The Maranon, after issuing from the lake from whence it takes its rise, in about 11 degrees of south latitude, runs towards the north to Jaen de Bracamoros, for the length of 6 degrees, from whence it directs its course towards the east, almost parallel to the equinoctial line, as far as the north cape, where it discharges itself into the ocean directly under the equator, by a mouth 50 or 60 leagues broad. It runs from Jaen, where it begins to be navigable, 30 degrees of longitude, according to Condamine, who was sent into these parts by the French king to discover the true measure of the earth. This is equal to 1800 miles of 60 to a degree: but if the turnings and windings are reckoned, it will then be at least 2700 miles. It receives from the north and south a prodigious number of rivers, some of which run 1400 miles, and are not inferior to the Danube or Nile. The country through which this river runs is very little known to the Europeans. The communication of the Oronoque and the Amazon recently attested, may pass for a kind of discovery in geography, as the connexion of these two rivers, though marked, without any doubt, in ancient maps, hath been universally suppressed by modern geographers in the new, and treated as chimerical. It is in this island, the greatest in the known world, formed by the Oronoque and the Amazon, connected by the Black river, and which may be called the Mesopotamia of the New World, have been long sought a pretended golden lake of Parima, and an imaginary city of Manoa del Dorado: a search which hath cost the lives of so many men, and among the rest Sir Walter Raleigh, a famous navigator, and one of the finest geniuses of England, whose tragical history is sufficiently known.

AMAZONS, a nation of female warriors, whose existence has been esteemed merely fabulous by Strabo, Arrian, Palephates, and some of the moderns; while others maintain that their existence is sufficiently proved by the testimony of such of the historians of antiquity as are most worthy of credit, by the monuments which many of them have mentioned, and by medals, some of which are still remaining; and that there is not the least room to believe that what is said of them is fabulous. The Scythians had a great part of Asia under their dominion upwards of 400 years, till they were conquered by Ninus, the founder of the Assyrian empire. After his death, which happened about 1150 years before the Christian era, and that of Semiramis and their son Ninias, Ilinus and Scolopites, princes of the royal blood of Scythia, were driven from their country by other princes, who like them aspired to the crown. They departed with their wives, children, and friends; and being followed by a great number of young people of both sexes, they passed into Asiatic Sarmatia, beyond Mount Camassus, where they formed an establishment, supplying themselves with the riches they wanted by making excursions into the countries bordering on the Euxine sea. The people of those countries, exasperated by the incursions of their new neighbours, united, surprised, and massacred the men. The women then resolving to revenge their death, and at the same time to provide for their own security, resolved to form a new kind of government, to choose a queen, enact laws, and maintain themselves, without men, even against the men themselves. This design was not so very surprising as at first sight appears; for the greatest number of the girls among the Scythians had been inured to the same exercises as the boys; to draw the bow, to throw the javelin, to manage other arms; to riding, hunting, and even the painful labours that seem reserved for men; and many of them, as among the Sarmatians, accompanied the men in war. Hence they had no sooner formed their resolution than they prepared to execute it, and exercised themselves in all military operations. They soon secured the peaceable possession of the country; and, not content with shewing their neighbours that all their efforts to drive them thence or to subdue them were ineffectual, they made war upon them, and extended their own frontiers. They had hitherto made use of the instructions and assistance of a few men that remained in the country; but finding at length that they could stand their ground, and aggrandise themselves, without them, they killed all those whom flight or chance had saved from the fury of the Sarmatians; and for ever renounced marriage, which they now considered as an insupportable slavery: but as they could only secure the duration of their new kingdom by propagation, they made a law to go every year to the frontiers, to invite the men to come to them, to deliver themselves up to their embraces, without choice on their part, or the least attachment; and to leave them as soon as they were pregnant. All those whom age rendered fit for propagation, and were willing to serve the state by breeding girls, did not go at the same time in search of men; for, in order to obtain right to promote the multiplication of the species, they must first have contributed to its destruction; nor was any thought worthy of giving birth to children till she had killed three men. If from this commerce they brought forth girls, they educated them; but, with respect to the boys, if we may believe Justin, they strangled them at the moment of their birth: according to Diodorus Siculus, they twisted their legs and arms, so as to render them unfit for military exercises; but Quintus Curtius, Philostrates, and Jordanus, say, that the less savage sent them to their fathers. It is probable, that at first, when their fury against the men was carried to the greatest height, they killed the boys: that when this fury abated, and most of the mothers were filled with horror at depriving the little creatures of the lives they had just received from them, they fulfilled the first duties of a mother; but, to prevent their causing a revolution in the state, maimed them in such a manner as to render them incapable of war, and employed them in the mean offices which these warlike women thought beneath them; in short, that, when their conquests had confirmed their power, their ferocity subsiding, they entered into political engagements with their neighbours; and the number of the males they had preserved becoming burthensome, they, at the desire of them who rendered them pregnant, sent them the boys, and continued still to keep the girls. As soon as the age of the girls permitted, they took away the right breast, that they might draw the bow with the greater force. The common opinion is, that they burnt that breast, by applying to it, at eight years of age, hot iron, which insensibly dried up the fibres and glands: some think that they did not make use of so much ceremony, but that when the part was formed they got rid of it by amputation: some, again, with much greater probability, assert, that they employed no violent measures; but, by a continual compression of that part from infancy, prevented its growth, at least so far as to hinder its ever being incommodious in war.

The Amazons were commonly clothed in the skins of the beasts they killed in hunting, which were tied on the left shoulder, and, leaving the right side uncovered, fell down to their knees. In war the queens and other chiefs carried a corselet, or light armour for the body, formed of small pieces of iron, in the manner of leaves or scales, fastened by a girdle, below which the coat of arms hung to the knee. The head was armed with a helmet and plume of feathers. The rest of their arms were a bow and arrows, lances, javelins, a battle-axe (said to be invented by Penthesilea, one of their queens), and buckler nearly in the form of a crescent, about a foot and a half in diameter, with the points upward. Thalestris appeared before Alexander with two lances in her hand, though she only came to make him a gallant request. Those who accompanied her bore battle-axes with two edges, the handles of which were as long as the wood of a javelin. They are said to have made great conquests, and to have obtained very extensive dominions, particularly Crimea and Circassia; and to have rendered Iberias, Colchis, and Albania, tributary to them. They enjoyed their power for several centuries; but an expedition into Greece, and into the island of Achilles, is said to have ruined their empire.

AMBA. The Abyssinians give names to each of their rocks, as Amba-Dorho, the rock of a hen, &c. Some of these rocks are said to have the name of Aorni; and are of such a stupendous height that the Alps and Pyrenees are but low hills in comparison of them. Amongst the mountains, and even frequently in the plains, of this country, arise steep and craggy rocks of various forms, some resembling towers, others pyramids, &c. so perpendicular, and smooth on the sides, that they seem to be works of art inasmuch that men, cattle, &c. are craned up by the help of ladders and ropes; and yet the tops of these rocks are covered with woods, meadows, fountains, fish-ponds, &c. which very copiously supplies the animals seated thereon with all the conveniences of life. The most remarkable of these rocks is called Amba-Geshen. It is prodigiously steep, in the form of a castle built of free-stone, and almost impregnable. Its summit is about half a Portuguese league in breadth, and the circumference at the bottom about half a day's journey. The ascent at first is easy; but grows afterwards so steep that the Abassine oxen, which will clamber like goats, must be craned up, and let down with ropes. Here the princes of the blood were formerly confined, in low cottages amongst shrubs and wild cedars, with an allowance barely sufficient to keep them alive. There is, according to Kircher, in this country, a rock so curiously hollowed by nature, that at a distance it resembles a looking-glass; glass; and opposite to this another, on the top of which nothing can be so softly whispered but it may be heard a great way off. Between many of these rocks and mountains are vast abysses, which appear very dreadful to the eye.

AMBAMARJAM, or AMBARA, the capital of Upper Æthiopia, or Abyssinia, on a lake, from which the Nile is supposed to rise. Lat. 13, 12, N. Long. 35, 14, E.

AMBARRES, in Latin Ambarri, a people of ancient Gaul, mentioned by Cæsar in his Commentaries. They seem to have inhabited the diocese of Mâcon and Charolois, in Burgundy.

AMBAR, or AMMER, in Latin Ambra or Amber, a considerable river of Bavaria, in Germany; which, rising in the S. W. part of this circle, about two leagues from Fuxen, on the confines of Tyrol, forms a small lake called Ammer-see, and then flows N. N. E. by Landsperg and Dachau, to Nofburg; at which place, or a little above Landshut, it unites with the Iser.

AMBER, a river in Denbighshire, Wales; which runs into the Darwan, near Chrich-chafe.

AMBERG-MOUNTAIN, in East-Göthland, a province of Sweden, two miles from Wadstena, and is so high, that from its uppermost peak one may reckon nearly 50 churches in the adjacent country. About the middle of it is a flat stone, under which a king is said to be buried.

AMBERG, in Latin Amberga, is, according to La Forest, the Cantebis of the ancients; and the capital of the Armalaufii. It is now the metropolis of the Upper or Bavarian palatinate, and situated on the little river Wills or lfs. It was built about the year 1297, and walled round in 1326. Formerly it was subject to the dukes of Suabia, and given or sold by them to the house of Bavaria, to whom it is now subject. This town has considerable privileges, which were granted it by the emperor Robert. It lies conveniently for traffic, being almost in the center between Ratisbon, Ingolstadt, and Nuremberg. Its greatest trade arises from the iron-mines, and its manufactures, which are sent down the Nabe to Ratisbon and other cities. Its principal ornaments are the castle, armoury, and electoral palace, being handsome structures. It is so well fortified that it is reckoned one of the strongest towns in Upper Germany. In 1703 the Imperialists took it from the elector, who was put under the ban of the empire for taking part with France in the war then carrying on against the emperor Leopold and his confederates. In the war of 1743, between the late elector, namely, the emperor Charles VII. and the queen of Hungary, Amberg, together with all the Upper palatinate, was taken by the Austrians, &c. in the service of the said queen. It lies 30 miles N. of Ratisbon. Lat. 49, 25, N. Long. 12, 4, E.

AMBERLEY, a village in Sussex, England, 4 miles from Arundel, 12 from Chichester, and 51 from London; is a great thoroughfare from London to the former place, and stands on the river Arun.

AMBERT, in Latin Amberta, a town of Lower Auvergne, in France, and the principal place of the little territory of Livradois. It belongs to the marquis of Roche Baron, who is of the house of Rochefoucault. Ambert is considerable for its trade, especially for its manufactory of paper and camblets.

AMBIAN, in Latin Ambianum, a kingdom and town of Æthiopia, near the lake of Zaffian. It lies between the kingdoms of Bagmid and Qqara.

AMBIANCUTIVA, a kingdom and town of Æthiopia; situated on the Nile, betwixt Nubia and the kingdom of Bagamedri.

AMBIATINUM, a town of Germany, near Coblenz; where the emperor Caligula was born.

AMBIBANI, a people of the ancient Gauls, mentioned by Cæsar; supposed to be the same with that of Avranche, in Normandy; and the town of Ambie still retains the name.

AMBLESIDE, in Latin Amboglanna, a market-town in Westmoreland, at the upper end of the Winander Meer, 250 miles from London. It has been formerly a large city, and a station of the Romans, many of whose coins and medals have been found here. It is noted for a considerable manufactory in cloth, and a beautiful cascade near it; its market, on Wednesday, is well-stored with provisions. It has two fairs, Wednesday after Whitsunday and October 29.

AMBLETUSE, in Latin Ambletosa, a small town in the province of Picardy, France, on the English Channel; and has its own governor: it is also a free port. Lewis XIV. intended to have made a harbour in the road off Ambletuse, in which frigates of between 36 and 40 guns might lie; but this scheme has not hitherto been brought to bear, though it would not be difficult to put it in execution. The port here is pretty good for middling vessels. Since the aforesaid design of cleaning the harbour has been on foot, several houses and inns have been built here, and some fortifications raised. The harbour is defended by a large tower, on which is a battery of great guns, with a garrison in it. In December 1688 landed at this place king James II. with the duke of Berwick, and a few other attendants, in his escape or flight from England, after abdicating the crown. It lies 5 miles N. of Boulogne. Lat. 49, 40, N. Long. 1, 30, E.

AMBOGES. See CAMARONES.

AMBOISE, in Latin Ambasia, or Castrum Ambaciacum, a town belonging to the government of Touraine, in France, near the conflux of the rivers Amasse and Loire, over the latter of which there is here a fine stone-bridge. It lies between Tours and Blois, about 5 leagues or 15 miles distant from each.

each. Here is a spacious castle built on a high rock, in which king Charles VIII. was born, anno 1470; and where he also ended his life in 1498, either by running against a door, or was killed, as others will have it, by a cannon-ball as he lay asleep. Here are likewise to be seen the statues of Charles VIII. and his queen Anna; a very large pair of stag's horns, 10 feet high, and 8 broad from the tip of one horn to the other; but these are not natural horns, but made of wood; besides other curiosities. In this castle Lewis XI. instituted the order of St. Michael in 1469; and in it also is a chapter. What has rendered this place still more famous is a cruel execution which was done here in 1560; 1200, most of them persons of quality and rank, having been hanged, drowned, or beheaded, whilst the young king, Francis II. his mother, namely, Catherine de Medicis, and two brothers, with most of the ladies of the court, beheld this tragical scene from the balcony of the castle. Amboise is the seat of an election, a royal tribunal, salt-magazine, forest-court, marshalsea, &c. It contains two parishes, the one for the gentry, freeholders, officers, foreigners, and all their attendants; but the foreigners are admitted for a year only; after which, if they be not gentlemen, freeholders, or officers, they must remove to the other parish, which is for the burghers, or common people. It has four convents and an hospital. In this place first began the civil or Protestant wars of France in 1561, and gave rise to the name of Huguenots. Within the city is an island, where Clovis and Alaric came to an interview. Lat. 47, 25, N. Long. 1, 30, E.

AMBOSIA, a large and populous village in the kingdom of Portugal, on the road from Lisbon to Oporto, about a day's journey from the former city.

AMBOULE, a very fertile valley towards the eastern part of the island of Madagascar, on the African coast, N. of the province of Carcanossi. It yields great store of oil and sesamum, has mines of iron and steel, and abounds in excellent pasturage, which renders the beef of that island very fat and palatable. In the neighbourhood is a hot well, good against cold distempers of the limbs, and about four fathom from a small river, the gravel of which is so hot, that there is no treading upon it, though the water be very cold. The natives are governed by a voadziri, or black prince. It contains about 3000 men; but very wicked, the place being an asylum for all vagabonds.

AMBOYNA, one of the Molucca-islands in the East-Indies. It is commodiously situated about 100 miles W. and by N. of the Banda-islands, lying between these last and the Moluccas; and is remarkable for being the center of the commerce for nutmegs and cloves, which is entirely monopolised by the Dutch East-India company. It is about 24 leagues in circumference. The air is but indifferent; and infects the body with a scrophulous disorder, not unlike the French-pox, except its not being so painful, and not corroding the bones. This disorder is said to be easily cured in the first stage; but very difficult, if allowed to proceed to any height. The island is fertile in millet, tobacco, sugar, cocoa, potatoes, oranges, lemons, citrons, &c. Here is likewise the sago tree, a kind of palm, of the pith of which they make bread, and by cutting off one of the branches near the top the sap will flow out: this juice is very sweet, and will ferment into a sort of wine. A bitter root, called oubat, is made use of to prevent it from turning, otherwise it would soon grow sour as vinegar. Some trees will yield 30 quarts in 24 hours. The men wear large whiskers, and but little hair upon their chin; and have only a slight piece of stuff wrapt round their middle. The women tie their hair in knots; the maids are bought of their fathers before they are married; and if the wife proves barren the marriage is dissolved. Some of the natives are Mahometans, and some Christians: but they are all said to be lazy, deceitful, and treacherous; and will rather die than leave their ancient customs. They make war with small swift vessels, in shape like dragons with regard to the head and tail. Their houses are built of bamboo-canes and sago-trees. They sleep on mats. Their weapons are bows, and arrows, javelins, scymitars, and targets. They have likewise trunks, out of which they shoot poisoned arrows. The women are very amorous; and if they are deceived by their gallants, they give them a slow poison, which causes them to linger a great while before they die. The inhabitants dealt fairly with our traders in their first voyages; but as soon as the Dutch got footing, they treated us with their usual insolence. The principal town has to the W. of it a very fair bay, where is safe anchorage, and good shelter for ships; and it enters deep into the country, so as to divide the island almost into two parts. In this island are several very good villages. Amboyna was first discovered by the Portuguese, who built a fort upon it, which was taken from them by the Dutch in 1605. They did not, however, become masters of the whole island at once. The English had here five factories, which lived under the protection of the Dutch castle; holding themselves safe, in respect of the friendship between the two nations. Great differences had arisen between the Dutch and English colonists in this part of the world; till at last, the English East-India company applying to king James, a treaty was concluded in 1619, by which the concerns both of the English and Dutch were regulated, and certain measures agreed upon for preventing future disputes. This was an additional security to the English; and by virtue of the treaty they they continued two years in Amboyna trading with the Dutch. During this time, however, several differences happened; which occasioning mutual discontents, the complaints were sent to Jacatra, in the island of Java Major, to the council of defence of both nations there residing: but they not agreeing, a state of the case was sent over to Europe, to be decided by the East-India companies of both nations; or, in case they should not agree, by the king of England and the states of Holland, according to an article in the treaty of 1619. But before these disputes could be decided in a legal way, the Dutch at Amboyna thought proper to invent a report of a plot intended by the English to surprise the Dutch fort, and destroy them. By this transaction the clove-trade fell entirely into the hands of the Dutch; and the more effectually to preserve it, the company takes care to have all the clove-trees in the adjacent islands grubbed up. Sometimes also, when the harvest is very large, part of the produce of Amboyna itself is burnt. To prevent the rearing of cloves in any of the neighbouring islands, or the inhabitants from selling them to strangers, the governor of Amboyna makes the tour of his government with a fleet of curricuries, consisting sometimes of 20, and at others of 30, 40, or 50 sail. This expedition is made with all the pomp imaginable, in order to gratify the pride and folly of the Indian chiefs. The true reason of their taking all this pains is, because experience has shewn that no contracts, however solemn, can prevent the inhabitants of those islands from selling their spice to strangers; and even now, frauds are so frequently practised by the Dutch themselves, though the company is inexorable in punishing them, that the common people call the cloves galken-kruid, that is, the gallows-spice. Besides the cloves, coffee is also cultivated here by the Dutch, and a gold mine has been lately found out. This was discovered by the quantities of gold-dust that were washed from some mountains by the torrents. Here also grows a kind of red-wood, which, besides the beauty of its colour, is exceedingly firm and durable; and, which is still more remarkable, its grain is naturally embellished with abundance of beautiful figures. Of this wood they make tables, chairs, escrutoires, &c. for the principal persons in the government, and the rest is sold all over the Indies at a very extravagant rate. Amboyna is divided into two parts, viz. a greater and lesser peninsula. The former, called Hiton, is 12 leagues in length, and 2 and a half broad. In this the Dutch have no less than 5 forts, or rather strong redoubts, mounted with cannon. The other is called Leytimor, 5 leagues in length, and one and a half broad, which is the southern part of the island; on this stands the fort of Victoria, which is the residence of the governor and his council, composed of 15 gentlemen or merchants. The fortress is a square, the ramparts mounted with 60 pieces of brass cannon, and the garrison usually composed of 600 men. It is so strong by nature and art as to be in a manner impregnable; and so effectually does it command the harbour, that no vessel could come in or go out without being sunk by the cannon, if the governor chose. The inhabitants of Amboyna are computed at 70,000 or 80,000, of whom but a small number are Dutch; and this obliges them to be continually upon their guard, and to keep a competent number of troops in each of their forts, particularly in that of Middleburgh, which stands upon the isthmus that connects these peninsulas. This island is reckoned the best settlement in the East-Indies, next to Batavia. It has been taken and re-taken several times by the Dutch, Portuguese, and Spaniards. In this island are many high and steep mountains, with springs of fresh-water; and in the valleys are fine walks made by rows of trees. The inhabitants who live on the hills have not yet submitted to the Dutch. The weapons of this and the neighbouring islands are nearly alike. Their houses are built low, as the country is subject to earthquakes. A Dutch folio was printed here in 1705, with copper-plates representing the natural curiosities of this island. We are told by captain Hamilton that no less than 50 Dutch Protestant churches are to be met with in Amboyna; the converts having increased vastly since the education of some Ambonese youth in the universities of Holland, and their return hither with church-orders. Lat. 3, 40, S. Long. 126, E.

AMBRACIA, anciently a city of Epirus, in European Turkey, which gave its name to the neighbouring gulph; about a day's journey from Arta, or l'Arta, and still called by the country-people Ambrakia, though now only a village, about a mile from the sea, just at the bottom of the bay. King Pyrrhus kept his court in this place, and Augustus called it Nicopolis after his naval victory over Marc Antony. Here is a kane, which serves as a warehouse for lodging the merchandise brought hither.

AMBRACIAN-GULPH, situated between the islands of Corcyra and Cephalonia. Into this gulph sailed Marc Antony's fleet just before the battle of Actium.

AMBRAS, AMRAS, or OMBRA, a town of Tyrol, in Austria, with a pleasant and strong castle or fort of the same name; so called from the design of it, which was a shady summer-house. The latter is delightfully situated, at the end of a fine park overlooking the Jun. The apartments have now little more left than the bare walls; though formerly they were fitted up with sumptuous furniture for the archdukes of Austria, who used to spend their summers here, as they did their winters at Inspruck.

Innsbruck. It is adorned with such a vast variety of statues, medals, &c. that in 1601 a large book was printed, giving an account of them. To pass over the immense treasure here in gold and precious stones; the several princes ranged on horseback, in all their rich old tilting accoutrements, and a variety of other remarkable things, we cannot omit the armour of Charles IX. king of France, and the statue of Francis I. on horseback, in plaster, exactly representing him in his armour, and his horse in his trappings, just as he was taken at the battle of Pavia; likewise the armour of several emperors, kings, and princes, with the picture of each drawn to the life, just by it. In short, here are abundance of spoils and trophies, taken in some of the most important victories obtained by the house of Austria for 2 or 300 years past; particularly the effigies of two Turkish bashaws on horseback, with the costly habits and harness in which they were taken, embellished with gold, silver, and precious stones. Among the collection of rarities is the trunk of an oak, inclosing the entire body of a deer, which is supposed to have perished in the snow, and upon a thaw being brought down by a torrent from the neighbouring hills, and covered with mud, was first inclosed by the roots, which, as the tree grew, forced it by degrees up into the trunk. Noah's rainbow is so admirably painted on one of the ceilings that the great duke of Tuscany offered 100,000 crowns for it. Here is also a good library, and a gallery full of busts. The chatellan, or keeper of this castle, who is generally some invalid, comes purposely from Innsbruck to shew the apartments to strangers; at which time he is always attended with a strong guard, and expects a suitable recompence for his trouble. This castle was once a seat of the counts bearing the same name, and is now subject to the emperor. A little way from the town, on its S. side, is the famous monastery of Wilheim; which see. Ambras stands about a mile S.E. from Innsbruck. Lat. 47, 11, N. Long. 31, 50, E.

AMBRES, a little town belonging to the diocese of Castres and government of Languedoc, in France. It is a marquifat, the proprietor of which is subject to the barons, who have a seat and voice in the provincial diet.

AMBRESBURY. See AMESBURY.

AMBRIERES, a small town belonging to Upper Maine, one of the three subdivisions of the province and government of Maine with Perche. It is a marquifat.

AMBROISE, (St.) a small town belonging to the diocese of Uzez, in Lower Languedoc, and government of this last name, in France. It is situated on the river Celse.

AMBRONES, a Gaulish people who lived near the foot of the Alps, between Switzerland and Provence. They invaded the Roman territories in conjunction with the Cimbric and Teutones; but were defeated with great slaughter by Marius about 101 years before Christ. Their women, who had staid during the engagement in a kind of fortification made with their carts, on seeing their husbands flying, and the Romans at their heels, armed themselves with axes, and, gnashing with their teeth, fell with fury on the pursuers and pursued. Their first rage being spent, they desired to surrender themselves, upon the single condition, that their chastity should not be violated; but this equitable request being denied, they first killed their children, and then themselves, not one remaining alive out of the whole multitude.

AMBROSE, a town of Piedmont, in Upper Italy, on the Doria. It is situated near Sosa, and not far from the famous abbey of St. Michael d'Escluse, one of the principal of the Benedictine order, on which many others depend. Lat. 45, 7, N. Long. 7, 14, E.

AMBROSE-ISLAND, a small island laid down in some of the most approved charts, and particularly mentioned in Mr. Robertson's Elements of Navigation, as lying in S. lat. 23, 30. W. long. 82, 20. It was searched for, however, in 1767, by Captain Carteret, with such diligence that he concludes it to have no existence, as he could not discover land any where near that place.

AMBRUN, or EMBRUN, in Latin Eburodunum, Ebrodunum, or Ebrodunum, the capital of the district of Ambrunois, or of the Alpes Maritimes, belonging to the Upper Delphinat, in the government of Dauphiny, in France. It is a small but pretty strong city, situated on a steep rock almost inaccessible, on the side of the river Durance, which runs at the foot of it. It was taken by prince Eugene in 1692. The city is very thin of people, though it is the seat of a royal balliwick and the see of an archbishop, who styles himself prince and count of Ambrun, and baron of Guillestre and Beaufort. Half of the lordship and jurisdiction of the city belongs to him. His suffragans are the bishops of Digne, Grasse, Vence, Glandève, and Senes; also Nice, in Piedmont. His annual revenue amounts to 22,000 livres, and he pays a tax of 2400 florins to the court of Rome. His palace is the finest structure in the city, and situated in the highest part of it. Besides the cathedral here are five parish-churches, a Jesuit's college, and a convent of Capuchins. It lies 44 miles W. of Pignerol. Lat. 44, 10, N. Long. 26, 5, E.

AMBRUNOIS, or EMBRUNOIS, one of the seven territories belonging to the Upper Delphinat; in the government of Dauphiny, in France, of which Ambrun is its capital; which see. It is situated on the S. of Briançonnais, and on the confines finis of Provence, from which the river Durance parts it. Ambrunois lies entirely in the Alps, and in Julius Cæsar's time was inhabited by the Catu-rigi. The counts of Ambrunois formerly acknowledged the archbishops of Ambrun as their lords paramount, and were obliged to pay them homage: but the kings of France have since shaken off that vassalage, and have made even the archbishops to do them homage, and to give them up half the lordship of the city, where, as has been already said, they have established a royal bailiwick.

AMBRYM, one of the Hebrides, in the South Sea, lying in 16, 15, S. lat. and 168, 20, E. long.

AMBY, a town of Limburg, a province of the Austrian Netherlands. It is situated on the E. side of the Maes, and opposite to Maastricht. Lat. 50, 56, N. Long. 5, 45, E.

AMEL, a kingdom of Africa near the Atlantic, within the mouth of the Niger, in Nigritia.

AMELAND, an island on the coast of West Friesland, in the United Provinces, situated in the German sea. It lies six leagues from Leewarden: it is part sandy, and part very fertile. Here is a great fishing of sea-dogs. Lat. 53, 30, N. Long. 6, 20, E.

AMELIA, a county in the province of Virginia, North-America, situated among several rivers, having Cumberland county on the N. Prince George county on the E. and Lunenburg county on the S. and W.

AMELIA-ISLE. See AMALIA.

AMELIA, anciently Ameria, or Æmilia, a small city of Spoleto, a duchy belonging to the Ecclesiastical State, in Mid-Italy. It is situated on a hill between the Tiber and Nera; a place celebrated by the old geographers: and Pliny, following Cato, says it was built 964 years before the war of Perseus. The several ruins of it still extant bear evident marks of its antiquity. It is the see of a bishop, who is immediately subject to the pope. The territory about it abounds in corn, wine, oil, and all sorts of fruit. Amelia stands five miles from Narni, in the road to Todi, and 25 S. W. of the city of Spoleto. Lat. 42, 40, N. Long. 13, 20, E.

AMERICA, the fourth general division of the terraqueous globe, the other three being Europe, Asia, and Africa. It is the largest, and in some respects the richest, of all the four. America was the last discovered and known, as well as in all probability the last peopled: for, whatever some authors may have fondly imagined, that this vast land, or at least some tracts of it, were known to king Solomon, yet it is evident that neither the sacred records, nor the ancient historians, have ever mentioned, or appear to have had any notion of this part of the globe. We therefore may safely join with the greatest part of authors, that America continued unknown from the creation, quite to the year of the Christian æra 1492, when it was first discovered by the ever memorable Christopher Columba, Columbus, or more properly, according to some, Colon, a native of Genoa, a very expert sailor, and an excellent mathematician, for Ferdinand and Isabella, the then king and queen of Spain, though that gallant adventurer had not the honour of calling this new world by his own name. In Columbus's first voyage he contented himself with discovering several of the Lucayo or Bahama islands, with those of Cuba and Hispaniola. But fortune gave it to one of his successors, Americ or Americus Vespucio, a Florentine by birth, who, in 1497, was sent thither by Emanuel king of Portugal, in order to carry on the discoveries begun by Columbus; when sailing directly from E. to W. he fell upon that part only which lies S. of the Equator; he arrogantly and unjustly assumed to himself the glory of being the first European who discovered this new world, and of calling it by his own name; but it was not till 1510, that the extremity of the continent was discovered by a celebrated Portuguese navigator, whose true name was Fernando de Magalhaens, by the Spaniards called Hernando Magalhães, and by the French Magellan, from whom the straits between the southern point of the continent and the island of Terra del Fuego take their name. Bartholemew, the brother of Columbus, who had been sent to our king Henry VII. inspired him with such a desire of making his subjects sharers in the advantages of this new-found world, that he sent, John Cabot, a Venetian, who was a man of equal skill and courage with him, to go in quest of it. His charter from that prince bore date in the year 1496, and in the year following he and his three sons discovered Newfoundland; from which, sailing along the coast of America, he came as far as the Cape of Florida. So that whatever title the Spaniards may claim to this new world, ours is not only equal, but superior, even if we should set aside the previous agreement between our king Henry and the said Bartholemew, in his brother's name. For if a discovery, possession, and improvement, give a good right, ours is at least equal to theirs. But if, as the Spaniards pretend, a discovery without taking possession, be a sufficient title, then ours to the main-land must of course be better than theirs: and thus much may serve for the discovery of this new part of the globe. With regard to that of its several kingdoms, nations, and particular conquests of them by the Europeans, they will be best seen under their respective heads in this work. This vast country is bounded on the east by the Atlantic ocean, which separates it from Europe and Africa; on the west, by the Pacific ocean, or great South sea, by which it is separated from Asia. On the south, it is bounded by the Frozen ocean. But its boundaries towards the north north have never been ascertained; nor is it determined whether the northern parts of America join to those of Europe and Asia or not. As far as it is known, America extends from Lat. 80, N. to 56, S. and from 25 to 170, Long. W. from London; its length being between 8000 and 9000 miles, and its greatest breadth 5000. America is by no means of equal breadth throughout its whole extent; but is divided into two great continents, called North and South America, by an isthmus 1500 miles long, and which at Darien, about Lat. 9, N. is only 60 miles over. This isthmus forms, with the northern and southern continents, a vast gulph, in which lie a great number of islands, called the West Indies, in contradistinction to the eastern parts of Asia, which are called the East Indies. Between the New World and the Old there are several very striking differences; but the most remarkable is the general predominance of cold throughout the whole extent of America. Though we cannot, in any country, determine the precise degree of heat, merely by the distance from the equator; because the elevation above the sea, the nature of the soil, &c. affect the climate; yet, in the ancient continent, the heat is much more in proportion to the vicinity, to the equator, than in any part of America. Here the rigour of the frigid zone extends over half that which should be temperate by its position. Even in those latitudes, where the winter is scarcely felt on the old continent, it reigns with great severity in America, though during a short period. Nor does this cold, prevalent in the New World, confine itself to the temperate zones, but extends its influence to the torrid zone also, considerably mitigating the excess of its heat. Along the eastern coast the climate, though more similar to that of the torrid zone in other parts of the earth, is nevertheless considerably milder than in those countries of Asia and Africa which lie in the same latitude. From the southern tropic to the extremity of the American continent the cold is said to be much greater than in parallel northern latitudes even of America itself. For this so remarkable difference between the climate of the new continent and the old, various causes have been assigned by different authors. Though the climate of North America certainly appears colder to those who have visited it than the corresponding places of Europe, yet we have no proof that the colds in that part of the world are absolutely superior to those on the eastern continent; indeed we cannot well suppose any degree of cold superior to what has been felt in Siberia. At Albany-fort, on Hudson's-bay, situated in Lat. 53, 20, N. the thermometer in winter 1775 stood at 28; below 0. This was certainly very great, but far inferior to the Siberian cold in Lat. 58, 10; and it cannot be thought, that the small difference in latitude would occasion such an enormous difference in the degree of cold. The reason why such large tracts in North America are constantly covered with snow, is probably the prodigious number and size of its mountains, greatly exceeding what are to be found on the eastern continent. The tops of high mountains are always excessively cold, even in the warmest regions; and they necessarily keep off the warmth of the sun in summer from large tracts of ground. For this reason, they naturally produce cold summers; but they also afford shelter to the trees and other vegetables in winter; so that wood is found in America much farther north than in Asia. This, which is a very strong proof of the greater cold of the Asiatic winters than the North American, will appear from the following account of the climate of North America, contrasted with that of the eastern coast of Asia. "The American land is in a much better state, with regard to climate, than the farthest part of Asia, though it lies near the sea, and has every where high mountains, some of which are covered with perpetual snows; for that country, when its qualities are compared with those of Asia, has by far the advantage. The mountains of that part of Asia are every where ruinous and cleft; from whence they have, long since, lost their consistency, and likewise their inward warmth; upon which account they have no good metal of any kind; no wood nor herbs grow there, except in the valleys, where is seen small brush-wood and stiff herbs. On the contrary, the mountains of America are firm, and covered on the surface, not with moss, but with fruitful earth or mold; and therefore, from the foot to the very top, they are decked with thick and very fine trees. At the foot of them grow herbs proper to dry places, and not to marshy ones; besides that, for the most part, those plants are of the same largeness and appearance both on the lower grounds and on the very tops of the mountains, by reason that there is every where the same inward heat and moisture. But in Asia there is so great a difference between them, that of one kind of plants growing there, one would be apt to make several kinds, if one did not observe a rule, which holds generally with regard to those places, viz. that, in lower grounds, herbs grow twice as large as on the mountains. In America, even the sea-shores, at Lat. 60, are woody; but in Kamschatka, at Lat. 51, no place set with small willows and alder-trees is found nearer than 20 verstes from the sea; plantations or woods of birch-trees are, for the most part, at the distance of 30 verstes; and with regard to pitch-trees, on the river Kamschatka, they are at the distance of 50 verstes or more from its mouth. At 62, there is no wood at Kamschatka. In Steller's opinion, from the aforementioned latitude of America, the land extends as far as 70, and farther; and the

the chief cause of the aforesaid growth of woods in that country is the cover and shelter it has from the west. On the other hand, the want of wood on the Kamtschadalian shores, especially on the shore of the Penhsinian-sea, doubtless comes from a sharp north-wind, to which it is much exposed. That those parts which lie from the Lopatka, farther to the north, are more woody and fruitful, is owing to Cape Tchukotski, and the land that has been observed over against it, by which those parts are sheltered from the sharp winds. For this reason also fish come up the rivers of America earlier than those of Kamtschatka. The 20th of July there has been observed a great plenty of fish in those rivers; whilst at Kamtschatka it is then but the beginning of an abundant fishery.—In the southern hemisphere the water bears a much larger proportion to the land than in the northern. From the chart prefixed to captain Cook's Voyages it appears that the whole space contained between the south pole and 30 of lat. all round the globe, is entirely occupied by the ocean, except a small part of South-America, a still smaller part of Africa, the islands of New-Zealand, and a very inconsiderable portion of New-Holland. Here, according to what we have advanced, a perpetual winter ought to take place; and for a great part of the space it actually does so. In 1766, Oct. 30th, commodore Byron, while in lat. 35, 50, S. found the weather as cold as in the same month in England. In 1766, Nov. 12, captain Wallis found it very cold in lat. 30, S. though the month of November in that climate corresponds to that of May with us. In 1769, January 3, captain Cook's people complained of cold in lat. 47, 17, S. and were clothed in their winter-garments; though this was the month which corresponds to July with us, and consequently the warmest in the whole year: nay, on the 16th of this month, Mr. Banks and Dr. Solander having gone ashore on Tierra del Fuego, lying in a south-latitude corresponding to that of England, they were overtaken by a violent storm of snow; and the cold was so excessive as to kill two of their attendants. In 1770, March 18, corresponding to the same day in September with us, the whole country of New-Zealand, in lat. 43, 4, S. was covered with snow. In November 1772, captain Cook's people put on their winter-dress in lat. 42, S. and on December 5, corresponding to the same day of June in this country, the thermometer sunk to 38 during the night; and some snow fell next morning. Five days after, having advanced as far as lat. 49, 45, S. the thermometer sunk to 32, and fresh water began to freeze aboard their ship. The next morning they fell in with ice floating on the sea. Proceeding still to the southward, they were stopped in lat. 67, 15, S. by field-ice, such as is met with in the high northern latitudes, only much thicker.

When they had once fallen in with the ice, it does not appear that the cold had greatly increased; for though they afterwards proceeded as far as 71, 10, S. the weather was far from being intolerable; for in that latitude, on January 30th, 1774, the thermometer stood only at 32. We shall conclude this subject with some observations made by Mr. Forster on the climate of different places in the southern hemisphere. The following is an account of the climate of New-Zealand in November 1773:—"Scarce a day passed without heavy squalls of wind, which hurried down with redoubled velocity from the mountains; and strong showers of rain, which retarded all our occupations. The air commonly was cold and raw, vegetation made slow advances, and the birds were only found in the valleys sheltered from the chilling southern blast. This kind of weather in all likelihood prevails throughout the winter; and likewise far into the middle of summer, without a much greater degree of cold in the former, or of warmth in the latter season. Islands far from any continent, or at least not situated near a cold one, seem in general to have an uniform temperature of air, owing perhaps to the ocean which every where surrounds them. It appears, from the meteorological journals kept at Port Egmont, on the Falkland-islands, that the extremes of the greatest cold and the greatest heat observed there throughout the year do not exceed 30 on Fahrenheit's scale. The latitude of that port is 51, 25, S. and that of Ship-cove, in Queen Charlotte's-Sound, only 41, 5. This considerable difference of site will naturally make the climate infinitely milder than that of Falkland's-Islands, but cannot affect the general hypothesis concerning the temperature of all islands; and the immense height of the mountains in New-Zealand, some of which are covered with snow throughout the year, doubtless contributes to refrigerate the air, so as to assimilate it to that of the Falkland's-isles, which are not so high."—Tierra del Fuego, the southern extremity of America, is thus described. "On the 2d of December, 1774, after a short calm we had a fresh breeze, which continued to blow without intermission, but with different degrees of velocity, till the 18th, when we made the land a little after midnight, near Cape Deseado, on one of the westernmost islands of Tierra del Fuego. The part of the world which was now in sight had a very unfavourable aspect. About 3 o'clock in the morning we ran along it, and found it for the greatest part hid in a thick haze. The parts near us seemed to be small islands, which, though not very high, were however very black, and almost entirely barren. Beyond them we saw some broken high lands, which were covered with snow almost to the water's-edge. In the afternoon we passed the island upon which Cape Noir is situated, mentioned by M. Frezier. We found many many separate islands from the place where we made the coast to Cape Noir; and should perhaps have seen many more if the weather had not been very hazy. We found the land to all appearance much more compact after passing Cape Noir; and the next morning, December 19, in particular, the coast seemed to be entirely connected; the mountains rose to a much greater height immediately from the sea-side, and were covered with snow in every part. The wind gradually lessened, and towards noon we were entirely becalmed, having the finest sunshine and mild weather. It was very amusing to us to meet with mild weather in the neighbourhood of that tempestuous cape, of which the name alone has affrighted the mariners ever since lord Anson's voyage. The destruction of vulgar prejudices is of so much service to science, and to mankind in general, that it cannot fail of giving pleasure to every one sensible of its benefits. We had this day the thermometer at 48; which, considering the neighbourhood of the huge heaps of snow on shore, was very moderate. This part of the world has been called the Coast of Desolation by the navigators who first visited it, and seems fully to deserve the appellation. Here we discovered nothing but vast mountains, of which the spiry summits were every where covered with eternal snow. Along the sea, the nearest rocks were clear of snow; but black, and destitute of grasses and shrubbery. Some inlets appeared in different parts, where a few islands seemed to have a covering of green. We stood in to one of these in the evening, having obtained an easterly breeze. A huge perpendicular wall of rock formed its western entrance; and captain Cook called it the York-Minster, having discovered a strong resemblance between that Gothic building and this dreary chaotic rock. It lies in 55, 30, S. and 70, 28, W. Along the coast we found regular soundings; but in the mouth of the inlet we could not reach the bottom with 150 fathom of line. This circumstance had already happened to us before at Dusky-Bay (New-Zealand); but, as we saw a very spacious sound before us, we ventured to stand on, amidst different rude islands; on which the summits of the hills were sometimes capped with snow. After being much retarded by calms, we arrived about 9 o'clock in a small cove, indifferently sheltered either from wind or sea; but a welcome place of refuge, on account of the approach of night. The next morning captain Cook, &c. went in a boat in quest of a more safe and convenient anchorage. We only rowed round a single point of the island under which our ship lay, and immediately found a fine cove sheltered from all winds and perfectly land-locked, with a little rill of water and a shrubbery. The weather was mild, considering the climate; and several birds were heard on shore. We found many little clefts, which cannot properly be called valleys, where a few shrubs of different species sprung up in a thin layer of swampy soil, being defended against the violence of storms, and exposed to the genial influence of reverberated sun-beams. The rock, of which the whole island consisted, is a coarse granite, composed of fels-path, quartz, and black mica or glimmer. This rock is in most places entirely naked, without the smallest vegetable particle; but wherever the rains or melted snows have washed together some little rubbish and other particles in decay, it is covered with a coating of minute plants, in growth like mosses; which, forming a kind of turf about an inch or more in thickness, very easily slip away under the foot, having no firm hold on the rock. In sheltered places a few other plants thrive among these mossy species; and these at last form a sufficient quantity of soil for the nutriment of shrubs, especially in such spots as I have mentioned before. Barren as these rocks appeared, yet almost every plant we gathered on them was new to us; and some species were remarkable for the beauty of their flowers, or their smell. Early the next morning captain Cook set out to take bearings in the sound, and we took that opportunity to examine its natural productions. The sound is very spacious, and surrounded to the north and east by several ranges of high mountains, which seem covered with permanent snow and ice. On entering this sound, and taking notice of its dreary desolate appearance, we had supposed that the natives of Tierra del Fuego never touch upon this inhospitable part, but confine themselves to the neighbourhood of the straits of Magelhaens, and to the eastern side of Tierra del Fuego; but it seems that human nature is capable of withstanding the greatest inclemencies of weather, and of supporting its existence alike in the burning sands of Africa and in the frozen extremities of the globe. We landed on several other islands, from whence we had a most extensive prospect across the sound, which looked wild and horrid in its wintery dress. This was, however, the first summer month of these regions; most of the plants we saw were in flower, and the birds were every where bringing up their young. From thence we may easily form an adequate idea of the torpid state of these regions, where the sun-beams cannot melt the snow at a season when their influence is the strongest. The farther we advanced from the sea the more snow appeared on the mountains. In some places we saw cascades and streams gushing down over the snow, especially where the rays of the sun took effect by being frequently reflected. We found a most beautiful cove on this coast, which formed a circular basin, where the water was smooth and transparent as a mirror. All the lower parts were fringed with trees, which we had had no where seen so tall in the neighbourhood; and many streams gushed down with great impetuosity between their roots, making a most convenient watering-place. A prodigious number of small birds sat on every branch, and twittered around us in the sun-shine. They were of many different species; but, unacquainted with men, hopped so near us that it was impossible to shoot them, especially as we had no other than coarse shot left, and that in very small quantity. Abundance of mosses, ferns, and climbers grew up between the trees, and were no small impediment to us in walking. Various flowers enlivened these woods, and increased our collection with new species. Here then there was the appearance of summer; but if we looked up to the monstrous cloud-capt mountains which formed almost perpendicular walls on all sides of the harbour, and beheld them covered with snow and ice, which had sometimes a blue and sometimes a yellowish tinge, we thought ourselves transported to the Glaciers of Switzerland, where the seasons seem likewise to be lost and confounded in each other. The height of these mountains was very considerable, though not equal to the Alps; and their summits were divided into many sharp and craggy points, between which the interval was filled with snow. We landed here, and walked along the shore to another port, formed by a number of low islands, which entirely sheltered it from all winds. We were fortunate enough to meet with an island entirely covered with the shrubs of a species of arbutus, loaded with red fruit of the size of small cherries, which were very well tasted, and combined an agreeable tartness with a sweet and a bitter flavour. The rocks of the same island, at the water's-edge, were covered with large muscle-shells, of which we found the fish more delicious than oysters. To add to our good fortune, we met with several islands on our return covered with excellent celery; which, though much smaller than that of New Zealand, was much higher flavoured. Its juices being probably more concentrated. We loaded our boat with it, and returned late on board, after being overtaken by several smart showers. On our return we found that the neighbourhood of the ship was very sensibly warmer than the northern parts of the sound, where the air was refrigerated by the abundance of snow on the mountains. — December 25. During our absence some of the natives, in four small canoes, had visited the ship: they were described to us as wretched and poor; but inoffensive, and ready to part with their spears, seal-skins, and the like. We now regretted that we had lost the opportunity of seeing them; but fortunately they returned the next morning, though the weather was rainy. The four canoes in which they came were made of the bark of trees, which could hardly have grown in this sound, on account of their size. Several small sticks are the ribs which distend this bark, and another stick forms the gunwale, over which they have wrapped the extremity of the bark and sewed it on. A few stones, with a small quantity of earth, are laid in the bottom of each canoe, and on this the natives keep a constant fire. Their paddles are small, and rudely formed, and they work very slowly with them. Each canoe contained from five to eight persons, including children; who, contrary to the custom of all the nations in the South-sea, were very silent in their approach to the ship; and when aboard hardly pronounced any other word than Pesseray. Those whom M. Bougainville saw in the Straits of Magalhaens, not far from hence, used the same word; whence he gave them the general name of Pecherais. We beckoned to them to come into the ship; and some accepted the invitation, though without the least sign of being pleased, and seemingly without the smallest degree of curiosity. Their persons were short, not exceeding five feet six inches at most; their heads large, the face broad, the cheek-bones very prominent, and the nose very flat. They had little brown eyes without life; their hair was black and lank, hanging about their heads in disorder, and besmeared with train-oil. On the chin they had a few straggling short hairs instead of a beard; and from their nose there was a constant discharge of mucus into their ugly open mouth. The whole assemblage of their features formed the most loathsome picture of misery and wretchedness to which human nature can possibly be reduced. The shoulders and chest were broad and bony; but the rest of the figure was so lean and shrivelled, that, to have seen it separate, we could not have believed that it belonged to the same person. Their legs were lean and bowed, and their knees disproportionally large. They had no other clothing than a small piece of old seal-skin, which hung from their shoulders to the middle of the back, being fastened round the neck with a string. The rest of their body was perfectly naked, not the least regard being paid to what Europeans would term decency. Their natural colour appeared to be an olive-brown, with a kind of gloss, which has really some resemblance to that of copper; but many of them had disguised themselves with streaks of red paint, and sometimes, though seldom, with white. The women were nearly formed as the men, though somewhat less in stature; their features were not less uncouth and ugly, and their dress exactly the same. They had only added a small piece of seal-skin, not so large as the palm of the hand, which hung down before, fixed to a string which was tied about the waist. Round their necks they wore leather strings, on which they had hung a number of shells; and on their heads they had a kind of bonnet, consisting of a few white quill-feathers of geese, which they occasionally signally placed upright on the head, by that means giving them a resemblance to the French head-dresses of the last century. There was but one single person among them, who had a small piece of a guanaco's skin sewed on his seal-skin to lengthen it. The children were perfectly naked; and, like their mothers, huddled continually about the fire, in each canoe, shivering continually with cold, and rarely uttering any other word than Pesseray, which sometimes sounded like a word of endearment, and sometimes seemed to be the expression of complaint. Those of the men who had come on deck spoke a few other words, which contained many consonants and gutturals, particularly the ll of the Welsh; and all seemed to lisp very strongly, which contributed to make them wholly unintelligible. They accepted trifles, such as beads, without seeming to value them; but, at the same time, they also gave away their own arms, or even their ragged seal-skins, without the least concern; their whole character being the strangest compound of stupidity, indifference, and inactivity." From this description of the country and inhabitants of Tierra del Fuego, we might reasonably enough conclude that no spot on earth can be in a more wretched state, unless it lies much nearer the south-pole: but bad as this country is, it appears to profit considerably by the neighbourhood of the continent of South-America; for small islands lying at a great distance from the continent, and nearly in the same latitude with Tierra del Fuego, are in a much worse state; as evidently appears from the description given by our author of South Georgia and southern Thule.—1774, January 16th. "We had very cold weather all this time, thermometer being $34\frac{1}{2}$, and great falls of snow covering our decks. This morning we had sight of the land again, and found its mountains of a vast height, covered with loads of snow and ice, in most places down to the water's edge. The only parts which were clear of snow were a few black and barren cliffs, and particularly some huge hollow rocks, that

Towards the south end of this land we saw several low islands, like the New-year's islands, which appeared to have some verdure upon them; and were therefore called the Green-islands. As it had been the main object of our voyage to explore the high southern latitudes, Mr. Forster suggested to captain Cook that it would be proper to name this land after the monarch who had set on foot our expedition solely for the improvement of science, and whose name ought therefore to be celebrated in both hemispheres. It was accordingly honoured with the name of Southern Georgia; which will give it importance, and continue to spread a lustre over it which it cannot derive from its barrenness and dreary appearance.—In the afternoon we saw two rocky islands at the north end of Georgia, which lay about a league asunder, and were of a dull black colour. We steered towards them, and about 5 o'clock passed in the middle between them. The northernmost was a craggy cliff, nearly perpendicular, which contained the nests of many thousand shags, and was named Willis's-island: it is situated in 54° S. and $38, 25^{\circ}$ W. The southernmost sloped gradually to the westward, being covered on that side with some grass, and with innumerable flocks of birds of all sorts, from the largest albatrosses down to the least petrels; for which reason it was named Bird-island. Great numbers of shags, penguins, divers, and other birds played about, and settled in the water around us; this cold climate seeming to be perfectly agreeable to them. Several porpoises were likewise noticed, and many seals, which probably came to breed on these inhospitable shores. We ran along the north-east coast of the land till it was dark, when we brought to, and did not resume our course till the next morning at three o'clock. The aspect of the land was extremely unpromising; the mountains were the most craggy we had ever seen, and formed many sharp points, between which the intervals were filled with snow. We passed a bay, which, from the numbers of low green islands in it, was named the Bay of Islands; and opened another towards which we stood with the ship, having soundings at the distance of two or three miles. Upon advancing into the farthest recess of the bay, we soon observed a solid mass of ice, such as is found in the harbours of Spitzbergen (N. lat. $79, 30^{\circ}$). This mass of ice bore a great resemblance to those detached islands of which we saw such numbers floating upon the ocean in the high southern latitudes. The shores of the bay nearer the sea were clear of snow, but excessively dreary, and almost perpendicular. We landed in a spot which was perfectly sheltered from the swell, and where the land formed a long projecting point. Here we saw a number of seals assembled on a stony beach; and among them a huge animal, which we had taken to be a rock at a distance, but which proved to be exactly the same animal with Lord Anson's sea-lion. The seals which we found here were more fierce than any we had seen on the New-year's Isles, and did not run out of our way. The youngest cubs barked at us; and ran after our heels when we passed by them, trying to bite our legs. We climbed upon a little hummock, about eight yards high, where we found two species of plants; one was the grass which grows plentifully on the New-year's Isles (dactylis glomerata), and the other a kind of burnet (sanguisorba). Here Captain Cook displayed the British flag, and performed the ceremony of taking possession of these barren rocks, "in the name of his Britannic Majesty and his heirs for ever."

A M

A volley of two or three musquets was fired into the air, to give greater weight to the assertion; and the barren rocks re-echoed with the sound, to the utter amazement of the seals and penguins, the inhabitants of these newly discovered dominions. The rocks consisted of a bluish grey slate, in horizontal strata, of which many fragments every where covered the beaches. As far as we were able to examine them, they contained no other minerals of any kind; the whole country being useless, and frightfully barren, in every respect. During our stay on shore, we saw some small fragments of ice floating out to sea, and heard the huge masses in the farthest part of the bay crack very loud from time to time. We continued to coast the land during the two following days, and discovered several bays and headlands upon it. The appearance of the land was always nearly the same: its mountains towards the south were excessively high, and divided into innumerable ragged points, like the flames in a raging fire. On the 19th we reached the S.E. extremity of southern Georgia, which we now discovered to be an island, between 50 and 60 leagues in length. It has been supposed that all parts of this globe, including those which are barren and dreary in the highest degree, are fit to become the abode of men. Before we arrived at this island of Georgia, we had nothing to oppose to this opinion, since even the wintery shores of Tierra del Fuego were inhabited by human beings, who were still one step removed from brutes: but the climate of Tierra del Fuego is mild with respect to that of Georgia, the difference in the thermometer which we observed being at least ten degrees. It has besides the advantage of producing a quantity of shrubbery and wood sufficient to supply the wants of the natives, who are by that means enabled to rest sheltered from the inclemencies of the air, and to light fires, which give them warmth, and may serve to make their food eatable and wholesome. As New Georgia is wholly destitute of wood, and of any other combustible to serve as a succedaneum, I apprehend it would be impossible for any race of men to live upon it, though they should, instead of the stupidity of the Pefferais, be possessed of the ingenuity of the Europeans. The summers of this new island are rigorously cold, the thermometer having never risen ten degrees above the freezing point during our stay on the coast; and, though we have reason to suppose that the winters are not colder in the same proportion as in our hemisphere, yet it is probable there will be at least a difference of 20 or 30 degrees. This I think is sufficient to kill any men who may survive the summer there, supposing them provided with no other defence than that which the country affords: but South Georgia, besides being uninhabitable, does not appear to contain any single article for which it might be occasionally visited by European ships. Seals and sealions, of which the blubber is accounted an article of commerce, are much more numerous on the desert coasts of South America, the Falkland and the New-Year's islands, where they may likewise be obtained at a much smaller risk." We can hardly expect an account of a country where winter prevails more perfectly than in New Georgia; yet even this island appears to have been greatly superior to that named the southern Thule, of which we have the following account. "The discovery of this land happened on the 31st of January, at seven in the morning, when the weather was so hazy that we could not see four or five miles around us. We ran towards it near an hour, when we were within half a mile of the rocks, which were black, cavernous, and perpendicular to a vast height, inhabited by flocks of shags, and beaten by dreadful breakers. Thick clouds veiled the upper parts of the mountains; but one immense peak appeared towering beyond them, covered with snow. It was agreed by all present, that the perpendicular height of this mountain could not be far short of two miles. We sounded with 170 fathom close in shore; and then put about, standing to the south, in order to weather the western point, which we had now discovered. We had not run above an hour on this tack, when we saw high mountains to the S. S. E. about five or six leagues distant; which, from the course we had kept, we must have narrowly escaped about midnight. This being the southernmost extremity of the land, Mr. Forster named it the Southern Thule, a name which Captain Cook has preserved. It is situated in 59. 30. S. and 27. 30. W.—Captain Cook, however, did not venture to lose any time in the investigation of this coast, where he was exposed to imminent danger from the violence of westerly winds. He chose rather to explore its northern extremities, which besides were doubtless the most likely to be of importance to navigators. We kept at the distance of two or three leagues from the land, having little winds, and seeing the coast every where steep and inaccessible. The mountains appeared to be of vast height, their summits being constantly wrapped in clouds, and the lower part covered with snow down to the water's edge, in such a manner, that we should have found it difficult to pronounce whether we saw land or ice, if some hollow rocks had not shewn their black and paked caverns in several places. Feb. 1. We found ourselves abreast of another projecting point in the morning, which Captain Cook has since named Cape Montague. Beyond it we discovered another point to the north, which, upon our nearer approach, was discovered to be a separate island, and named named Saunders's Island. It was not inferior in height to the mountainous coast to the south of it, and was covered with snow and ice in the same manner. It is situated in 57. 48. S. and 26. 35. W. We had little wind during the night; but, with the return of day-light, stood to the eastward, in order to weather Saunders's Island. We could not accomplish our point with a single board; but, the wind being contrary, tacked all the afternoon, in order to double the northern extremity of Saunders's island. We came very near it several times, and observed a flat point or beach running out to the northward, covered with heaps of shingle, which were piled up in the wildest manner, and offered nothing but sharp points and ridges to the eye. The whole country had the most desolate and horrid appearance which can possibly be conceived; not a single grass could be discerned upon it, and it seemed to be forsaken even by the amphibious and lumpish animals which dwelt on Southern Georgia." We have now abundant reason to conclude, that all islands are colder than continents lying in the same parallels of latitude; and that the vicinity of the ocean by no means contributes to produce warmth, but the contrary: and though water, by its property of absorbing heat in a latent state, and then discharging it in a sensible one, may be said to regulate the cold, so as to prevent its going to great extremes at any season; yet, by this very property, the distinction of seasons is lost, so that an island situated at a great distance from land may be uninhabitable by reason of the cold, while parts of a continent much nearer the pole than that island, might furnish mankind with a comfortable abode. From its shape, America may almost be considered as consisting of two islands; for only a narrow isthmus prevents the southern continent from being entirely surrounded with water. These, though very large, are far from equalling the bulk of Europe, Asia, and Africa, put together. The southern continent is not so big as Africa, and it is doubtful whether Asia does not equal the bulk of both North and South America, especially if we take in the new-discovered island of New Holland, which is very little if at all inferior in bulk to Europe. The three old continents are connected with one another, and are no doubt considerably warmer on that account. America is at a vast distance; and cannot profit by the warmth either of Africa or Asia, let it be ever so great. It is impossible, then, that the climate of New-York, New-England, and New-Scotland, can be so mild as that of France and Spain; because the winter in them is moderated by their having the Mediterranean sea to the south, and the Atlantic ocean to the west and north, at the same time that the vicinity of Africa prevents this vast quantity of water from absorbing much of their summer-heat. The American countries just now mentioned, have indeed the Atlantic Ocean on one side, but are surrounded with land on every other, nor have they any warm continent so near them as Asia and Africa are to the southern parts of Europe: and hence they are subject to violent extremes of heat and cold; so that, in the streets of Boston, the capital of New-England, the ice frequently lies a foot thick for several months in winter; while the summer-heats are very great. In like manner is South America colder than Africa, because of its inferiority in size, and its distance from any other continent; while the small islands in the southern ocean, lying in latitudes corresponding to that of Britain, are utterly uninhabitable, and covered with perpetual snow and ice. Another particularity in the climate of America is its excessive moisture in general. In some places, indeed, on the western coast, rain is not known; but, in all other parts, the moistness of the climate is as remarkable as the cold; and this moisture undoubtedly contributes to render America in general very unhealthy. The forests wherewith it is every where covered, no doubt, partly occasion the moisture of its climate; but the most prevalent cause is the vast quantity of water in the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans with which America is environed on all sides. Hence those places where the continent is narrowest are deluged with almost perpetual rains, accompanied with violent thunder and lightning, by which some of them, particularly Porto Bello, are rendered in a manner uninhabitable. This extreme moisture of the American climate is productive of larger rivers than any other part of the world.—The Danube, the Nile, the Indus, or the Ganges, are not comparable to the Mississippi, the river St. Lawrence, or that of the Amazons; nor are such large lakes to be found any where as those which North America affords.—To the same cause we are also partly to ascribe the excessive luxuriance of all kinds of vegetables in almost all parts of this country. In the southern provinces, where the moisture of the climate is aided by the warmth of the sun, the woods are almost impervious, and the surface of the ground is hid from the eye, under a thick covering of shrubs, herbs, and weeds.—In the northern provinces, the forests are not encumbered with the same luxuriance of vegetation; nevertheless, they afford trees much larger of their kind than what are to be found any where else. The same moisture which is so favourable to vegetation, is found to be very unfavourable to animal life. The brute creatures of America are generally of a small size when compared with those of Europe, Asia, or Africa; nay, those which have been imported by the Europeans, though they multiplied excessively, have never failed to degenerate in size, as well as in strength and vigour. We may with the more certainty ascribe this to the pernicious influence of the moisture, ture, as it is observed, that black cattle brought from other parts of the continent to Porto Bello, where the moisture is exceedingly great, lose their flesh so fast as to become in a few weeks scarce eatable.—To this, however, there is one exception; for America produces a species of ravenous birds called condor, superior both in size and strength to any that are to be found in other parts of the world. The same causes which check the growth and vigour of the more noble animals, are friendly to the propagation and increase of insects. America, if not joined on the N. side either to northern Tartary, the land of Jetzo, to some part of Siberia, or some other of the northern tracts in Europe, would be by much the largest island on this globe, being on every side else surrounded by the ocean, namely, on the E. by that which we stile the Western, with respect to us; on the S. by the Southern; and on the W. by the Pacific-ocean. But we have good reason for thinking that it joins to the N. part of Asia. A country of such vast extent, not only on each side of the equator, but reaching so very far beyond each of the tropics, must consequently have as great a variety of soils as it has of climates. But, upon the whole, if we except the most northern and and southern parts, which here, as every where else, are naturally cold and barren, the rest is an immense treasury of nature, producing most, if not all the plants, grains, fruits, trees, woods, metals, minerals, &c. to be met with in the other parts of the world; and that not only in as great, if not greater quantities, but many of these in much higher perfection. Besides which, America has an almost infinite variety of other productions peculiar to itself, which are neither found, nor will grow, or at least thrive in any other country. But all these are nothing in comparison with the great, numerous, and inexhaustible mines of gold and silver; which, though all the art and labour of men has been endeavouring to drain for above two centuries past, are yet so far from being impoverished, that they seem rather to want some fresh supply of hands to draw out these endless treasures. One thing is to be observed of those golden-mines in particular, that they are inferior in several respects to those of Africa, where they lie so near the surface as to be dug up with the greatest ease: and where the metal is so pure as to want no other refining or operation than the bare melting. But perhaps, for aught we know, this may have been the case of these in America when the Spaniards began to work them; though in process of time they have been sunk so low as to require immense labour and cost to fetch the metal from the bowels of the earth, and that less ripe and perfect than when it was nearer the surface: for some of them, especially those of Pachma, near Mexico, we are told are between 150 and 250 yards deep; others still more in different places;

besides a much greater number which are laid aside as exhausted. But, however, it is certain, that gold and silver are far from being the only precious commodities which this country produces, as appears from the vast variety of pearls, emeralds, amethysts, and other valuable stones, which are brought from thence into Europe in such quantities that their value is become inconsiderable, comparatively with what it was before that time. To these we may add a vast number of other commodities, which, though of less price, are notwithstanding still more valuable and useful. Of this sort are the constant and plentiful supplies of cochineal, indigo, anatto, logwood, brasil, fustic, lignum-vitæ, sugar, ginger, pimento, cocoa, banillas, cotton, redwood, tobacco, hides, ambergrise, bezoar, balsams of Tolu, Peru, and Chile, Jesuit's-bark, mechoacan, sassafras, sarfaparilla, cassia, tamarinds, with a great variety of woods, plants, &c. to which, before the discovery of these American parts, we were either utter strangers, or forced to buy at an extravagant rate from Asia and Africa. America has a great variety of most excellent fruits, which grow here to admirable perfection; such as pomgranates, citrons, lemons, oranges, malictons, cherries, pears, apples, figs, vast numbers of culinary, medicinal, and other herbs, roots, plants, &c. Add to all this the surprising fecundity with which the soil is here blessed, whereby many exotic productions are nourished in as great perfection here as in their native ground: and this article is particularly remarkable in the coffee; which has been lately cultivated with surprising success, and might be extended to many other vegetables, which we are obliged to have from Asia and Africa. Yet with all this plenty and variety, the vast continent of America laboured under the want of several very necessary and useful commodities: for, upon the first landing of the Europeans there, they found neither corn, wine, nor oil, the inhabitants making their bread of some sorts of pulse or roots; their drink was not much better; and with regard to money, they did not know the use of it. No dogs, sheep, goats, oxen, cows, asses, nor horses were to be found there, though the land abounded with pastures; and, at first, the very sight of any of them would throw a whole troop of those wild inhabitants into a horrible panic. But all these animals have been brought hither in such plenty, and have thriven so well, that now the country has no want of them; as appears from the vast quantities of hides, particularly of oxen, continually exported from thence. However, in lieu of those domestic animals, they had several kinds of others no less valuable and useful, and which we are entirely strangers to in Europe. The same may also be said of that vast variety of birds to be seen there; some of which greatly surpass all that are to be found found in any other parts of the world, both for surprising beauty, shapes, colours, &c. Their seas and large rivers are no less fraught with the greatest plenty and variety of fish. By what means, at what time, how early, and by whom this vast continent was first inhabited is almost impossible to say, since the natives have such imperfect records and uncertain tradition about the matter. That America may have been peopled from the north-eastern part of Asia is certainly possible; though that it actually was so can by no means be evinced. Indeed we are led into great difficulties from whatever place we suppose its inhabitants to have come: for the whole continent, from north to south, was peopled with tribes almost equally savage; and it is not easy to imagine how a few individuals, for we cannot suppose many to have come from these frozen parts of Asia, could have formed themselves into so many different tribes, each having the most inveterate malice against the others. Their colour too would incline us to think that their progenitors had been Negroes rather than Tartars. Yet Dr. Robertson says, "The actual vicinity of the two continents is so clearly established by modern discoveries as removes the chief difficulty with respect to the peopling of America. While those immense regions which stretched eastward from the river Oby to the sea of Kamtschatka were unknown, or imperfectly explored, the north-east extremities of our hemisphere were supposed to be so far distant from any part of the new world that it was not easy to conceive how any communication should have been carried on between them. But the Russians, having subjected the western part of Siberia to their empire, gradually extended their knowledge of that vast country, by advancing towards the east into unknown provinces. These were discovered by hunters in their excursions after game, or by soldiers employed in levying the taxes; and the court of Moscow estimated the importance of those countries only by the small addition which they made to its revenue. At length Peter the Great ascended the Russian throne. His enlightened comprehensive mind, intent upon every circumstance that could aggrandise his empire or render his reign illustrious, discerned consequences of those discoveries which had escaped the observation of his ignorant predecessors. He perceived that in proportion as the regions of Asia extended towards the east they must approach nearer to America; that the communication between the two continents, which had long been searched for in vain, would probably be found in this quarter; and that, by opening this intercourse, some part of the wealth and commerce of the western world might be made to flow into his dominions by a new channel. Such an object suited a genius that delighted in grand schemes. Peter drew up instructions with his own hand for prosecuting this design, and gave orders for carrying it into execution. His successors adopted his ideas and pursued his plan. The officers whom the Russian court employed in this service had to struggle with so many difficulties that their progress was extremely slow. Encouraged by some faint traditions among the people of Siberia concerning a successful voyage in the year 1648 round the north-east promontary of Asia, they attempted to follow the same course. No vessel fitted out by the Russian court ever doubled this formidable cape. In all Siberia an opinion prevails that countries of great extent and fertility lie at no considerable distance from their own coasts. These the Russians imagined to be part of America; and several circumstances concurred not only in confirming them in this belief, but in persuading them that some portion of that continent could not be very remote. Trees of various kinds, unknown in those naked regions of Asia, are driven upon the coast by an easterly wind. By the same wind floating ice is brought thither in a few days; flocks of birds arrive annually from the same quarter; and a tradition obtains among the inhabitants, of an intercourse formerly carried on with some countries situated towards the east. After weighing all these particulars, and comparing the position of the countries in Asia which they had discovered, with such parts in the north-west of America as were already known; the Russian court formed a plan which would hardly have occurred to any nation less accustomed to engage in arduous undertakings and to contend with great difficulties. Orders were issued to build two vessels at Ochotz, in the sea of Kamtschatka, to sail on a voyage of discovery. Though that dreary uncultivated region furnished nothing that could be of use in constructing them, but some larch-trees; though not only the iron, the cordage, the sails, and all the numerous articles requisite for their equipment, but the provisions for victualling them, were to be carried through the immense deserts of Siberia, along rivers of difficult navigation, and roads almost impassable; the mandate of the sovereign and the perseverance of the people at last surmounted every obstacle. Two vessels were finished; and, under the command of the captains Behring and Tschirikow, sailed from Kamtschatka in quest of this new world, in a quarter where it had never been approached. They shaped their course towards the east; and though a storm soon separated the vessels, which never rejoined, and many disasters befel them, the expectations from the voyage were not altogether frustrated. Each of the commanders discovered land, which to them appeared to be part of the American continent; and, according to their observations, it seems to be situated within a few degrees of the north-west coast of California. Each set some of his people ashore; but in one place the inhabitants fled as the Russians approached; in another, they carried off those who landed, and destroyed their boats. The violence of the weather and the distress of their crews obliged both to quit this inhospitable coast. In their return they touched at several islands, which stretch in a chain from east to west between the country which they had discovered and the coast of Asia. They had some intercourse with the natives, who seemed to them to resemble the North Americans. They presented to the Russians the calumet, or pipe of peace, which is a symbol of friendship universal among the people of North-America, and an usage of arbitrary institution peculiar to them." The general character of a nation depends in a considerable degree upon that of the first founders of it. It is also a certain fact that living in society will improve the most barbarous nations. Had America then been peopled at once, or only received one colony of men into it, it is impossible but the nations must have begun some improvements through length of time. We shall suppose a colony of Tartars had been driven by some accident on the coast of North-America. They would have remembered their ancient customs, and transmitted them to their posterity. These people we know have the art of taming animals; and, though they could not find animals of the same kind with those they left in their own country, they would undoubtedly have endeavoured to render such as they found in America subservient to them; and the great utility of this practice would infallibly have preserved it when once begun. It is very probable, therefore, that as the Americans had not this art, neither had their ancestors; whom, for that reason, we can scarce suppose to have been from any nation in the northern parts of Asia, where that art has been always known. The excessively savage state of the Americans we may account for by supposing them to have come originally from the southern parts of Asia. From these places of the old continent lie a chain of islands with but very moderate distances between them till we come to the Marquesas and Society-Islands, lying between 138 and 155 deg. of W. long. and between 10 and 20 of S. lat. Then indeed the connection is in a great measure broken off; but not so much that we can suppose an impossibility of some of the inhabitants of those islands reaching the continent of America. The solitary island of Easter or S. Carlos lies at a very considerable distance from the Society-Isles, in lat. 27, 4, S. long. 109, 46, W. and yet the inhabitants are manifestly of the same race, as they speak almost the same language. Here they have very few domestic animals, and consequently must be very deficient in the art of taming them; as they must likewise be in all the South-sea islands, for the same reason. — The rivers in this country are universally allowed to be the largest by far in the whole world; not only with regard to their breadth and depth, but likewise their very long course. For instance only in two or three of the most considerable of them. That of St. Laurence, in Canada, N. America, is computed to run above 1500 miles, and is said to be about 90 miles over at its mouth; that of the Amazons in the S. which rises in Peru, runs through several large and considerable kingdoms, and, after a course of above 3600 miles, falls into the Atlantic-ocean between Brasil and Guiana, and rolls its stream with such impetuosity, and so vast a volume of water, that it may be taken up quite fresh at several leagues distance from its mouth. That of Rio de la Plata, or Plate-river, descending from the inland of South-America, becomes so large, by the accession of other considerable rivers, that for many leagues up it looks like a sea; inasmuch that it is computed to be at least 150 miles in breadth at the place where it discharges itself into the ocean. Besides many other rivers, which shall be described under their proper heads. What has been said of their rivers is equally applicable to their mountains; which are of such surprising height and extent as cannot be matched by any in the three other parts of the world. For instance, that vastly long and high chain called the Cordillera or the Andes, which begins at the shore of the Terra Firma, as it is commonly called, next to the Isthmus of Darien, and extends itself quite to the Straits of Magelhaen, cutting the whole southern part of America into two, and running a length of 4300 miles. Their height at the same time is such, that even in those places where they are crossed over, commonly the narrowest and lowest, the passengers are several days in going over them; and they suffer very much from their excessive coldness, even in the hottest seasons; besides many other very great inconveniences and dangers which those must undergo who are obliged to cross them. They have likewise some very large and extensive woods, deserts, and lakes of a vast size. As in the discovery of this new world the Spaniards lay claim to the preference before all other Europeans, so they may with the greater truth to their being in possession of far the largest, and in some sense the best and richest share of it. However, the rest of the trading nations in Europe did not stand idle spectators of these new acquisitions and conquests, but endeavoured very soon to get what share they could. The Portuguese fell on the southern part of it, and the English on the northern; by which means the former made themselves masters of Brasil; the latter formed settlements on the coasts of Virginia, Maryland, Carolina, and other northern provinces; besides the islands of Jamaica, Barbadoes, Bermudas, and others of less note. The French soon gained also a considerable northern tract of land along ing the river St. Lawrence, in Canada. And the arch, who it could hardly be expected would see fine a country cut out and divided among their neighbours without laying hands on some good are in this common dividend, secured also to themselves a footing at Curaçao and Surinam, in S.

 America. And they have since made such progress along the river Amazons, and into the country of Berbices, &c. and carry on there so considerable and advantageous a commerce with the inhabitants of those parts that this company is by far the richest in Holland. But all these put together amount to nothing in comparison with what the Spaniards have made themselves masters of, and still possess;
 having no competitors on the coast of the South-sea, where their dominions extend from lat. 40. N. to 45. S. that is, above 5000 miles in length: and to the northern and southern tracts on each side, they are still possessed by the original natives. In these vast conquests made by the several European nations above-mentioned, Christianity hath in the measure abolished the ancient superstition and idolatry which reigned there; so that little or nothing of these remain, except in the northern and southern parts yet unsubdued; but which are still very considerable. Most of the European nations, however, have contented themselves with making them and advantageous settlements for commerce in those parts, without endeavouring to subdue and en-slave the inhabitants to their obedience; and instead of forcing them, whether they would or no, to embrace Christianity, have left them at liberty to live and believe as they thought fit. But the Spaniards have taken a quite contrary method; and, by forcing the nations which they conquered to embrace also their religion, have so far propagated it that they have now some millions of these subjects, among which all the traces of ancient heathenish idolatry are quite effaced, and the Romish church universally established that they have no less than archbishoprics, 26 bishoprics, 2 universities, above 100 monasteries, a much greater number of hospitals, and parishes almost without number. This new and extensive world is variously divided by geographers, as first into continents and islands; and the former of these into northern and southern,
 and thence called North and South-America.
 These two countries being as it were divided by nature, and almost cut asunder by the sea on the eastern and western sides, and only joined by a narrow neck of land, called the Isthmus of Darien; which has the city of Panama on one side, and Nombre de Dios on the other. This isthmus, which is computed to be about 20 leagues or 60 miles in breadth, or even less: for authors are not agreed exactly about it; it is all that parts the Gulph of Mexico and the South-seas. Notwithstanding the many settlements of the Europeans in this conti-ment, great part of America remains still unknown.

 The northern continent contains the British colonies of Hudson's-bay, Canada, Nova-Scotia, New-England, New-York, New-Jersey, Pennsylvania,
 Maryland, Virginia, North and South-Carolina, Georgia, and East and West Florida. Contains also the Spanish territories of Louisiana, New-Mexico, California, and Mexico. Besides these, there are immense regions to the west and north, the boundaries of which have never yet been discovered.
 In such as are in any degree known dwell the Esquimaux, the Algonquins, the Hurons, the Iroquois, the Cherokees, the Chickasaws, and many other tribes of Indians. In the southern continent lie the Spanish provinces of Terra Firma, Guiana, Peru, Paraguay, and Chili; together with that of Brasil, belonging to the Portuguese; and the country of Surinam, belonging to the Dutch. Vast tracts, however, in the inland parts, are unknown, being comprehended under the general name of Amazonia. A large district also, said to be the residence of a gigantic race of men, lies on the south-east end of the continent, between the straits of Magelhaen and the province of Paraguay.

It is universally acknowledged that the acquisition of these countries was not effected without the most horrid devastations, and massacres of the inhabitants, by the Spaniards. The riches they afford have also been the occasion of much bloodshed among the Europeans themselves; and indeed, were the advantages which the Europeans have gained from their conquests in America, duly contrasted with the losses they have sustained from them, it is doubtful whether the latter would not preponderate. It is undeniable, however, that many real and solid advantages have accrued to the Europeans by their connexions with this continent. Gold and silver have been rendered more plentiful in the European regions than ever they were before. The Materia Medica hath been enriched by the acquisition of the Peruvian bark and Ipecacuanha; medicines of so great efficacy that their good effects may justly be supposed to balance the bad consequences of the venereal disease, said to be imported from thence. But of the riches of America, as well as the history of its different provinces, their inhabitants, manners and customs, &c. we shall treat particularly under the names of each as they occur in alphabetical order.

When the thirst of gold first carried the inhabitants of Europe beyond the Atlantic, they found the inhabitants of the new world immersed in what they reckoned barbarity, but which, however, was a state of honest independence and noble simplicity. Except the inhabitants of the great empires of Peru and Mexico, who, comparatively speaking, were refined nations, the natives of America were unacquainted with almost every European art; even agriculture itself, the most useful of them all, was hardly known, or cultivated very sparingly. The only method on which they depended for acquiring the necessaries of life was by hunting the wild animals which their mountains and forests supplied in great abundance. This exercise, which among them is a common occupation, gives both strength and agility to their limbs unknown among other nations. The same cause perhaps renders their bodies in general, where the rays of the sun are not too violent, uncommonly straight and well proportioned. Their muscles are firm and strong; their bodies and heads flattish, which is the effect of art; their features are regular, but their countenances fierce, their hair long, black, lank, and as strong as that of a horse. The colour of their skin is a reddish brown, admired among them, and heightened by the constant use of bears' fat and paint. The character of the Indians is altogether founded upon their circumstances and way of life. A people who are constantly employed in procuring the means of a precarious subsistence, who live by hunting the wild animals, and who are generally engaged in war with their neighbours, cannot be supposed to enjoy much gaiety of temper, or a high flow of spirits. The Indians therefore are in general grave even to sadness; they have nothing of that giddy vivacity peculiar to some nations in Europe, and they despise it. Their behaviour to those about them is regular, modest and respectful. Ignorant of the arts of amusement, of which that of saying trifles agreeably is one of the most considerable, they never speak but when they have something important to observe, and all their actions, words, and even looks, are attended with some meaning. This is extremely natural to men who are almost continually engaged in pursuits which to them are of the highest importance. Their subsistence depends entirely on what they procure with their hands; and their lives, their honour, and every thing dear to them, may be lost by the smallest inattention to the designs of their enemies. As they have no particular object to attach them to one place rather than another, they fly to wherever they expect to find the necessaries of life in greatest abundance. Cities, which are the effects of agriculture and arts, they have none. The different tribes, or nations, are for the same reason extremely small, when compared with civilized societies, in which industry, arts, agriculture, and commerce, have united a vast number of individuals, whom a complicated luxury renders useful to one another. These small tribes live at an immense distance; they are separated by a desert frontier, and hid in the bosom of impenetrable and almost boundless forests. There is established in each society a certain species of government, which over the whole continent of America prevails with very little or no variation; because over the whole of this continent the manners and way of life are nearly similar and uniform. Without arts, riches, or luxury, the great instruments of subjection in polished societies, an American has no method by which he can render himself considerable among his companions, but by a superiority in personal qualities of body or mind. But as nature has not been very lavish in her personal distinctions, where all enjoy the same education, all are pretty much equal, and will desire to remain so. Liberty therefore is the prevailing passion of the Americans; and their government, under the influence of this sentiment, is better secured than by the wisest political regulations. They are very far, however, from despising all sorts of authority: they are attentive to the voice of wisdom, which experience has conferred on the aged; and they enlist under the banners of the chief, in whose valour and military address they have learned to repose their confidence. In every society therefore there is to be considered the power of the chief and of the elders; and, according as the government inclines more to the one or the other, it may be regarded as monarchical, or as a species of aristocracy. Among those tribes which are most engaged in war, the power of the chief is naturally predominant, because the idea of having a military leader was the first source of his superiority, and the continual exigencies of the state requiring such a leader will continue to support and even to enhance it. His power, however, is rather persuasive than coercive: he is revered as a father rather than feared as a monarch. He has no guards, no prisons, no officers of justice, and one act of ill-judged violence would pull him from the throne. The elders, in the other form of government, which may be considered as an aristocracy, have no more power. In some tribes indeed there are a kind of hereditary nobility, whose influence being constantly augmented by time is more considerable. But this source of power, which depends chiefly on the imagination, by which we annex to the merit of our cotemporaries that of their forefathers, is too refined to be very common among the natives of America. In most countries therefore age alone is sufficient for acquiring respect, influence, and authority. It is age which teaches experience, and experience is the only source of knowledge among a barbarous people. Among those persons business is conducted with the utmost simplicity, and which may recall to those who are acquainted with antiquity a picture of the most early ages. The heads of families meet together in a house or cabin appointed for a purpose. Here is the business discussed, and here those of the nation distinguished for their eloquence or wisdom have an opportunity of displaying those talents. Their orators, like those of Homer, express themselves in a bold figurative style, stronger than refined, or rather softened nations, can well bear, and with gestures equally violent, but often extremely natural and expressive. When the business is over, and they happen to be well provided in food, they appoint a feast upon the occasion, of which almost the whole nation partakes. The feast is accompanied with a song, in which the real or fabulous exploits of their forefathers are celebrated. They have dances too, though, like those of the Greeks and Romans, chiefly of the military kind, and their music and dancing accompanies every feast. It often happens that those different tribes or nations, scattered as they are at an immense distance from one another, meet in their excursions after prey. If there subsists no animosity between them, which seldom is the case, they behave in the most friendly and courteous manner; but if they happen to be in a state of war, or if there has been no previous intercourse between them, all who are not friends being deemed enemies, they fight with the most savage fury. War, if we except hunting, is the only employment of the men; as to every other concern, and even the little agriculture they enjoy, it is left to the women. Their most common motive for entering into a war, when it does not arise from an accidental rencounter or interference, is either to revenge themselves for the death of some lost friend, or to acquire prisoners, who may assist them in their hunting, and whom they adopt into their society. These wars are either undertaken by some private adventurers, or at the instance of the whole community. In the latter case all the young men, who are disposed to go out to battle, for no one is compelled, contrary to his inclination, give a bit of wood to the chief as a token of their design to accompany him: for every thing among these people is transacted with a great deal of ceremony and many forms. The chief who is to conduct them fasts several days, during which he converses with no one, and is particularly careful to observe his dreams, which the presumption natural to savages generally renders as favourable as he could desire. A variety of other superstitious and ceremonies are observed. One of the most hideous is setting the war kettle on the fire, as an emblem that they are going out to devour their enemies, which among some nations must formerly have been the case, since they still continue to express it in clear terms, and use an emblem significant of the ancient usage. Then they dispatch a large shell to their allies, inviting them to come along, and drink the blood of their enemies. They think that those in their alliance must not only adopt their enmities, but have their resentment wound up to the same pitch with themselves. And indeed no people carry their friendships, or their resentments, so far as they do; and this is what should be expected from their peculiar circumstances; that principle in human nature, which is the spring of the social affections, acts with so much the greater force the more it is restrained. The Americans, who live in small societies, who see few objects and few persons, become wonderfully attached to these objects and persons, and cannot be deprived of them, without feeling themselves miserable. Their ideas are too confined, their breasts are too narrow to entertain the sentiments of general benevolence, or even of ordinary humanity. But this very circumstance, while it makes them cruel and savage to an incredible degree, towards those with whom they are at war, adds a new force to their particular friendships, and to the common tie which unites the members of the same tribe or of those different tribes which are in alliance with one another. Without attending to this reflection, some facts we are going to relate, would excite our wonder without informing our reason, and we should be bewildered in a number of particulars seemingly opposite to one another, without without being sensible of the general cause from which they proceed. Having finished all the ceremonies previous to the war, they issue forth with their faces blackened with charcoal, intermixed with streaks of vermilion, which give them a most horrid appearance. Then they exchange their clothes with their friends, and dispose of all their finery to the women, who accompany them a considerable distance to receive those last tokens of eternal friendship. The great qualities in an Indian war are vigilance and attention, to give and to avoid a surprise; and indeed in these they are superior to all nations in the world. Accustomed to continual wandering in the forests, having their perceptions sharpened by keen necessity, and living in every respect according to nature, their external senses have a degree of acuteness which at first view appears incredible. They can trace out their enemies, at an immense distance, by the smoke of their fires, which they smell, and by the tracks of their feet on the ground, imperceptible to an European eye, but which they can count and distinguish with the utmost facility. They even distinguish the different nations with whom they are acquainted, and can determine the precise time when they passed, where an European could not, with all his glasses, distinguish footsteps at all. These circumstances, however, are of small importance, because their enemies are no less acquainted with them. When they go out, therefore, they take care to avoid making use of any thing by which they might run the danger of a discovery. They light no fire to warm themselves, or to prepare their victuals; they lie close to the ground all day, and travel only in the night; and marching along in files, he that closes the rear diligently covers with leaves the tracks of his own feet, and of theirs who preceded him. When they halt to refresh themselves, scouts are sent out to reconnoitre the country, and beat up every place where they suspect an enemy may lie concealed. In this manner they enter unawares the villages of their foes, and while the flower of the nation are engaged in hunting, massacre all the children, women, and helpless old men, or make prisoners of as many as they can manage, or have strength enough to be useful to their nation. But when the enemy is apprized of their design, and coming on in arms against them, they throw themselves flat on the ground among the withered herbs and leaves, which their faces are painted to resemble. Then they allow a part to pass unmolested, when all at once, with a tremendous shout, rising up from their ambush, they pour a storm of musket bullets on their foes. The party attacked returns the same cry. Every one shelters himself with a tree, and returns the fire of the adverse party, as soon as they raise themselves from the ground to give a second fire. Thus does the battle continue until one party is so much weakened as to be incapable of farther resistance. But if the force on each side continues nearly equal, the fierce spirits of the savages, inflamed by the loss of their friends, can no longer be restrained. They abandon this distant war, they rush upon one another with clubs and hatchets in their hands, magnify their own courage, and insulting their enemies with the bitterest reproaches. A cruel combat ensues, death appears in a thousand hideous forms, which would congeal the blood of civilised nations to behold, but which rouse the fury of savages. They trample, they insult over the dead bodies, tearing the scalp from the head, wallowing in their blood like wild beasts, and sometimes devouring their flesh. The flame rages on till it meets with no resistance, then the prisoners are secured, those unhappy men, whose fate is a thousand times more dreadful than theirs who have died in the field. The conquerors set up a hideous howling to lament the friends they have lost. They approach in a melancholy and severe gloom to their own village, a messenger is sent to announce their arrival, and the women with frightful shrieks come out to mourn their dead brothers, or their husbands. When they are arrived, the chief relates in a low voice to the elders a circumstantial account of every particular of the expedition. The orator proclaims aloud this account to the people, and as he mentions the names of those who have fallen, the shrieks of the women are redoubled. The men too join in these cries, according as each is most connected with the deceased, by blood or friendship. The last ceremony is the proclamation of the victory: each individual then forgets his private misfortune, and joins in the triumph of his nation; all tears are wiped from their eyes, and by an unaccountable transition they pass in a moment from the bitterness of sorrow to an extravagance of joy. But the treatment of the prisoners, whose fate all this time remains undecided, is what chiefly characterises the savages. We have already mentioned the strength of their affections or resentments. United as they are in small societies, connected within themselves by the firmest ties, their friendly affections, which glow with the most intense warmth within the walls of their own village, seldom extend beyond them. They feel nothing for the enemies of their nation; and their resentment is easily extended from the individual who has injured them to all others of the same tribe. The prisoners, who have themselves the same feelings, know the intentions of the conquerors, and are prepared for them. The person who has taken the captive attends him to the cottage, where, according to the distribution made by the elders, he is delivered to supply the loss of a citizen. If those who receive him have their family weakened by war or other accidents, they adopt the captive into the family, of which he becomes becomes a member: but if they have no occasion for him, or the resentment for the loss of their friends be too high to endure the sight of any connected with those who were concerned in it, they sentence him to death. All those who have met with the same severe sentence being collected, the whole nation is assembled at the execution, as for some great solemnity. A scaffold is erected, and the prisoners are tied to the stake, where they commence their death-song, and prepare for the ensuing scene of cruelty with the most undaunted courage. The enemies, on the other side, are determined to put it to the proof, by the most refined and exquisite tortures. They begin at the extremity of his body, and gradually approach the more vital parts. One plucks out his nails by the roots, one by one; another takes a finger into his mouth, and tears off the flesh with his teeth; a third thrusts the finger, mangled as it is, into a bowl of a pipe made red hot, which he smokes like tobacco; then they pound his toes and fingers to pieces between two stones; they pull off the flesh from the teeth, and cut circles about his joints, and gashes in the fleshy parts of his limbs, which they sear immediately with red hot irons, cutting, burning, and pinching them alternately; they pull off his flesh, thus mangled and roasted, bit by bit, devouring it with greediness, and smearing their faces with the blood in an enthusiasm of horror and fury. When they have thus torn off the flesh, they twist the bare nerves and tendons about an iron, tearing and snapping them, whilst others are employed in pulling and extending the limbs in every way that can increase the torment. This continues often five or six hours, and sometimes, such is the strength of the savages, days together. Then they frequently unbind him, to give a breathing to their fury, to think what new torments they shall inflict, and to refresh the strength of the sufferer, who, wearied out with such a variety of unheard-of torments, often falls into so profound a sleep that they are obliged to apply the fire to awake him and renew his sufferings. He is again fastened to the stake, and again they renew their cruelty; they stick him all over with small matches of wood, that easily take fire but burn slowly; they continually run sharp reeds into every part of his body; they drag out his teeth with pincers, and thrust out his eyes; and lastly, after having burned his flesh from the bones with slow fire; after having so mangled the body that it is all but one wound; after having mutilated the face in such a manner as to carry nothing human in it; after having peeled the skin from the head, and poured a heap of red hot coals, or boiling water, on the naked skull, they once more unbind the wretch, who, blind, and staggering with pain and weakness, assaulted and pelted upon every side with clubs and stones, now up, now down, falling into their fires at every step, runs hither and thither, until one of the chiefs, whether out of compassion, or weary of cruelty, puts an end to his life with a club or a dagger. The body is then put into a kettle, and this barbarous employment is succeeded by a feast as barbarous. The women, forgetting the human as well as the female nature, and transformed into something worse than furies, act their parts, and even out-do the men in this scene of horror, while the principal persons of the country sit round the stake smoking, and looking on without the least emotion. What is most extraordinary, the sufferer himself, in the little intervals of his torments, smokes too, and converses with his torturers about indifferent matters. Indeed, during the whole time of his execution, there seems a contest between him and them which shall exceed, they in inflicting the most horrid pains, or he in enduring them, with a firmness and constancy almost above human; not a groan, not a sigh, not a distortion of countenance escapes him; he possesses his mind entirely in the midst of his torments; he recounts his own exploits; he informs them what cruelties he has inflicted upon their countrymen, and threatens them with the revenge that will attend his death; and, though his reproaches exasperate them to a perfect madness and fury, he continues his insults even of their ignorance of the art of tormenting, pointing out himself more exquisite methods, and more sensible parts of the body to be afflicted. The women have this part of courage as well as the men; and it is as rare for an Indian to behave otherwise, as it would be for any European to suffer as an Indian. Such is the wonderful power of an early institution, and a ferocious thirst of glory. I do not dwell upon these circumstances of cruelty, which so degrade human nature, out of choice; but, as all who mention the customs of this people have insisted upon their behaviour in this respect very particularly, and as it seems necessary to give a true idea of their character, I did not choose to omit it. And what is still more important, it serves to shew in the strongest light to what an inconceivable degree of barbarity, to what a pitch the passions of men may be carried, when untamed by the refinements of polished society, when let loose from the government of reason, and uninfluenced by the dictates of Christianity; a religion that teaches compassion to our enemies, which is neither known nor practised in other institutions; and it will make us more sensible than some appear to be, of the value of commerce, the arts of a civilised life, and the light of literature; which, if they have abated the force of some of the natural virtues by the luxury which attends them, have taken out likewise the sting of our natural vices, and softened the ferocity city of the human race. Nothing in the history of mankind, as I have already observed, forms a stronger contrast than this cruelty of the savages towards those with whom they are at war, and the warmth of their affection towards their friends, who consist of all those who live in the same village, or are in alliance with it; among these all things are common; and thus, though it may in part arise from their not possessing very distinct notions of separate property, is chiefly to be attributed to the strength of their attachment; because in every thing else, with their lives as well as their fortunes, they are ready to serve their friends. Their houses, their provisions, even their young women, are not enough to oblige a guest. Has any one of these succeeded ill in his hunting? has his harvest failed, or is his house burned? he feels no other effect of his misfortune than that it gives him an opportunity to experience the benevolence and regard of his fellow citizens; but to the enemies of his country, or to those who have privately offended, the American is implacable. He conceals his sentiments, he appears reconciled, until by some treachery or surprise he has an opportunity of executing an horrible revenge. No length of time is sufficient to allay his resentment; no distance of place great enough to protect the object; he crosses the steepest mountains, he pierces the most impenetrable forests, and traverses the most hideous bogs and deserts for several hundreds of miles; bearing the inclemency of the seasons, the fatigue of the expedition, the extremes of hunger and thirst, with patience and cheerfulness, in hopes of surprising his enemy, on whom he exercises the most shocking barbarities, even to the eating of his flesh. To such extremes do the Indians push their friendship or their enmity; and such indeed in general is the character of all strong and uncultivated minds. But what we have said respecting the Indians would be a faint picture, did we omit observing the force of their friendship, which principally appears by the treatment of their dead. When any one of the society is cut off, he is lamented by the whole; on this occasion a thousand ceremonies are practised, denoting the most lively sorrow. Of these the most remarkable, as it discovers both the height and continuance of their grief, is what they call the feast of the dead, or the feast of souls. The day of this ceremony is appointed by public order, and nothing is omitted that it may be celebrated with the utmost pomp and magnificence. The neighbouring tribes are invited to be present, and to join the solemnity. At this time all who have died since the last solemn occasion, (which is renewed every ten years among some tribes, and every eight among others) are taken out of their graves; those who have been interred in the greatest distance from the villages are diligently sought for, and brought to this great rendezvous of carcases. It is not difficult to conceive the horror of this general disinterment. I cannot describe it in a more lively manner than it is done by Lafitau, to whom we are indebted for the most authentic account of those nations. Without question, says he, the opening of these tombs displays one of the most striking scenes that can be conceived; this humbling portrait of human misery, in so many images of death; wherein she seems to take a pleasure to paint herself in a thousand various shapes of horror, in the several carcases, according to the degree in which corruption has prevailed over them, or the manner in which it has attacked them. Some appear dry and withered; others have a sort of parchment upon their bones; some look as if they were baked and smoked, without any appearance of rottenness; some are just turning towards the point of putrefaction; whilst others are swarming with worms, and drowned with corruption. I know not which ought to strike us most, the horror of so shocking a sight, or the tender piety and affection of these poor people towards their departed friends; for nothing deserves our admiration more than that eager diligence and attention with which they discharge this melancholy duty of their tenderness; gathering up carefully even the smallest bones; handling the carcases, disgusting as they are, with every thing loathsome, cleansing them from the worms and carrying them upon their shoulders through tiresome journeys of several days, without being discouraged from the offensiveness of the smell, and without suffering any other emotions to arise than those of regret, for having lost persons who were so dear to them in their lives, and so lamented in their death. They bring them into their cottages, where they prepare a feast in honour of their dead, during which their great actions are celebrated, and all the tender intercourses which took place between them and their friends are piously called to mind. The strangers, who have come sometimes many hundred miles to be present on the occasion, join in the tender condolance; and the women, by frightful shrieks, demonstrate that they are pierced with the sharpest sorrow. Then the dead bodies are carried from the cabins for the general reinterment. A great pit is dug in the ground, and thither, at a certain time, each person attended by his family and friends, marches in solemn silence, bearing the dead body of a son, a father, or a brother. When they are all convened, the dead bodies, or the dust of those which were quite corrupted, and deposited in the pit: then the torrent of grief breaks out anew. Whatever they possess most valuable is interred with the dead. The strangers are not wanting in their generosity, and confer those presents which they have brought along with them for the purpose. Then all present go down into the pit, and every one takes a little of the earth, which they afterwards preserve with the most religious care. The bodies, ranged in order, are covered with entire new furs, and over these with bark, on which they throw stones, wood and earth. Then taking their last farewell, they return each to his own cabin.

We have mentioned that in this ceremony the savages offer as presents to the dead, whatever they value most highly. This custom, which is universal among them, arises from a rude notion of the immortality of the soul. They believe this doctrine most firmly, and it is the principal tenet of their religion. When the soul is separated from the body of their friends, they conceive that it still continues to hover around it, and to require and take delight in the same things with which it formerly was pleased. After a certain time, however it forsakes this dreary mansion, and departs far westward into the land of spirits. They have even gone so far as to make a distinction between the inhabitants of the other world; some they imagine, particularly those who in their life-time have been fortunate in war, possess a high degree of happiness, have a place for hunting and fishing, which never fails, and enjoy all sensual delights, without labouring hard in order to procure them. The souls of those, on the contrary, who happen to be conquered or slain in war, are extremely miserable after death. A future state therefore is not at all considered among the savages as a place of retribution, as the reward of humble virtue, or as the punishment of prosperous vice. They rather judge of our happiness in the next world by what we have enjoyed in the present. Their taste for war, which forms the chief ingredient in their character, gives a strong bias to their religion. Areskouï, or the god of battle, is revered as the great god of the Indians. Him they invoke before they go into the field: according as his disposition is more or less favourable to them, they conclude they will be more or less successful. Some nations worship the sun and moon; among others there are a number of traditions, relative to the creation of the world, and the history of the gods: traditions which resemble the Grecian fables, but which are still more absurd and inconsistent. But religion is not the prevailing character of the Indians; and except when they have some immediate occasion for the assistance of their gods, they pay them no sort of worship. Like all rude nations, however, they are strongly addicted to superstition. They believe in the existence of a number of good and bad genii or spirits, who interfere in the affairs of mortals, and produce all our happiness or misery. It is from the evil genii, in particular, that our diseases proceed; and it is to the good genii we are indebted for a cure. The ministers of the genii are the jugglers, who are also the only physicians among the savages. These jugglers are supposed to be inspired by the good genii, most commonly in their dreams, with the knowledge of future events; they are called in to the assistance of the sick, and are supposed to be informed by the genii whether they will get over the disease, and in what way they must be treated. But these spirits are extremely simple in their system of physic, and, in almost every disease, direct the juggler to the same remedy. The patient is inclosed in a narrow cabin, in the midst of which is a stone red hot; on this they throw water, until he is well soaked with the warm vapour and his own sweat. Then they hurry him from the bagnio, and plunge him suddenly into the next river. This coarse method, which costs many their lives, often performs very extraordinary cures. The jugglers have likewise the use of some specifics of wonderful efficacy; and all the savages are dexterous in curing wounds by the application of herbs. But the power of these remedies is always attributed to the magical ceremonies with which they are administered.

AMERSFORT, AMERSFOORT, or AEMSFORT, in Latin Amisfortia, a considerable town, and the second in rank in the province of Utrecht. It stands in a pleasant fertile country on the river Eern, which first receives that name here, and becomes navigable. At this port are shipped the goods brought from Germany by Hessian waggons consigned to Amsterdam. The tobacco grown and spun here is much decayed, as is the trade in beer, but the new erected dimity and bombazine manufactures are in a thriving way. Here are two calvinist churches, an hospital, and a public school. In 1543 it was pillaged by the troops of Gelderland, and in 1561 was much enlarged. The Spaniards took it in 1629, and the Marquis of Rochfort took it for the French in 1672. Their government is much like that of Utrecht, and they enjoy nearly the same privileges. Just upon the edge of a hill near here, stands Suetf-dyke, a palace of the late King William. Amerfort lies fourteen miles N. E. of Utrecht. Lat. 52, 25, N. Long. 5, 20, E.

AMERSHAM, or AGMOMDESHAM, a small market-town and borough of Bucks, very ancient, and situated in the Chiltern, a sort of hills which abound with chalk, and are covered with beech-woods and groves. It lies in a vale, in the hundred of Burnham, and not far from Wickham. It is twenty nine miles almost W. from London, near the river Coln; is governed by two burgesses, has a handsome market-house, town-hall, and free-school. Its fairs are holden on Whitfun-Monday and September 19.

AMESBURY, AMBRESBURY, AMBLESBURY, or AMBROSEBURY, as it is written in Doomsday-Book; a very old market-town in Wiltshire, pretty large, and situated on the E. side of the river Avon.

Its market is almost discontinued. It is said to have taken its name from Ambrius, who founded here a monastery for Benedictines, long before the coming in of the Saxons, which last destroyed it; or from Aurelius Ambrose, a British prince, who rebuilt it, and filled it with 300 monks, to pray for the souls of those noble Britons who were slain by the treachery of the perfidious Hengist the Saxon, who massacred here 271 of the ancient British nobility in cold blood, whom he had invited, with their king Vortigern, to meet him here without arms, in order to treat of a league of amity, and rejoice together. The treacherous Saxon saved only the King alive, whom he obliged to give him near a third of his kingdom eastward, before he would set him at liberty. The monastery was afterwards converted into a nunnery, and Eleanor, King Henry III.'s wife, retired and died here: whose example induced the Princess Mary, Edward I.'s daughter, and thirteen noblemen's daughters, to take the veil together in this house. The Duke of Queensberry has a seat here, built by Inigo Jones. It is not much to be admired; but the gardens are delightful, the late Duke having inclosed and planted a steep hill, at the foot of which the river Avon winds charmingly, as also through great part of the garden. Over this river there is a bridge and Chinese summer-house. The town was consumed by fire in 1753, since which it has been rebuilt in a more elegant taste. It has many good inns, it being a thoroughfare from Bridgewater, and the places adjacent, to London, from which it is distant about eighty miles, as it is about eight from Salisbury. This town consists of a long street, divided about the middle by a shorter cross street; in the intersection of which stands the church. Its town-hall or market-house is the handsomest in the county, being a brick structure on arched pillars, and has on the top a lantern and clock. Market on Tuesdays. On the river the late duke also built a handsome bridge for the public benefit. It drives but little trade; has two fairs yearly, viz. on the longest and shortest day. Near it is dug the best kind of pipe-clay. About a mile to the N. W. of this town is Stonehenge, (which see.) A charity-school was erected here in 1715, for fifteen boys and as many girls. Market on Fridays, and fairs May 17, June 22, October 6, and the first Wednesday after Dec. 12.

AMHAR, or AMHARA, a province of Abyssinia, said to extend forty leagues from east to west. It is considered as the most noble in the whole empire, both on account of its being the usual residence of the Abyssinian monarchs, and having a particular dialect different from all the rest, which, by reason of the emperors being brought up in this province, is become the language of the court and of the politer people. Here is the famed rock Amba-geshen, where formerly the young monarchs were confined. See AMBA.

AMIDA, a great city of Mesopotamia, or Am-mæa; situated on a high mountain on the borders of Assyria, on the Tigris, where it receives the Nymphius. It was taken from the Romans in the time of the emperor Constant by Sapores, king of Persia. The siege is said to have cost him 30,000 men; however, he reduced it to such ruin that the emperor afterwards wept over it. According to Ammianus Marcellinus, the city was razed; the chief officers were crucified; and the rest, with the soldiers and inhabitants, either put to the sword or carried into captivity, except our historian himself, and two or three more, who, in the dead of the night, escaped through a postern unperceived by the enemy. The inhabitants of Nisibis, however being obliged to leave their own city by Jovian's treaty with the Persians, soon restored Amida to its former strength; but it was again taken by Cavadés in 501, but was restored to the Romans in 503. On the declension of the Roman power it fell again into the hands of the Persians; but was taken from them by the Saracens in 899. It is now in the possession of the Turks. Here are above 20,000 Christians, who are better treated by the Turks than in other places. A great trade is carried on in this city of red Turkey leather, and cotton cloth of the same colour. The Arabian name of Amida is Diarbekir, and the Turkish one Kara-Amed. Long. 39, 0, E. Lat. 36, 58, N.

AMIEIRA, a small place in the audience of Crato and province of Alentejo, in Portugal.

AMIENOIS (county of) in Latin Ambianensis ager, an under-stadtholdership, with Ponthieu and Vimeu, belonging to Picardy, in the government of the latter, together with Artois, in France. It is so called from Amiens, its capital; and is bounded by Artois on the N. by Santerre on the E. by Beauvaisis on the S. and by the country of Caux on the W. It includes a great part of that tract of land which was anciently inhabited by the Ambriani, from which both the capital and country seem to take their names. It is now called Picardy Proper. The river Somme runs across this country, which is very fruitful. Formerly the bishops of Amiens obtained the sovereignty over it from the kings of France, under the title of a county or earldom. In 1185, Philip the August annexed it to the crown. Charles VII. gave it to Philip the Good, duke of Burgundy; and in 1477, Lewis XI. united it again to the crown.

AMIENS, in Latin Ambienum, Ambicnum, anciently Samarobriua, Samarobrica, or Samarobriga, so called from its situation on the river Somme. It is the capital of Picardy and county of Amienois, and is a place of great antiquity, the inhabitants of which fought resolutely against Julius Cæsar, and even even took up arms against those of Rheims, only for yielding too easily to the conqueror. Cæsar erected here a magazine for his army, and caused a general assembly of the people of Gaul to be convened in this city. It was enlarged by the emperor Antoninus Pius, as also by his son Marcus Aurelius. The emperors Constantine, Constans, Julian, Valentinian, Valens, Gratian, and Theodosius chose Amiens for their royal seat in Gaul: yet in 925 it suffered very much from the incursions of the Alans, Vandals, and Normans, having been almost entirely burnt; but it was rebuilt soon after. At present Amiens has the title of a vidamy or subordinate feignory or lordship. It is the residence of a general-governor, an upper-bailiff, and under-governor or stadtholder; the seat of a generality, an intendency, election, provincial-court, mint-office, a provostship for Amienois, and another for Beauvaisis. It has also an office for tobacco and the finances, a forest-district, a marshalsea, and a salt-house. This city affords a very pleasant prospect, by reason of the largeness of its streets, which are mostly straight, broad, and well-built, as also on account of the height of the houses and extent of the open squares, of which last are two in Amiens, where seven fine streets meet. On the ramparts are planted two rows of trees, forming a delightful walk. The Somme enters the city by three different channels, through as many bridges; when, after watering several parts of the town, they unite again at the other end, near St. Michael's-bridge. Here is a noble and stately cathedral dedicated to the Virgin Mary, and one of the finest in France; its columns, choir, chapels, tombs, and paintings being admirable, especially the gate, which is flanked with two high towers, on which are several statues. Among other reliques in the cathedral is the head of John the Baptist. Here is a collegiate-church, a chapter of St. Nicolas, fourteen parish-churches, a seminary, a Jesuits college, a general hospital, besides another hospital, several abbeys and houses of religious orders. It has a peculiar and independent jurisdiction, with an academy of the sciences and fine arts; which till the year 1750 had been only a society of learned men. In Amiens are manufactured great quantities of woollen ribands or ferrets, serges or woollen stuffs, half-silk stuffs, and a great deal of black and green soap. The bishop is suffragan to the metropolis of Rheims; and to his diocese belongs, besides the cathedral, 12 collegiate churches, 26 abbeys, 55 priories, 780 parishes, 103 chapels of ease, 48 communities, 6 colleges, 2 general hospitals, besides 6 others; and his annual income is 30,000 livres. He pays the court of Rome a tax of 4900 florins. King Philip VI. of Valois fortified this city, which Lewis XI. much improved by additional works; and Henry IV. built a strong citadel after retaking this place from the Spaniards, who had seized it by stratagem in the year 1597. Queen Isabel of Bavaria established a parliament here; but it was afterwards suppressed. Amiens lies in the road between Calais and Paris, 65 miles S. of the former, and 80 N. of the latter. Lat. 49. 53. N. Long. 2, 23. E.

AMILIA. See AMELIA.

AMILPAS, two volcanoes in the province of Guatimala, in New-Spain, North-America, near the mountains of Soconusco.

AMISUS, the chief city of the ancient kingdom of Pontus. It was built by the Milesians, and peopled partly by them, and partly by a colony from Athens. It was at first a free city, like the other Greek-towns in Asia; but was afterwards subdued by Pharnaces, king of Pontus, who made it his metropolis. It was taken by Lucullus in the Mithridatic-war, who restored it to its ancient liberty. Near this city stood another, called Eupatoria, from Mithridates Eupator, its founder. This city was likewise taken by Lucullus, who levelled it with the ground; but it was afterwards rebuilt by Pompey, who united it with Amisus, giving them the name of Pompeiopolis. It was taken during the war between Cæsar and Pompey by Pharnaces, king of Pontus, who put most of its inhabitants to the sword; but Cæsar, having conquered Pharnaces, made it again a free city.

AMITERNUM, a town of the Sabines, in Italy, now extinct. The ruins are to be seen on the level ridge of a mountain near S. Vittorino and the springs of the Aternus; not far from Aquila, which rose out of the ruins of Amiternum.

AMIX, one of the five districts into which the kingdom of Lower Navarre is divided. It belongs to the government of Navarre and Bearn, in France.

AMLAK, one of the Andreanoffky Ostrova, or the islands of St. Andrean. See ANDREANOFFSKY-ISLANDS and FOX-ISLANDS.

AMLWICK, a village in North-Wales, on the N. side of the isle of Anglesey; which has a fair on Nov. 12.

AMMER-MOUNTAINS, in Africa; high and rugged; supposed to be a part of the Mons Phræus of Ptolemy, in the country of the Melanogæti, by Dr. Shaw, seeing they succeed immediately the Maethubalus.

AMMERSWEYER, a small town of the barony of High Landsperg, in Upper Alsace, and government of this last name in France. It belongs to Baron Leyhen. Lat. 49, 10, N. Long. 8, 10, E.

AMMON, anciently a city of Marmarica. Arrian calls it a place, not a city, in which stood the temple of Jupiter Ammon, round which there was nothing but sandy wastes. Pliny says, That the oracle of Ammon was 12 days journey from Memphis; and among the Nomi of Egypt he reckons the the Nomos Ammoniacus : Diodorus Siculus, That the district where the temple stood, though surrounded with deserts, was watered by dews which fell no where else in all that country. It was agreeably adorned with fruitful trees and springs, and full of villages. In the middle stood the acropolis or citadel, encompassed with a triple wall, the first and inmost of which contained the palace ; the others the apartments of the women, the relations and children, as also the temple of the god, and the sacred fountain for lustrations. Without the acropolis stood, at no great distance, another temple of Ammon, shaded by a great number of tall trees ; near which was a fountain, called that of the Sun, or Solis Fons, because subject to extraordinary changes according to the time of the day ; morning and evening warm, at noon cold, at midnight extremely hot. A kind of fossil salt was said to be naturally produced here. It was dug out of the earth in large oblong pieces, sometimes three fingers in length, and transparent as crystal. It was thought to be a present worthy of kings, and used by the Egyptians in their sacrifices. From this our sal-ammoniac has taken its name.

AMMONITES (the country of the). The children of Ammon possessed the country called, after their own name, Ammonitis, adjoining to the N. of Moabitis, after having driven out the Zuzims, or Zamzummins, as they called them, who were giants, tall as the Anakims, and the ancient inhabitants of the land, Deut. ii. 20, 21. This country, as well as Moabitis, is by Stephens (de Urbibus in Amanon) reckoned a part of Cœle-Syria, and by others Arabia ; and was, in its first state under the Ammonites, bounded by the river Jaboc N. (Judg. xi. 13.) though elsewhere (Josh. xiii. 24, 25.) it seems as if extended beyond that, N. into the mountains of Gilead. On the W. it had the Jordan, S. the Arnon (Judg. xi. 13.) or the confines of Moabitis, E. the deserts of Arabia.

AMOL, a town of Asia, in the country of the Usbecks ; seated on the river Gihun. Long. 64, 30, E. Lat. 39, 20.

AMOL, one of the names of the river Gihun, in Asiatic Russia. See GIHUN.

AMOND, a river in Carmarthenshire, Wales ; which empties itself into the Lougher above Bettus.

AMONEBURG, in Latin Amana, a small town in the bishopric of Mentz ; standing on an eminence, around which an arm of the river Ohm winds itself. Here is a collegiate foundation, dedicated to John the Baptist. It was taken by the French in 1762.

AMON-NO. This city, which in our translation is rendered No (Jer. xli. 25. Ezek. xxx. 15, 16.) is by those we call the Seventy Interpreters rendered Diospolis, or the City of Jove. There was a city of this name, lying on the branch of the Nile, which was next westward to that which ran by Zoan, or Tanais. But Bochart thinks that by the Diospolis of the Seventy is rather to be understood the more famous city of that name in the S. part of Egypt, otherwise called Thebæ. And he supposes that by Jove, from whom this city took its name of Diospolis, is to be understood Ham, third son of Noah, and father of Mizraim, from whom descended the Egyptians.

AMONT, or GRAY, one of the four bailiwicks, or districts, into which the government of Franche Comté, in France, is divided. It includes three subordinate bailiwicks, namely, Vesoul, Gray, and Beaume.

AMORBACH, a small town on the rivulet of Mudt, in the bishopric of Mentz ; containing an abbey of Benedictines. To the jurisdiction here belongs the church villages Mudach and Limbach.

AMORGO, MORGO, or MORGOS, anciently AMORGOOS, an island of the Archipelago, in European Turkey. It is 36 miles in circuit, stretching from N. to S. and is extremely steep towards the S.E. The soil is pretty fruitful in corn, and well cultivated ; yields oil sufficient for the consumption of its inhabitants, and produces excellent wine and flax. Its fertility invites thither the Tartans of Provence, in France. The town here, which is three miles from the W. port, is built in the form of an amphitheatre on the side of a rock, upon which stands a castle, once the residence of the dukes of the Archipelago, who had been masters of this island for a long time. On the sea-side, three miles from the town, stands a large Greek convent. The best harbour lies on the S. side of this island. It is situated 90 miles N. of Candia. Lat. 37, 10, N. Long. 26, 15, E.

AMORIUM, a town of Phrygia Major, near the river Sangarius, on the borders of Galatia. It was taken from the Romans by the Saracens in 668 ; but soon after retaken by the Romans. A war breaking out again between these two nations in 837, the Roman emperor Theophylus destroyed Sozopetra, the birth-place of the khalif Al' Motasem, notwithstanding his earnest intreaties to him to spare it. This so enraged the khalif, that he ordered every one to engrave upon his shield the word Amorium, the birth-place of Theophylus, which he resolved at all events to destroy. Accordingly he laid siege to the place, but met with a vigorous resistance. At length, after a siege of 55 days, it was betrayed by one of the inhabitants, who had abjured the Christian religion. The khalif, exasperated at the loss he had sustained during the siege, put most of the men to the sword, carried the women and children into captivity, and levelled the city with the ground. His forces being distressed for want of water on their return home, the Christian prisoners rose upon some of them, and and murdered them; upon which the khalif put 6000 of the prisoners to death. According to the eastern historians 30,000 of the inhabitants of Amorium were slain, and as many carried into captivity.

AMORRHITIS, the country of the Amorites, situated, according to Josephus, between three rivers, like an island: the Arnon on the south, the Jabbok on the north, and the Jordan on the west. The Amorites, or Amorrhæi, took their name from Amor, or Emor, the son of Canaan. They dwelt in the mountains of Judah to the south, and in some parts mixed with the Hethæi; also about Sichem: but a great part of them crossed the Jordan, and in a hostile manner occupied a considerable part of the country of the Moabites and Ammonites, which afterwards fell to the Israelites, on the defeat of Sihon their king.

AMORITES, (the Mountains of the) a ridge of mountains which part Canaan from Arabia, and which seem to be denoted in scripture by the name of the Mountains of the Amorites, some spurs or branches whereof run up N. to Hebron.

AMOTAPE, a town near Tumbaz, near the shore of the South-seas, in Peru, S. America. It is an appendix to the parish of Tumbaz, belonging to its lieutenancy. The houses are few, and built of wood, like those of Tumbaz; but near it is a river of fine water, which occasions all the adjacent country to be cultivated and improved; so that here are to be found plenty of the several grains, esculent vegetables, and fruits natural to a hot climate. Lat. 4, 15, S. Long. 77, 26, W.

AMOUR, a large river in Asia, that separates the Mongol desert (in which country it takes its rise) from Siberia. It separates in the country of the Manchurs, when one part falls into the sea of Ochotsk near the island of Sakalin Ula, and the other into the bay of Corea, and the Indian ocean.

AMOY, or EMOY, or, according as others write it, A-mwy, Emoui, and Hya-men; an island belonging to the province of Fokien, on the S. W. coast of China. It takes its name from the town, which is a convenient sea-port, on account of the road formed by the island and the continent, where the largest vessels may ride safely, and come as near the land as they will, the sea being very deep there. The resort, and consequently the commerce, of this place hath increased so much since the last century that the emperor, we are told, keeps a constant garrison in it of 7000 men under a Chinese governor. Here the English East-India company had a factory, which they have quite abandoned, and have gone to Canton, where they are not so much imposed upon as they were by the Chinese about Amoy. Near this island are a number of other small ones; the most considerable among these is Ponghu. Amoy is situated in lat. 25, 5, N. Long. 112, 20, E.

AMPALLA. See AMAPALLA.

AMPARAES, a jurisdiction under the archbishop of Plata, east of that city, in the empire of Peru, S. America. It abounds in grain and numerous droves of cattle, which constitute the chief parts of its commerce.

AMPASA, an island on the coast of Zanguebar, a country in Africa. It is a little kingdom, situated to the S. of that of Siout, and governed by a Mahometan prince, who is a vassal to the Portuguese. The king refusing to pay his tribute, Alphonso de Mella, a Portuguese captain, destroyed his capital city: but, upon the king's acknowledging his fault, and making his peace, he was allowed to rebuild it.

AMPELUSIA, a promontory of Mauritania Tingitana, called Cottes by the natives, which is of the same signification with a town of the same name not far from the river Lixus, near the Straits of Gibraltar; now Cape Spartel. W. long. 6, 30. Lat. 36, 0.

AMPHAXIS, or AMPHAXITIS, a region of Macedonia, W. of Mygdonia. Herein stood the noble city of Thessalonica, anciently called Therma.

AMPHILOCHIA, the territory of the city of Argos, in Acarnania; Amphiloichium; called Amphiloichi, (from the people) in the lower age. A town also of Spain, in Gallicia, built by Teucer, and denominated from Amphiloichus, one of his companions; now Orense. W. long. 8, 20. Lat. 42, 36.

AMPHIPOLIS, a city of Macedonia, an Athenian colony, on the Strymon, but on which side is not so certain: Pliny places it in Macedonia, on this side; but Scylax, in Thrace, on the other. The name of the town, Amphipolis, however, seems to reconcile their difference; because, as Thucydides observes, it was washed on two sides by the Strymon, which, dividing itself into two channels, the city stood in the middle, and on the side towards the sea there was a wall built from channel to channel. Its ancient name was ἑννα ὁδοί, the Nine Ways. The citizens were called Amphipolitani. It was afterwards called Christopolis; now Chrisopoli, or Chisopoli.

AMPHIPOLIS, a town of Syria, on the Euphrates, built by Seleucus, called by the Syrians Turmeda; the same with Thapsacus; and supposed to have been only renewed and adorned by Seleucus, because long famous before his time.

AMPHISCII, among geographers, a name applied to the people who inhabit the torrid zone. The Amphiscii, as the word imports, have their shadows one part of the year towards the north, and the other towards the south, according to the sun's place in the ecliptic. They are also called Ascii. See ASCII.

AMPHISSA, the capital of the Locri Oxolæ, 120 stadia, or 15 miles, to the west of Delphi; so called because surrounded on all hands by mountains: hence Amphissæi, the inhabitants, who plundered the temple at Delphi. Also a town of Magna Græcia, at the mouth of the Sagra, on the coast of the Farther Calabria, situated between Locri and Caulona; now called Rocella. Amphissius the epithet.

AMPSAGA, one of the most remarkable rivers that watered Numidia Propria, and separated that ancient region from that of the Masæli, or Mauritania Cæsariensis. This river fell into the sea about 6 leag. W. of Cullu, and is at present named the Wed el Kibeer, or Great River.

AMPSANCTI VALLIS, or AMPSANCTI LACUS, a Cave or Lake in the heart of the Hirpini, or Principato Ultra near the city Tricento. It is now called Musiti, from Mephitis the goddess of stench, who had a temple there. The ancient poets imagined this gulph led to hell. It is also called Ansancti.

AMPTHILL, a market-town in Bedfordshire, five miles S. of Shefford, and forty-four miles N. of London; its fairs are on May 4 and December 11. Is pleasantly situated betwixt two hills, in the hundred of Redborn-Stoke, and almost in the heart of the county. In the reign of Henry VI. a large mansion-house was built in a spacious park at the east end of it, by Sir John Cornwall, whom that prince created baron of Fanhop, out of the spoils taken in France. King Edward VI. to whom it came by forfeiture, gave it to Edmund Grey, Lord Ruthven, whose grandson made it over to Henry VIII. by which means it was annexed to the crown, and made the manor of Ampthill; to which place Queen Catharine retired, after being forbid the court upon her divorce. In this place is a school endowed for teaching thirteen poor children; and an hospital with good allowance for ten poor men.

AMPUGNANO, one of the thirty pievi or districts in the country on this side the mountains, or north-east part of the island of Corsica in Upper Italy. It can raise 1000 men.

AMPURA, a province of Peru before conquered by the Spaniards. Here the inhabitants worshipped two mountains, from a principle of gratitude, as the water which descended from them fertilized their lands. It is said to have been conquered by Virachoca the eighth of Inca.

AMPURDAN, a district, to which belongs

AMPURIAS, a town and sea-port of Catalonia in Spain. At the mouth of the river Fluvia. At present, a mean place, though anciently very considerable. It gives title of Count; and stands sixty miles N. E. of Barcelona. Lat. 42, 15, N. Long. 2, 56, E.

AMPURIAS, or EMPURIAS, an inland town, on the northern side of the island and kingdom of Sardinia, and in that subdivision called the Cape of Saffari. It is situated amidst the high mountains which cover that part.

AMRAS, a strong castle of Germany, seated in Tirol. E. long. 11, 40. N. lat. 47. It is full of rarities of every kind, and has a library with the portraits of many learned men.

AMROM, or AMROEN, in Latin Amrona, or Amerum, a small island belonging to the duchy of Sleswick, in Denmark. It is a parish subject, both in temporal and spiritual matters, to the diocese of Ripen, and is situated to the N. W. of Northstrund, from which it is about seven miles distant. It is in the form of a crescent, and inconsiderable for any thing but its oyster-fishery.

AMSTELLAND, a district near Amsterdam; so called from the Amstell running through it. It affords good pasturage; and in a village of it, called Ouderkerk, is the burial place of the Portuguese Jews dying at Amsterdam.

AMSTERDAM, or AMSTELDAM, in Latin Amstelodamum, or Amsterodamum; though not the first in rank among the cities that send deputies to the states of the provinces, is nevertheless the most considerable for extent, trade, and the share it contributes towards the public expences of the state. It is the capital city of the province of Holland and of the United Netherlands, is seated on the river Amstel and an arm of the sea called the Wye. The air is but indifferent, on account of the marshes that surround it, and render the city almost inaccessible: but this inconvenience is abundantly recompensed by the utility of its commerce, which the port serves greatly to promote; for it will contain above a thousand large ships. In 1204, it was nothing but a small castle, called Amstel from the name of the river, which its lords made a retreat for fishermen, who at first lived in huts covered with thatch: but it soon became considerable, and had a bridge and towers built about it, inasmuch that it rose to a small city; though, till the year 1490, it was surrounded with nothing but a weak pallisado. The walls were then built with brick, to defend it from the incursions of the inhabitants of Utrecht, with whom the Hollanders were often quarrelling; but some months afterwards it was almost reduced to ashes. In 1512, it was besieged by the people of Guelderland; who, not being able to take it, set fire to the ships in the harbour. In 1525, an Anabaptist leader, with 600 of his followers, got into the city in the night-time, attacked the town-house, and defeated those that made any resistance. At length they barricaded, with wool and hop-sacks, the avenues to the market-place, where these enthusiasts were posted; and so put a stop to their fury.

till day appeared, at which time the citizens fell upon them on all sides, and forced them to retire into the town-house, where most of them were cut to pieces. About ten years after, there was another tumult raised by a parcel of fanatics, consisting of men and women, who ran about the streets stark naked, and had a design of making themselves masters of the town-house. Their shrieks and cries, which were dreadful enough, soon alarmed the inhabitants, who seized the greatest part of them, and gave them the chastisement they deserved. Amsterdam was one of the last cities that embraced the reformed religion. It was besieged by the Hollanders in 1578, and submitted after a siege of ten months. One article of the capitulation was, a free exercise of the Roman-catholic religion: but this was not observed by the Protestants; for they soon drove the ecclesiastics, monks, and nuns, out of the city, broke the images, and demolished their altars. From this time it became the general rendezvous of all nations and of every sect, which raised it to that degree of grandeur and opulence it now enjoys. The inhabitants were often obliged to enlarge the bounds of their city, and in 1675 it was increased to its present extent. It was surrounded with a brick wall, and a large ditch, 80 feet broad, full of running water. The walls were fortified with 26 bastions, on each of which there is now a windmill. There are eight gates towards the land, and one towards the water. Amsterdam being seated in a marshy soil, is built on piles of wood, for which reason no coaches are allowed, except to great men and physicians, who pay a tax for that privilege; and all kinds of goods are drawn on sledges. It stands so low that they would be exposed to inundations, if they did not secure themselves by dikes and sluices. The finest streets are, the Keyser's Graft, or Emperor's Canal; the Heer Graft, or Lord's Canal; the Cingel; and the street of Haerlem. The principal canal is remarkable for its houses, which are magnificent structures, of an equal height. Here are three prodigious sluices, and a great number of canals, which cross the city in many parts, and render the streets clean and pleasant. The canals are deep, their sides are lined with hewn stone, they have generally rows of trees planted on each side, and many stone-bridges over different parts of them. The finest is that called the Ammarack, which is formed by the waters of the Amstel, into which the tide comes up, and on the sides of which are two large quays. This canal has several bridges. The principal is that next the sea, called Pont-Neuf, or the New Bridge: it is 660 feet long and 70 broad, with iron balustrades on each side; it has 36 arches, of which 11 are very high, and eight are shut up to inclose the yachts. From this bridge there is a most charming prospect of the city, port, and sea. The port is a mile and half in length, and above a thousand paces in breadth; it is always filled with a multitude of vessels, which look like a forest, or rather a floating wood. The streets in general are well paved, and the houses built of brick or stone. Towards the sides of the haven, the city is inclosed with great poles driven into the ground, which are joined by large beams placed horizontally. There are openings to let the ships in and out, which are shut every night at the ringing of a bell. Amsterdam is computed to be half as big as London; and the number of houses are said to amount to 26035.

The public buildings are very magnificent. The stadthouse was founded in 1648; it is built upon 14,000 wooden piles; and its front is 282 feet long, its sides 255 feet, and its height to the roof 116. There is a marble pediment in the front, whereon a woman is carved in relievo, holding the arms of the city; she is seated in a chair, supported by two lions, with an olive branch in her right hand, on each side are four Naiads, who present her with a crown of palm and laurel, and two other marine goddeses present her with different sorts of fruit: besides, there is Neptune with his trident, accompanied with Tritons, a sea unicorn, and a sea-horse. On the top stands three statues in bronze, representing Justice, Strength, and Plenty. On the top of the structure is a round tower 50 feet above the roof, adorned with statues, and an harmonious chime of bells, the biggest of which weighs about 7000 pounds, and the next 6000; they are made to play different tunes every month. It has not one handsome gate, but only seven doors to answer to the number of the United Provinces. On the floor of the great hall are two globes, the celestial and terrestrial, which are 22 feet in diameter and 69 in circumference; they are made of black and white marble, and are inlaid with jasper and copper. In general, all the chambers are enriched with paintings, carvings, and gildings. While this stadthouse was building, the old one was set on fire, and consumed with all the archives and registers.

Under the stadthouse is a prodigious vault, wherein is kept the bank of Amsterdam, where there is a vast quantity of ingots both of gold and silver, as also bags, which are supposed to be full of money. The doors are proof against petards, and are never opened but in the presence of one of the burgomasters. The prisons for debtors and criminals are likewise under the stadthouse; as also the guard-house for the citizens, wherein the keys of the city are locked every night. At the end of the great hall is the schepens or aldermen's chamber, where civil causes are tried. Besides these, there are the chambers of the senate and council, the burgomaster's-chamber, the chambers of accounts, &c. In the second story is a large magazine of arms; and on the top of the building are six large cisterns of

of water, which may be conveyed to any room in the house in case of fire, to prevent which the chimneys are lined with copper.

The bourse, or exchange, where the merchants assemble, is all of free-stone, and built upon 2000 wooden piles; its length is about 200 feet, and its breadth 124; the galleries are supported by 26 marble columns, upon each of which are the names of the people that are to meet there; they are all numbered, and there is a place fixed for every merchandise under some one of these numbers. On the right hand of the gate is a superb stair-case, which leads to the galleries, on one side of which there are several shops, and on the other a place to sell clothes. It is not unlike the Royal-exchange in London.

The house belonging to the East-India company contains large magazines, full of the different sorts of commodities brought from the East-Indies. The building was formerly used for the city-arsenal. There are several magnificent new buildings added to it. The directors hold their assemblies there twice a week.

The academy called the Illustrious School is likewise a very fine building: it was formerly a convent belonging to the nuns of St. Agnes. Here they teach Latin, the oriental languages, theology, philosophy, history, &c. The lawyers and physicians have likewise their schools. There are eleven churches belonging to the established religion, and one for English Presbyterians, none besides, which are allowed to have bells. Other sects may have churches, except the Roman Catholics, who meet in private houses without molestation. The Jews have two fine synagogues, one for the Portuguese, and the other for the Germans. Some of the churches are very stately buildings; but not so remarkable as to deserve a particular description.

Besides these there are several hospitals, or houses for orphans, for poor widows, for sick persons, and for mad people; all which are regulated with much prudence. The rasp-house, which was formerly a nunnery, is now a sort of work-house for men that behave ill. They are commonly set to saw or rasp Brasil-wood; and if they will not perform their task, they are put into a cellar which the water runs into, where, if they do not almost constantly ply the pump, they run the risk of being drowned. There is likewise a spin-house for debauched women, where they are obliged to spin wool, flax, and hemp, and do other work. All the hospitals are extremely neat, and richly adorned with pictures. They are maintained partly by voluntary contributions, which are raised by putting money into the poor's-boxes fixed up all over the city; and partly by taxing all public diversions, as well at fairs as elsewhere. Likewise every person that passes thro' any of the gates at candle-light pays a penny for the same uses. These charities are taken care of by certain officers called deacons. The governors are nominated by the magistrates out of the most considerable men in the city.

The opera-house was well-supported, and was an elegant building; but in 1772 it was destroyed by an accidental fire, when 150 persons lost their lives. A new one has been since erected, and every method taken to prevent the like accident.

The common people have places of diversion called Spiel-houses, where are music and dancing. They are much of the same kind as the hops till lately so frequent in London. If strangers go there, they must take care not to make their addressees to a woman that is engaged to any other man.

This city is governed by a senate or council, which consists of 36 persons, called a vroedschap, who enjoy their places for life; and when any of them die, the remainder choose other in their stead. This senate elects deputies to the states of Holland, appoints the chief magistrates of the city, called burgomasters, or echevins, who are like our aldermen. The number is twelve, out of which four are chosen every year to execute the office, and are called burgomasters-regent. Three of these are discharged every year, to make room for three others. One of the four is kept in to inform the new ones of the state of affairs, and also presides the three first months in the year, and the others three months each; so that, when they are in this office, they may be compared to the lord-mayor of the city of London. These alterations and appointments are made by their own body. They dispose of all inferior offices which become vacant during their regency. They have likewise the direction of all public works which regard the safety, tranquillity, and embellishment of the city. The keys of the famous bank of this city are in the hands of these magistrates.

The college consists of new burgomasters or echevins, who are judges in all criminal affairs, without appeal; but in civil causes they may appeal to the council of the province. There are two treasurers, a bailiff, and a pensionary. The bailiff continues in his office three years; and searches after criminals, takes care to prosecute them, and sees their sentence executed. The pensionary is the minister of the magistracy, is well versed in the laws, makes public harangues, and is the defender of the interests of the city. The city of Amsterdam contributes to the public income above 50,000 livres per-day, besides the excise of beer, flesh, and corn; which in all amounts to above 1,600,000 sterling a year. This is more than is paid by all the rest of the provinces put together; and yet Amsterdam bears but the fifth rank in the assembly of the states of Holland, with this distinction, that whereas other cities send 2 members, this sends 4.

The militia of Amsterdam is very considerable; they have 60 companies, each of which has from 200 to 300 men. Jews and Anabaptists are excluded from this service, not being admitted to bear arms. But they are obliged to contribute to the maintenance of the city-guard, which consists of 1400 soldiers; as also to the night-watch, who patrol about the streets and proclaim the hour. Besides these, there are trumpeters on every church-steeple, who sound every half hour: and if there happens a fire, they ring the fire-bell, and shew where it is. The inhabitants have excellent contrivances to extinguish it speedily.

The trade of Amsterdam is prodigious: for almost the whole trade of the East-India company centers in this city, which besides carries on a commerce with all the rest of the world; inasmuch that it may be called the magazine or store-house of Europe. They import a vast deal of corn from the Baltic, not so much for present consumption as to lay up against times of scarcity. The richest spices are entirely in the hands of the East-India company, who furnish all Europe therewith. They have vast quantities of military stores, with which they supply several nations; which is owing to their engrossing most of the iron-works on the Rhine and other great rivers that run into Holland. The longitude of Amsterdam is 5, 4, E. the latitude 52, 23, N.

AMSTERDAM-ISLE, or TONGATABOO, one of the islands discovered by Tasman, situated west of Otaheite, in the Pacific-ocean; visited by captain Cook in 1773, who describes it as a delightful spot, remarkably fertile; and in his voyage in 1778 he visited it again. He describes the men as resolute and bold; but that the virtue of chastity has not yet taken residence there. The island is amazingly populous; and has one of the finest harbours in the Pacific-ocean. Lat. 21, 11, S. Long. 175, 59, E.

AMSTERDAM-NEW. See YORK-NEW,

AMSTY, a parish of Hartfordshire, through which passes the Roman-road, called Herman-street, and all the way upon it are found the remains of camps and stations, exactly according to Antoninus's Itinerary. The castle which anciently stood here is said to have been built by Eustace earl of Boulogne, at the Conqueror's command: and probably here were fortifications before. It consisted of a steep or round artificial hill, which remains yet; and a large and deep fosse about it, out of which probably the mount was made. In king John's time the barons made another intrenchment S. of it, which would contain a garrison as numerous as the castle could hold. Henry III. obliged Nicolas de Avestic to demolish the additional fortification, and keep up only the old one. The church here was built in the reign of the said king

A M

Henry; and, as they say, out of the stones of the demolished fortifications made additional to the castle. It is certainly very old, and built with a low tower in the middle, and two aisles. The chancel is of later date, being perhaps rebuilt with the materials of the former. It is large and lofty, with stalls, as if intended for a choir.

AMT, (das Deutsche, i. e. the German bailiwick) one of the three large districts (Nancy, and Voëge or Vauge being the other two) into which the duchy of Lorraine is divided. It is situated in the government of the latter, and of Bar, now belonging to France; and lies along the river Saar or Sarre. It takes its name from the inhabitants speaking the German language.

AMTITZ, a lordship in the circle of Luben, in Lusatia; which belongs to the baron of Schönau, and contains a town of the same name which has a citadel, and several villages.

AMTS-FREE. See FREYEN.

AMU, one of the names of the river Gihun, in the Asiatic part of the Russian empire. See GIHUN.

AMUCHTA, one of the Lyffe-Ostrova or Fox Islands. See FOX-ISLANDS.

AMUL, AMOL, or OMOAL, a large inland town of Tubristan, a province of Persia, in Asia; situated near the mountains, and contains 3000 houses. It lies 45 miles distant from Ferabath, to the W. Sir Thomas Herbert says, that this town is inhabited by such numbers of strangers that all the days of the week, Wednesday excepted, is kept sabbath by one sect or other. The site of the town is upon a large plain, in a pleasant and fruitful soil, and is guarded by a strong fair castle moated round. In the principal mosques are buried, they say, 444 princes and prophets; whence arises a great veneration in the people for it. According to Tavernier, they drive a considerable trade in provisions to Bakara, especially in plums, great plenty of which the soil here produces; and they are a delicious sort of fruit.

AMUR, a considerable river of Asiatic Russia, and one of those streams that falls into the Eastern-ocean. Formerly it bore the name of Charanmuran: but at present the Chinese and Manchures call it Sagalin-ula. It goes also under the names of Jamur, Onon, Helong-kiang, and Schilka. It consists of the united streams of the rivers Schilk and Argun; is navigable down to the sea, and has uncommon plenty of fish. Its whole course comprises about 400 miles in length.

AMWELL, a village of Hartfordshire, situated a little to the S. of Ware. It is famous for giving rise to the New-river, which supplies London with considerable part of its water; after proceeding in a direct course by the church of Amwell, it receives a spring that flows very plentifully. It is 20 miles from London, but the course of the river is computed at 36. This useful contrivance was projected and first begun by Sir Hugh Middleton; who, by the assistance of the city of London, and by aid of an act of parliament, brought it to perfection: but to the great diminution of his private fortune. The yearly profits of the river are computed at 70,000*l.* and the expence in supporting and keeping it up is said to amount to half the profits. The governors of the New-river company agreed with the proprietors of the land lying on the Lee, for a cut from the said river, which the proprietors consented to. This cut of the Lee supplies the largest share of the New-river water.

AMYCLÆ, a city of Lacedæmonia (or Sparta, or Laconia) was built by Amyclas the son of Lacedæmon, and famed afterward for the birth of Castor and Pollux, the sons of Tyndareus, the 8th king of Lacedæmonia; distant about 18 miles from Sparta, the metropolis. It was afterwards famed for sending a considerable colony of its own inhabitants into Upper Calabria, who built there a city, which they called by the same name. This city was afterwards destroyed by the Dorians, and turned into an inconsiderable hamlet, in which however were seen some of the ruins of its ancient grandeur. One of the finest buildings which escaped the common destruction was the temple and statue of Alexandra, whom the inhabitants pretended to be the same with Cassandra, the daughter of Priam.

ANABOA, a small island, situated near the coast of Loango, in Africa, in E. long. 8, 30. N. lat. 1, 0. Here are several fertile valleys, which produce plenty of bananas, oranges, pine-apples, lemons, citrons, tamarinds, cocoa-nuts, &c. together with vast quantities of cotton. In this island are two high mountains, which, being continually covered with clouds, occasion frequent rains.

ANADIR, a considerable river in the N. E. part of Siberia, and falls into the Eastern-ocean N. of the peninsula of Kamtschatka.

ANADIRSK, a town belonging to the Russians; situated on the river Anadir, in Siberia. Lat. 66, 0. N. Long. about 185, E.

ANAGNI, ANANIA, AGNANIA, anciently ANAGNIA, a small city of the Campagna di Roma, a province in the Ecclesiastical-state, in the middle part of Italy. It is the see of a bishop, who is immediately subject to the pope, and is situated upon an eminence in the Via Latina; but now almost gone to ruin. In the territory belonging to it are the hot waters anciently called the Thermæ Anianæ. This territory is now called Fumerolli, on account of the steams which arise from them. These baths are of sovereign efficacy, particularly against the gout and other chronic disorders. Marc Antony married Cleopatra in Anagni, after he had divorced Octavia, Augustus's sister. It was the birth-place of pope Boniface VIII. who retired to it for shelter, from Philip the Fair of France, in hopes that his countrymen would have stood by him: he was, however, taken prisoner by that prince, but the Anagnians, ashamed of having so poorly defended him, rescued him out of the hands of the French three days after. The pontiff died of grief in a few days at the insults he received during his short confinement. This city gave birth also to three other popes, namely, Innocent III. Gregory IX. and Alexander IV. It lies 36 miles E. of Rome, and 16 from Palestrina to the N. Lat. 42, 48. N. Long. 13, 45, E.

ANARSTAPPIN, a trading place, and harbour for fishing-boats, belonging to what is called, in Islandic, the Snafells-ness-fyssel; and in Danish, Sneefields-ness-fyssel, one of the seven subdivisions of the western quarter of Iceland.

ANAMABOA, a populous town in the kingdom of Fantin, in Guiney, three leagues from Cape Coast-castle. The natives are generally great cheats, and must be carefully looked after in dealing with them, and their gold well examined, for it is commonly adulterated. It lies under the cannon of the English castle. The landing is pretty difficult, on account of the rocks; and therefore those that come here to trade are forced to go ashore in canoes. The earth here is very proper to make bricks; the oysters, when burnt, afford good lime; and there is timber in great abundance; so that here are all the materials for building. The country at Anamaboa is full of hills, beginning at a good distance from the town, and affording a very pleasant prospect. Indian corn and palm-wine are in great plenty. They have a green fruit called papas, as big as a small melon, and which has a taste like cauliflower. Anamaboa is much frequented by the English ships and others for corn and slaves, which last are sometimes to be had in great numbers. The English fort is built on the foundation of a large old house, which subsisted entire in 1679. It is a large edifice, flanked by two towers, and fortified towards the sea with two bastions: the whole of brick and stone cemented with lime. It stands upon a rock at the distance of 30 paces from the sea. It is mounted with 12 pieces of cannon and 12 patereroes; and defended by a garrison of 12 whites and 18 blacks, under the command of the chief factor. The natives treat the garrison of this fort with great insolence, insomuch as often to block them up, and frequently, if they dislike the governor, send him off in a canoe to Cape Coast with marks of the utmost contempt. Far from being able to oppose them, the English are glad to obtain their favour with presents. In 1701 they declared war against the English; and having assembled in a tumultuous manner before the fort, they set fire to the exterior buildings, and went on with their outrages: till they they were dispersed by a discharge of the cannon from the batteries. The night following the English took their revenge by setting fire to the town of Anamaboa; and thus hostilities continued for 20 days, till at last the natives were obliged to sue for peace. This fort was abandoned in 1733; but has been resumed by the English, who have continued in it ever since. Lat. 5, 2. Long. 3, 43.

ANAPHE, an island spontaneously emerging out of the Cretan sea, near Thera: now called Nansio. Its name is from the sudden appearance of the new moon to the Argonauts in a storm, Anaphæus, an epithet of Apollo, who was worshipped there. Anaphæi, the people.

ANATOLIA (corruptly Natolia), or Asia Minor, a province of Asiatic Turkey. Formerly it had the name of Asia simply, as also by way of eminence, on account of its being the best spot in this quarter of the world, and adorned with vast numbers of noble and opulent cities, and considerable states. It is at present distinguished from the rest of the Asiatic regions by the epithet of Minor, or Asia the Less. It had the name of Anatolia on account of its eastern situation from Europe; and on the same account it has been, and still is, called the Levant. It is a peninsula of a considerable breadth and length, jutting out between the Mediterranean on the S. and the Euxine or Black Sea on the N. quite to the Archipelago on the W. and the sea of Marmora on the N.W. So that it is bounded on the N. by the Hellespont, Propontis, the Thracian Bosphorus, and Euxine seas, or Kara Denghi, as the Turks call it; on the N.W. by the sea of Marmora; on the E. by Georgia, Armenia, Turcomannia, and the eastern part of the Mediterranean; on the S. by Syria and the Levant, also by the Euphrates, dividing it from Turcomannia and Diarbeck or Diarbeckr; and on the W. by the Archipelago. This province extends itself between Lat. 37 and 41, 30, N. and from Long. 27 to 40, E. Its utmost length from E. to W. is computed to be about 600 miles, and its breadth from S. to N. about 320.

Anatolia, in its largest sense, includes the ancient provinces of Galatia, Paphlagonia, Bithynia, Pontus, Mysia, Phrygia, Lydia, Mæonia, Æolis, Ionia, Caria, Doris, Pamphylia, Pisidia, Cappadocia, Lycia, Lycaonia, and Cilicia. At present geographers divide it into four parts or governments, which the Turks call beglebelics, and those according to their situation: 1. Anatolia, properly so called, on the western part; 2. Carmania, on the southern; 3. Aladulia, on the eastern; and, 4. Amasia, on the northern part: which are again subdivided into the following districts:—In Anatolia-Propria; Chiutaya, or Kiotaya, Burfa, Angouri, Bolli, Chiangare, Imyr, or Smyrna, and Aiyasolug, or Ephesus.—In Carmania; Cogui, or Iconium, Tiagma, Scalemur,

Satalia, and Tarfun.—In Aladulia; Maraz, Sis, Sarmuzada, Lajazza, and Adena.—In Amasia; Amasia, Tocat, Silvas, Trebizond, Arlinga, and Charaiffar.

Each of these districts is again divided into two or more sangiacs, containing a certain number of ziamets and timars, the nature of which see under Turkey; as also the number of them under each of the four districts above mentioned.

The chief city belonging to each province of Anatolia, including those ancient ones which formerly made a figure, though the greatest part of them are, through the Turkish tyranny, either totally ruined, or sunk into a deplorable state, are as follows:

I. ANATOLIA PROPER.

In Bithynia; Prusa, or Bursa Metropolis, Chalcedon, Nice, Nicomedia, and Libusta.—In Mysia and Phrygia; Cyzicus, Parium, Lamsacus, Abvdos, Troy, Troas, Alexandria, Scamandra, Assos, Pergamus, Palesepsis, Antandros, and Pitana.—In Æolis and Ionia; Elea, Myrina, Cuma, Phocæa, Smyrna, Urla, or Clazomene, Ærythræa, Teos, Lebidos, Colophon, Ephesus, and Priene.—In Caria and Doris; Miletum, Palatschia, Heraclea, Boriglia, Mylafa, Amyzoa, Alabanda, Stratonice, Alynda, Myndos. Halicarnassus now Nefs, Ceramus, Cnidos, and Creffa.—In Lydia, or Mæonia; Sardis, Philadelphia now Allah-schyer, or the city of God, Thyatira now Alhissar, Maynesia, Guzel-hissar, Laodicea now Eskihissar.—In Phrygia Major; Cotæum now Chiutaya, Gordæum, Midæum, Apamia, Colofs, Hierapolis, Synneda, Prymnesia, and Tiberopolis.—In Galatia; Pessinus, Germa, Therma, Ancray now Anguri, and Amurium.—In Paphlagonia; Heraclea, now Penderachi, Amastris now Somastro, Claudianopolis now Castrimena, Teuthramia now Tripoli, Amisus now Simisio, Pompeiopolis, Gangura, and Jonopolis.

Those in the three other provinces of Asia Minor.

II. In AMASIA.

In Pontus Galaticus; Amasia, Themiscyra, and Comana.—In Pontus Ptolemaicus; Tocat, and Sebastia.—In Pontus Cappadocia; Trebizond, Pharnacia, Ischopolis, and Ceraufus.

III. In ALADULIA, namely, Cappadocia, and part of Armenia Minor.

Suvas, Caifar, Nyssa, Nazianzum, and Marosh; the present capital.

IV. Those in the provinces of Carmania are,

In Lycia; Telmessus, Patara, Xanthus, Myra, Olympius, Phaselis, Pinaria, &c.—In Pamphylia, Attalia

Attalia now Satalia, Perga, Aspendus, Syde now Candalor.—In Pisidia; Sangalassus, Antioch, Pisidia, and Temessus.—In Lycaonia; Lystra, Derbe, Isauria, and Iconium now Cogni.—In Cilicia; Silenus, Stalmura, Sole, Adena, Tarsus now Therassa, Mopsuestia, and Issus now Ajazzo.

The chief islands on the coasts of Asia Minor are, Tenedos, Lesbos, Chios now Scio, Samos, Icaria, Patmos now Patmosa, Leria now Lero, Claros, Aftypalea now Stampola, Carpathus now Scarpanto, Rhodes, and Cyprus; all which, with their cities, see under the respective words.

This whole country is naturally of a rich, fertile soil, and the air healthy; though the Turkish tyranny has almost reduced Asia Minor to a desert. With regard to antiquities in this once noble and famous country, scarcely any thing is to be met with but ruins. The very fields, though naturally rich and well-watered, lie uncultivated, and are overrun with weeds and brambles. Those few plains which are cultivated, though after the Turkish method; that is, in a slovenly manner, yield excellent corn of several sorts, fruits of all kinds, exquisite grapes and wine, the fairest olives, citrons, lemons, oranges, figs, dates, &c. besides plenty of coffee, rhubarb, balsam, opium, galls, and other valuable drugs and gums. To which may be added twisted cotton, silk, grogram, yarn, goats hair, carpets, tapestries, callicuts, cordovans of various colours, quilted coverlids, which are exported from hence to Europe.

Here is a considerable number of rivers, the principal of which are, the Zagari or Sangarius, Porteni, Aitoesu, Ali, Hali or Otmigiut, and the Iris, or Casalmach, which empty themselves into the Euxine-sea; Jechel-Irma, or Green River, that falls into the Kara, or Black River, which discharges itself into the Euphrates; Satalia, Cydnus, or Carasu, and Xanthus, or Sirbis, which run into the Mediterranean; Madre, anciently the Mæander, or Meandrus, Cranicus, Cayster, Caystrus, or Carasou, Samander or Scamandra, and Hermus, now Sarabat, which receives the Pactolus, Caicus, Castri, or Girmasti, and falls into the Archipelago.

In this province are some considerable lakes, the largest of which the Turks call Guol-bug-skau, extending in length from Long, 32 to 33, 20, E. and from Lat. 37, 40, to 38, 10, N. being about 50 miles in length and 22 in breadth.

The only natural rarity in this country is a certain kind of earth which boils up out of the ground, and always gathered before sun-rise, and in such quantities that many camels are employed in carrying loads of it to soap-houses at some distance off, where, being mixed and boiled with oil for several days, it becomes an excellent soap, which is in great request, and a considerable traffic is made of it by the inhabitants. The Franks call it soap-earth; and it is found in the neighbouring plains about Smyrna.

Here are great numbers of artificial curiosities, as, 1. the remains of an ancient Roman circus and theatre near Smyrna; 2. about two short days journey from that city are some rudera of the ancient Thyatira, where are still about 10 or 12 remarkable inscriptions to be seen; 3. at Mylassa, anciently Melasso, in Caria, among other antiquities, is a magnificent marble temple dedicated to the Genius of Rome, and built in honour of Augustus, as appears from an inscription still entire, which is to be seen on the front; a stately column, called the pillar of Menander, and a curious temple: 4. at Ephesus are still remaining several ancient churches, particularly that of St. John, the most entire of them all, but now a Turkish mosque; 5. at Laodicea, now only a haunt of wild beasts and fowls, are still extant three noble theatres of white marble, and a stately circus, all entire; 6. at Sardis, now a poor dirty village, though anciently the seat of the rich Cræsus, are the remains of some stately edifices, with several mutilated inscriptions; 7. at Pergamos, famous for the first invention of parchment, are the ruins of a palace of the ancient kings of Atalus, with the old Christian church of St. Sophia, now a mosque.

In Asia Minor the religion is the same as in Turkey in Europe, where only Mahometanism is established, and Christianity of all denominations and Judaism are barely tolerated; so that the patriarchs, archbishops, and bishops, whether Greeks or Armenians, as well as their sees, churches, and congregations, are not only kept under a state of deplorable poverty and servitude, but those prelates are deposed, changed, promoted, or oppressed, at the will of the sultan and his ministers.

The principal Greek patriarchs, besides that of Constantinople, are those of Jerusalem, Alexandria, and Antioch. The Armenians have only two of them; the first residing at Ecmefan, a monastery in Georgia, and the other at Sis, in Aladulia. Besides these the Nestorians are allowed one, whose residence is commonly at Mossul, in the province of Diarbeckr.

The archbishops belonging to the Greeks are Heraclea, Saloniki, Athens, Malvasia, Amphipolis, Neapoli di Romania, Larissa, Adrianople, Corinth, Nicosia, Janna, Monembasia, Methymna, Phanarion, Patras, Proconessus, Amasia, Scutaria, Tyre, Tyana, and Berytus.

The principal bishoprics of the Greeks are An-cyra, Cyzicus, Ephesus, Chalcedon, Nice, Nicomedia, Smyrna, Trebizond, Drama, Mitylene, Serra, Christianopolis, Iconium, now Cogni, Nova-Cesarea, Chios, Rhodes, and St. John d'Acre. Not to mention those of the Armenians, Nestorians, and Popish titulars. Sects of learning can hardly be expected where the established religion inspires men with a contempt of all literature. So that excepting some few academies, which the Jesuits and some other orders of the Romish church have, with great difficulty, been allowed to erect here, and some few Greek and Armenian schools, in which children learn to read, or perhaps write, no other seminaries are to be met with in this vast country. And in general the clergy of all denominations here are very ignorant, except those who have travelled, or come hither from foreign countries. The principal languages spoken in this country, as in European Turkey, are the Turkish, Greek, and Armenian; the Latin among the Roman Catholics; and the Lingua Franca, a medley of language common to the merchants.

ANATOLIA, properly so called, or, as the Turks stile it, Anatol Vilaiete, is by far the largest province of all Asia Minor, as may be seen above, and is the most western of its four grand divisions, and the nearest to Europe. It extends from the coasts of the Bosphorus, Propontis, and Aegean-sea, on the W. that is, from Long. 26, 30, to almost 35, E. where it is bounded by the two beglebergates, or governments, of Amasia and Aladulia; and from the coasts of the Euxine or Black sea, on the N. to the government of Caramania on the S. from which last it is only divided by an imaginary line, drawn from that coast which lies between the mouth of the river Xanthus and those of Rhodes, to the mouth of Cafalmach. So that the province reaches from Lat. 37 to 40, 20, N. and consequently includes above one half of all Asia Minor, and is the largest beglebergate in it. The capital of Anatolia Proper, which is also the residence of the begleberg, or governor, is now called Chintala, or Kutayah, anciently Cotiaum, in Phrygia Major. The begleberg has under him 15 sangiacs, which contains 225 ziamets, and 7740 timars. The revenue of this beglebergate, as appears from the sultan's register called the Old Canon, amounts annually to a million of aspers; and the whole number of troops in each sangiacate, by a moderate computation, to a little above 16,000, whose pay is reckoned to be about 37,310,700 aspers. Besides these 15 sangiacates above mentioned are about 29 castles more belonging to this beglebergate. Besides those 16,000 troops, most of which are horsemen, the grand signior used to keep in pay about 6900 men for cleaning and mending the public roads, and for the better conveyance of his artillery and the provisions of his army; together with 1280 sutlers, and 128 Egyptian trumpeters and drummers; all which were kept on foot whilst this country was a Christian frontier: but since the Turkish limits have extended themselves farther, and this has enjoyed a peaceful state, that Income hath been given to augment the number of the ziams and timariots.

ANATU, one of the Aleutian islands. See that article.

ANAZARBUS, ANAZARBA, a town of Cilicia, on the river Pyramus, the birth-place of Dioscorides, and of the poet Oppian. It was sometimes called Cæsarea, in honour either of Augustus or of Tiberius. The inhabitants are called Anazarbeni; and on coins Anazarbeis, after the Greek idiom. It was destroyed by a dreadful earthquake in the year 525, along with several other important cities; but they were all repaired at a vast expence by the emperor Justin, who was so much affected with their misfortune, that, putting off the diadem and purple, he appeared for several days in sackcloth.

ANBAR, or AMBER, a town of the Mogul, in the East-Indies, situated a good way to the N. W. in the road from Surat to Masulipatan, and only noted for a little pagod or temple underground, which is much resorted to by the natives; and also for tumblers, rope-dancers, and posture-masters, who, according to Thevenot's account, are much superior in dexterity to those in Europe. Of the same name is another city of Diarbeckr, in Asiatic Turkey, and situated not a great way from the junction of the great river Euphrates with the Tigris.

ANCAA, or ANCIAO, a small place in the district of Coimbra, and province of Beira, in Portugal. It consists of 900 inhabitants. Its district includes five parishes.

ANCARANO, a town of Italy, in the march of Ancona, situated in E. long. 14, 54. N. lat. 42, 48.

ANCASTER, a small place in Lincolnshire, eight miles from Grantham, and 15 S. of Lincoln; noted for having been a Roman village, called Crococalana, and on a Roman highway; and where several medals, coins, &c. of antiquity are found, as appears from the traffic which the town's people have for many years carried on with the sale of them. After a shower of rain the school-boys and shepherds look for them on the declivities, and never return empty. The town consists of one street, running N. and S. along the Roman road. At each end of it is a spring; and from hence to Lincoln, full 15 miles, is no water to be met with. On the W. side of the town is a road, which was formerly designed for the conveniency of such as travelled when the gates were shut. In the church-yard are the figures of two priests cut in stone. This must have been anciently a populous place, from the large quarries about it, the rocks lying but a very little way beneath the surface.

ANCE, or ANSE, a small town in the government

ment of Lyonnois, a province of France. It is situated just by the river Saone. And here some provincial synods have formerly been holden.

ANCENIS, in Latin Ancenisium and Andenesium, a small town and marquisate belonging to the house of Bethune-Charost. It is situated on the Loire, and in the bishopric of Nantes, one of the five subdivisions of Upper Britany, in the government of this last name, in France. Formerly Ancenis was the chief town of the Amnites, nine leagues distant from the borders of Anjou to the W. and 17 miles above Nantes to the N.E. A castle stood here, which is now demolished. Lat. 47, 20, N. Long. 1, 5, W.

ANCHIALE, one of the chief cities of Cilicia properly so called, or Cilicia Campestris, was, as Strabo, out of Aristobolus, acquaints us, built by Sardanapalus, who proves his assertion from an ancient monument found in those parts, with this inscription, "SARDANAPALUS, the son of ANACYN-DARAXES, built the cities of Anchiale and Tarsus in one day;" but, if we believe Athenodorus, we must think it built by Anchiale, the daughter of Japhet. It stood on the coast where the river Cedrus, which passes through Tarsus, disembogues itself into the Mediterranean-sea.

ANCLAM, a well-fortified town of the Western, Swedish, or Royal Pomerania, in the circle of Upper Saxony. It is situated on the river Pene, 17 miles S.W. from Gripswald, and 45 N.W. of Sterin. It was taken by the elector of Brandenburg in 1676, together with Demain, on the same river; but both restored three years after by the treaty of St. Germain. It was however retaken by the Prussians in 1715. Formerly it was called Tangdim; and some will have it to be the seat of the Angli, mentioned by Tacitus; some of whom removed from thence to the Elbe, and from that again went over to the island of Great-Britain. It made a good figure once among the Hans towns, and has an advantageous site among good corn-lands and excellent pasture, with the conveniency of fishing, and exporting their commodities by means of the river Pene. Here are four parish-churches, and a yearly fair on the second Sunday after the nativity of our Lady. It suffered by several fires in the 14th century, when its churches, with a monastery, and the town-house, were burnt; but it was afterwards more beautifully rebuilt. In the year 1424 it was burnt again; so that few of the houses escaped; and 100 years after this a fire broke out in the town-house, by which several charters and other papers of importance were consumed. Lat. 54, 10, N. Long. 14, 5, E.

ANCLIFF, a place situated about a mile and a half from Wigan, in Lancashire. It is very much visited by the curious for a remarkable phenomenon, called the Burning-well, the water of which is cold, and has no smell; yet so strong a vapour of sulphur issues from it upon emptying the well, that the water bubbles up as if it boiled; upon putting a lighted candle thereto, it immediately catches the flame like brandy, which lasts several hours, and sometimes a whole day in calm weather, with a heat strong enough to make a pot boil; though the water itself still remains cold, and will not burn when taken out of the well, any more than its mud will which the halitus has issued. The water does not increase by the bubbling; but is only kept in motion by the sudden halitus of the vapours breaking out.

ANCO, a small town in South America, situated about three leagues from the city of Guamanga, in the audience of Lima, Peru.

ANCOBER, or RIO COBRE, a river on the coast of Guinea, in Africa, which falls into the Atlantic-ocean.

ANCONA, the marquisate of, a district belonging to the Ecclesiastical State in the middle part of Italy; in Latin Marchia Anconitana. It formerly constituted the greater part of the ancient Picenum, which name the Lombards changed into that of Marka Anconitana, Ancona being the usual residence of the Marquises or governors of the province. It is bounded on the N. and E. by the Adriatic sea; by the duchy of Urbino on the W. by Umbria or the duchy of Spoleto on the S. and on the E. by the Farther Abruzzo, from which it is separated only by the River Tronto, anciently Truentus. Its extent from E. to W. is about eighty miles, and sixty from N. to S. The air here is extremely temperate, which renders the soil so fruitful that it was formerly called the Garden of Italy. Its principal productions are flax and wax, the manufactures from which are here whitened to a very great degree of perfection. This country is watered by no less than twelve rivers, namely, the Fiumefino, the Aspido, Masone, Potentia, Lafino, Le Chiento, Tingo or Tenna, Leta-vino, Afone, Tesino, Ragnola, and Tronto; which last separates it from the Abruzzo, in the kingdom of Naples, as the Appenine mountains do from Ombria. This would still be an excellent spot, and its inhabitants very rich, were it not that they have the misfortune to groan under the tyranny of priests. This is the reason for its being a desert, in comparison of what it was formerly: for Pliny assures us, that after many years of a very bloody war, in which the Piceni lost several considerable armies, it submitted at last to the Romans, with upwards of 400,000 inhabitants.

On the coast of Ancona, all along the Adriatic sea, at the distance of every half mile, stands a tower, which is defended by one or two pieces of cannon, in order to hinder the landing of pirates, Sallee or other sea-robbers. On this coast, and more particularly near Monte Comero or Conaro, about ten Italian miles from the city of Ancona, and on the dry shore, there is abundance of clayish earth, and various sorts of porous stones: one meets with the ballani or ballari, a species of crustaceous fish or mussels, which are found in large stones; and, from their resemblance to a date-kernel, are likewise called dattili del mare, or sea-dates.

Here oysters are preserved alive in sea-water for several years. At Ancona these are indeed very large; but flabby, and far from being palatable. Here also is a kind of sea-crawfish, called nocchia, in appearance resembling our lobsters, but of a more delicate flavour. Their claws are less than those of a crawfish, and the head and tail are of a very uncommon shape. The largest of this species is about four inches in length; and this fish is by some called squilla arenaria. Among other remarkable sea-animals found in the harbour of Ancona, and in the Adriatic, is a fish called the sepi, which is probably a species of the sepia, or cuttle-fish, the shells of which are found along the shore, and, when powdered, are used for cleaning of plate. Here is also the univalve shell-fish, in Latin called patella, and which adheres to the rocks, and through the small aperture in its convex part expells its faeces. Not to mention a variety of other curious mussels and fish to be met with on this coast, and enumerated by Keysser in his travels. In the neighbourhood of Ancona are dug out of the ground amber, sulphur, and several mineral resins: the sea near Ancona is observed to ebb and flow about a foot, or a foot and a half: which phenomenon gradually abates, as the Adriatic sea approaches to its junction with the Mediterranean. The city of Ancona and district belonging to it, after the time of the Longobards, recovered their freedom, which they maintained till the year 1532; when Lewis Gonzaga, general to Pope Clement VII. brought them under the papal dominion. Notwithstanding this poor country has been harassed by the popes of Rome, yet it boasts of having given two heads to the church, namely, Nicolas IV. who was a native of Ascoli, and died suddenly in the year 1292, occasioned, as we are told, from indulging a foolish curiosity of seeing the dead body of St. Francis d' Assise; also Sixtus V. of Montalto, who was originally a swine-herd, and died in 1590, after making more noise in the five years of his single pontificate than a dozen other popes did in all theirs.

ANCONA, the capital of the marquisate of the same name, in the middle division of Italy. It is the Picenum of the ancients, and situated at the edge of the Appenines, close to the borders of the Adriatic sea, near the little river Revola, anciently Senon, which separates the duchy of Urbino from the marquisate of Ancona. It stands upon and between two hills. Ancona takes its name from the coast on which it is situated, making a curve in the figure of an elbow, being a kind of straight formed by two promontories. A great number of Syracusans, flying from the cruelty of their tyrant Dionysius, settled in this place; and having found it pleasant, they built a city here, with a temple, which they dedicated to Venus, about 406 years before the Christian æra. Others derive its name from Ancus Martius, who is said to have been its founder. Ancient authors have rendered it very famous in their writings; for Cæsar, Tacitus, Lucan, and Silius Italicus, mention it; the latter comparing the city of Ancona to that of Sidon, as being equally famous with it for its purple dye. It was made a Roman colony, according to Pliny; but he does not say by whom, or at what time. The Goths besieged Ancona for a long time, but in vain; and lost before it almost their whole fleet, consisting of fifty sail, out of which they only saved ten, all the rest being either taken or run ashore by Narfes. Some years after it fell under the power of the Lombards; and at last, the Saracens having ravaged Dalmatia and Illyricum, in the reign of the emperor Michael, son of Theophilus, they crossed the Adriatic sea; and, having made themselves masters of Ancona, burnt it almost to the ground. But Nicephorus, lieutenant to the emperor Basilus I. drove them out of Italy, and caused that city to be rebuilt. After the abolition of the exarchate, she maintained her liberty under the government of her own magistrates. Pope Pius II. went thither in 1464, in order to preach up the croisade against Mahomet II. who, after taking Constantinople, and destroying the Greek empire ten years before, threatened Italy and Hungary with absolute ruin. But this pope had not the satisfaction of seeing his enterprize succeed; for he died at Ancona, as is thought, by overheating himself in his declamations. Clement VII. came hither likewise in the year 1532, but upon quite a different motive; for he made himself master of it by the treachery of Bernardin Barba, bishop of Carla, and the following stratagem. executed by Lewis de Gonzaga, general of the papal forces. Under the plausible pretext of defending it against the incursions of the Turks and banditti, he prevailed on the inhabitants to allow him to build a citadel at his own expence. As soon as this was done, Gonzaga having drawn out all the young men of the city, under pretence of exercising them in arms, the perfidious bishop sallied out of the citadel with his garrison; caused the gates to be shut; seized the magistrates, and obliged them, with the rest of the inhabitants, to take an oath of fealty to the pope. Thus, by manifest villainy, that city was united to the Ecclesiastic State, with the title of a suffragan bishopric of Fermo. There is hardly any where a finer or more fertile country than the rising grounds grounds and the valleys which surround Ancona, being all over covered with vineyards, corn-fields, and fruit-trees. Strabo and Pliny formerly celebrated its wines as very good and generous; a quality which they have not yet lost. As a person approaches Ancona, he imagines he sees an amphitheatre above the harbour. Its houses are built upon a forked hill, of which the citadel forms one of the tops, and the church of St. Cyriacus, which is the cathedral, stands upon the top of the cape that juts into the sea; and from whence, in fair weather, one easily sees Dalmatia. This promontory, now called by the Italians Monte Guaſco, was anciently named Cumerum; and the church was the famous temple of Venus; mentioned by Juvenal, in sat. iv. where he speaks of the enormous turbot taken before that temple, and presented to the emperor Domitian, who ridiculously summoned the senate to debate in what manner this fish was to be dressed. The front of this church is incruſted with marble, without any ornament, and the inside is low, and very dark. There they preserve, besides several pieces of antiquity, the bodies of St. Cyriacus and St. Marcellinus. The city is not a small place, and is for the most part pretty well built; but nothing near so populous and rich as it might be from its convenient situation and excellent harbour, which was formerly the best and most considerable the Romans had on the Adriatic sea, next to Ravenna. A marble wall incloses it on both sides to its very entrance, and at certain distances were pillars, of the same materials, for mooring the ships. This harbour was considerably improved by the emperor Trajan; for which reason a triumphal arch, which consists of a fine bluish-white marble, very high, but narrow, with eight fluted columns, and which is still entire, and very elegant, was formerly erected in honour of him, his wife, and sister, on the strong mole or bank defending it. The end of the said mole is now fortified, and planted with cannon between eight and twelve pounders. The harbour is to this day very good; and it was formerly resorted to by the merchants of Greece, Epirus, Illyria, and from other places of Europe: but at present its trade is very inconsiderable, especially since the popes have withdrawn their galleys, and stationed them at Civita Vecchia, that they may be the nearer to Rome. The exchange at Ancona, is a very handsome and large structure; and here persons of what religion soever, as well as those of the established church, which is the Romish, enjoy full liberty of conscience. The little trade they have at Ancona is mostly carried on by the Jews, of which nation there may be about 5000, who live together in a particular quarter of the town, where they have a synagogue. These are distinguished from Christians by a little bit of scarlet-cloth, which they are obliged to wear in their hats.

At Ancona is a large lazaretto for performing quarantine, which is partly built in the sea, and partly on the land. The number of churches, convents, and hospitals, are forty-five. The largest churches in Ancona, are St. Augustine's and St. Dominic's. The porch of the former is of marble, adorned with several statues, and among them St. Augustine surrounded with books. Here is a very fine organ, and a magnificent high altar, also a picture of Lilly's, highly valued, which represents Christ's baptism; but by a ridiculous whim of the painter, a cardinal and two bishops assist at the ceremony. The streets of Ancona are very narrow, and most wretchedly paved; they are besides very tiresome, on account of the irregularity of the ground, and the perpetual ascents and descents. The exchange or place where the merchants meet, is a pretty large piazza, the roof and front of which is Gothic, and the ceiling all painted in fresco: on three of its corners, are the statues of Faith, Charity and Hope; that in the fourth corner representing Religion, was a few years ago overturned by an earthquake: which gave occasion to a wag of that city to say, "That she went off much too late, since Religion had abandoned Italy many ages before." The bishop of Ancona is immediately subject to the pope, and here is a legate or governor. In Ancona they shew a square tower, pretty high, which is said to be very ancient, and of the same architecture with ten others that stood in the middle of the city; but the earthquake which overthrew the statue of Religion, demolished all the rest except this one. The situation of Ancona, notwithstanding the ruggedness of the soil, is in many respects agreeable to the eye. Its harbour would be pretty commodious, if its entrance was not a little difficult; its road is reckoned very good on account of the anchorage in it, the bottom being all sand. The neck of land upon which Trajan's arch is built, leads by an extended curtain to a large tower, capable of containing four or five hundred men. This tower is well provided with artillery; and by its low flanks, is a sure defence to the entrance of the harbour: and on the other side are two large royal bastions, with their curtains very well built and terraced. They are disposed in such a manner as to command the harbour, its mouth, and all the bay; which being low, and extending very far in a straight line, may be entirely scoured by these works. The principal citadel is situated above this fort. The architecture of it is irregular, consisting of five sides of a polygon; but perfectly well defensible. They have multiplied its flanks towards the sea, where is a great horn-work jutting out, to command the bottom of the height on which it stands, and to cover the lower fort, which thereby might be greatly assisted. The rest of the fortifications towards the land are built, so as to humour the situation.

tion; and as the whole stands very high, some places are inaccessible, by reason of their steepness. The gentlest declivity is towards the city, from whence it is most practicable to attack it. Opposite to this great fortress, on an eminence within the city, is another which formerly was a large castle, the outside of which they have been endeavouring to modernise. Though its fortifications, like those of the other, are irregular; yet they are very good ones: and there is but one way of approaching it, being inaccessible by its situation on all other sides. In the first the pope keeps a pretty good garrison; and in the others some few invalids: but the magazines of both are in a very bad plight. At Ancona is plenty of provisions; but from Rimini to this place, a traveller is at certain times, such as in Lent, forced to live principally on fish, and the inn-keepers laugh at a dispensation which the drivers of sedans tell them they have from the sub-inquisitor of Imola, for eating meat; since not one morsel of it will they keep, for fear, as they say, of being excommunicated. But one meets with people of better sense at Ancona, which is the largest city in the whole road from Bologna. At times here are some March storms, with a northerly wind, which renders the season as sharp as if it were in January; a thing pretty rare in this country. Ancona lies 15 miles N. of Loreto, and 130 E. of Rome. Lat. 43, 37, N. Long. 13, 36, E. ANCORARUM URBS, a city in the Nomos Aphroditopolites, towards the Red Sea; so called because there was in the neighbourhood a stone quarry, in which they hewed stone anchors, before iron anchors came to be used. The gentilitious name is Ancyropolites, ANCRE, a small town of France, in Picardy, with the title of a marquisate, seated on a little river of the same name. E. Long. 2, 45, N. Lat. 49, 39.

ANCY, LE FRANC, a small town of Senonois, one of the subdivisions of Champagne, and government of this name, together with Brie, in France. It has a fine castle, or seat.

ANCYRA, a town of Galatia in Asiatic Turkey, called Angouri, Engouri, Ancara, and Angora, (which see.) It was formerly the capital of Galatia, or, according to Ptolemy, of the Galli Tectosagæ. What surprises most is, that Strabo, who lived in the reign of Augustus, calls it only a fort; when he could hardly be ignorant how much that emperor had enlarged, beautified, and enriched it: so that he was celebrated as its second founder, though it was a city of a much earlier date. It appears from ancient monuments, that it preserved the title of metropolis for a long series of Augustus's successors. It was built either on the banks, or at some little distance from the river Halys, or Milas, as Moll and others imagine, or Sangarius according to some. But the truth is, that it is no easy matter to determine, whether the ancient Ancyra stood on the site of the modern Angouri, or at some distance from it; Ancyra, however was famous for the victory which Pompey gained over Mithridates; and that of Tamerlane in 1402, over the emperor Bajazet. It is still the residence of a Turkish sultan, and a populous trading place, principally in camlets and the like light stuffs. It every where bears the marks of its pristine magnificence. The streets, piazzas, &c. abound with stately remains, columns, &c. of the most exquisite marble, porphyry, red jasper, and other costly stones curiously wrought: a full account of all which may be seen in Tournefort. The modern buildings here are mostly mean and low, being built of mud and turf: the town-walls are also low and made of earth, with wretched battlements, and intermixed with towers, columns, architraves, freezes, and other ancient fragments injudiciously tacked together, particularly the gates and towers: so that they make but an indifferent figure. The only remarkable thing, besides the old workmanship, is the great variety of inscriptions in several languages to be seen on them. The castle of Angouri or Ancyra, is surrounded with a treble wall, consisting of large fragments of white marble, intermixed with another kind of stone, not unlike porphyry. Within the first wall is a little dark Armenian church, said to have been built upwards of 1200 years. In it is but one window, which is stopped up with thin marble or alabaster, through which the light is transmitted but dimly, and is tinged of a reddish cast. All the three walls are full of such ancient fragments, with inscriptions in Greek, Latin, Arabic, Turkish, &c. and those so numerous, that they would take an antiquary a whole year to transcribe them. Ancyra was anciently an archbishop's see with six suffragans under it. This town lies 128 miles S. E. from Scutara, and 250 E. of Smyrna. Lat. 40, N. Long. 32, 58, E.

ANDAGUAYLAS, a jurisdiction in S. America, in the empire of Peru, subject to the archbishop of Lima, lying E. by S. of the city of Guamanga. It abounds in sugar-plantations, grain of most sorts and fruits.

ANDAJA, a river of Old Castile in Spain, which runs into the Duero or Douro, one of the two capital rivers in this kingdom.

ANDALUSIA, or ANDALUZIA, (province of) in Spain, taken in its most extensive sense, comprehends the Moorish kingdoms of Seville, Cordova, and Jaen, together with that of Granada; whence the latter was called Upper Andalusia, and Andalusia Proper had the name of Lower Andalusia, but is generally looked upon as a distinct province. We are to observe that these four joined together, made up the ancient Roman province called Bætica, wanting ing only as much of the provinces of Estremadura and Castile as lies between the river Guadiana and the mountains called Sierra Moreno. In ancient times it had also the name of Tartessus. These being the seat of the Vandals, who over-ran the greatest part of Spain, as well as some part of Africa, was from them called Vandalenshaus, i. e. the residence or seat of the Vandals, in Latin Vandalicia; from the former of which the present name of this province has been corrupted into that of Andalusia. It was anciently called Turdetani as being one of the seats belonging to the brave Turdetani and Turduli: whilst another tribe of them possessed that part of the Tarraconensis which now composes the kingdoms of Valencia and Arragon, at least their inland parts; for the maritime coasts were occupied by other nations; such as Greeks, Phœnicians, Carthaginians, and Romans, who probably drove those ancient inhabitants, not only from the coasts into the inland parts, but separated them from each other, squeezing themselves in between them. And this will best account for the great distance between the Turdetani in this S.W. part of the kingdom, and those on its E. side. The strip of land on the coast, from Niebla as far as Almería in the kingdom of Granada, was formerly named Algarve, whence part of the royal title is, "Rey de los Algarves," i. e. king of the Two Algarves. See ALGARVE, in Portugal. Andalusia, properly so called, is bounded on the N. by Estremadura and New Castile, from which it is divided by the above-mentioned chain of mountains, called Sierra Morena; on the W. it has the Portuguese provinces of Alentejo and Algarve; to the S. partly by the Atlantic, and partly the Straits of Gibraltar; and its boundary to the E. is Granada and Murcia. Its extent from W. to E. is upwards of 200 miles; and from N. to S. its breadth is various, the greatest is above 100 miles. It lies between Lat. 36 and 38, N. and between Long. 2 and 5, W. The river Guadalquivir, anciently called Bœtis and Tartessus, runs the whole length of Andalusia; and the Guadiana divides it to the W. from Portuguese Algarve. The other smaller rivers fall partly without the intervention of any thing into the sea, or the Odier or Odiel, Tinto or Azeche, the water of which is not drinkable, and is detrimental to plants and the roots of trees, producing neither fish nor any other living creature; also the Guadalate, that is, the River of Forgetfulness: and partly into the Guadalquivir, as the Guadiamar and Xenil, whose source is in Granada, &c.

Andalusia is reckoned the best and richest part of all Spain, with regard to commerce from without, and plenty of every thing from within. The former advantage arises from its maritime situation and commodious harbours; the latter from the fertility of the country, and the numbers of its inhabitants; for it abounds in exquisite fruits of all kinds, as oranges, citrons of Seville, fine raisins, almonds, figs, pomegranates; and has surprising quantities of wheat, excellent wine, and oil: and a single town in this province, we are told, has been known to make 7500 pipes of wine, and the same quantity of oil, in a year. It abounds in fine honey, silk, and the best of sugar. Vast herds of cattle are bred through the whole province. Here is plenty of curious white salt, fine scarlet berries for dying, and, in short, every thing that can render a country wealthy and pleasant. Not to say any thing of their rich mines of gold, silver, and baser metals, seeing these have been wholly neglected since the discovery of America. From ancient history it appears that the Tyrians, Rhodians, Phœnicians, Carthaginians, Phocians, and other nations, exported vast quantities of the two noble metals, besides what the Romans did afterwards. And to this day we see Andalusia continues a place of considerable commerce, and is resorted to by all nations of Europe. From its mines are extracted cinnabar, and a certain kind of quicksilver. Its breed of horses has been famous in all ages and nations; and though those bred in Estremadura, along the banks of the Tagus, and Guadiana, are very good; yet the horses of the Guidalquivir, or the famous Bœtis of the ancients, surpasses all other parts of Spain in beauty and fleetness; particularly the city of Cordova maintains to this day its ancient reputation for being the best breeder of that generous and useful creature.

The summer-heats in Andalusia are excessive; but at such times the inhabitants generally sleep in the day, and travel and work in the night: yet the air is pure and fine, and the heat is not so lasting, detrimental, or troublesome (as cooling breezes blow at certain times, which greatly alleviate and abate of its vehemence), but that it may be borne with, in regard of the many advantages this country enjoys, especially as habitual use, and the many ingenious expedients found out to screen the inhabitants, all contribute to render the heat more tolerable and easy. And indeed nothing can be a greater proof of this than the vast concourse of people that come into this country, as well as the number of its cities, and the populousness of the province in general, which is so great that Father Pennalosa informs us that Andalusia and Estremadura could raise 50,000 foot, and 20,000 horse, for the king's service; unless this, like the articles above mentioned of wine and oil, are instances of Andalusian, if not Spanish, rhodomontade.

This province is governed by an Adelantado, or lord-lieutenant, which honour is hereditary to the dukes of Medina Celi; and it properly consists of three ancient kingdoms, which are made use of in the the king's title, instead of the general name Andalusia: and these are Seville, Cordova, and Jaen; which see. It contains 21 cities, namely, Seville, Cordova, Jaen, Cadiz, Xerez de la Frontera, Ezija, Gibraltar, Ubeda, Baeza, San Lucan de Barrameda, Medina, Sidonia, Port St. Mary, Anduxar, Carmona, Alcalá la Real, Lucena, Areos, San Lucar Mayor, and Marchena; all which see in their places. It has also one archbishopric, three bishoprics, a great number of rich and stately towns, with large wealthy villages.

ANDALUSIA, (New) a division of the province of Terra Firma, in South America, whose boundaries cannot be well ascertained, as the Spaniards pretend a right to countries in which they have never established any settlements. According to the most reasonable limits, it extends in length 500 miles from north to south, and about 270 in breadth from east to west. The interior country is woody and mountainous, variegated with fine valleys that yield corn and pasturage. The produce of the country consists chiefly in dying-drugs, gums, medicinal roots, brazil-wood, sugar, tobacco, and some valuable timber. To this province also belonged five valuable pearl-fisheries. The capital of New Andalusia is Comana, Cumana, or New Corduba, situated in N. Lat. 9, 55, about nine miles from the North-sea. Here the Spaniards laid the foundation of a town in the year 1520. The place is strong by nature, and fortified by a castle capable of making a vigorous defence; as appeared in the year 1670, when it was assaulted by the bucaners, who were repulsed with very great slaughter.

ANDEMAN (Islands of), situated on the E. side of the entrance of the bay of Bengal, and kingdom or Siam, in the East-Indies, between Lat. 10 and 15, N. and in Long. 93, E. In sailing from the Nicobar Islands towards the N. there is an interval of 20 or 30 leagues to the southernmost of the Andeman Islands, called the Chitte, or Little Andeman. It is reckoned difficult sailing among these and the Martavan Islands, many coral-grounds lying along the W. side of the Andeman sand, and in other places there being rocks and great overfalls, in some of which is ouzy ground. The Andeman Islands lie 100 leagues N. of Sumatra, and opposite to the coast of Tennasserim; from whence Capt. Hamilton says they are 80 leagues, and that they are surrounded with several dangerous banks and rocks, and all well inhabited by an inoffensive people, who seldom eat flesh, though some voyagers represent them as carnibals, and live principally on rice, fruits, roots, and herbs, with which they furnish such ships as touch at these islands. The above Capt. Hamilton says, they are a fearless people; and that they will swim off to a boat, if near the shore, and attack her with their wooden weapons, notwithstanding the superiority of numbers, and the advantage of fire-arms in the boat.

ANDANAGAR, or AMADANAGER, or DANAGAR, a town in the province of Decan, and hither peninsula of India, in Asia. It is situated 120 miles S. E. of Bombay, and 15 leagues of north Visapour. Heylin calls it a beautiful and flourishing city; and, if Mr. Finch may be credited, it was taken by the natives from the Mogul in 1510, when the latter had 500,000 men in the field. On account of its delightful situation in the midst of charming gardens, it was formerly the residence of the kings of Golconda, on the borders of which Luyts places it upon the river Guenga. Andanagar lies in Lat. 18, 20, N. Long. 74, 15, E.

ANDANCE, a little town of Upper Vivarais, one of the two subdivisions of the diocese of Viviers, in the government of Languedoc, in France. It is situated at the foot of a mountain near the confluence of the rivers Dome and Rhone.

ANDARGE, a river of France, in the government of Nivernois.

ANDASTES, a savage nation, in Canada, North-America, bordering on the northern boundary of Virginia.

ANDAXAR. See ANDUJAR.

ANDAYE, in Latin Andaia, a large village and fort of Labourd, one of the subdivisions of Gascony, belonging to the government of Guyenne and Gaseony, in France. It is situated at the mouth of the river Bidasson, directly opposite to the Fontarabia, or Fuentarabia, in Spain, and only a quarter of a league from it. It is about two leagues distant from St. Jean de Luz, and five from Bayonne. As it stands on the very borders of Spain, the French have built a fort here, in order to keep those of Fontarabia in awe. From Andaye is exported very fine brandy.

ANDE, a river in Hampshire.

ANDECAVI, ANDEGAVI, ANDES, ANDI, a people of Gallia Celtica, having the Turones to the east, the Namnetes to the west, the Pictones to the south, and the Auleri Cœnomani to the north; now Anjou.

ANDEGAVI, or ANDEGAVUS, a town of Gallia Celtica; now Angiers: called Andecavi. W. Long. 30. Lat. 47, 30.

ANDELFINGEN, a town in a district of the same name, in the canton of Zurich, Switzerland; standing on an eminence along the river Thur, over which it has a covered bridge. Here is a custom-house, and a castle, in which resides the governor of the district.

ANDELOT, in Latin Andelous, a place in Bassigny, which is a subdivision of Champagne, belonging to the government of this name, and Brie, on the little river Rougnon, in France. It was formerly a considerable city, as still appears from from its ruins; but is now only a village. It is however the seat of a royal provostship.

ANDELI, anciently Andelaus, or Andelagus, from which Andeleium, Andelium, or Andeliacum, have been formed; the name of two towns in Vexin Normandy, a subdivision of Upper Normandy, belonging to the government of the latter, in France. They are situated close by each other, only separated by a paved road a quarter of a league long; and both taken together are called Andelis. Great Andeli, but which is only a small town, is situated in a valley on the river Gambon, upon which are several water-mills, and which falls into the Seine below the castle of Gaillard. It is the principal place of an election, the seat of a royal court, a provincial court, district, viscounty, forest-court, and granary for salt. Here is a collegiate church, a priory, two convents, and a small college, together with a mayor and three aldermen. Little Andeli is a small town, situated on the banks of the Seine, and was formerly fortified, but the walls are now ruined in several places. It has only one parish-church, a convent, and an hospital which stands out of the town. Near it also is an hermitage built on the middle of a rock, on the top of which stands Castle Gaillard, which commands the river, and had formerly fine apartments, but now fallen into ruins. This was the native place of the famous painter, Nicolas de Poussin. Here is a fountain to which pilgrims flock from all parts to be cured of their disorders, on the feast-day of the saint to which it is dedicated. It is 20 miles S.E. of Rouen, and five N.W. of Paris. E. Long. 1, 30. N. Lat. 49, 20.

ANDELLE, a river of Normandy, in France, whose source is in the parish of Forge, a village belonging to the little territory of Bray, in the same province. Upon it rafts of wood, intended for fuel, which has been cut in the forests of Lions and Pitre, are floated down to Paris, as it falls into the Seine.

ANDENAS, a bailiwick, in the district of Nordland, belonging to the diocese of Dröntheim, in Norway. It consists entirely of islands, and, together with the bailiwicks of Lofoden and Vesteraalen, constitutes one priory; to which belong 19 churches. Here no corn grows: but between the islands of Lofoden is the best fishery in all Nordland; and these yield high grass. The whole row of islands stretches out into the sea from N.E. to S.W. and between these and the main land is a long and broad bay, called West Fiorden, and which widens still further towards the S.W.

ANDEOL (St.), a town of France, in the Vivarez, five miles S. of St. Viviers, whose bishop formerly resided there. E. Long. 2, 50. N. Lat. 44, 24.

ANDERAB, the most southern city of the province of Balkh, possessed by the Usbeck Tatars. It is very rich and populous, but a place of no great strength. The neighbouring mountains yield excellent quarries of lapis lazuli, in which the Bukhars drive a great trade with Persia and India. This city is situated at the foot of the mountains dividing the dominions of the Great Mogul and Persia from Great Bukharia. As there is no other way of crossing these mountains but by the road through this city, all travellers with goods must pay 4 per cent. On this account the Khan of Balkh maintains a good number of soldiers in the place.

A N

ANDER, (St.) See ANDERO.

ANDERNAAH, or ANDERNACHT, anciently Andenacum and Anternacum, a small town and fortress in the electorate of Cologne, in Germany. It lies on the Lower Rhine, and on the confines of Triers and Juliers. It was one of the fortresses built by Drusus, to keep the Germans in awe: and it is believed that his son Caligula was born there. In it are three considerable monasteries, and several churches, the principal of which has two similar steeples, not unlike the towers of Notre Dame at Paris: it is inclosed with a strong, well-flanked wall, and is fortified with a castle. It was taken in three days by Gustavus Adolphus, king of Sweeden, in 1632, with a small detachment, though there were 800 men in the place. At one of the angles of the wall is an antique tower, pretended to have been built by Drusus. Near the town are excellent mineral waters, particularly those of Dunchstein, which are much frequented in the summer, and are often drank with wine. For this purpose here is a great vent of stone-jugs and pitchers; and the town is a considerable gainer by floats of large timber brought hither, and exported from hence to Holland. It was formerly a free and imperial city; but is now subject to the elector of Cologne, who took it in 1496. After lying a long time in ruins, it was rebuilt in 1520. It is the boundary betwixt this archbishopric and that of Triers, and has a custom-house belonging to Cologne; but its principal trade is by lodging travellers and passengers. In 1702 it was taken by the Prince of Hesse-Cassel, the more to strengthen Bonné, which was then blocked up by the confederates. It was much damaged in 1689 by the French. Two companies of soldiers are kept here at the charges of the chapter of Cologne. Andernacht is situated eight miles N.W. from Coblenz, and twenty S.E. from Bonné. Lat. 50, 27. N. Long. 7, E.

ANDERLECHT, a fortress of Brabant, in the Netherlands. It lies two miles S. of Brussels, and is intended as an outwork to that city.

ANDERO, St. according to Busching, St. Ander. "Anciently, continues he, Portus Sancti Emederi, a small, old, and fortified city of Asturia de Santillana.

lana, one of the two subdivisions of the principality of Asturias, in Spain. It is situated on the sea, at the foot of a hill, in a delightful country, which abounds with fine fruit and wine, having a large, secure, and well-fortified harbour; but in the entrance to it is a very dangerous rock, which is called Penna de Mogron. The suburbs are almost entirely inhabited by fishermen, who have a rich and plentiful fishery here." Thus far Busching; but our maps place St. Andero in the province of Biscay; and our geographers tell us, that it lies on a little peninsula. It has a good trade, and is sixty miles W. of Bilbao. Here some of the Spanish men of war are built, and laid up. Lat. 43, 20, N. Long. 4, 30, W.

ANDES, a great chain of mountains in South America, which running from the most northern part of Peru to the Straits of Magellan, between 3 and 4000 miles, are the longest and most remarkable in the world. The Spaniards call them the Cordillera de los Andes; they form two ridges, the lowermost of which is overspread with woods and groves, and the uppermost covered with everlasting snow. Those who have been at the top, affirm that the sky is always serene and bright; the air cold and piercing; and yet so thin, that they were scarce able to breathe, and the respiration was much quicker than ordinary; and this is attended with reaching and vomiting; which, however, has been considered by some as merely accidental. When they looked downwards, the country was hid by the clouds that hovered on the mountain's sides. The mountains just mentioned, which have been frequently ascended, are much inferior in height to many others in this enormous chain. The following is the account given of the mountain called Pichincha, by the mathematicians sent by the kings of France and Spain to make observations in relation to the figure of the earth. Soon after our artists arrived at Quito, they determined to continue the series of the triangles for measuring an arch of the meridian to the S. of that city: the company accordingly divided themselves into two bodies, consisting of French and Spaniards, and each retired to the part assigned them. Don George Juan and M. Godin, who were at the head of one party, went to the mountain of Pambamarca; while M. Bouguer, de la Condamine, and Don Ulloa, together with their assistants, climbed up to the highest summit of Pichincha. Both parties suffered extremely, as well from the severity of the cold as from the impetuosity of the winds, which on these heights blow with incessant violence; difficulties the more painful, as they had been little used to such sensations. Thus in the torrid zone, nearly under the equinoctial, where it is natural to suppose they had most to fear from the heat, their greatest pain was caused by the excessiveness of the cold. Their first scheme for shelter and lodging in these uncomfortable regions, was to pitch a field-tent for each company; but on Pichincha this could not be done from the narrowness of the summit: they were therefore obliged to be contented with a hut so small that they could hardly all creep into it. Nor will this appear strange, if the reader considers the bad disposition and smallness of the place, it being one of the loftiest crags of a rocky mountain, 100 fathoms above the highest part of the desert of Pichincha. Such was the situation of their mansion, which, like all the other adjacent parts, soon became covered with ice and snow. The ascent up this stupendous rock from the base, or the place where the mules could come, to their habitation, was so craggy as only to be climbed on foot; and to perform it cost them four hours continual labour and pain, from the violent efforts of the body, and the subtilty of the air; the latter being such as to render respiration difficult. The strange manner of living to which our artists were reduced during the time they were employed in a geometrical mensuration of some degrees of the meridian, may not perhaps prove unentertaining to the reader; and therefore the following account is given as a specimen of it. The desert of Pichincha, both with regard to the operations performed there, and its inconveniences, differing very little from others, an idea may be very easily formed of the fatigues, hardships, and dangers, to which they were continually exposed during the time they were prosecuting the enterprize, with the conduct of which they had been honoured. The principal difference between the several deserts consisted in their greater or lesser distance from places where they could procure provisions; and in the inclemency of the weather, which was proportionate to the height of the mountains and the season of the year. They generally kept within their hut. Indeed they were obliged to do this, both on account of the intenseness of the cold, the violence of the wind, and their being continually involved in so thick a fog that an object at six or eight paces was hardly discernible. When the fog cleared up, the clouds by their gravity moved nearer to the surface of the earth, and on all sides surrounded the mountains to a vast distance, representing the sea, with their rock like an island in the center of it. When this happened, they heard the horrid noises of the tempests, which then discharged themselves on Quito and the neighbouring country. They saw the lightnings issue from the clouds, and heard the thunders roll far beneath them: and whilst the lower parts were involved in tempests of thunder and rain, they enjoyed a delightful serenity; the wind was abated, the sky clear, and the enlivening rays of the sun moderated the severity of the cold. But their circumstances were very different when the clouds rose: their thickness rendered respiration difficult; the snow and hail fell continually; and the wind returned with all its violence; so that it was impossible entirely to overcome the fears of being, together with their hut, blown down the precipice, on whose edge it was built, or of being buried under it by the daily accumulations of ice and snow.

The wind was often so violent in these regions, that its velocity dazzled the sight, whilst their fears were increased from the dreadful concussions of the precipice, caused by the fall of enormous fragments of rocks. These crashes were the more alarming, as no other noises are heard in these deserts: and during the night, their rest, which they so greatly wanted, was frequently disturbed by such sudden sounds. When the weather was any thing fair with them, and the clouds gathered about some of the other mountains which had a connection with their observations, so that they could not make all the use they desired of this interval of good weather, they left their hut to exercise themselves. Sometimes they descended to some small distance; and at others, amused themselves with rolling large fragments of rocks down the precipice; and these frequently required the joint strength of them all, though they often saw the same effected by the mere force of the wind. But they always took care in their excursions not to go so far out, but that on the least appearance of the clouds gathering about their cottage, which often happened very suddenly, they could regain their shelter. The door of their hut was fastened with thongs of leather, and on the inside not the smallest crevice was left unstopped; beside which, it was very compactly covered with straw: but, notwithstanding all their care, the wind penetrated through. The days were often little better than the nights; and all the light they enjoyed was that of a lamp or two, which they kept continually burning. Though their hut was small, and crowded with inhabitants, beside the heat of the lamps; yet the intenseness of the cold was such, that every one of them was obliged to have a chafing-dish of coals. These precautions would have rendered the rigour of the climate supportable, had not the imminent danger of perishing, by being blown down the precipice, roused them every time it snowed, to encounter the severity of the outward air, and sally out with shovels to free the roof of their hut from the masses of snow which were gathering on it. Nor would it, without this precaution, have been able to support the weight. They were not indeed without servants and Indians; but these were so benumbed with the cold, that it was with great difficulty they could get them out of a small tent, where they kept a continual fire. So that all our artists could obtain from them was to take their turns in this labour; and even then they went very unwillingly about it, and consequently performed it slowly. It may easily be conceived what this company suffered from the asperities of such a climate. Their feet were swelled, and so tender, that they could not even bear the heat; and walking was attended with extreme pain. Their hands were covered with chilblains; their lips swelled and chopped; so that every motion in speaking, or the like, drew blood; consequently they were obliged to strict taciturnity, and little disposed to laugh, as, by causing an extension of the lips, it produced such fissures as were very painful for two or three days after.

Their common food in this inhospitable region was a little rice boiled with some flesh or fowl, procured from Quito; and, instead of fluid water, their pot was filled with ice; they had the same resource with regard to what they drank; and while they were eating, every one was obliged to keep his plate over a chafing-dish of coals, to prevent his provisions from freezing. The same was done with regard to the water. At first they imagined the drinking strong liquors would diffuse a heat through the body, and consequently render it less sensible of the painful sharpness of the cold; but, to their surprise, they felt no manner of strength in such liquors, nor were they any greater preservative against the cold than the common water. At the same time they found it impossible to keep the Indians together. On their first feeling of the climate, their thoughts were immediately turned on deserting their masters. The first instance they had of this kind was so unexpected, that, had not one, of a better disposition than the rest, staid and acquainted them of their design, it might have proved of very bad consequence. The affair was this: there being on the top of the rock no room for pitching a tent for the Indians, they used every evening to retire to a cave at the foot of the mountain; where, beside a natural diminution of the cold, they could keep a continual fire; and, consequently, enjoyed more comfortable quarters than their masters. Before they withdrew at night, they fastened, on the outside, the door of the hut, which was so low that it was impossible to go in or out without stooping; and as every night the hail and snow which had fallen formed a wall against the door, it was the business of one or two of the Indians to come early and remove this obstruction. For though the negro servants were lodged in a little tent, their hands and feet were so covered with chilblains, that they would rather have suffered themselves to have been killed than move. The Indians therefore came constantly up to dispatch this work between nine or ten in the morning: but they had not been there above four or five days, when they were not a little alarmed to see ten, eleven, and twelve o'clock come, without any news of their labourers; when they were relieved by the honest servant mentioned above, who had withstood the seduction of his countrymen, and and informed his masters of the desertion of the four others. As soon as the snow was cleared away from the door, they dispatched the Indian to the corregidor of Quito, who with equal dispatch sent other Indians, threatening to chastise them severely if they were wanting in their duty. But the fear of punishment was not sufficient to induce them to support the rigour of this situation; for within two days they deserted. The corregidor therefore, to prevent any other inconvenience, sent four Indians under the care of an alcade, and gave orders for their being relieved every fourth day. Twenty three days our artists spent on this rock, viz. to the 6th of September, and even without any possibility of finishing their observations of the angles: for, when it was fair and clear weather with them, the others, on whose summits the signals which formed the triangles for measuring the degrees of the meridian, were hid in the clouds; and when those were clear, Pichincha was involved in clouds. It was therefore necessary to erect their signals in a lower situation, and in a more favourable region. This however did not produce any change in their habitation till the beginning of December; when, having finished the observations which particularly concerned Pichincha, they proceeded to others; but with no abatement either of inconveniences, cold, or fatigue; for the places where they made their observations being necessarily on the highest parts of the deserts, the only respite in which they enjoyed some little ease, was during the short interval of passing from one to the other. In all their stations subsequent to that on Pichincha, during their fatiguing mensuration of the degrees of the meridian, each company lodged in a field-tent, which, though small, they found less inconvenient than the hut on Pichincha; though at the same time they had more trouble, being oftener obliged to clear it from the snow, as the weight of it would otherwise have demolished the tent. At first, indeed, they pitched it in the most sheltered places; but on taking a resolution that the tents themselves should serve for signals, to prevent the inconvenience of having others of wood, they removed them to a more exposed situation, where the impetuosity of the winds sometimes tore up the piquets, and blew them down. Though this mountain is famous for its great height, it is considerably lower than the mountain of Cotopaxi: but it is impossible to conceive the coldness of the summit of the last mentioned mountain, from that felt on this; since it must exceed every idea that can be formed by the human mind, though they are both seated in the midst of the torrid zone. In all this range of mountains, there is said to be a constant inferior boundary, beyond which the snow never melts: this boundary, in the midst of the torrid zone, is said by some to be 2434 fathoms above the level of the sea; by others, only 2400 feet.

The snow indeed falls much lower, but then it is subject to be melted the very same day. It is affirmed that there are in the Andes 16 volcanoes, or burning mountains, which throw out fire and smoke with a terrible noise. The height of Chimborazo, said to be the highest peak of the Andes, has been determined by geometrical calculation to be 20,282 feet. But the great differences between the calculators of the heights of mountains in other parts of the world must very much diminish the credit of such calculations. Instances of this we have already given under the article ERNA. No less remarkable are the differences concerning the height of the peak of Teneriffe, which, according to the calculations of Varenus, is three miles and three quarters, or 19,800 feet; according to those of Dr. Heberden, is only 15,396 feet; and, according to those of M. Feuille, is no more than 13,128 feet. From these specimens we can scarce avoid concluding that all the methods hitherto invented for calculating the exact height of mountains are insufficient.

As all or most rivers have their source in mountains, it is no wonder a great number run down the sides of the Andes. Some hurry along with a prodigious rapidity, while others form beautiful cascades, or run through holes in rocks, which look like bridges of a stupendous height. There is a public road through the mountains, 1000 miles in length, part of which runs from Quito to Cusco.

The dependencies of the jurisdictions in the province of Quito are situated between the two cordilleras of the Andes. These arid tracts are called Paramos, or Deserts; for, though all the cordilleras are dry, or quite shrivelled up, some of them are much more so than others, since the continual snows and frost render them uninhabitable, even by any beast; nor is there a single plant to be found upon them. The latter, as being the most remarkable and curious objects, we shall more particularly describe.

The paramo of Asuay, formed by the junction of the two cordilleras, is not of this class; for, though it is remarkable for its excessive cold and aridity, its height does not surpass that of the cordilleras in general, and is much lower than that of Pichincha and Corazon. From barometrical experiments made at Pucaguayco, on the mountain Cotopaxi, the height of the mercury was five lines and one third; whence the height of that place was determined to be 1023 toises above the plane of Carabucu, and that of the latter above the surface of the sea about 1268 toises. Thus the height of Pucaguayco above the surface of the sea is 2791 fathoms. The signal placed on this mountain was 30 or 40 fathoms above the ice, or point of continual congelation; and the perpendicular height, from the commencement of this point to the summit pit of the mountain, was found, from geometrical observations made for that purpose, to be about 880 fathoms. Thus the summit of Cotopaxi is elevated 3126 above the surface of the sea, or something above 3 geometrical miles, and 639 higher than the top of Pichincha. These are the mountains we shall treat of; and the height of them all, considering the greatness of it, may be said to be nearly equal. In these cordilleras the most southern mountain is that of Mecas, more properly called Sanguay; though in this country better known by the former appellation, and lying in the jurisdiction of the same name. It is of a prodigious height; and the far greatest part of its whole surface is covered with snow. From its summit issues a continual fire, attended with explosions which are plainly heard at Pintac, a village belonging to the jurisdiction of Quito, and near 40 leagues from the mountain; and, when the wind is fair, the noise is heard even at Quito. The country adjacent to this volcano is totally barren, being covered with cinders ejected from it. In this paramo the river Sanguay has its source. This river cannot be said to be small; but, after its junction with another, called the Upano, forms the Payra, a large river, which empties itself into the Maragnon.

In the same eastern cordillera, about six leagues W. of the town of Riobamba, is a very high mountain, with two crests, and both of them covered with snow. That on the N. is called Collanes, and that on the S. Altar; but the space covered with snow is much less than that of Sanguay, and others of this class, its height being proportionably less.

North of the same town, and about seven leagues distant from it, is the mountain of Tunguragua, which is of a conical figure, and equally steep on all sides. The ground at its base is something lower than that of the cordilleras, especially on the N. side, where it seems to rise from the same plain with that on which the villages are situated. On this side, in a small plain betwixt its skirts and the cordilleras, has been built the village of Bannos, so called from its hot medicinal baths, to which there is a great resort from all parts of this jurisdiction. S. of Cuenca, and not far from another village called Bannos, also belonging to this jurisdiction, are other hot waters, on the summit of an eminence, gushing out through several apertures of four or five inches in diameter; and of a heat which hardens eggs sooner than water over the fire. These several streams unite, forming a rivulet, the stones in the channel and banks of which are tinged with yellow, and the water tastes brackish. The upper part of this small eminence is full of crevices, through which issues continual smoke; a sufficient indication of its containing great quantities of sulphureous and nitrous substances.

North of Riobamba, inclining some degrees to the W. is the mountain of Chimborazo, by the side of which lies the road from Quito to Guayaquil. At first great numbers of the Spaniards perished in passing the vast and dangerous deserts on its declivity; but being at present better acquainted with them, and inured to the climate, such misfortunes are seldom heard of; especially as very few take this road, unless there is the greatest appearance of two or three days of calm and serene weather.

North of this mountain stands that of Carguayra. North of Latacunga, and about five leagues distant from it, is Cotopaxi, which, towards the N. W. and S. extends itself beyond all the others; and which became a volcano at the time of the Spaniards first arrival in this country. In 1743 a new eruption happened, having been preceded for some days by a continual rumbling in its bowels. An aperture was made in its summit; and three more about the same height near the middle of its declivity, at that time buried under prodigious heaps of snow. The ignited substances emitted on that occasion being mixed with a prodigious quantity of ice and snow, and melting amidst the flames, were carried down with such astonishing rapidity, that in an instant the plain from Callo to Latacunga was overflowed; and besides its ravages in sweeping down houses of the Indians, and other poor inhabitants, great numbers of people lost their lives. The river of Latacunga was the channel of this terrible flood, till becoming too small for receiving such a prodigious current, it overflowed the adjacent country near the town, and carried away all the buildings within its reach. The inhabitants retired to a spot of higher ground behind the town, of which such parts as stood within the limits of the current were totally destroyed. The dread of still greater devastations did not subside in three days, during which the volcano ejected cinders, while torrents of melted ice and snow poured down its sides. The fire lasted several days, and was accompanied with terrible roarings of the wind rushing through the volcano, which vastly exceeded the great rumblings before heard in its bowels. At last all was quiet, neither fire nor smoke were seen, nor was there any noise to be heard till the following year; namely, 1744, when, in the month of May, the flames increased, and forced their passage through several other parts on the sides of the mountain; so that in clear nights the flames being reflected by the transparent ice formed a very grand and beautiful illumination. On the 30th of November it ejected such prodigious quantities of fire and ignited substances that an inundation equal to the former soon ensued; so that the inhabitants of Latacunga gave themselves over for lost.

Five leagues to the W. of this mountain stands that of Illinisa, the summit of which is also bifid, and constantly covered with snow. From it several rivulets derive their source, of which those flowing from the northern declivity continue that direction; as those from the southern side run southward: the latter pay their tribute to the Northern-ocean, through the large river of the Amazons; while the former discharge themselves into the South-sea, by the River of Emeralds.

North of Cotopaxi is another snowy mountain, called Chinculagua, something less than the former, though even that is not to be compared to the others. The mountain of Cayamburo, which is one of the first magnitude, lies N. some degrees easterly from Quito, at the distance of about 11 leagues from that city. There is neither appearance nor tradition of its ever having been a volcano. Several rivers issue from it, of which those from the W. and N. run either into the River of Emeralds, or that of Mira; but all fall into the South-sea: while these from the E. discharge themselves into the river of the Amazons. Besides the torrents which precipitate themselves from the snowy mountains, others have their source in the lower parts of the Cordilleras; and at their confluence form very large and noble rivers, which either pay their tribute to the North or South seas. All the springs issuing from the mountains, in the neighbourhood of Cuenca, on the W. and S. side as far as Talqui, with those of the eastern Cordillera, and northward as far as the Paramo de Burgay, unite at about half a league eastward of a chapel, called Jadan, under the care of the curate of Pante; where forming a river, and passing near that village, from which it has its name, discharges itself into the river of the Amazons. It is so deep at Pante that, though wide, it is no where fordable. From the mountains of Asuay, that of Buerap, and the adjacent hills on the S. is formed a very considerable river, over which are several bridges. It is called Cannar, from that being the only town in its course, which it continues to Yokon to the bay of Guayaquil. The northern parts of the Paramo of Asuay also give rise to many streams, which, uniting with others that issue from Mount Seneguala, and the western side of the eastern Cordillera, form the river Alausi, which discharges itself into the bay of Guayaquil.

On the highest part of the Paramo de Tioloma, and near the signal erected on this mountain for forming the series of triangles, are four lakes, the three which are nearest to it being less than the other, which is about half a league in length, and called Coley; and the others, which are not much inferior to Coley, have the names of Pichabinnac, Pubillu, and Macallan. From these is formed the river Cebadas, which runs near the village of that name, and is joined by another rising from the springs on the Paramo of Lalangufo, and the streams from the Colta-lake; after which, inclining a little from the N. towards the E. it passes by Pungala, and about a league from the village of Puni is joined by the river Bamba, which has its source in the Paramo of Sisapongo. Near the town of Cobigies is another, which flows from the mountain of Chimborazo; and which, after directing its course northward till it is in an E. and W. direction with the mountain of Tunguragua, winds to the E. and adds its waters to those of the river of the Amazons. At the town of Penipe it is so deep and rapid as only to be crossed over by a bridge made of bejucos. Also before it reaches the town of Los Bannos, it is increased by the rivers Latacunga and Bato, together with all the streams from both the Cordilleras, those from the southern summit of Elenisa, and the southern side of Ruminavi and Cotopaxi.

The streams flowing from the N. summit of Elenisa have already been mentioned as running northward; and with these all from the same Cordillera unite, together with those issuing from the N. and W. sides of the mountain Ruminavi, those of Pasuchua; and from this junction is formed the river Amaguanna. The two last mountains stand N. and S. from each other, in an intermediate space of the Cordilleras. From the N. side of Cotopaxi, the Paramo of Chinchulagua, which is covered also with snow, and the Cordillera de Guamani, other streams have their rise, and from their confluence is formed the river Ichubamba, which, running northward, joins the Amaguanna a little to the N. of Cono-coto. It afterwards receives the rivulets issuing from the eastern Cordillera, and changes its name to that of Guayallabamba. The waters which have their source in the western part of Cayamburo, and southern part of Mexanda, form another river called Pisque, which first runs towards the W. and joining the Guayallabamba, takes the name of Alchipichi, which a little to the N. of St. Antonio, in the jurisdiction of Quito, is very broad, and withal rapid. From hence it contains its course northward, and at last falls into the River of Emeralds.

The mountain of Majanda stands in the intermediate space between the Cordilleras; and though it has only one side, as it were, it is divided into two summits: the one eastward, and the other westward: and from both these runs a small Cordillera, which afterwards joining, inclose this valley. From the side of this mountain issues two large torrents, which meet in the lake of St. Pablo; from whence flows a river, which being joined by others from the springs of the western Cordillera, form one stream; and after being increased by another brook from the heights of Oezillo, give rise to the river river that washes the town of St. Miguel de Ibarra; after which it takes the name of Mira, and discharges itself into the South-sea, a little to the N. of the River of Emeralds.

ANDES, a hamlet of Mantua, in Italy, the birth-place of Virgil; hence the epithet Andinus. It is now called Pietola, two miles west of Mantua.

ANDETRIUM, ANDRETIUM, ANDECRUM, or ANDRECIUM, an inland town of Dalmatia. The genuine name is Andetrium. It is described by ancient geographers as situated near Salone, on a naturally strong and inaccessible rock; surrounded with deep vallies, with rapid torrents; from which it appears to be the citadel: now called Clissa. Long. 17, 46, E. Lat. 43, 20, N.

ANDEUSE, a city of Languedoc, in France; in E. Long. 3, 40. Lat. 43, 45, N.

ANDIOL (St.), a considerable village of Lower Vivarais, belonging to the diocese of Viviers, and government of Languedoc, in France. It is situated on the Rhone, at the junction of the Ardeche with it. Here is the usual residence of the bishop of Viviers; and this place has two convents.

ANDLAU, a small city of Lower Alsace, in the government of this last name, belonging to France. It is situated on the southern bank of the river Andlau. Here is a nunnery bearing the same name, which is for secular canoneses of quality. It was formerly a free imperial abbey, but never paid any contributions towards the public expences of the empire. To it belongs the castle of Freudeneck, with the convent of Hugshofen. The town does not belong to the abbess, but to a secular lord, who is stiled Lord of Andlau. The abbess was however summoned to the imperial diets before Alsace was ceded into the hands of the French.

ANDLAU, one of the ten considerable rivers of Lower Alsace, which issue from the Vosgue or Wasgau mountains. It mingles its waters with those of the Ill, one of the two largest rivers in Upper Alsatia.

ANDOMADUNUM, ANDOMATUNUM, and ANTEMATUNUM, or Civitas Lingonum; a city of Gallia Belgica; now Langnes, in Champagne: situated on an eminence on the borders of Burgundy, at the springs of the Maine. Long. 5, 22, E. Lat. 48, 0, N.

ANDORA, a town in the Riviera di Ponente, or western division of the Genoese territories on the continent of Italy, and the upper part of it. In its neighbourhood is produced excellent wine.

ANDORRE, a territory in the government of Foix, France, containing several villages, the chief of which is Ourdines.

ANDOVER, a small town in New England, N. America, in the province of Massachusetts-bay and county of Essex.

ANDOVER, i. e. a ferry, or passage over the river Ande, rising in the forest of Chute, on which it stands. It is a borough and market town in Hampshire, 66 miles from London, and 16 from Basingstoke. It is noted for its manufactures of malt and shalloons. It was made a corporation by queen Elizabeth, to be governed by a bailiff, steward, recorder, and ten approved men (out of which are chosen two justices), and 22 capital burgeses, that annually choose the bailiff, who enters on his office on Michaelmas-day, and appoints two serjeants at mace to attend him. It has an hospital for six men, with a free-school founded A. D. 1569, and a charity-school for 30 boys. Its fairs are on Saturdays in Midlent; May 12, and Nov. 16. Andover is also noted for being a great thoroughfare on the direct western road, as well from Newbury to Salisbury, as from London to Taunton, and all the manufacturing towns of Somersetshire; by which means it is greatly enriched, and is a thriving, handsome, well-built, delightful, and populous town. Its site is very pleasant, and air healthy; standing just on the confines of those downs which are commonly, though not properly, called Salisbury-plains. To the W. of it, at the beginning of the open downs, is the village of Weyhill, where is annually kept every 30th of September the largest fair in all England. See WEYHILL. Andover sends two members to parliament. It lies 10 miles N.W. of Winchester, and 62 S.W. of London.

ADRAGHIRA, a river in the island of Sumatra, in the East-Indies; upon which the Dutch have a factory. See STACK.

ANDRAIG, a harbour of Mallorca, commonly called Majorca, one of the Balearic Islands in the Mediterranean, and situated on the coast of Spain. It is large, but lies exposed to the west wind. It is defended by a fort which stands near the village of Mola.

ANDRARUM, a district belonging to the territory of Christianstadt, and province of Scania, or Schonen, in South Gothland, in Sweden. It is situated two miles and three quarters to the S. of Christianstadt. It is a noble allum-work, and the largest in the whole kingdom. The preparation of this manufacture is made from a kind of slate, or shivery-stone, which being first gathered into heaps, and then calcined, or roasted in the fire, after which, being boiled in water, it yields both allum and vitriol. The work belongs to count Piper.

ANDRE (St.) a village of Campagne de S. André, a subdivision of Campagne, in Upper Normandy, and government of this last name in France.

ANDRE (St.), a little town belonging to the duchy of Genois, a subdivision of Savoy, in Upper Italy. It is situated on the river Sier.

ANDRÉ, (St.) a market-town belonging to the county of Maurienne, a part of the duchy of Savoy, in Upper Italy. In its neighbourhood, the land-traffic or public road is troublesome and dangerous. The chapel of St. André stands on a dreadful height; and in it is a picture placed here in 1681, in consequence of a vow. It represents a man upon his knees, before Mary, the Lady of Loretto, appearing in a cloud. He is said to have been a courier, who in the night time tumbled with his horse down this steep place; but as in his fall he happily bethought himself of his favourite patroness, he himself did not receive the least hurt, and his horse they say had only his back broken.

ANDRÉ, a small district within that of Balagna, belonging to the division of the island of Corsica, on this side the mountains, or the N. E. part of it, in Upper Italy.

ANDRÉ, a village, and one of the 24 parishes belonging to the jurisdiction of Calais, in the government of Picardy and Artois in France. See CALAIS.

ANDRÉ FORT, (St.) situated on a hill in the neighbourhood of Salins, a town belonging to the district of Aval, and government of Franche Comté, in France. See SALINS.

ANDREANOFFSKY-ISLANDS, lying between the Aleutian and Fox Islands in the sea of Kamtschatka, and supposed to complete the connection between Kamtschatka and America. Their chain is supposed to begin in about latitude 53, near the most easterly of the Aleutian isles, and to extend in a scattered series towards the farthest Aleutian or Fox Islands. The Russians from Kamtschatka made a voyage to these islands in 1760, in the St. Andrean and Natalia, commanded by Andrean Folshtyk, whom they were named after; there are only six of them described, viz. Ayagh, about one hundred English miles in circumference; it contains several high and rocky mountains, the intervals of which are bare heath and moor ground. There are no forest trees and but few crane berries, and the largest sort of bilberries. There is so great a quantity of snake weed and burnet as to afford provision in case of necessity for the inhabitants, whose number cannot be ascertained as they pass continually from one island to another in their baidars. There is a small rivulet on this island. Kanaga stands west from Ayagh and is 132 miles in circumference. It contains an high volcano where the natives find sulphur in summer. At the foot of this mountain are hot springs, wherein provision is sometimes boiled. There is no rivulet on this island, and the low grounds are similar to those of Ayagh. The inhabitants are reckoned at about 200 souls. Isetchina lies eastward about thirty miles from Kanaga and is about sixty in circumference. It is full of rocky mountains, of which the Bielaia Spoka or the White Peak is the highest. In the valley there are some hot springs, but no rivulet which has fish. The island contains only four families. Tagalak is thirty miles in circumference and about seven east from Isetchina. The coasts are dangerous to approach even by baidars. It has only four families and produces no vegetable fit for nourishment. Atchu lies in the same position 27 miles from Tagalak, and is about 200 in circumference; near it is an harbour where ships may ride safely at anchor. It contains many rocky mountains and several small rivulets that fall into the sea, one of which running eastward abounds in fish. The roots which have been mentioned, and bulbs of white lilies are found in plenty. Its inhabitants amount to about sixty souls. Amlack, is a mountainous island standing to the east, more than 4 miles from Atchu, and is about 200 in circumference. It contains the same number of inhabitants as Atchu, has a commodious haven, and produces roots in abundance. Of many rivulets there is but one has fish. The other islands lay farther to the east and were not touched at. The inhabitants of these six islands are tributary to Russia, and dress the same as those on the Aleutian isles. They kill the sea otters and dogs with harpoons. In the severest weather they make no addition to their clothing, and whenever it freezes very hard they burn dry grass, and standing over it catch the heat under their clothes. When they pass the night from home they dig a hole in the earth, and lay in it only covered with their clothes and matted grass. Regardless of every thing but the present moment, destitute of religion, and without the least appearance of decency, they seem but a few degrees removed from brutes.

ANDREA, (St.) a village on the Malabar coast, in the East-Indies, founded originally by the Portuguese. It takes its name from a church dedicated to St. Andrew, and served by the priests of St. Thomas. On the shore of this coast, about half a league out in the sea, lies Mud-Bay, a place which few in the world can parallel. It is open to the wide ocean, and has neither island nor bank to break the force of the billows, which come rolling with great violence from all parts, in the south west monsoons; but on this bank of mud they lose themselves in a moment; and ships lie on it as secure as in the best harbour, without motion or disturbance. It reaches about a mile along the shore, and has been observed to shift its place from the northward about 3 miles in 30 years. From St. Andrea to Kranganôr, about twelve leagues to the south, the water has the bad property of causing swellings in the legs of those who drink it constantly. Some it affects in one leg, and some in both. It causes no pain, but itching; nor does the swelled leg seem heavier to the owner than the small one, though some have been seen a yard in circumference at the ancle. — The Romish legends impute the cause of this distemper (for which no preventative or cure hath been hitherto found) to a curse laid by St. Thomas upon his murderers and their posterity; though, according to the Romans themselves, St. Thomas was killed by the Tillinga priests at Meliaphur, on the coast of Coromandel, about 400 miles distant, and where the natives have not this distemper.

ANDREASBERG, or St. ANDREW, a mine-town belonging to the principality of Grubenhagen, a part of the electoral dominions of Brunswick-Lunenbourg, in Germany, and belonging to his present British majesty. It is situated in the E. part of that principality, near the source of a river which falls into the Laine at Northheim, and is famous for its rich mines of iron. It lies five miles N. of Lutterburg, and thirty E. of Eymbeck.

ANDRES, (St.) an island on the Mosquito-Shore, N. America, off the Pearl-Keys; in Lat. 12, 30. Long. 82, 30.

ANDREW's (St.) a town of Fifeshire in Scotland, once the metropolis of the Pictish kingdom, lying in W. Long. 2. 25. N. Lat. 56. 18. If we may credit legend, St. Andrew's owes its origin to a singular accident. St. Regulus, (or St. Rule, as he is likewise called) a Greek of Achaia, was warned by a vision to leave his native country, and visit Albion, an isle placed in the remotest part of the world; and to take with him the arm-bone, three fingers, and three toes, of St. Andrew. He obeyed, and set sail with his companions, but had a very tempestuous passage. After being tossed for some time on a stormy sea, he was at last shipwrecked on the coasts of Otholania, in the territories of Hergustus, king of the Picts, in the year 370. On hearing of the arrival of the strangers, with their precious relics, the king immediately gave orders for their reception, afterwards presenting the saint with his own palace, and building near it the church, which still bears the name of St. Regulus.

At this time the place was stiled Mucrofs, or the Land of Boars; all round was forest, and the lands bestowed on the saint were called Byrehid. The boars equalled in size the ancient Erymanthian; as a proof of which, two tusks, each sixteen inches long and four thick, were chained to the altar of St. Andrew's. St. Regulus changed the name to Kilmymont; and established here the first Christian priests of the country, called culdees. The church was supreme in the kingdom of the Picts; Ungus, having granted to God and St. Andrew, that it should be the head and mother of all the churches in his dominions. He also directed that the cross of St. Andrew should become the badge of the country. In 518, after the conquest of the Picts, he removed the episcopal see to St. Andrew's, and the bishop was stiled Maximus Scotorum episcopus. In 1441, it was erected into an archbishopric by Sextus IV. at the intercession of James III. In 1606, the priory was suppressed; and, 1617, the power of election was transferred to eight bishops, the principal of St. Leonard's college, the arch-deacon, the vicars of St. Andrew's, Leuchar's, and Coupar.

The town of St. Andrew's was erected into a royal borough by David I. in the year 1140, and their privileges afterwards confirmed. The charter of Malcolm II. is preserved in the tolbooth; and appears written on a bit of parchment, but the contents equally valid with what would at this time require whole skins. Here also are kept the silver keys of the city; which, for form's sake, are delivered to the king, if he should visit the place, or to a victorious enemy, in token of submission. In this place, likewise, is to be seen the monstrous axe which, in 1646, took off the heads of Sir Robert Spotwood and other distinguished loyalists. The town underwent a siege in 1337; at which time it was possessed by the English, and other partizans of Baliol; but the loyalists, under the earls of March and Fife, made themselves masters of it in three weeks, by the help of their battering machines. St. Andrew's is now greatly reduced in the number of its inhabitants; at present not exceeding 2000. It is impossible to ascertain the number when it was the seat of the primate: all that can be known is, that during the period of its splendour, there were between 60 and 70 bakers; but now nine or ten are sufficient for the place. It is a mile in circuit, and contains three principal streets. On entering the west port, a well-built street, straight, and of a vast length and breadth, appears; but so grass-grown, and presenting such a dreary solitude, that it forms the perfect idea of its having been laid waste by a pestilence. The cathedral of St. Andrew's was founded by bishop Arnold in 1161, but did not attain its full magnificence till 1318. Its length from east to west was 370 feet; that of the transept, 322. But though this vast pile was 157 years in building, Knox, in June 1559, effected its demolition in a single day; and so effectually has it been destroyed, that nothing now remains but part of the east and west ends, and of the south side. Near the east end is the chapel of St. Regulus; the tower of which is a lofty equilateral triangle, of 20 feet each side, and 103 feet high; the body of the chapel remains, but the two side-chapels are ruined. The arches of the windows and doors are round, and some even more than semicircles; an undoubted proof of their antiquity. The priory was founded by Alexander I. in 1122; and the monks (canons regular of St. Augustine) were brought from Scone, in 1140, by Robert, bishop of this see. By an act of parliament, in the time of James I. the prior had precedence of all abbots and priors, and on the days of festival wore a mitre and all episcopal ornaments. Dependent dent on this priory were those of Lochleven, Portmoak, Monimusk, the isle of May, and Pittenweem, each originally a seat of the Culdees.

The revenues of the house were vast, viz. In money 2237l. 2s. 10½d. 38 chaldrons, 1 boll, 3 firlots of wheat; 132 ch. 7 bolls of bear; 114 ch. 3 bolls, 1 peck of meal; 151 ch. 10 bolls, 1 firlot, 1 peck and a half of oats; 3 ch. 7 bolls of peas and beans: 480 acres of land also belonged to it.

Nothing remains of the priory except the walls of the precinct, which shew its vast extent. In one part is a most artless gateway, formed only of seven stones. This inclosure begins near the cathedral, and extends to the shore.

The other religious houses were, one of Dominicans, founded, in 1274, by bishop Wishart; another of Observantines, founded by bishop Kennedy, and finished by his successor, Patrick Graham, in 1478; and, according to some, the Carmelites had a fourth.

Immediately above the harbour stood the collegiate church of Kirk-heugh, originally founded by Constantine III. who, retiring from the world, became here a Culdee. From its having been first built on a rock, it was stiled, Præpositura Sanctæ Mariæ de Rupe.

On the east side of the city are the poor remains of the castle, on a rock overlooking the sea. The fortress was founded, in 1401, by bishop Trail, who was buried near the high altar of the cathedral, with this singular epitaph:

*Hic fuit ecclesiæ directæ columna, fenestra
Lucida, thuribulum redolens, campana sonora.*

This castle was the residence of cardinal Beaton: who, after the death of George Wishart, apprehending some danger, caused it to be fortified so strongly as to be at that time deemed impregnable. In this fortress, however, he was surprized and assassinated by Norman Lesly with 15 others. They seized on the gate of the castle early in the morning of May 29, 1546; it having been left open for the workmen who were finishing the fortifications: and having placed centinels at the door of the cardinal's apartment, they awakened his numerous domestics one by one; and, turning them out of the castle, they without violence, tumult, or offering an injury to any other person, inflicted on Beaton the death he justly merited. The conspirators were immediately besieged in this castle by the regent, the earl of Arran; and notwithstanding they had acquired no greater strength than 150 men, they resisted all his efforts for five months. This, however, was owing to the unskilfulness of the besiegers more than to the strength of the place or the valour of the besieged: for in 1547 the castle was reduced and demolished. The entrance of it is still to be seen; and the window is shewn, out of which it is said the cardinal leaned to glut his eyes with the cruel martyrdom of George Wishart, who was burnt on a spot beneath.

In the church of St. Salvator is a most beautiful tomb of bishop Kennedy, who died an honour to his family, in 1466. The Gothic work is uncommonly elegant. Within the tomb were discovered six magnificent maces, which had been concealed here in troublesome times. One was given to each of the other three Scotch universities, and three are preserved here. In the top is represented our Saviour; around are angels, with the instruments of the passion.

With these are shewn some silver arrows, with large silver plates affixed to them, on which are inscribed the arms and names of the noble youth, victors in the annual competitions in the generous art of archery, which were dropt but a few years ago; and golf is now the reigning game. That sport and foot-ball were formerly prohibited, as useless and unprofitable to the public; and at all weapon schawings, or reviews and public assemblies of the lower rank of the people, it was ordered, that "fute-bal and golf be utterly cried down, and that bow-markes be maid at ilk parish kirk, a pair of hurts and schutting be used; and that ilk man schutte sex shottes at least, under the paine to be raiped upon them that cummis not, at least twa pennyes to be given them that cummis to the bow-markes ta drinke."

The trade of St. Andrew's was once very considerable. In the time of Cromwell's usurpation, 60 or 70 vessels belonged to the port, but now scarce a single one. The harbour is entirely artificial, guarded by piers, with a narrow entrance, to give shelter to vessels from the violence of a very heavy sea, by the enroachments of which it has suffered much. The manufactures this city might in former times possess, are now reduced to one, that of golf-balls; which, trifling as it may seem, maintains several people. The trade is commonly fatal to the artists; for the balls are made by stuffing a great quantity of feathers into a leathern case, by help of an iron rod, with a wooden handle, pressed against the breast, which seldom fails to bring on a consumption.

The celebrated university of this city was founded in 1411, by bishop Wardlaw; and the year he obtained from Benedict III. the bull of confirmation. It consisted once of three colleges. 1. St. Salvator's, founded in 1458, by bishop Kennedy. This is a handsome building, with a court or quadrangle within: on one side is the church, on another the library; the third contains apartments for students: the fourth is unfinished. 2. St. Leonard's college was founded by prior Hepburn, in 1522. This is now united with the last, and the buildings sold, and converted into private houses. 3. The new, or St. Mary's college, was established by by archbishop Hamilton, in 1553; but the house was built by James and David Bethune, or Beaton, who did not live to complete it. This is said to have been the site of a schola illustris long before the establishment even of the university; where several eminent clergymen taught, gratis, the sciences and languages; but it was called the new college, because of its late erection into a divinity college by the archbishop.

The university is governed by a chancellor, an office originally designed to be perpetually vested in the archbishops of St. Andrew's; but since the reformation he is elected by the two principals, and the professors of both the colleges. The rector is the next great officer; to whose care is committed the privileges, discipline, and statutes of the university. The colleges have their rectors, and professors of different sciences, who are indefatigable in their attention to the instruction of the students, and to that essential article, their morals. This place possesses several very great advantages respecting the education of youth. The air is pure and salubrious; the place for exercise dry and extensive; the exercises themselves are healthy and innocent. The university is fixed in a peninsulated county, remote from all commerce with the world, the haunt of dissipation. From the smallness of the society every student's character is perfectly known, and every irregularity immediately suppressed.

ANDREW's (St.) Island of, or Island of St. ANDREAS, in Latin Ros Insula, is in the district of Pilis, in Hungary Proper. It is situated on the Danube, three miles and a quarter long, and its breadth about one mile, more or less. It belongs with its villages to the domains of the crown of Hungary.

ANDREW's (St.) or St. ANDREW's, in Hungarian Szent Andrea, in Latin Fanum St. Andreae, a town on the Danube, in the Pilis district, in Hungary Proper. It is a better and more populous place than Buda, a Russian colony, and an hereditary place of count Zichy's.

ANDREW's (St.) a neat town of Lower Carinthia, a subdivision of the duchy of that last name, belonging to Austria, in Germany, situated on the banks of the river Lavant; and the seat of the bishop of Layanmund, who calls himself Flaventinensis, as this was the ancient Flavianum in Norico, or the Colonia Flaviana of the Romans. He is also stiled in Latin, Episcopus Lavantinus. The archbishop of Saltzbourg is lord both of this town and its territory. It is about two miles from the Drave, 40 miles E. from Clagenfurt, and 100 S. W. of Vienna. Lat. 46, 49, N. Long. 15, 7, E.

ANDREW's (St.) or St. ANDREA, an island of Ragusan Dalmatia. It is small but pretty well inhabited, with a town upon it of the same name.

ANDRIA, a small episcopal city of the territory of Bari, belonging to the kingdom of Naples, in Lower Italy. The bishop is under the archbishop of Trani. It gives title of duke to the house of Caraffa; and is situated in a spacious plain, six miles W. from Trani, and four from the coast of the Adriatic-sea. Lat. 41, 6, N. Long. 17, E.

ANDROPHAGI, the name of a nation whose country, according to Herodotus, was adjacent to Scythia. Their name, compounded of two Greek words, signifies man-eaters. Herodotus does not inform us whether their manner of subsisting corresponded with their name; whether they were so savage as to eat human flesh. They are represented, however, as the most barbarous and fierce of all nations. They were not governed by laws: the care of their cattle was their chief employment. Their dress was like that of the Scythians; and they had a language peculiar to themselves.

ANDROS, one of the ancient Cyclades, lying between Tenedos and Euboea; being one mile distant from the former, and ten from the latter. The ancients gave it various names, viz. Cauros, Lasia, Nonagria, Epagris, Antandros, and Hydrusia. The name of Andros it received from one Andreus, appointed, according to Diodorus Siculus, by Rhadamanthus, one of the generals, to govern the Cyclades, after they had of their own accord submitted to him. As to the name of Antandros, the same author tells us, that Ascanius, the son of Æneas, being taken prisoner by the Pelasgians, gave them this island for his ransom, which on that account was called Antandros, or "delivered for one man." The name of Hydrusia it obtained in common with other places well supplied with water. It had formerly a city of great note, bearing the same name, and situated very advantageously on the brow of an hill, which commanded the whole coast. In this city, according to Strabo and Pliny, stood a famous temple dedicated to Bacchus. Near this temple, Mutianus, as quoted by Pliny, tells us, there was a spring called the Gift of Jupiter, the water of which had the taste of wine in the month of January, during the feasts of Bacchus, which lasted seven days. The same author adds, that the waters, if carried to a place whence the temple could not be seen, lost their miraculous taste. Pausanias makes no mention of this spring; but says, that, during the feast of Bacchus, wine flowed, or was at least by the Andrians believed to flow, from the temple of that god. The priests, no doubt, found their account in keeping up this belief, by conveying, through secret conduits, a great quantity of wine into the temple.

The Andrians were the first of all the islanders who joined the Persians at the time Xerxes invaded Greece; and therefore Themistocles, after the victory at Salamis, resolved to attack the city of Andros.

dros, and oblige the inhabitants to pay large contributions for the maintenance of his fleet. Having landed his men on the island, he sent heralds to the magistrates, acquainting them that the Athenians were coming against them with two powerful divinities, Persuasion and Force; and therefore they must part with their money by fair means or foul. The Andrians replied, that they likewise had two mighty deities who were very fond of their island, viz. Poverty and Impossibility; and therefore could give no money. Themistocles, not satisfied with this answer, laid siege to the town, which he probably made himself master of and destroyed, as we are informed by Plutarch that Pericles, a few years after, sent thither a colony of 250 Athenians. It was, however, soon retaken by the Persians; and, on the overthrow of that empire by Alexander the Great, submitted to him along with the other islands. On his death it sided with Antigonus, who was driven out by Ptolemy. The successors of the last-mentioned prince held it to the times of the Romans, when Attalus, king of Pergamus, besieged the metropolis at the head of a Roman army; and, having taken it, was by them put in possession of the whole island. Upon the death of Attalus the republic claimed this island, as well as his other dominions, in virtue of his last will. It is now subject to the Turks, and contains a town of the same name, with a great many villages. There are said to be about 6000 inhabitants, besides those of the villages Arni and Amoldeos, who are about 200; have a different language and customs, and are called Albanois. There are seven monasteries, a great number of churches, and a cathedral for the bishops of the Roman Catholic persuasion; but most of the inhabitants are of the Greek communion. The Jesuits had a house and a church in this island; but they were forced to quit them long ago. Here are some delightful valleys; but the air is bad, and the water of the city worse. The peasants make wicker baskets, wherewith they supply the greatest part of the Archipelago. They have all sorts of game in the woods and mountains, but know not how to take them for want of guns. Their principal food is goat's flesh; for there is no fish to be met with on their coasts. When they are sick, they are obliged to let the disease take its natural course, having neither physician nor surgeon on the island. A cadi, assisted by a few of the principal persons of the island, has the management of civil affairs, and his residence is in the castle: an aga, who presides over the military force, lives in a tower without the city. About two miles from the present town are still to be seen the ruins of a strong wall, with the fragments of many columns, chapiters, bases, broken statues, and several inscriptions; some of which mention the senate and people of Andros, and the priests of Bacchus; from which it is probable that this was the site of the ancient city. It has a superfluity of wine, oil, and barley (more than of wheat, which they are frequently obliged to fetch from Volo), all sorts of the most delicious and savoury fruits, as oranges, lemons, citrons, figs, &c. with innumerable springs of water, and nothing but these and gardens are to be seen. The greatest riches of the island consist in silk, though fit for nothing else but to make tapestry; and yet it fetches three half-crowns a pound on the spot. Here they make upwards of 1000 lb. weight of it every year. The town of the same name, with a port, is fit only for small vessels; is defended by a castle, which the Greeks call the Lower Castle, in contradistinction from the Upper Castle, which is ten miles distant from it. The island is about 120 miles in circuit, with a bishop of their own; and among them is a colony of Albanians, still dressed in the mode of their own country, and continuing to live in the same manner, that is, without faith or law. These were invited by the Turks to come thither. In the year 1700 they paid 15,000 crowns to the capitation and land-tax. The town of Arna is on this island, as also Port Gauria; both which see. Andros lies between Tenos to the N. W. and near the S. end of Negropont; also N. of the island of Candia. Long. 25, 30. E. Lat. 37, 50.

ANDROS, or ANDROSS, one of the Bermuda or Somer Islands, in the Atlantic-ocean. It is small and uninhabited, and quite surrounded with the great sandy bank of Bahama. These islands the Spaniards call Ylas del Espiritu Santo, and take up a space of 30 leagues long, and four or five broad, intersected by a number of very narrow passages.

ANDRUSSOW, a village belonging to the palatinate and government of Smolensko, in European Russia, or Western Muscovy, situated between the town of Smolensk, and that of Mstislav, close by the river Harodna. It is famous for the treaty of peace concluded here in 1667. between Russia and Poland.

ANDRZEIOW, a little town belonging to the palatinate of Cracow, in Lesser Poland, on the confines of Silesia and Hungary, with an abbey and convent of Cistercian monks. Here the nobility and gentry of this country held a considerable meeting in 1576, at which they confirmed the election of Stephen Bathory as king of Poland; and here also the kokassians, or confederated nobility, assembled in 1607.

ANDST, a district belonging to the bailiwick of Koldinghuus, and diocese of Ripen, in North Jutland, in Denmark. It comprehends ten parishes.

ANDUJAR, ANDUXAR, or ANDAXAR, an ancient and pretty large city of Cordova, one of the three subdivisions of the province of Andalusia, in Spain, situated on the river Guadalquivir, over which it has a stately bridge, and is defended by a strong castle. It contains 3000 families, has five parishes, with six monasteries, three nunneries, and two hospitals; besides other stately and handsome buildings. It vends great quantities of silk. The neighbouring country abounds in corn, wine, oil, honey, and all sorts of fruit; and it yields also excellent game. Not far from this place stood the ancient city of Illurgis or Illiturgis, the Forum Julium of the Romans; and its old site still retains the name of Andujar el Veio. It lies 32 miles E. of Corduba, about 110 E. N. E. from Seville, and something above 150 S. from Madrid. Lat. 37, 5. N. Long. 4, 2. W.

ANDUZE, or ANDUX, a town belonging to the diocese of Alais, one of the fourteen subdivisions of Lower Languedoc, in the government of the latter, in France, on the River Gardon, with the title of a barony. A considerable trade is carried on here in ferges and coarse frized woollen cloth. It lies 25 miles N. of Montpellier. Lat. 43, 46. N. Long. 3, 42. E.

ANDWORTSKOW, or ANDERSKOW, a prefecturate or bailiwick of Seeland in Denmark, comprehending the districts of Western and Eastern Flacheberg; to the former belong eighteen country parishes, and to the latter thirteen.

ANDWORTSKOW, or ANDERSKOW, a large royal palace or castle, in the jurisdiction of Korsoer, a subdivision of Seeland in Denmark, on a hill, a short walk from Slagelse, towards the E. It was anciently a considerable monastery belonging to the order of St. John, and founded by king Waldemar II. in the year 1120, but after the Reformation it was converted into a royal seat. King Frederic II. who was very fond of this place, is said in a fit of passion here to have thrown the religious concordat into the fire, in the year 1580; and at this place he ended his days. He indeed considerably enlarged and improved the palace. In 1720, king Frederic IV. caused the church here to be rebuilt: but it is not a considerable structure for these days. A national synod of all the bishops was holden here in the year 1546.

ANEGADA, or NEGADA, a low flat desert island, which has no settled inhabitants. It is one of the Caribbees, in the Atlantic ocean in America, and encompassed with shoals and sand-banks. It is situated fifty miles N. W. of Anguilla. The Spaniards called it Negada, or the Drowned Island, as being for the most part overflowed by high tides. It abounds with birds, particularly that remarkable one called the colibry, or humming bird. Here also are varigated crabs. A Spanish galleon having formerly been cast away here, and most of the gold and silver carried ashore, was hid so artfully in Anegada, that the inhabitants of the French islands, and the buccaneers, have searched for it months together; but could never come at the bulk of it. It is situated in Lat. 18, 6. N. Long. 63, 5. W.

ANERMONT, or AMERMONT, a lordship of that part of the duchy of Bar or Barrois, which was not ceded, and did not become a fief of France, in the government of Lorraine and Bar. It was formerly dependent on the church of Metz; but ever since the 16th century, the dukes of Lorraine have possessed it independently.

ANET, a castle or seat of the Mantois or Mantoan, belonging to the fourth sub-prefecture in the government of the Isle of France, near the confluence of the rivers Eure and Aure, under the title of a principality.

ANFA, a district belonging to the province of Temesna, or Temecen, in Africa. It is situated on the edge of the sea, on account of which advantageous position it formerly drove a considerable fair trade; but exchanged it afterwards for the scandalous one of piracy. It was so populous as to be able to raise an army of 50,000 men against Joseph Aben Tefisricen, the founder of the empire of Morocco. But these were so terrified at the sight of his numerous army, that they fled, and left the country to his mercy; who made such a horrible massacre of its inhabitants, that for a long time it was only a den of wild beasts; yet it recovered itself so well, as to be able to raise 60,000 horse, besides foot, in the year 1500; and to have 200 castles under its jurisdiction.

ANFILOCHA, now JEROIRLIA, in Latin Amphilocheia, or Argos Amphilocheium, a town of the ancient Epirus, a part of Albania, a province of Turkey, in Europe. It is situated on a small river falling a little lower into the gulph of Arta, from which city this place is distant about twenty-two miles towards the S. W. and forty from Prevesa to the E. It was formerly a very famous town, but it has been almost ruined during the wars between the Venetians and the Turks.

ANGARA, the first and uppermost of three rivers which are called Tungusca, and together fall into the Genisei, a large river of Asiatic Russia; this simply call Tungusca, obtains that name after receiving the Ilie; is before that junction called Angura, and issues from the Baikal-lake.

ANGARAES, a jurisdiction in South America in the empire of Peru, subject to the archbishop of Lima, 60 miles W. N. W. of the city of Guamanaga. It abounds in wheat, maize, and other grain, besides vast droves of all kinds of cattle for labour or sustenance.

ANGAZYA, one of the Comorra islands, lying between the north end of Madagascar, and the coast of Zanguebar in Africa, from Lat. 10, to 15, S. It is inhabited by Moors, who trade with divers parts of the continent, in cattle, fruits, and other commodities of the island; which they exchange for callicoes and other cotton cloths. The houses here are built of stone, and lime made of calcined oyster-shells; with which the walls and roof are plastered in a very elegant manner. The government of Angazia is a pure aristocracy; the island being subject to ten lords, who have all the title of Sultan. The people are very careful of their women, never permitting strangers to see them, without permission from a sultan, or an order which the stranger brings with him. Many of them read and write Arabic with great facility; and some even understand Portuguese, which they learn from their intercourse with Mosambique, whither they trade in vessels of 40 tons burthen.

ANGEDIVA, a barren, desert, and unhealthy island, in the East-Indies, whither Sir Abraham Shipman, by king Charles II. appointed governor of Bombay and generalissimo of the Indian coast, being forced by the Moors to remove from Swalley near Surat, got his death, as did 300 of his men. It is situated two miles from Batcoal, one league from land, 36 miles S. of Goa. There being four other little islands about it, it is called Anlandiva, i. e. in the Malabar language, Five Islands.

ANGEL, a river in Montgomeryshire, which falls into the Dovy, on the borders of Merionethshire.

ANGELO IN VADO (St.), a town belonging to the duchy of Urbino, and Ecclesiastical State, in Middle Italy. It is so called to distinguish it from another in the marquisate of Ancona. It is situated on the river Metro, at the foot of the Appennine mountains, in the country called Massa Trabaria, towards the confines of Tuscany. It is a bishop's see under that of Urbino, and erected only since 1633, by pope Urban VIII. and united to that of Urbane, another city, about five miles from this, which lies 12 miles from Urbino, and as many from Borgo St. Sepolcro.

ANGELO (St.), or ANGELO DE ST. LOM-BARDI, a mean little town of the Further principate and kingdom of Naples, in Lower Italy; the see of a bishop under that of Conza, and situated on an eminence at the foot of the Appennines. Its bishopric hath been united with that of Biscaccia ever since the year 1540. The town is thinly peopled, and stands about eight miles N. W. of Conza, and 28 S. E. of Benevento. Lat. 41, 43, N. Long. 15, 56, E.

ANGELO (Port of), is an harbour on the South-sea coast, in South America, in the middle, between St. Pedro and Capolita. It is a broad, open bay, with good anchorage but bad landing; and the Spaniards reckon it as good a harbour as Guatulis.

ANGELO (Castle, of St.) in Agiru, one of the four subdivisions of the island of Corfu, in the Ionian-sea, and on the coast of Greece, situated on the southern promontory of Palactum; and under it is a considerable convent, called Paleo Castizza, and the only place in this district which is worthy of notice.

ANGELO (St.), a sea-port of Apulia on the Adriatic gulph. It is situated eight miles N. of Manfredonia. Lat. 41, 20, N. Long. 16, 25, E.

ANGELO-MONTE (St.), a small city of a capitanate belonging to the kingdom of Naples, in Lower Italy, an inland place on a mountain, and the see of an archbishop. Lat. 41, 42. Long. 16, 16, E.

ANGELO-MONTE (St.), the only mountain of note in the capitanate of Naples. See GARGANO.

ANGELO, (Civita St.), or the city of St. Angelo, in the Further Abruzzo of Naples, in Lower Italy; a small place, and of inferior rank, with the title of a marquisate.

ANGELOS, or TLAACALA, a province of Mexico; America, on both North and South Seas, having that part of the former, which is called the Gulph of Mexico, on the E. the province of Guascaca on the S. E. the Pacific-ocean on the S. the province of Mexico Proper on the W. and that of Penuco on the N. W. From one sea to the other it is 100 leagues, about 80 where broadest, which is along the gulph of Mexico, and 25 upon the South-sea coast. Its soil, climate, and product, are much the same with Mexico Proper. On the W. side there is a chain of mountains for the space of 18 leagues, very well cultivated; and likewise a great ridge of mountains on the N. the neighbourhood of which subjects it to shocking tempests, horrid hurricanes, and frequent inundations of the river Zahnal, which is so great as to endanger houses on the tops of eminences; yet this is allowed to be the most populous country in all America, which is partly ascribed to its having been originally an ally to Cortez in the conquest of Mexico, who obtained a grant of the emperor Charles V. then also king of Spain, by which it is to this day exempt from all service or duty whatsoever to that crown; and only pays the king of Spain an handful of maize per head, as an acknowledgement, which inconsiderable parcels were said, almost 60 years ago, to make up 13,000 bushels; for it produces so much of that Indian corn, that from thence it had the name of Tiafcala, i. e. the land of bread. By this means the towns and villages swarm with Indians; a quite different people from their neighbours, who are grown quite stupid, from the long continuance of the slavery and oppression to which they have been subject; whereas these are a spirited people, having as much fire and alacrity as is natural to a free people. They speak the Spanish tongue, and scarce any other; are perfectly reconciled to the Spanish customs, and grateful for the countenance and deference shewed to them above their fellow provinces. It was anciently governed by kings, till civil wars arising in it, the people formed themselves into an aristocracy of many princes to get rid of one. They divided the towns into different districts, each of which named one of their chiefs to reside in the court of Tlascala, where they formed a senate, whose resolutions were a law to the whole.

ANGELOS, or PUEBLA DE LOS ANGELOS, i. e. The city of Angels. It is the present capital of Tlascala, its ancient one being of this last name, or Los Angeles, one of the provinces of Old Mexico, or New Spain, in North America, above mentioned. It is by much the finest place in this province, and even vies for beauty and magnificence with the city of Mexico. The wealth of the place, or rather of the Spanish clergy here, may be judged from the annual revenue of the cathedral and chapter, amounting to 300,000 pieces of eight. It stands in a delightful plain, on the road from Vera Cruz to Mexico, 100 miles N. E. of the former, and 60 of the latter. It has the see of a bishop under the archbishop of Mexico. Most part of its buildings are of stone; and the streets, which are large, clean, and regular, cross each other at the four cardinal points, meeting in the center, where they form a large square, by some thought to be finer than that of Mexico. On 3 sides it is beautified with porticos, where are shops furnished with all sorts of merchandise, and chests full of pieces of eight, piled one upon another almost up to the ceiling. Each chest being a sort of box 20 inches long, and 12 broad, hold about 1000 pieces of eight, and made so small for the conveniency of handing in and out of the shops. On the other side is its stately cathedral, with a very beautiful front, and two high towers, built all of stone in the modern taste. The bishop's see was translated hither from Tlascala. Here are several other churches and convents, particularly the nunnery of St. Clare, which in Gemelli's time had a dormant sum of 500,000 pieces of eight that had been raised by portions. The best felts in the country are made in this city; and it has a mint and glass-house, the latter being the first ever known in all New Spain. The number of houses is reckoned to be about 16 or 1700 and the families at 2000; but the people, together with the priests and recluses of both sexes, are so profligate, that though the friars gave the place the name of Angelos, and made the poor natives believe that they were angels from heaven; yet it may now be more properly denominated Puebla de los Diabolos, i. e. the town of Devils. The river Zacatula passes by the town, whose neighbouring valley produces vines, all sorts of European fruits, and flax. About this city are also mineral waters of several qualities. Some parts of this town are subject to inundations, as well as Mexico. It belongs to Old Spain, and is situated in Lat. 19, 51, N, Long. 102, 12, W.

ANGERAP, or ANGERAPPE, a river issuing from a lake near Agenburg, in the kingdom of Prussia; which by its junction with the Pisse, near Georgenburg, forms the Pregel, by which it is afterwards called: these two rivers uniting with the Inster, near Insterburg, it from thence becomes navigable by large boats or barks. See PREGEL.

ANGERBURG, one of three capital bailiwicks belonging to the circle of Sehest, in the kingdom of Prussia. In it the best Prussian mana is gathered. Its archpriestship, or archdeaconry, has the inspection over 12 parishes.

ANGERBURG, though a modern town of the above bailiwick, bearing the same name, in the kingdom of Prussia, has become a good place, and is well inhabited. It is surrounded with pallisades, and has a strong castle built in the year 1335, upon a lake from which issues the above-mentioned river Angerap. This lake is seven miles long, and a mile and a half broad; and the eel-fishery in it is especially considerable. The church is large and handsome. In the year 1725 an archpriestship was erected here; and king Stanislaus staid a long time at this place in 1734 and 1736. It lies in Lat. 54, 5, N. Long. 23, 10, E.

ANGMERING, two small villages on the British Channel near Arundel, with a market on Saturday, and a fair July 30. In the reign of Henry VIII. Edward Palmer, esq. lived here, whose wife had three sons in a fortnight's labour, who lived to be all knighted for their bravery and successes.

ANGERMANNLAND, or ANGERMANNIA; the last is its Latin name; one of the seven large subdivisions of Nordland, a province of Sweden, and bounded on the N. by West Bothnia and Lapland; on the E. by the Bothnic gulph; on the S. by Medelpadia, and on the W. by Jamtland. It is 24 Swedish miles long, and 16 broad; that is, upwards of 140 English miles the one way, and in proportion to that the other. It is very woody, rocky, and mountainous, particularly the excessively high mountain of Skula, and the large and wild forest of Skula-shog. The country has a fruitful soil, and remarkably good arable-grounds, especially on the E. side of the Angermannland river, called Hernosand, as far as the parish of Botea, the seat or castle of Holm, &c. It produces, besides rye, pease, or pulse, lint and flax, also good barley. Here are fine breeds of cattle, on account of its excellent pastures; likewise very good iron-works, lakes and rivers abounding with fish. At the bottom of some standing-lakes very rich ore is found. The Angermannland flodt or river, which runs through this country, is one of the largest in the whole kingdom, as being near its outlet into the sea, a league broad, and also navigable for many miles up land. In it is an extremely rich salmon-fishery. The crown-sailors possess the country. It consists of a territorial jurisdiction and two bailiwicks. Here is the seat of a superintendent over this diocese, which is the thirteenth in rank, and is divided into two probsteys or priories. It comprehends Agermannland, Medalpadiä, Jantland, and Harjedaliä, and also the whole landship or territory of West Bothnia; besides Kiemi-lappmark, which belongs to the diocese of Abo. On account of Angermannland being so full of rocks and forests, it has very few villages, and but one town of any note, namely, Hernofand (which see) on the gulph of Bothnia, where it has a pretty good harbour, affording some trade.

ANGERMANNLANDS-LAPPMARK. See ASELE-LAPPMARK.

ANGERMUNDE, a little town in the parish of Pilten, belonging to the district of this last name, in the duchy of Courland. In its neighbourhood is an old castle now lying in ruins.

ANGERMUNDE, a town belonging to the duchy of Berg, and circle of Westphalia, in Germany, on the E. side of the Rhine, 9 miles N. of Dusseldorp, the elector Palatine's capital, in lat. 51, 10, N. Long. 6, 20, E.

ANGERN, a place in the parish of Candau, and Upper territory of Tuckum, belonging to the duchy of Courland Proper, where is a church and iron-work.

ANGERS, anciently Juliomagus, Andegavum, and Andes, the capital of the government of Anjou, in France, situated a little above the place where the little rivers Loire and Sarre fall into the Mayenne; which last river divides this city into two parts.

Its ancient name it had from Julius Cæsar, who built it. When Augustus Cæsar had founded several cities in Gaul, and peopled them with colonies, he called some not only after his own name, but others after the names of Julius and Cæsar. The first walls of this city were raised by John, surnamed Lack-land, who was King of England, and Duke of Anjou. But Prince Lewis, son of King Philip Augustus, and afterwards King Lewis VIII. demolished these walls. His son and successor St. Lewis built them up again in the manner in which they still are; and besides these it is surrounded with antique fortifications.

Angers is a large and populous city, containing 9000 houses, 16 parishes, 12 of which being within the town, and four without in the suburbs, and about 30,000 inhabitants; with the see of a bishop, the seat of a district, provincial bailiwick, country-court, royal prevoté or provostship, a mint-court, salt-house, marshalsea, &c. The inhabitants of Angers are all free from the tailles or imposts, except part of one parish, the parishioners of which are subject to them. Here is a cathedral-church, seven other chapters or collegiate-churches, a church belonging to each of the above-mentioned 16 parishes, four abbeys, many other convents for both sexes, and a seminary of Jesuits. The bishop is a suffragan to the archbishop of Tours; has a diocese of 668 parishes, 23 chapels of ease, a revenue of 26,000 livres, and he is taxed to the court of Rome 1700 florins. The cathedral is remarkable for three very high steeples built on its portico; of which the middle one seems to be suspended in the air, as resting only on the foundations of the other two. Its roof is very lofty, large, and bold, but supported by no pillars. St. Lewis founded an university here, which is one of the most famous in France. They teach the civil and canon laws, divinity, physic, and the sciences: a chair for the mathematics has been lately founded in the college of the fathers of the oratory. In the year 1685 Lewis XIV. established here a royal academy for the fine arts, with the same privileges as that of Paris. It consists of 36 members, who must all be natives or inhabitants of the province of Anjou. They are not to meddle with religion, politics, or divinity; nor to judge of any compositions, but those of their own members. They have a director, chancellor, secretary, and four officers. Here is a strong castle, built on a rock, which is very steep on the side next the river, which runs at the foot of it. It is flanked with several large towers, and has an half-moon bastion at the gate leading to the suburbs. This was also built by St. Lewis, during the wars with the English and the Britons; and now serves as a prison for state-prisoners. The government of the city is lodged in a mayor (called provost or provost) and four alderman (echevins or bailiffs) chosen every other year, twelve counsellors, eight assessors, a city-attorney, a commissary, and a recorder. Their jurisdiction extends over the manufactories set up in the town, the suburbs, and liberties thereof. Their manufactures consist in fine woollen stuffs, striped with silk and gold, camblets, and serges: they also bleach wax, and linen-cloth here, and have some sugar-bakers in the town: and besides, they drive a good trade in other commodities. In Angers is a great procession kept annually at a festival called La fête de Dieu, or the feast of God, which is Corpus Christi day, at which all the priests and monks, with the chief inhabitants of this city, and multitudes of foreigners, attend, and carry in their hands burning torches, and scripture histories engraved, in order to atone for the pretended crime of their archdeacon, the famous Berengarius, who opposed posed transubstantiation here, when the tenet was first preached in the Romish church about the year 1010.

A N

Part of the town lies very low; and it is a proverb in the neighbouring country, that, "Angers is a low town, has high steeples, rich whores, and poor scholars."

Here are some remains of Roman antiquities, and part of an amphitheatre in one of the suburbs, where several medals of the old Roman Emperors have been dug up. Angers lies 45 miles E. of Nantz, in Lat. 47, 28. N. Long. 29, W.

ANGHIART, a town of the territory of Florence, belonging to the grand duchy of Tuscany, in the middle division of Italy.

ANGHIERA, a district formerly belonging to the duchy of Milan, in Upper Italy, was erected into a county by the Emperor Winceflaws, in favour of Galeas III. in the year 1397. In Latin it is called Comitatus Angleriae. Since 1743 the greatest part of it has belonged to the King of Sardinia, namely, all lying on this side, or the W. side of the Lago Maggiore, or Great Lake: so that the line of the Austrian and Sardinian boundaries runs through the middle of this lake, from the frontiers of Switzerland as far as Tessino. It is situated at the foot of the Alps, between Switzerland and the territory of Valais on the N. the valley of Aosta on the W. and the Vercellese and Novarese on the S. It consists of mountains and valleys; and though small, it is very fruitful and populous. The chief towns of this country, besides that of the same name, are those of Arona, Palanza, Mergozzo, Vogogna, and Domo d'Ossella.

ANGHIERA, the capital of the above county, bearing the same name, situated on the right or E. side of the Lago Maggiore, opposite to Arona. It formerly stood at the distance of at least 1000 paces from that lake, which has now got close to it. When it was made the capital of this county, it was governed by lords of its own: but since that time it has undergone the same fate with the rest of the Milanese. Though the country round it be very fertile, and well-inhabited, it is but an ordinary town. It lies 40 miles W. of the city of Milan, in Lat. 45, 40. N. Long. 9, 5. E.

ANGLARS, a town of France, in Auvergne, in the generality of Riom, and the election of St. Flour.

ANGLE, a town of France in Poitou, on the river Anglin, with a rich abbey, 22 miles from Poitiers.

ANGLESEY, or ANGLESEA, an island and county of North Wales, belonging to Great Britain. It was called by the ancients Mona, and was the seat of the Druids. It was first attempted by Suetonius Paulinus, but conquered afterwards by Julius Agricola. The old Saxons gave it the name of Mones; and when reduced by the English, it obtained the Saxon name of Anglesey, i. e. the English Island. It was also anciently called Insula Opaca, or the Shady Island, from the great quantity of wood with which it was overgrown; and for the same reason it had the Welch name above-mentioned of the same import. But at present it is so bare, especially in the N. and W. parts, that very few trees are to be seen there, either fit for timber or shelter. This is the most N. W. county of North Wales.

The Irish sea surrounds it on all sides, except on the S. E. towards the mainland of Britain, where it is divided from Carnarvonshire by the narrow strait, canal, or frith called Meneu, or Menai; which, in some places, is about the same breadth as the Thames at Westminster, and is fordable at low-water. From Beaumaris on the E. to Holyhead on the W. it is 24 miles long; and about 17 from Abermana's-ferry on the S. to Llanbaderig on the N. were broadest. Templeman gives it an area of 248 square miles: others make it about 67 miles in circuit, containing about 200,000 acres, divided into 6 hundreds, having 74 parishes, 2 market-towns, 2 chaces, 1840 houses, and upwards of 12,000 souls. It formerly contained, according to Camden, no less than 363 villages. The soil of Anglesey is more fertile than one would imagine, from its stony, rocky, or mountainous bottom, it very much abounds in grain, particularly wheat, which is said to be the best in all Wales; and in cattle, fish, and fowl: and it yields also plenty of mill-stones, and grind-stones, the former of these so good, that when once in motion, if there be no grit, they will take fire; here is likewise some alluminous earth, from which allum or copras may be made.

The principal rivers of Anglesey are the Brant, the Alow, and the Keveny. The Brant has its source near Llanredevel, on the E. side of the island, and runs for the most part S. till it falls into the Menou, near the S. point of the island. The Alow rises not far from Llanvaer-Ugwradog; first it runs N. but soon turning W. towards Llanbab, it there forms a second angle to the S. almost as far as Llantrissant, and at last winds to the W. in its way to the Irish sea. The Kaveny issues from the high hills to the N. of Coydanna, from whence it runs S. to Llangristolis, where it receives the Gynt; and then directs its course to the S. W. side of the island, where it falls into the Irish sea. Here are many Crumlachs, being very huge stones erected, regularly, confusedly, together, and singly. Here is a very large, thick, and flat stone, supported by three others; also two circles of stones like those at Stonehenge on Salisbury-plain, but larger. In 843 it was plundered by Berthred king of Mercia, and in 875 by the Danes, who afterwards in 900 conquered it. In the reign of the Saxon King Ethelred, the Isle of Anglesey was plundered by his navy; and after the Norman conquest, it was laid waste.

waste by the earls of Chester and Shrewsbury, who commanded on the English frontiers against the Welch; but were themselves defeated by the Norwegian General Magnus, who slew the earl of Chester, and plundered the inhabitants of what little the Normans had left them. The English made several attempts to subdue it; but could not do it effectually till the reign of king Edward I. in 1277. This county is all of it in the diocese of Bangor. It sends two members to Parliament, namely, the one as knight of the shire, and the other as burghers for the borough of Beaumaris. The places of most note are Holyhead, Newburgh, and Aberfraw. Here are several Roman and other antiquities, namely, Llan-idan, situated betwixt Newburgh and Beaumaris, the place where the Romans first landed, upon passing the frith of Menneu, from Llanvair is Gaer, in Carnarvonshire, which lies opposite to it. About a mile from hence is Tre're Druw, or Druid's town, so called from some of those ancient priests; and the township adjacent to it, is called Tre're Beirdd, or the Bard's town, who were another sort of priests, or rather poetical and oral recorders of the valorous actions of the ancients. On the confines of these townships is a square fortification, supposed by some to be the first camp which the Romans formed in Anglesey; and opposite to it is another very high and round one, supposed to have been the camp of the Britons. At Trevarthin, in the year 1680, a large gold medal of Julius Constantius was found on the ploughed land. In Nov. 1777 was accidentally discovered at the Hamlet of Brynkelly, a subterraneous gallery, 18 feet in length, three in breadth, and six in height. This led to a chamber of the same height, which was covered with a single large stone, 12 feet long, and 9 wide. A small round pillar seemed to afford some support to this stone from the center of the room. Many human bones were found dispersed over the floor; but they immediately mouldered into dust upon being touched. This sepulchre is asserted to be of the highest antiquity, and probably coeval with some neighbouring cromlechs. The only seat of note in this island, besides Sir Nicholas Bayley's, is the Lord Berkeley's, on the side of a hill above Beaumaris, from whence is a charming prospect of Carnarvon-bay; and the adjacent country. Glogauny, a good old house, was another belonging to the said lord's family, and the ancient residence of Owen Tudor, that married the queen dowager of England, who was a daughter of the king of France, and by whom he had two daughters that were married into English noble families, to one of which the Earl of Richmond, afterwards king Henry VII. was related. But with regard to Tudor himself, he was a private gentleman of about 3000l. a year, who came to seek his fortune at court, where the queen above-mentioned fell in love with him.

ANGLES, an ancient German nation; originally a branch of the Suevi; who, after various migrations, settled in that part of Denmark and duchy of Slewick which to this day is called Angel, and of which the city of Flensburg is the capital. Here they were known, even in the time of Tacitus, by the name of Angli. The origin of this name is variously accounted for. According to Saxo-Grammaticus, they were called Angli from one Angulus, son to Humblus king of Denmark. Widschind, a Saxon writer, will have them to be called Angli, from an island in the corner or angle of the sea, which they conquered. Goropius derives their name from the Saxon word Angel, or Engel, signifying a fish-hook; the Angles, like the other Saxon nations, being greatly addicted to piracy, and on that account being so named by the neighbouring nations; as if, like hooks, they caught all that was in the sea. To this nation the British ambassadors are said to have applied when soliciting succours against the Scots and Picts. The Angles therefore came over in greater numbers than any other Saxon nation; and accordingly had the honour of giving the name of Anglia to England. See ENGLAND.

ANGLES, a town of France, in Languedoc, and in the diocese of Castres, seated on a mountain near the river Agut.

ANGLY, St. Jean de. See JEAN.

ANGOL, a city belonging to the bishopric or district of Imperial, now Conception, in Chili. It is otherwise called Villa Neuva de los Infantes. It stands in a very large open plain, the soil of which is very fertile, and fruits ripen here very well. They have excellent wine, and good store of raisins dried in the sun, figs, and other dried fruits: also vast numbers of tall cypresses, which yield a very sweet-scented wood, from which, Herera says, is made a gum-lac. By it runs the large river Biobio, which serves it for a wall and ditch on the S. side: and on the N. side, another pleasant rivulet flows down from hills, of a moderate height, and turns several mills for the use of the city. It is situated about 100 miles S. E. of Conception; 125 N. of Baldivia, and about 32 from the Cordillera, in lat. 38, 10. S. Long. 78, 20. W.

ANGOLA, a kingdom of Congo, or Lower Guinea, in Africa. It is bounded by Congo Proper on the N. by Malemba or Majemba on the E. by Benguela on the S. and by the ocean on the W. Though Europeans call this country Angola, the natives give it the name of Dombo; and anciently it had the appellation of Ambonde, which is not yet quite out of use.

It is watered by several rivers, the most considerable of which are the Dande and Coanza or Quansa. The depth of water at the mouth of the former former is not above five or six feet, so as to be navigable only for small boats. Here its southern bank is higher than the northern; but as the land rises insensibly, both are of an equal height about a league above its outlet. It abounds with fish, but at the same time it has vast numbers of crocodiles. The soil on each side is very fertile. The mouth of the river Coanza lies in lat. 9, 20. S. about nine leagues from Palmerinho to the southward. Its head is not certainly known, no European having ever been so far in land: but it is supposed to arise from Lake Zambre, as well as the river Zaire. At its mouth this river is about a league in breadth, 12 feet deep at high water, and 8 at low water. The N. side is the deepest, and that way ships enter the river. It is not navigable above the village called Cambambe, on account of its course being so swift, and encumbered with so many rocks and waterfalls that it is impossible to go higher up. Between 13 and 14 leagues above its outlet, this river divides itself into two branches, which form the island of Massander, six leagues in length, and 2000 paces in breadth. The soil of this island is extremely fruitful; so that maize, or Turkish corn, and millet, are reaped thrice a year on it. Fifteen or sixteen leagues above this island lies that of Motchiamia, which is five or six leagues broad, and about one long; it has good pastures. On this island five or six Portuguese families were once settled, who maintained themselves principally by the slave-trade. This kingdom is divided into eight provinces, namely, Loando, Sinfo, Ilamba, Icollo, Ensaca, Massingano, Cambamba, and Embacca; each of which is subdivided into several lordships, of which Dapper reckons upwards of 210. Each of the eight provinces above-mentioned takes its name from the principal town, village, or fort upon it. These districts are but small. The capital of the kingdom of Angola is Loanda. Sinfo comprehends the countries lying to the N. of Loanda along the banks of the river, as far as Ensaca. Ilamba or Elamua is a very large province, to the S. W. of Loanda. It is upwards of 300 leagues in circuit, and near 100 in length, and situated along the banks of the Coanza and Bengo. In it are reckoned forty-two lordships, each governed by its own soya or lord, who commands all the villages in his particular district. Icollo lies to the N. W. and W. N. W. of Jamba.

Ensaca is situated between the rivers Coanza and Bengo, nine or ten leagues from Loanda to the E. It is a small province, as well as that immediately preceding it. In it are but few inhabitants, who live near the banks of the River Bambo. Four leagues above the island of Motchiamia, stands a fortress, which gives the name of Massingan or Massagan. The province of Cambamba, the capital of which bears the same name, begins at the distance of about a day's journey from Massingan, towards the E. and lies on the banks of the Coanza. It extends eight or ten leagues from the river to the N. and E. Here the Portuguese have a fort, which is inhabited by some of their nation, and some negroes who trade in slaves. Eight days journey from Massingan, going up the River Lucala, on its eastern bank, is a large village called Embacca, which gives name to the province. It is inhabited by Portuguese and negroes, and has a citadel to defend it. The inhabitants of Angola differ but little from those of Congo (which see) in manners, dress, and religion. Opposite to the town of Loanda is a remarkable island of the same name.

The kingdom of Angola is principally inhabited by negroes; and thither most European nations resort, in order to purchase slaves for their American plantations. These negroes are generally reckoned the most lazy and untractable of any slaves from the coast of Guinea. This, among other reasons, is attributed to the plenty of all sorts of provisions in their own country, and consequently their not being used to labour and hardships, like the negroes of the Gold-Coast, where the soil is poor and barren. Angola is divided amongst several petty princes and states; and on this coast the Portuguese have several colonies and settlements, who pretend to a dominion over the negro princes in their neighbourhood; however, the English, Dutch, and other European nations, traffic with the negroes here without any restraint. In the lakes of Angola are Hippotani, or River-horses. This country the Portuguese have rendered very fruitful. They have also peopled the banks of the river Calucala, and planted them with oranges, citrons, and vines.

The greatest trade of the Portuguese in Angola consists in slaves, which they buy, and send 15,000 of them in a year into America, to work in their sugar-mills and mines. The principal commodities which they import, are woollen stuffs, silks, linen, gold and silver laces, wine, brandy, oil, and spices. The inhabitants use bows and arrows, battle-axes, and scimitars, with a sort of long pike. Their king can raise an army of 200,000 foot, but they prove sorry soldiers; for 200 Portuguese, with some negroes, have often defeated their numerous armies. The king keeps his court in a village built on a very high rock, inaccessible but on one side; it is called Mapongo, and is above two leagues in circuit. This prince breeds a great number of peacocks. Most of the inhabitants are idolaters. The Jesuits baptised a great number of the natives in 1584; so that in 1590 there were upwards of 20,000 Christian Angolais. The bishop of Angola resides at Loanda San Paulo. Angola lies between Lat. 8, 30, and 16, 21, S. forming a coast of upwards of 480 miles, but how far it extends from ANGOR, a market town, with a citadel belonging to the house of Salburg, in the circle below the Manharts-berge Austria.

ANGORA, ANGOURA, or ANGYRA, called Angara by the Turks, and by the common people Engurch. It is the ancient Ancyra, a city of Naxos in Asiatic Turkey, which was the castle or fortress of the Tectosages. It was made the metropolis of Galatia, under the reign of Nero, and so it is called in the inscriptions that are found here. The emperor Caracalla having been a great benefactor to the city, it was called Antoniniana. The ancient city seems to have been on the same place as the present, except that in some parts it appears to have extended somewhat farther to the W. On the E. side of the plain, near the mountains, there are four or five hills. Angora is on the W. and S. sides of one of the largest of these hills, which is farthest to the S. on the summit of which there is a large castle. The city also extends a little to the N. W. of the hill, stretches on the N. side to another small hill, or rather rising ground, on the top of which is the principal mosque called Hadjee-Biram, near which is the temple of Augustus, and the famous inscription of Angora. The walls extend farther N. and go up the middle of a small high hill called Orta Daug, from which they come down to the small river Tabahanah, which runs E. and N. of the castle-hill, where they are joined to the castle-walls by a wall 20 feet thick, built across the river, with two or three holes in it, through which the water passes. This seems to be designed to keep up the water, in order to supply the castle in a time of distress; for there is a private passage down from the castle, by which they can take up the water that comes from the river. The walls of the town are about a mile and a half in length, and extend near half a mile up to the castle, which cannot be much less than a mile in circumference. It has a wall across the middle of it; and a strong tower at the summit of the hill, which is to the north, and to the east is a steep precipice. The castle itself is like a small town, and is well inhabited both by Christians and Turks. The river which runs by the castle, together with another rivulet, called the Infuch, which runs to the W. of the town, falls into a larger stream called Chibouk-Such, which passes near the Armenian convent, a mile to the N. of the city, and runs into the Sacari; and though there are so many rivulets near the city, it is ill supplied with water, which for common use they carry from the river to the higher parts of the town on horses, either in leather bags, as at Cairo, or in earthen jars, put into a box or frame on each side of the beast; but they have it conveyed by an aqueduct to the lower parts of the town from the river, and all the people of any condition send for their water half a mile to a fountain. The air of this place is esteemed to be very dry, and good for asthmatic constitutions, but pernicious to the sanguine. There being no wood in the country about it, fuel is exceedingly dear, and the common people are obliged to make use of dried dung. The present walls of the city are very ill built, and consist chiefly of the stones of ancient buildings, put together only with mud, so that a great part of them are daily falling: they were built about 60 years ago, against the rebel Gadick, who ravaged the country with 12,000 men, and was afterwards made a Pascha. Though many of the houses of the city are very good within, yet the buildings on the outside make a very mean appearance, being all of unburnt brick; the streets are narrow, and the city irregularly laid out. They have however a handsome stone building covered with cupolas, which is a bezeestan for rich goods. These are buildings only of one floor, with shops in them, like the Exchange in London. They have about 12 large mosques with minarets, and several small ones, near 100 in all.

As to ancient buildings, there are very few remains of any. To the W. of the walls there is a small ruin, which is built of brick and stone, and seems to have been part of some ancient temple; but it is so destroyed, that no judgment can be made what sort of a building it was. The most curious piece of antiquity is near a mosque called Hadjee-Biram, which belongs to a college for Mahometan sophists. It is an oblong square building, of white marble, about 90 feet long, and 50 broad; it stands N. and S. the walls are three feet three inches thick, and the stones are channelled at the joints. It is built on a basement, and there is a cornice round at the top, both inside and out, adorned with sculpture. At the distance of 20 feet from the N. there appears to have been another partition; and it is very probable there was such another, and another door; and that there were four lofty columns to each portico; so that the middle-room is about 44 feet long, and has a second beautiful entablature seven feet below the upper one, which is adorned with festoons; and on each side below it there are three windows, with semi-circular tops, about four feet wide and five high, which have before them a grate of marble. It is supposed to have been a temple of Augustus. On the inside of the portico, to the S. is that famous inscription that Augustus left with his will in the hands of the vestal virgins, and ordered to be cut in two brass plates, in the front of his mausoleum in Rome. The inscription consists of six columns, three on each side of the portico, each having between fifty and sixty lines in it, and each line about sixty letters. On the outside of the eastern wall wall part of it is cut in Greek, and part might be on the W. side: there is reason to believe that it was in about 20 columns. The letters appear to have been gilt on a ground of vermillion. Some houses are built against the other parts of it. The title of the Latin inscription is in three lines over the three first columns, as that in Greek appears to have been in one line on the E. side: which is a good reason to suppose that the whole Greek inscription was on that side, because the Latin begins on the W. side. The greatest part of the ancient buildings were of an ash-coloured marble, with veins of white in it, which are brought from the mountains to the S.E. Most of the capitals here are of the Corinthian order; the capitals of some pilasters consisting of a cymatium, two lists, and flutes about a foot long, and under them a quarter-round, adorned with eggs and darts. Towards the N.W. corner of the city there is an extraordinary pillar, the pedestal of which is raised on a stone work about ten feet above the ground: that work probably was cased with marble, which might have an inscription on it, and be adorned with reliefs. The shaft is about four feet in diameter, and is composed of 15 stones, each being two feet deep: it is worked all round horizontally with convex and concave members, which are about an eighth of a circle, divided by lists, all those members being three inches wide; the capital consists of four plain circles, something like pætae, with leaves on each side of them, the work above this somewhat resembling a Tuscan capital. The style of the shaft has no bad effect; but the capital is rather in a Gothic taste. It may be supposed that this pillar was erected to the honour of the emperor Julian, when he passed through Ancyra from Parthia, there being an inscription to his honour in the castle-walls. There are many stone-pipes of aqueducts about the town, such as are described at Laodicea, by which the water ran along the ground, as it does at present from the river; there being towers at certain distances in which the water ascends and descends in earthen pipes, to make it rise to the higher parts of the town, which is a method much practised in those countries.

The city of Angora is governed by a pascha and cadi. Some compute that there are 100,000 souls in it, 90,000 of which are Turks, and about 1000 of those janizaries: the Christians are thought to be 10,000, of which 300 families, or about 1500 souls, are Greeks, the rest Armenians; two thirds of the latter are of the Roman communion, and have four churches; the other Armenians have three. In rebuilding one of their churches not long ago, they found the bodies of seven children uncorrupted; they were like the bodies at Bremen, and at Venzoni, in Friuli; but rather more fair and entire. They suppose that these are of the 12 children who were martyred when St. Clemens Ancyranus suffered. The Armenians have a large convent about a mile to the N. of the city. Here the archbishop of Ancyra resides, with his suffragan; they are not of the Roman church. The Greeks have also an archbishop here, who is one of the 12 great metropolitans under the patriarch of Constantinople; is the fourth in rank, and has the title of primate of all Galatia: he has now no bishop under him, nor have any of the archbishops of Asia Minor. In a Greek church in the castle there is a transparent piece of alabaster, of a yellowish colour: many authors make mention of it; and the Greeks imagine it has some miraculous effects; though there is a much finer piece of that sort in the church of the same convent. There are in Angora about 40 poor families of Jews. The city was formerly very fruitful in heretics, among whom was Photinus. In the year 314 a council of 18 prelates was held here under Vitalis, patriarch of Antioch; and they made 24 canons, relating to the penance of apostles, and some other points of discipline.

They have a trade here of the hair of common goats, which grows short under the long hair; it is taken off after they are dead, to make hats. The French also of late buy up yarn of sheep's wool; but the great staple-commodity of the place is the yarn of the fine Angora goats wool, and the manufactures of it. These goats are peculiar to the country for about 30 miles round Angora, inasmuch that if they are carried to another place they degenerate; as to the E. of the Halys, and on the other side of a river that runs from the N. into the Sagari, and also to the S. of Sevrighisar. They are very beautiful goats, mostly white; but some of an ash-colour, and very few black. It is so exceedingly fine, that the most experienced persons could not know it from silk, but by the touch; they are shorn, without washing, about the month of May. They here weave of it fine camblets of three or four threads, which they sometimes water; and they make a stuff they call shawl, of two threads, which is like our finest serges; it is either plain or striped, and both are worn by the Turks for summer-garments: they make also camblets to 13 threads for European clothes. The export of the wool out of the country is strictly prohibited, because the inhabitants live by the spinning of it. Every thing that we call mohair, camblets, and prunellas, are made of it; and also the best plushes. The exports were pretty near equal to England, France, and Holland, amounting to about 5 or 600 camel-loads to each yearly, every load being 150 okes: but we are informed that the trade to England is sunk; and that the greatest export now is to France, and next to Holland, what is exported being from three to six dollars an oke. This country produces very good wine; and they have excellent rice on some rivers not a great way from Angora. Angora is situated on the river Melus, 150 miles E. of Constantinople. It is a large city, containing near 45,000 inhabitants. In the neighbourhood Pompey obtained a memorable victory over king Mithridates, and Tamerlane defeated Bajazet, emperor of the Turks. Lat. 41, 5, N. Long. 33, 10, E.

ANGOT, or ANGOTE, (Kingdom of), in the middle of Æthiopia, in Africa. It is situated E. of Bagemder; to the N.E. it joins with part of the kingdom of Tigra, and on the S.W. with that of Amhara. It is environed with steep and unpassable mountains, resembling an amphitheatre, in which are kept all the children of the royal family till one of them is called to the throne. It has fruitful valleys, with plenty of corn and cattle. Angot has been wrested from the Abyssinian empire by the barbarous Gallas or Gallies, who broke into it from the southern parts; where spreading themselves mostly to, and even beyond, the line, made themselves masters of the country. It hath some few towns, but inconsiderable; namely, the capital, which is of the same name; Dofarzo, said to contain near 1000 houses; Abugana, or Bugana, once famed for a good church called Imbre Christos, and for being the capital of a considerable territory of its name: with some few more of less note.

ANGOULESME, or ANGOULEME, in Latin Inculisma, Engoulisma, and anciently Ratiafum, the capital of Angoumois, which, together with Saintonge, is one of the governments in France. It is situated in the middle of the province, on the top of a hill, surrounded with rocks, at the foot of which runs the river Charante, that rises in Angoumois. It is a very ancient city, and gives the title of duke: it is also the see of a bishop, who is a suffragan to the archbishop of Bourdeaux, has a diocese of 200 parishes, a revenue of 20,000 livres, and is taxed 1000 florins to the court of Rome. Besides here is a seminary, 12 parish-churches, the abbey of St. Cibard, where the ancient counts of Angoumois are buried; likewise 10 convents, and a general hospital. It is the seat of an election, provostship, provincial bailiwick, and jurisdiction, forest-court, board of the five large imposts, and a marshalsea. The town is fortified by a strong castle and other bulwarks, so as to be accessible only on one side. The number of inhabitants is about 8000, who drive a pretty considerable trade in paper made in this city. In the neighbouring fields is a spring, from which gushes out a large volume or torrent of water, like a river. Angoulesme is 64 miles S. E. of Rochelle, and about 20 leagues from Poitiers to the S. in Lat. 45, 40, N. Long. 0, 13, E.

ANGOUMOIS, in Latin Provincia Engolismensis, a province of France, having its name from the capital, Angoulesme. It is bounded on the west by Saintonge, on the south by Perigord, on the east by Limousin and La Marche, and towards the north by Poitou. It lies along the banks of the river Charante, being between 15 and 18 French leagues in length, and between 15 and 16 in breadth. The country is full of hills, but has no considerable mountain. It produces wheat, rye, barley, oats, Spanish corn, saffron, wine, and all sorts of fruits. It has also good iron mines, and the paper manufactured in this province is excellent. Among its principal cities and towns are, Angoulesme, Rochefoucaud, Jarnac, Cognac, Chateau-neuf; besides seven more of less note; as La Vallette, Aubeterre, Blanzac, Verteuil, Ruffec, Chaabnois, and Montbron; which see. Its capital rivers are the Charante and Touvre, the latter of which rises in this province, and runs into the former. Angoumois was formerly a county or earldom; but as its last count Francis became king of France, under the name of Francis I. in the year 1515, he made a duchy of it. It is under the parliament of Paris, and includes a provincial bailiwick and jurisdiction of the same kind.

ANGOURA, or ANCYRA. See ANGORA.

ANGOY, a kingdom of Loango, in Africa, bounded on the north by Cacongo, and on the south by Congo; from the former of which it is separated by the river Cabinda, and from the latter by the river Zaire. It is but of small extent, being only a vassal province of Cacongo, till the mani or prince, who had married a Portuguese's daughter, was persuaded by his father-in-law to make himself independent. This he effected at a favourable juncture, the king of Loango having but just before revolted from the king of Congo, and the king of Cacongo from the new king of Loango. The country is full of woods and thickets, and has no towns of any note, except one called Bomangoy, situated on the north banks of the Zaire, and not far from its mouth. Its chief port is Cabinda, called also Kabenda, or Cubenda, situated on the mouth of a river of the same name about five leagues north of Cape Palmerino, on the north side of the Zaire's mouth. The bay is very commodious for trade, or wooding and watering along the shore. It is flat and marshy in some places; but ascends gradually about three miles inland, and then forms itself into a ridge of hills. On the ascent of these is situated a town belonging to the father-in-law of the king above mentioned, where he constantly kept a stock of wood ready cut, to sell to foreign ships at an easy rate. From these wood-piles, southwest along the bay, lie scattered a number of fishermen's huts, on each side a small fresh water river which falls into the bay; and thence all the water for ships is brought in casks to the mouth of the river, which is so shallow that even at full flood it can only be entered by a yawl carrying a cask or two. The town stands on the round point of the bay looking to the westward; and the English have a factory on the S. W. of the road. For a description of the town itself, see the article CABINDA.

The country round the bay is mostly barren, owing chiefly to the laziness of the inhabitants, which often occasions a scarcity of provisions. The wild beasts swarm so in the woods, that they destroy all the tame kinds; so that there are no cattle bred here but hogs. From the wood in this country some monkeys have been brought away, which in shape and stature resembled the human species. Civet-cats abound here in great plenty, and parrots may be bought for three or four ordinary knives. The coasts abound so with oysters that the sailors quickly load their boats with them, they being found lying in great heaps like small rocks. The natives follow the occupation of fishing more than any other. They fish both on the sea and in the rivers, making use of drag-nets, which have long canes fixed at equal distances, instead of corks, to shew when any fish is caught. These nets are made of a peculiar kind of root, which, after being beaten, may be spun like hemp. The dress of the inhabitants is the same with that of Congoese. They allow polygamy, and the best beloved wife hath the command of the rest; but is no less liable to be turned out if she proves unfaithful. The ladies of the blood royal have the privilege of choosing their husbands out of any, even the meanest rank; and have even the power of life and death over them; as likewise over their paramours, if any of them are caught tripping: but the husbands are by no means entitled to expect the same fidelity from their royal ladies. Women of the lower rank are obliged, when they receive a stranger, to admit them for a night or two into their embraces. This obliged the missionaries, who travelled through this country, to give notice of their approach to any of their houses, that none of the female sex might enter within their doors. Their religion consists chiefly in a variety of superstitious customs; such as powdering their public and domestic idols with the dust of a kind of red wood, on the first day of the moon, and paying a kind of worship to that planet. If on that night it happens to shine clear and bright, they cry out, "Thus may I renew my life as thou dost!" but if the air is cloudy, they imagine the moon hath lost her virtue, and pay her no respect. We do not hear of their offering any sacrifices to their idols, though they commonly consult them about the success of their enterprises, thefts, or such like. The king of Congo still styles himself sovereign of Angoy; but the king of this little state pays neither tribute nor homage to any foreign power.

ANGRA, a city of Tercera, one of the Azores, the capital not only of that island, but of all the rest, and is the residence of the governor. It is seated on the south side, near the middle of the longest diameter of the island, on the edge of the sea. The harbour is the only tolerable one in the whole island, being equally secure against storms and the efforts of an enemy. It is of the form of a crescent, the extremities of which are defended by two high rocks, that run so far into the sea as to render the entrance narrow, and easily covered by the batteries on each side. From this harbour the town is said to derive its name, the word Angra signifying a creek, bay, or station for shipping; and this is the only convenient one among all the Azores. The opening of the port is from the east to the south-west; and, according to Frezier, it is not above four cable's-length in breadth, and not two of good bottom. Here ships may ride in great safety during the summer; but as soon as the winter begins, the storms are so furious that the only safety for shipping is the putting to sea with all expedition. Happily, however, these storms are preceded by infallible signs, with which experience has made the inhabitants perfectly well acquainted. On these occasions the Pico, a high mountain in another of the Azores, is overcast with thick clouds, and grows exceedingly dark; but what they look upon as the most certain sign is the fluttering and chirping of flocks of birds round the city for some days before the storm begins.

The town is well built and populous, is the see of a bishop, under the jurisdiction of the archbishop of Lisbon. It hath five parishes, a cathedral, four monasteries, as many nunneries, besides an inquisition and bishop's court, which extends its jurisdiction over all the Azores, Flores, and Corvo. It is surrounded by a good wall, a dry ditch of great depth and breadth, and defended by a strong castle rendered famous by the imprisonment of king Alphonso by his brother Peter in 1668. Though most of the public and private buildings have a good appearance externally, they are but indifferently furnished within; but for this poverty the Portuguese excuse themselves, by saying, that too much furniture would prove inconvenient in so warm a climate.

At Angra are kept the royal magazines for anchors, cables, sails, and other stores for the royal navy, or occasionally for merchantmen in great distress. All maritime affairs are under the inspection of an officer called desembergrador, who hath subordinate officers and pilots for conducting ships into the harbour, or to proper watering-places. The English, French, and Dutch, have each a consul residing here, though the commerce of any of these nations with the Azores is very inconsiderable.

ANGRA (Cidade), a city belonging to the last-mentioned district of the same name in Tercera, an island of the Azores. It is the metropolis of them all, and the residence of their governor-general. It is situated on the S. side of the island, about the middle of it, and on the edge of the sea. Its harbour is at the bottom of a small bay, between two points of land, one of which is situated to the W. and the other to the E. a quarter of a mile asunder, and but about half that distance from the city. Upon the former of these points of land stands the castle of St. Sebastia, or St. Sebastian; and on the latter, namely, upon a high hill called Monte do Brasil, that of S. Juan Baptista, and near it one bastion. The harbour is clean, with good anchorage, where several ships may moor, and ride secure from all winds, the S. E. only excepted. The bay or port of Angra is not above four cables-length in breadth, and perhaps has not two of good bottom. The town is populous, and tolerably built, with broad, well-paved, clean, and strait streets. It has six parish-churches, among which the cathedral, namely, San Salvador, is one, a poor-house, an hospital, and eight convents, besides a tribunal of the inquisition. Under the jurisdiction of which, and that of the bishop, are all the nine Azore islands; see AZORES: but the bishop himself is under the patriarch of the western part of Lisbon. Its civil government is in the hands of two ordinary judges, three vereadores (assessors), a procurator (attorney), an escrivao da camera (secretary or clerk), and other officers. Besides, here is a corregidor, under whose jurisdiction are all the nine islands; and from him appeals lie to the relacao (a supreme judge) at Porto. Lastly, here are two provedores; one of which has the care of the king's revenues, and the other manages all matters that relate to the shipping. The city has a privilege of nominating a deputy to the general diet of Portugal. It is surrounded with a good wall and fosse; and besides other fortifications, is defended by the aforesaid castle of St. John the baptist, in which are 160 pieces of cannon, most of them brass guns. This is the castle where king Alphonso was confined by his brother Peter, in the year 1668. Angra was erected into a city in the year 1533. The name Angra properly signifies a creek, bay, or station for ships. It is principally on account of this port, that the Portuguese have been hitherto so careful of these Azore islands, its situation being so extremely convenient for refreshing their own ships that sail to and from the Brazils, and other long voyages. The safety in its harbour, some observe, is no longer than the fair summer-weather lasts, as at that time only gentle winds prevail from the W. to N. N. W. But as soon as winter begins, there are usually such violent storms, that the shortest way for men to save their lives and preserve their ships, is to sail away as soon as they see the least tokens in the air. The inhabitants, by long experience, are seldom mistaken in this respect: for then Il Pao, or the Peak, which is a very high mountain in one of the Azores, is covered and grows dark; and the birds for some days before come and cry about the city, as it were by instinct, to give them notice. In this city are kept the royal store-houses for anchors, sails, cables, and other ship-tackling for the men of war. The maritime affairs are under the inspection of a proper judge, who hath other officers under him; and he entertains a number of pilots, some to conduct the ships into and out of the harbour, and others to shew the crews springs of fresh water, &c. The public edifices, as also those of private persons, especially the churches of Angra, are well-built: but the houses are but indifferently furnished within; and the heat of the climate serves as a specious pretence for concealing the poverty of the inhabitants, whose principal commerce consists in that of wood, which grows in great plenty in most of these islands, in corn, and other provisions, which merchant-ships come to take in at this port. Angra is situated in lat. 39. N. Long. 27. W.

ANGRA DE LOS REYES, a town in the captainship of Rio de Janeiro, in Brasil, South America, subject to the Portuguese, about 36 miles from Rio de Janeiro. It is situated on the coast upon a small bay, from whence it has its name, being in English King's Bay. It has two churches, a monastery, and a small guard-house, of about a score of soldiers, and its chief produce is fish. Lat: 22. 28. S. Long. 41. 10. W.

ANGRETSTEIN, a castle and dependency belonging to the princely ecclesiastical foundation of Murbach in Upper Alsatia, a subdivision of the government of this last name, which now belongs to France.

ANGRIVARII, a people of Germany, situated between the Weser and the Ems, and eastward reaching beyond the Weser, as far as the Cherusci, on which side they raised a rampart to the south, having the Tubantes on the Ems, and on the Weser where it bends to the forest Bacemis; to the west, the Ems and the confines of the Bructeri; and to the north, the territory of Angrivarii lay between the Chamavi and the Ansibarii. Ptolemy places them between the Cauchi and Suevi or Catti. Supposed now to contain a part of the county of Schaumburg, the half of the bishopric or principality of Minden; to the south, the greatest part of the bishopric of Osnabrug, the north part of the county of Tecclenburg, and a part of the county of Ravensberg.

A N

A trace of the name of the people still remains in the appellation Engern, a small town in the county of Ravensberg.

ANGROGNE. Sometimes the valleys of Piemont are called by the name of Angrogne.

ANGROGNE, or ANGROGNA, a community, parish, or township, belonging to the valley of Lucerne, one of the valleys of Piemont, in the principality of this last name, in Upper Italy. It is situated 7 miles W. of Pignerol, and subject to the king of Sardinia. This community of Agrogne, through which runs a little river of the same name, is full of mountains; hardly produces any wine, but great quantities of chefnuts, all sorts of excellent fruits, and especially it has exuberant pastures for cattle. By nature Agrogne is uncommonly strong, as from below it is inaccessible only at two places, namely from the S. and E. and should both these happen to be taken by force or treachery, the inhabitants near Barricade, a secure and almost impassible valley, may have a safe retreat either on Mount Vachera, or on that called the Tower-meadow (Prée de Tour). This last place is a cavern or large hole, lying between the highest mountains of all, to which no access can be had, but with the utmost labour and trouble; yet it will hold when they get thither a great number of men. Here during the most violent persecutions against the poor Vandois, their old barte, bards as they are called, or valley-ministers, preached the gospel without any molestation; and, before the reformation, they trained up here young persons for the office of the ministry, or as preachers of the gospel. Angrogne is situated in Lat. 44, 45, N. Long. 7, 2, E.

ANGSOO, a considerable castle, or nobleman's seat, of Westmanland territory, a subdivision belonging to Upland, a province of Sweden Proper. A view of it may be seen in Dahlberg's Suecia.

ANGUED, or ANGA, a province of Africa. It ought rather to be called the desert of the Tremecen kingdom, being little else than such a fenny barren part of it, that one meets with neither tree, river, or spring therein, especially between the towns of Tremecen and Fez. It is computed to be about 28 leagues in length, some say miles, and between eight and twelve in breadth; and breeds great quantities of game and wild-fowl. The river Maluya runs through some part of its along the banks of which are several hords or clans of Arabs, besides great numbers of other people, who wander from place to place at pleasure, and live mostly on plunder, which obliges travellers to pay a certain sum of money to the first chief they come to, who gives them a small kind of flag at the end of a lance; which is a sort of safeguard till they come to the next hord, where they must renew their passport with the like sum. They all range and ramble about the country, without acknowledging any but their own chief, or paying any tribute to the Algerines. They have but little corn, and they feed principally on dates, milk, and what wild game they kill.

In this district is a high mountain called Beni-Zenetta, with several good villages upon it, and a castle in which their chieftain or principal lord resides. It is for the most part barren, and unhealthy on the higher part: but the valleys below it are fertile enough, breeding great number of fallow-deer, wild boars, ostriches, lions, and other ravenous creatures, which do a great deal of damage to the country. The governor of this province, who is sent hither by the dey of Algiers, resides at Guagida, the capital of the province. The other towns are Tenzegzet, and Zezil, or Zeril, and by others Ili and Giglua, (which see.)

ANGUILLA, or SNAKE ISLAND, so called, as being a long, but narrow tract, winding and twisting like that animal. It is one of the Caribbee islands in America, and situated in the Atlantic ocean. Its length is said to be about ten leagues, and its breadth only three. It is the most northerly of the Caribbees belonging to Great Britain, and lies 100 miles N. of St. Christopher's, in lat. 18, 4, N. Long. 62, 10, W. It may easily be seen from St. Martin's, an island possessed by the English and Dutch, which is about fourteen leagues to the E. of it. This island of Anguilla is woody, but quite level. It abounds with tame cattle, since it has been stocked by the Europeans; whereas formerly they had in this island only the possum or opussum, the flesh of which, if fat, eats like a pig; musk-rats, alligators, and such other strange animals. The English settled here in 1650, on a spot of fruitful soil, where they cultivated tobacco, which was reckoned very good. They planted corn, and bred cattle; for which purpose they brought stock with them. But the inhabitants were, and still continue to this day, poor, being, it is said, the laziest drones under the globe. Some have removed hither from Barbadoes, and others of the British Caribbee islands; and they live here without either religion or government. They subsist for the most part by farming, planting Indian corn, and other kinds of husbandry; but they cultivate few sugar-canes. This poor island has been often pillaged by the French; and in 1689 they landed some wild Irish here, who treated the English very barbarously. The number of militia here about fourteen or fifteen years ago was only eighty. Yet notwithstanding 1000 French made a descent here in May 1745, of which 600 marching up to attack a breast-work, were so well received by the continual fire of 100 men posted there to defend it, that the French were obliged to return with the loss of 150 of

of their party, besides some of their colours and fire-arms. The climate is very healthy, and the inhabitants strong. The exports in 1770 amounted in sugar, rum, and cotton to near 6000l. 3800l. of which was for Great Britain. Long. 62, 10. Lat. 18. 4.

ANGUILLE, (Cape of) a point of land on the West side of Newfoundland, North America. Lat. 47. 57.

ANGUILARA, or ANGUILLARA, a small, but handsome town of the Paduan, in Upper Italy. It is situated on a little lake of the same name, and near the river Adige, about 15 miles S. of Padua, in the road to Rovigo, and about 8 miles from it. Busching has not this town under Il Paduano; but he describes the following in Il Patrimonio di S. Pietro, a province of the ecclesiastical dominions.

ANGUILLARA, one of the principal places in the duchy of Bracciano, belonging to the patrimony of St. Peter, a province of the Ecclesiastical State, in the middle division of Italy. It has the title of a county or earldom.

ANGUS, see FORFARSHIRE.

ANHALT (principality of) a district belonging to the circle of Upper Saxony, in Germany. It is a narrow long strip of land, bounded by Misnia, and the counties of Mansfield and Stolberg, to the S. the duchy of Magdeburg and principality of Halberstadt, to the N. and N. W. the duchy of Saxony to the E. and Thuringia to the W. It is situated for the most part between the rivers Elbe and Saal, extending about 42 miles from E. to W. but of unequal breadth, the greatest being on its E. side, which is only 14 miles. It is remarkable that at Halderholz, near Heideburg, the territories of Brunswick, Anhalt, and Stolberg, meet in such a manner that the three princes may sit at the same table and each be in his dominions. Though some reckon Anhalt a part of Saxony, yet it is independent of it, being under its own prince: and some of this family have been electors both of Saxony and Brandenburg, their original being the same with that of both these. It is so ancient that they have a genealogical table in their palace, in which it is affirmed, according to their account, that their ancestors were kings, dukes, and generals of the Saxons, before the Christian era: but the Atlas Historique carries their origin no higher than the 6th century. This family is divided into the four branches of Dessau, the principal of which are Bernburg, Zerbst, and Cothen. And, upon the partition of their dominions, they mutually agreed to submit to the eldest of the family, who has the supreme government and territorial jurisdiction, and the only power to assemble the rest on any matters of consequence. They all have but one vote in the college of princes, belonging to the general diet of the empire, in which they generally depute one of their number to represent them. The right of primogeniture or seniority has for some years been established in the branches of Bernburg and Zerbst, which are the most numerous. It plainly appears from history, and consequently is indubitable, that this family of Anhalt has given birth to illustrious warriors and many other famous men. They also have married into the greatest families in Germany.

The estates belonging to the prince of Anhalt-Dessau, are the principality of Dessau, with the town of that name, Worlitz upon the Elbe, Rudgast, Sunderleben, Oranienbaum a seat on the confines of the Saxon electorate, Ragun, Jesnitz, &c. The prince of Anhalt-Bernburg, possesses the lordships of Bernburg on the Saal, and Ballenstadt, Old Anhalt, from which the family takes its name, Hartzgerode, Little Zeitz the place of his residence, and the abbey of Gernrode a foundation for ladies; of which last the princes of Anhalt have the advowson or disposal. To the prince of Anhalt-Cothen belongs the territory and town of that name, situated between the Saal and Muldaw, together with Plotzkow, the bailiwics of Nienburg on the Saal, formerly an abbey, Wolfen, the upper county of Warenisdorf, and Gusten. The prince of Anhalt-Zerbst has the town of that name, with the bailiwics of Lindaw, Coswitz, Roswick, Rosla, Muhlingen in Magdeburg, Water-Nienburg, Dornburg, Meckern, and the lordship of Javern or Yevern in Oldenburg: and he has also the reversion of the territory of Kniphausen. The revenue which each of these princes has is reckoned about 7000l. a year: but Dessau and Zerbst are thought to be worth more. In this country is no university: but prince Lewis of Cothen has founded a learned society, who have been principally employed in translating of ancient Greek and Latin authors, and the improvement of the German language. He himself was the first president; and in a short time upwards of 20 princes and 600 noblemen entered into this society, which is called the "Fruetifying Society." It has greatly advanced the learning, and improved the language, among the Germans. The people of Dessau are Calvinists, and all the others Lutherans: but in the town of Zerbst are both Calvinists and Lutherans. Anhalt is a good corn-country, and watered by the Saal and Muldaw. Its principal trade is in beer; and the chief towns are Dessau, Zerbst, Bernburg, &c. which see.

ANHOLT, an island belonging to the diocese of Aarhus or Arhusen, in the province of North-Jutland, in Denmark. It lies in the Cattegat or Schagerackund, about eight miles from the coast of Jutland, ten from that of Seeland, and seven from that of Halland, almost in the middle between Denmark and Sweden. It belongs to a district called Norre-herzed in the bailiwick of Kalloe in the same diocese. It is dangerous to sea-faring people on account of the many sand-banks which surround it; and for this reason a continual fire is kept up in a light-house upon it, in order to give ships that sail this way proper warning. The inhabitants get their sustenance by the sea-dog-fishery, and form a small parish. Lat. 56, 40. Long. 12, 0, W.

ANIAN, an imagined strait on the N. of California, a peninsula situated in the Pacific ocean in America, between the N. E. of Asia and N. W. of America, but now found to exist only in imagination, by the late voyage of Captain Cook to that part of the globe. See SANDWICH-SOUND.

ANIAN, or AYAN, a country on the east coast of Africa, between the equator and lat. 12, N. and long. 40, 50: E. It has the Red-sea and straits of Babel-mandel to the N. is bounded to the E. by the Indian ocean; on the S. by Zanguebar, and on the W. by Abyssinia. It is a desert country, and subject to several princes of Africa.

ANIANNE, or St. Benoît, a small town belonging to the diocese of Montpellier, one of the subdivisions of the government of Languedoc, in France. It is situated at the foot of the mountains, close by the river Arre; and in it is an old abbey of Benedictine monks.

ANJENGO, or ANJANGA, one of the principal places of Travancour, the most southern province of Malabar in the hither peninsula, belonging to the East-Indies or Mogul country in Asia: also the most southerly settlement belonging to the English on the coast of Malabar; and near a small town. They built a fort at this place in the year 1695, which has the sea on one side and a broad river on the other; but stands on a sandy bottom, and has not a drop of good water within a league of it.

The trade of Anjengo is principally in pepper, but not so large a grain nor so good as that about Carwar, &c. more to the northward. Here they have a manufacture of several sorts of cotton made into calicoes, great quantities of which were sent to Madraspatan. Anjengo lies in lat. 7, 5, N. Long. 76, 1, E.

ANIO, or ANIEN, now il Teverone: a river of Italy, which falls into the Tiber, three miles to the north of Rome, not far from Antemna. It rises in a mountain near Treba, and, running through the country of the Æqueni, or Æqui, it afterwards separated the Latins from the Sabines; but nearer its mouth, or confluence, it had the Sabines on each side. It forms three beautiful lakes in its course. In the territories of Tibur it falls from a great height, and there forms a very rapid cataract; hence the epithet præceps, and hence the steam caused by its fall. Anienus is the epithet formed from it, Anienus is also the god of the river.

ANJOU, one of the governments of France. This province, which takes its name from its ancient inhabitants the Andes or Andegavi, is called in Latin Andegavia, or Ducatus Andegavienfis. It is bounded on the E. by Touraine, on the S. by Poitou, on the W. by Britany, and on the N. by Maine. Its greatest length from W. to E. is about twenty-six French miles, and its greatest breadth from S. to N. twenty-four. It is very agreeably diversified with hills and level fields, especially along the banks of the Loire. The country produces white wine, corn, as wheat, rye, oats, barley, pease, beans, and several other sorts of pulse, with flax, hemp, &c. Here are all kinds of trees, excellent fruit, and they make cyder in some places; also walnuts, and a few chestnuts, and good pastures; here and there are pit-coals, also some iron-mines; likewise quarries of marble, and beautiful slate, with pits of salt-petre. In this province is no want of mineral waters; but these are little regarded. This is a charming country; and the wine it produces, which is very good, is exported into other parts, by means of the river Loire. Its climate is very temperate. In Anjou are reckoned forty-nine small and great rivers; but of these only six are navigable, namely, the Loire, which divides this province into two parts, the Vienne, Tou, Mulenne, Loire and Sarte.

This country formerly consisted of two counties or earldoms, which towards the close of the 9th century were united. In the year 1202 Philip Augustus annexed this county to the crown: in 1256 St. Lewis gave it to his brother Charles, who was the founder of the first line of Anjou that ascended the throne of Sicily. In the year 1297, king Philip the Fair raised it to a duchy and peerage; and soon afterwards the country reverted to the crown. King John gave this duchy to his son Lewis I. who was the founder of the second house of Anjou, from which also are descended the kings of Sicily and Naples. In 1481 it came again to the crown; but Henry III. gave it to his brother Francis Philip of France, duke of Orleans, and brother to Lewis XIV. bore the name of Anjou to his other name.

The whole province is under the jurisdiction of the parliament of Paris. With regard to its military government, it has a governor, a lieutenant-general, a lieutenant for the king for Upper and Lower Anjou, and two other deputy-governors or lieutenants for the king, and likewise for the province of Anjou and county of Laval. It has a justiciary court, called Marthallée, which takes cognizance of all crimes committed in the country by robbers and other offenders. It consists of a provost-general, a recorder, two exempts, and thirty tipstiffs. The capital of Anjou is Angers; besides which it contains twenty eight other towns, great and small.

sides

ANKER, a river in Warwickshire which runs by Atherstone, and falls into the Tame at Tamworth.

ANKHAM, a river in Lincolnshire, which falls into the Humber by Ferryby.

ANKUN, a small town in the principality of Anhalt, to the west of Zerbst, and so near that in the imperial patents it is termed a suburb to that city, though it has a corporation of its own. In 1707, a great part of this place was destroyed by fire.

ANNA, ANA, or ANAH, one of the three principalities into which Arabia Deserta, in Asiatic Turkey, is divided. Its capital is of the same name, and situated on the W. bank of the river Euphrates. It was formerly a famed mart-town, though at present it is not much frequented. Its site is in the midst of a fruitful and pleasant soil, and on the northern limits of this province, near the province of Diarbeckr. And hence perhaps the Arabian geographers have placed it in the Mesopotamia. The inhabitants pretend that this is a very ancient city, and the Ana, or, as the Hebrew hath it, Hena, mentioned by Rabshakeh (2 Kings xix. 13.) with Ivah, Sepharvaim, and other cities which his master had destroyed. The city is still surrounded with high walls, though old, and defended by a castle on the N. side. But as the ground on which it stands is hemmed in, and surrounded by high and stagg mountains on each side, the inhabitants have spread themselves most in length; so that it hath but two streets, which are divided by the Euphrates. That on the Mesopotamian side is about two miles long, but thinly peopled, and that by none but tradesmen and journeymen. That on the opposite side is above six miles in length, and here the principal inhabitants reside. All the houses here are only one, or at most two stories high, being square, flat, and covered with a terrace, except the mosque which is covered with tiles; and is the only covering of that kind in all the country. Every house has some ground belonging to it, which is bounded on one side by the hills and on the other by the Euphrates. These grounds are covered with noble fruit-trees, as lemons, oranges, citrons, quinces, figs, dates, pomegranates, olives, &c. which are very large, and in great plenty. Some low and flat grounds are sown with corn and other grain, which yield a considerable crop. They are obliged to leave a good large ditch between their grounds and the hills behind them, in order to prevent their being overflowed with the waters, which sometimes pour down from them. Both sides of the city are reckoned to contain about 4000 houses, among which some belong to the Arabian Jews, who are neither rich nor neat; the rest are either of stone and lime, or mortar. The inhabitants are divided into two classes or tribes, one of which is descended from the ancient Arabians, and the other consists of strangers settled there. This city is one of the thorough-fares through which the caravans must pass that go to and from Aleppo, Tripoli, Damascus, Bagdad, &c. It is under one of the greatest Emirs of all Arabistan, though tributary to the Turk: and to him all the merchants pay custom for the commodities which they carry through it. Another traveller says, that Ana is about three quarters of a league in length, and about 100 paces in breadth. It is principally peopled by Arabs, the greatest part of whom consists of the chiefs of the free-booters, who disperse themselves from hence into all the parts of the desert. It is the common rendezvous of all the thieves that infest the country, which renders it very dangerous to travel through it; and the city is tributary to the grand signior; but it is with great difficulty that the Turkish aga and janizaries kept here can levy the tribute which is imposed by the Turks. Whether the difference between these two accounts be owing to the alterations which time has made, or to any other cause, we cannot take upon us to determine. Anna stands 100 miles W. of Bagdat, in Lat. 33, 30, N. Long. 41, 35, E.

ANNA (St.) a new and regular, but small and low Russian fortress, in the joint government of Woronz and Asoph, on the river Don, four wersts beyond Tischerkaft, a town belonging to the Cossacks that dwell on the said river. This fort has six bastions, and the necessary outworks, defended by two marching and two garrison regiments. Its streets are straight, broad, and well-built. The country round it is marshy.

ANNABERG, by some called St. Annenberg, or St. Annaberg, a town of Misnia Proper, one of the districts belonging to the electorate of Saxony, and subject to the elector. It stands on the Schneeberg, i. e. the Snow-mountain, lying near Bohemia, at the source of the river Schop. It is situated 42 miles S. of Meissen, towards Ellenbogen. The silver-mines here turned to such good account, from the year 1496 to 1500, that George duke of Saxony founded a town here, and changed the name of the place from Schreckenberg, i. e. frightful mountain, to St. Annaberg, or St. Anne's mountain. And the year following the emperor Maximilian I. conferred great privileges upon it, with a weekly market and annual fair. In the year 1503 it was walled round; and St. Anne's reliques brought from France were deposited here; and in 1510 Barba, daughter of Casimir king of Poland, made a present to its church of one of that saint's fingers. Here also were formerly a convent, with a chapel for the use of the minors: but in 1604 Annaberg, with its town-house and churches, the finest finest then in this country, were burnt to the ground, by certain incendiaries, who were afterwards condemned and burnt at Prague for it. However, Annaberg soon rose again out of its ashes. In Laurence Peccenstein's Theatrum Saxonicum is an account of a bath at the village of Wiese, about a mile from it, which proved of great benefit to the infirm; and which Sophia, electress-dowager of Saxony, adorned with several fine structures; and from whom it had the name of Sophia's bath, being before that called Job's bath, and an image of him set up in its chapel. Though its water be warm, yet they make it hotter for bathing in. It is reckoned efficacious against convulsions, tremors, cutaneous distempers, &c. This used formerly to be one of the elector's country-seats. Lat. 50, 33. N. Long. 13, 6. E.

ANNAGH, a thriving village, five miles S. of Charleville, in the county of Cork, Ireland. This place, and the adjacent lands round it, were at a great expence reclaimed from a deep and dangerous morass, by the late earl of Egmont, who has established the linen manufacture. A strong castle stood here, and was garrisoned from 1641 to 1645 at the expence of Sir Philip Percival, when it was taken by the Irish under Lord Castleconnel, and the garrison put to the sword in cold blood.

ANNAM Kingdom, the first division of India beyond the Ganges (those of the empire of Siam and the empire of Ava being the other two divisions), contains in it the three kingdoms of Tonquin, Laos, and Cochinchina. This kingdom of Annam, or Anna, Lutys says, is in Latin called Regnum Annamiticum, five Annamum, i. e. the western kingdom, because it was heretofore the west part of China. He places it between the empires of Siam and Ava, China and the bay of Tonquin. It has the two latter on the east, Ava west, Siam south, and part of China and Independent Tartary north-east and north. The Sansons say, that though this country revolted from China about 800 years ago, yet the inhabitants retain the government, religion, manners, and customs of the Chinese.

ANNAMABOE, an English manufactory on the Gold-coast of Guinea, in Africa. See ANAMABOE.

ANNAN, a river in Scotland, which has its source at Arrickstone, near those of the Clyde and the Tweed; and notwithstanding their sources are so near, they run into different seas: the Tweed into the German-ocean, the Clyde into the Irish-sea, and the Annan into the Solway frith, after passing through the stewartry of Annandale, to which it gives name, and a little below the town of Annan.

ANNAN, ANNAND, or ANNANDALE, the chief town of the district of the last name, with which Wachopdale, Eskdale, and Nithdale, constitute the four great divisions of the shire of Dumfries, in the south of Scotland. It is an ancient royal burgh, and the fourth in order of the district of five boroughs, namely, Kircudbright, Dumfries, Lochmaban, and Sanquhar, which alternately send a member to the British parliament. It is situated at the mouth of a river of the same name, where it falls into the Solway frith. This place has some trade in wine, and exports annually between 20 and 30,000 Winchester bushels; (10 and 15,000 bolls) of corn. Vessels of about 250 tons can come within half a mile of the town; and of 60, as high as the bridge; which consists of five arches, defended by a gateway. It had also a castle, but is now in ruins. Here was a good salmon-fishery; but the place having been often taken by the English, they at last burnt it to the ground in the reign of king Edward VI. upon which, most of its merchants and men of substance removing to Dumfries, Annan never recovered itself, and seems now in a state of irretrievable decay. The town has a weekly market, and a handsome bridge over the Annan, the ordinary course of which river marks out the division of Annandale, i. e. the dale or valley on the river Annan. It is a subdivision of the shire of Dumfries in the south of Scotland, and is situated in the east part of it, in a straight line from Nithdale or Nidisdale on the W. to Eskdale, Eshdale, or Eufdale, on the E. being, according to the addenda of Dr. Gibson to Camden's Britannia, 24 miles long, and 14 broad. Annandale, with Nidisdale, was, according to the Roman division, inhabited by the Selgowie. This division was an hereditary stewartry in the Tweeddale family; but by a late British act it has been vested in the crown. It was granted to Robert lord of Cleveland in Yorkshire, of whose family Robert Bruce, king of Scotland, was a branch, on account of his assisting Edgar, king of Scots, against the usurper Donald VI. but the male issue of that family failing, it was given to the aforesaid family of Johnston; a family born, says Camden, for war; between which and the Maxwells, who, by ancient right, says he, preside over the stewartry, there had long subsisted an open enmity and defiance, even to bloodshed. The Johnstons, who received it as a reward for their services against the English, and for suppressing the Douglasses, and other borderers who joined them, took for their device a winged spur, to signify their diligence, together with this motto, "Alight thieves all," as denoting their authority to command, or power to compel them to surrender; for they were often wardens of the borders, and the marquis, as has been said, was hereditary steward. It stands on the Solway frith. Lat. 54, 40; N. Long. 3, 2. W.

ANNANO,

A N

ANNANO, a strong fort of Italy, in the duchy of Milan. It has been twice taken by the French; but was restored to the duke of Savoy in 1706. It is seated on the river Tanaro, in E. Long. 8, 30. N. Lat. 44, 40.

ANNAPOLEIS, or ANAPOLIS, a town of Anne-Arundel county in Maryland, in North-America. It is a small but beautifully-situated town, upon the river Patuxent. It was formerly called Severn, but by an act of the assembly of Maryland, passed in the year 1694, it was made a port-town, and the seat of a principal custom-house, collector, and naval officer, at which time it had the name of Annapolis given it. It is situated in Lat. 39, 25. N. Long. 78, 16. W. Here the governor resides. To this place also the county-court was removed; a church was ordered to be built within the port, which was made a parish; and in 1699 Annapolis was made the principal seat of justice within the province of Maryland, for holding of assemblies and provincial courts. The assembly passed an act for founding a free-school here to be called King William's school. The county-court for orphans is holden at Annapolis. The records of Anne-Arundel county were removed to this town, where are about 40 houses; but it has not flourished lately, according to expectation; and while planters and merchants affect to live separately, as they do in Virginia, there is no great probability of this town ever becoming considerable. It lies, 100 miles N. of James-town; and its principal production is tobacco.

ANNAPOLEIS, or ANNAPOLEIS ROYAL, the capital of Acadia, or Nova Scotia, in North-America. It is situated in a fair clean bay, within the great bay of Fundi, where are at least six or seven other good harbours. It was called Port Royal by Monsieur de Monts in the year 1605, when he brought the French colony hither from St. Croix; and had the name of Annapolis in honour of queen Anne, in whose reign it was taken by the English under Colonel Nicholson. By the 12th article of the treaty of Utrecht, his Most Christian Majesty ceded for ever to the queen of England, Acadia, or Nova Scotia, wholly, according to its ancient limits; as also the town of Port Royal, at present called Annapolis Royal, and in general all the dependencies on the said country, and the islands belonging to it. The harbour of Annapolis has but one fault, namely, the difficulty of coming in or out of it, besides the inconveniency of the frequent fogs which happen here; so that only a single ship can pass through at a time, and that must be with its stern foremost, and with very great precaution, by reason of the strong currents and tides here. This one thing excepted, nature has hardly omitted any else to render it the finest harbour in the world. Its length is two leagues, and its breadth one, having a small island called

Goat-island, almost in the middle of the basin, which can, it is said, contain all the ships in America. The depth of water in it is no where less than four or five fathoms, it being six or seven on one side of the island, and on the other 16 or 18. Its bottom is every where good, and ships may ride secure in it from all winds. Whilst the French possessed it, they often brought their fishing vessels hither.

Annapolis is not a large town, but has some handsome buildings in it, though these are generally no more than two stories high. It was very well fortified both by sea and land, some time after the cession of the port and country to the English, by the above-mentioned treaty. But the old works being irregular, and so rendered incapable of defence, the government caused them to be almost demolished, and new and regular fortifications to be completely finished, with lines, and four bastions, large and well-faced with a deep dry moat, a covered-way, and counterscarpe, also a half moon, and out-works detached from the body of the place. And thus it is in no danger from any sudden attack. Towards the sea are likewise several batteries of guns, so arranged as to keep off any enemy; nor can it be easily attacked any otherwise than by bombardment. This strong town is reckoned a barrier to the colonies of New England, and of great service for annoying the Americans in the late tumultuous transactions, as well as serving for the retreat of the Loyalists when they quitted Boston. At the bottom of the basin is a point of land dividing two rivers, where the tide rises to 10 or 12 feet; on each side are pleasant meadows, covered in spring and autumn with all sorts of fresh-water fowl. The subsistence of the place arises from the traffic of skins, which the savages bring down and exchange for European goods. It has also a pretty good trade in fish and lumber. Here the governor resides, with a garrison, who are maintained at a considerable expence by the British government. During queen Anne's wars, when Annapolis was in the hands of the French, it was, according to Mr. Dummer, the Dunkirk, as it were, of this part of the world, continually harbouring privateers and French cruizers, to the great detriment, if not utter ruin, of the fishery and foreign trade of all our northern colonies. Annapolis lies in Lat. 45, N. Long. 64, W.

ANNATTOM, one of the islands called the Hebrides in the South Sea. Lat. S. 20, 3. Long. E. 170, 5.

ANNE, (Cape) a point of land with a harbour, in Massachusetts Bay, New England. North America. Lat. 42, 55. Long. 70, 17.

ANNE, (Princess) a county of which Norfolk is the principal town in Virginia. It has the Back-Bay on the S. the Atlantic on the E. Chesapeake-Bay on the N. and Norfolk-county on the W.

A N

ANNE, (Arundel) a county in Maryland, watered by the Severn, the capital town of which is Annapolis.

ANNE's, (St.) a port on the E. side of the Isle of Cape-Breton, frequented sometimes by fishing vessels. Lat. 47, Long. 60.

ANNEBAUT, a village of Le Roumois, a territory belonging to Upper Normandy, in the government of that name in France. It is situated on the Rille, and has the title of a Marquisate.

ANNECY, in Latin Annifiacum, Annecium, or Annifiacum, the capital of the duchy of Genevois, a subdivision of that of Savoy, in Upper Italy, a neat town with a castle, and situated on the beautiful lake of the same name, where the river Sier issues from it, and which runs through the town. It is watered by many other pleasant rivulets, which, flowing from the said lake, form themselves into a small river called the Trioul, and render the situation of the place very convenient and delightful. This city, from its remains, appears to have been formerly very large, populous, and opulent; but a dreadful fire, which happened in it in the year 1448, made such devastation, that it hath never been able to recover itself since, either with regard to ancient splendor or the number of its inhabitants.

Annecy has been the residence of the bishop of Geneva ever since the year 1535, when the reformers drove him out of that city, though he still retains his title from it. The cathedral is a noble structure without, and very rich in its ornaments within. On its high altar are preserved, in a chest of massy silver, the reliques of St. Francis de Sales, formerly bishop of Geneva, a prelate of eminent piety, and one of the best families in Savoy. The choir of this church is magnificent, and its canons are rich, learned, and courteous. Here are also two other collegiate churches, a seminary of priests of St. Lazarus, a college (lately of Jesuits) another of Barnabites, a convent of Dominicans, one of Capuchines, and one of Benedictines, besides several others. Some of the convents are very stately rich edifices. Here are likewise some nuneries of several orders; one in particular, originally called that of the Annunciation, but now more commonly known by the name of their founder above-mentioned, St. Francis de Sales. The nuns of this order, which has since spread itself over Europe, are noted for their strict piety and close retirement, being never admitted to see, or be seen, by any man, except by the priest, when he administers the sacrament to them. This city was taken by the French in the year 1630, and afterwards in 1690, but restored to the dukes of Savoy by the treaty of Turin in 1696. They again took it in each of the two last wars; but it was ceded to the king of Sardinia, to whom it is now subject. It lies 20 miles S. of Geneva. Lat. 46, 53, N Long. 6, 12, E.

ANNECY (Lake of) is one of the most considerable inland lakes in Genevois, a duchy belonging to Savoy, in Upper Italy.

ANNENBURG, a place with a castle or seat, in the parish of Mittaw, belonging to the territory of this last name in Semigallia, the eastern division of the duchy of Courland.

ANNENHOF, an imperial pleasure-house and seat of Ingermanland, or government of Petersburg, in European Russia, on the banks of the Nieva.

ANNESLY, a town in Nottinghamshire, near the forest of Sherwood.

ANNEZIN, a castle or seat in the advocacy of Bethuine, one of the twelve jurisdictions of Artois, belonging to the government of Picardy and Artois, in France.

ANNISOR, a river in Pembroke-shire, which runs into the Irish-channel near Newport.

ANNOBON, i.e. the good or happy New year, so called by the Portuguese, on account of their discovering it upon New-year's day. It is one of the African islands, and situated to the E. of St. Matthew, in Lat. 2, S. and Long. 5, 10, E. from London. It lies almost 210 miles from the coast of Loango, in the kingdom of Congo, in Africa. According to Baudrand, it is ten leagues in circuit; but the voyages of the Dutch East-India company make it only two. In this island are two high mountains, which, from their being continually wrapt up in clouds, occasion frequent rains. Here are several fertile valleys, producing plenty of bananas, potatoes, oranges, pine-apples, tamarinds, and cocoa-nuts: besides which it abounds also in lemons, citrons, nuts, figs, Turkish corn, and millet. Here are likewise oxen, cows, hogs, goats, fowls, pigeons, and other poultry; also plenty of fish. It yields also a vast quantity of cotton. It is subject to Portugal, and the governor is a Portuguese, who has very few white people with him; all the other inhabitants being blacks, who are zealous Roman Catholics. On the S. E. part of the island are two rocks, one of which is almost level with the surface of the sea, the other much higher, and very large. On these rocks are numbers of birds, so tame that they suffer themselves to be taken by the hand. The water is so deep between these two rocks that ships may easily pass between them. On the same side of the island is a very good watering-place, the water running down from the mountains into a valley of orange and other fruit trees. But it is difficult to come at the water, by reason of the violent breakings of the sea; and here the negroes have made an intrenchment of stone, from which they can very much incommode those that go for water thither. The road is on the N. E. side of the the island, where shipping may anchor in seven, ten, thirteen, or sixteen fathoms water, upon a sandy bottom close to land, and opposite to the village where the above intrenchment has been made. When the inhabitants cannot hinder a descent, they immediately quit their houses, which are only of timber and sand, and retire into the mountains. They are generally very well armed. The revenue of this island consists principally in cotton, which the negroes gather; and, after cleaning, send it into Portugal. In the mountains of this island are some civet-cats, which yield a small profit. The inhabitants are but meanly clothed; the women go bare-headed, with the upper part of their body also naked, wearing only a piece of linen wrapped round them, which reaches from the pit of the stomach to a little below the knee.

ANNONAY, a little town, and the principal place of Upper Vivarias, a subdivision of the diocese of Viviers, in the government of Languedoc, in France, situated on the small river of Deume; is a marquisate, and the seat of a bailiwick, belonging to the house of Rohan-Soubise.

ANNONE, a fort of some strength, belonging to the duchy of Montferrat, a subdivision of that of Savoy, in Upper Italy, situated on the river Tanaro, bordering on the Milanese, and is subject to the duke of Savoy. It stands eight miles E. from Asti, in Lat. 44, 27, N. Long. 28, 12, E.

ANNOY, a small city on the mountains of Provence, in France. Lat. N. 44, 4. Long. E. 7.

ANO-CAPRI, the largest town of the island of Capri, belonging to the territory of Lavoro, in the kingdom of Naples, situated on the coast of Lower Italy, and on the western part of Capri-island. See CAPRI.

ANOMOCOA-ISLE. See ROTTERDAM-ISLE.

ANOVER, a fine village belonging to Algaria, one of the three subdivisions of New Castile, in Spain, situated on the Tagus.

ANOSSE, a province of the island of Madagascar, lying between Lat. 23, 18, and 26, S. It is watered by many rivers, most of which run into the Franchere, Ramevatte, or Immour, the spring of which is in a mountain called Manghage, and discharges itself into the sea in Lat. 25, 18, S. The mouth of this river is often stopped, and the course to the sea interrupted, unless kept open by the overflowings of great rains and high tides. The water runs salt one league above the mouth, particularly in a free communication with the sea. A lake, called Ambou, is formed at the mouth, half a league wide, with depth sufficient for any ship if the mouth of the river was kept open. Next in bigness to the Franchere is the Manghafia, which springs from a mountain called Siliva, and empties itself into the sea, where large ships may ride at anchor. Crocodiles breed in these and all the other rivers of the island.

Between the two rivers above-mentioned lies Cape St. Romain, half a mile distant from the mouth of the Franchere, and which runs from the north-west six or seven leagues into the sea. When the cape is passed the coast forms a great bay, in the shape of a cross, which extends to the mouth of a river called Dian Panouge, or Pitorah. In the middle of this bay the land runs out, and almost forms a peninsula, called Tholangare. Fort Dauphin lies to the north of this peninsula, and Port Dauphin over against it. This province has several other peninsulas and small islands belonging to it. The country is beautiful, abounds in fruit trees, is fertile in pastures for cattle, and, if carefully cultivated, would produce all the necessities of life. It is surrounded by high mountains, which are covered with woods and shrubs; but about four miles distant from Fort Dauphin, the adjacent hills are quite destitute of verdure. The French often dug in this neighbourhood, expecting to meet with mines of gold and silver, particularly in one mountain, where several springs flow near each other, and empty themselves into a neighbouring river. In this river they found several stones and heaps intermixed with yellow clay, with a great quantity of black and white spangles shining like silver, which they carefully pounded and washed, but without effect. About 60 yards above these springs the grass, and every sort of vegetable, appears half dried and yellow, from a metalline sulphur, which gives that aspect; but the top of the mountain is covered with a fresh and beautiful verdure. It is said that the Portuguese found gold at the foot of this mountain on the north side, but that the place they had dug was filled up by the chiefs of the country after the Portuguese had been driven out.

The province of Anossi is inhabited by three different sorts of whites, and four sorts of negroes. The whites are distinguished by the names of Rohandrians, Anacandrians, and Ondzatsi. The whites are distinguished from the negroes by the general name of Zaferamini, or Rahimini; and the Rohandrians are distinguished above the other whites. When they proceed to an election of a sovereign, whom they call ompiandrian, or dian bahouache, he is chosen from the Rohandrian race. Next to him the others hold the rank of princes, and are honoured as such by all the rest of the subjects. The Anacandrians are descendants of the chiefs, but who have degenerated, and are accounted the bastards of princes, or those who are descended from a Rohandrian and any inferior white or black woman. These are likewise called by the name of Ontempassemaca, or people from the sandy parts of Mecca, from whence, they say, came came the Rohandrians. Both the Rohandrians and Anacandrians wear long hair, which hangs down in curls, and enjoy the privilege of killing beasts. The Ondatzsi, or lowest class of whites, are descended from the bastards of the Anacandrians. These are all fishermen, and are allowed to kill no land-animal, except chicken.

The four classes of negroes are named Voadzir, Lohavohits, Ontsoa, and Ondeves. The Voadziri, the most powerful and the richest, are masters of several villages, and descended from the original lords of the country. They enjoy the privilege of killing beasts when at a distance from the whites, and no Rohandrian or Anacandrian in the village. The Lohavohits are descendents from the Voadziri, and also lords; but with this difference; that the one commands a whole district, and the jurisdiction of the others extends only to their own village and family. They are also permitted to kill those beasts they intend to eat, when at a distance from the whites. The Ontsoa are next to the Lohavohits, and are their near relations. The Ondeves are the lowest of all, being originally slaves by father and mother. The Voadziri, Lohavohits, and Ontsoa, enjoy the privilege of submitting themselves, on the death of their lord or king, to any chief they please. In return for such homage, the new lord makes them a present, in consequence of which he becomes heir to all their possessions. Hence the lower classes both of whites and blacks, when death approaches, are under the greatest concern and anguish of mind, well knowing that their lords will not fail to deprive their children of every thing they possess. The Ondeves have not the same liberty with the others: but, in times of famine, the chiefs are obliged to supply them with necessities; which if they fail to do, they have the liberty of submitting themselves to new masters. The inhabitants of this province have no temples, and very little appearance of religion, only they keep up a custom of immolating beasts upon particular occasions, as in sickness, planting yams or rice, on assemblies, &c. They offer the first-born beast to the devil and to God, naming the devil first, in this manner, Dianbilis Aminhanhabare, or, "Lord devil and God."—There are several towns on the river Franchere; and near this river the Portuguese had a fort built upon a steep rock, and several buildings below, with inclosures, which furnished all sorts of necessaries for their subsistence; but they were all massacred by the natives.

This province seems originally to have been inhabited by negroes. The whites or Zaseramini settled in it about 200 years ago, and conquered the negroes. But they themselves were conquered by the French, though under the government of a king whom they honoured as a god. In 1642, captain Rivault obtained a permission to establish a colony in this part of the island; and accordingly he took possession of it in the name of the king of France, in the month of September, that same year. The French landed 200 men, well armed and provided with store of ammunition and other necessities for building a fort, which they immediately set about; but no sooner did the natives observe their intention, than they used their utmost art to prevent their design from taking effect. This created a war, in which the French were victors; and the natives becoming in time much better reconciled to them, they intermarried, and lived up and down in several towns at some distance from one another, not above five or six in a place. This tranquillity lasted for some years; but at last the natives, growing jealous, resolved to free themselves from a foreign yoke, and accordingly formed a conspiracy to cut off all the French in one day, which they soon after effected, not leaving a single person alive. In 1644 the above-mentioned Fort Dauphin was erected in Lat. 25, 6, S. Many buildings were erected, behind the fort, adjoining to the governor's house, with great inclosures that produced every sort of fruit and kitchen herb. In 1656 this fort was accidentally destroyed by fire; but was soon after repaired, and still continues, notwithstanding the catastrophe above mentioned, and its garrison carries on frequent wars with the natives.

ANOUT, a small island in the Schagerrack, or that part of the sea of Denmark which has Norway on the north, Jutland on the west, and the isle of Zealand on the south. It lies in 13, E. Long. and 56, 36, N. Lat.

ANSE, an ancient town of France, in the Lyonois, ten miles north of Lyons. Long. 6, 55, N. Lat. 45, 55.

ANSEDE, one of the seven smaller districts, in the jurisdiction of Porto, belonging to the province of Entrêdouro e Minho, in Portugal.

ANSIBARII, or ANSIVARII, an ancient people of Germany, situated somewhere in the neighbourhood of the Chauci. All we know of their history is, that, in the reign of the emperor Nero, they were driven from their own possessions by the Chauci. Being then in a forlorn condition, they took possession of some uninhabited lands, which had been used as pasture for the horses of the Roman soldiers. They were led by one Boiovalus, a man of great valour, and of known fidelity to the Romans. He remonstrated to the Romans, who objected to their taking possession of these lands, that the territory in dispute was large; and requested, that it might be allowed to an unhappy people, driven from their own habitations; that, at the same time, wide tracts might be retained for the horses and cattle of the soldiers to graze in; that it was inconsistent with humanity to furnish men in order to feed beasts, &c. and at last, lifting up his eyes to heaven, he asked the celestial luminaries how they could behold a desolate soil, and if they would not more justly let loose the sea to swallow up usurpers, who had engrossed the whole earth? To this the Roman commander, Avitus, replied, that the weakest must submit to the strongest; and that since the gods, to whom they had appealed, had left the sovereign judgment to the Romans, they were resolved to suffer no other judges than themselves. To Boiocealus himself, however, he privately offered lands as a reward for his long attachment to the Romans: but this offer the brave German rejected, as a price for betraying his people; adding, "A place to live in we may want, but a place to die in we cannot." The Ansibarii now invited the neighbouring nations to join them against the Romans; but they, dreading the power of that nation, refused to give them any assistance: upon which they applied to the neighbouring nations, begging leave to settle in their territories; but being every where driven out as enemies and intruders, these unhappy people were reduced to wander up and down till every one of them perished.

ANSIKO, a kingdom of Africa, bounded on the west by the river Umbre which runs into the Zaire, the kingdom of Wangua, and the Amboes who bordered on Loango; on the N. by some deserts of Nobia: and on the S. by Songo and Sonda, province of Congo. Here are great numbers of wild beasts, as lions, rhinoceroses, &c. and many copper mines. The king of Ansiko, or the great Macoco, commands 13 kingdoms, and is esteemed the most powerful monarch in Africa. The inhabitants of Angola have a tradition, that this is the proper country of the Giagas, who came originally from Sierra Leona, and over-ran, like a torrent, the whole coast as far as Benguela; that, being weakened by numerous battles, and unable to force the defiles in order to return to Jierra Leona, they arrived on the borders of Monomotapa, where being defeated, they were forced to remain in the provinces of Ansiko. Be this as it will, the Ansikans yield not in the least to the Giagas in fierceness and barbarity. They are so accustomed to the eating of human flesh, that it is asserted they have markets where it is publicly sold, and that there are no other graves for the dead than the bellies of the living. They try the courage of their prisoners of war by shooting at them as at marks, directing their arrows above or around their heads; and whoever discovers the least signs of fear, is immediately devoured without remedy. Those who appear intrepid and resolute, have their noses and ears boared, and two fore-teeth of the upper jaw drawn. They are then improved in barbarity, by accustoming them to the most horrid cruelties.

A N

The Ansikans are neat, well-proportioned and strong; wandering about from place to place, without either sowing or reaping. They are dreaded for their extreme brutality, and never traded with by the Europeans. Their language is barbarous, and difficult to be learned, even by the inhabitants of Congo. The most distinguished among them wear red and black caps of Portuguese velvet; the lower ranks go naked from the waist upwards; and, to preserve their health, anoint their bodies with a composition of pounded white sandal-wood, and palm-oil. Their arms are battle-axes, and small but very strong bows adorned with serpents skins. Their strings are made of supple and tender shoots of trees, that will not break, and their arrows of hard and light wood. These people, who kill birds flying, shoot with such surprising swiftness that they can discharge 28 arrows from the bow before the first falls to the ground. With equal dexterity they manage their battle-axes; one end of which is sharpened and cuts like a wedge, and the other flattened like a mallet, with an handle set between, about half the length of the iron, rounded at the end like an apple, and covered with the skin of a serpent. The current money in this country is the zimbis or shell, which is fished for, and passes among several African nations. They worship the sun as their chief deity; whom they represent by the figure of a man, and the moon by that of a woman. They have also an infinite number of inferior deities, each individual having a particular idol whom he addresses on certain occasions.

ANSLO, ASLO, or OPSLO, a town of Aggerfherred, a district in Aggerhuus diocese, belonging to Norway. It is situated in a bay, and subject to Denmark. It was taken and burnt by the Danes in 1135, and was taken by the Swedes in 1307. Its bishop is under the archbishop of Drontheim. See AGGERHUUS, ASLO, or OPSLO. It lies 100 miles N. of Gottenburg. Lat. 59, N. Lon. 10, 12, E.

ANSON, an inland county of North Carolina, without any town. It has the old boundary line of South Carolina on the south, on the west the Catabaw nation, on the north Mecklenburg county, and on the east the counties of Cumberland and Bladen.

ANSPACH, ONSPACH, OHNSPACH, or ONOLTZBACH (marquissate of) a secular territory belonging to the circle of Franconia in Germany, subject to a branch of the family of Brandenburg, and situated in the South part of the circle, between the bishoprics of Bamberg, Wurtzburg, and Aichstadt, and the counties of Hohenloe and Oettingen, having the domain of the Teutonic order, and bishopric of Wurtzburg, to the West part of the bishopric of Bamberg, on the North and East, and the circle of Swabia on the South. According to

Moll this marquisate extends 32 miles from S.E. to N.W. and about 20 where broadest; some make it 70 from E. to W. and 60 from N. to S. but others only 45 miles long and 16 broad. This diversity in the account of its dimensions arises from its being so intermixed with other dominions that it is hard to determine them exactly. It is divided into four bailiwicks, namely, Anspach, Schwabach, Koninshheim, and Uspenheim. It is a fruitful country, and beautifully interspersed with woods, which renders it a fine country for hunting. Its revenue is said to bring in 500,000 crowns a year to its sovereign, one of the most considerable princes in Germany, under the degree of an elector, who is a Lutheran.

ANSPACH, the capital of the last-mentioned marquisate of the same name, called in Latin Anspachium, Ompachium, Onoldium, and Onoldina. It is a small but pretty town, very well built, with several churches. It has no fortifications, and is only surrounded with walls which form a kind of bulwark. A large palace is lately erected here for the prince, upon a magnificent plan. The late margravine dowager, who carried it on after her husband's death, and caused some fine gardens to be laid out, spared no cost for the embellishing of this town. In the palace is a cabinet of fine curiosities, particularly the stories in Ovid's Metamorphoses done in wax. In this town are good manufactures, which were erected both here and at Schwabach, and give no small uneasiness to the city of Nuremberg, from which it lies 20 miles to the S.W. and is subject to its own marquis. ANSTRUPPEN, a village remarkable for an excellent medicinal spring, in the district of Piltzen, belonging to the duchy of Courland, Poland.

ANSTRUTHER EASTER, ANSTRUTHER WESTER, or EAST and WEST ANSTER-RÜDBER, commonly ANSTER. They are two royal burghs of Fifeshire, in Scotland, on the coast of the frith of Forth. They lie about half a mile asunder. These are the second and third in the district of five burghs (the others being Pittenweem, Kraithe, and Kilrenny) which send alternately a member to the British parliament. Anstruther Wester stands about a mile from Pittenweem, eight miles S. of St. Andrew's, and 25 N. E. of Edinburgh, in Lat. 56, 40, N. Long. 2, 25, W.

ANTANDROS, a city on the S. coast of Phrygia the Less, in Asiatic Turkey, situated E. of Ados, and at the bottom of the gulph of Adramyttum. It was formerly possessed by the Cimmerians, and from them it had the name of Cymmeris, and since that of Adonis, and more recently St. Dimitri. It stands at the foot of Mount Ida, and was the see of a bishop, one of whose prelates, namely, Zozimus, subscribed to the council of Constantinople, and to the fifth general council.

ANTE, one of the eleven different countries along the Gold-coast, in Guinea Proper, in Africa. It contains several towns or villages lying on the sea-shore, both under and between the forts of Europeans; their greatest and most populous towns lying generally more inland. Its bounds and extent, together with those of the rest, cannot be exactly ascertained.

ANTE, a river of France, in the government of Normandy, which, rising beyond Falaise, after a course of four miles, mingles its waters with those of the river Vire.

ANTEGO, ANTEGUA, or ANTIGUA, one of the Caribbee or Leeward islands, in the Atlantic-ocean. It lies E. of Nevis and St. Christopher's, and about forty miles N. of Guadaloupe. It is situated in Lat. 16, 57, N. Long. 60, 50, W. It is almost of a circular form, being about 20 miles long from E. to W. about the same breadth from N. to S. and nearly equal in circumference to that of St. Christopher's, which is 75 miles. Antego is more noted for good harbours than all the islands belonging to the British government in these seas; yet it is so encompassed with rocks that it is of dangerous access in many parts of it, especially to such as are unacquainted with the proper inlets between them; for besides those rocks, which lie on every side of the island, is a ledge all along its N. side, near two miles from the shore. But there are several channels to go in between, and in some places over them, by the direction of skilful pilots.

Five-Island harbour, on the W. side of Antego, so called from that number of islands lying to the W. of it, is wide, and goes a great way in land: for this reason it has the name of a harbour, though it hardly deserves it, being so full of dangerous rocks, shoals, riffs, and uncertain depths, which render it a very difficult place: yet, to such as are acquainted with it, it is of great service in cases of distress; and in N. and E. winds here is shelter enough. Here is likewise an oyster-creek, and another at the bottom of the bay, which might, on many occasions, be made useful for small vessels.

St. John's-harbour, due N. from the former, and about two miles from it by land, is a sort of double harbour, being indeed the best in the whole island, and the most used: yet across its mouth lies a sandy bar, which runs from the N. point of the entrance, where the fort stands, and stretches S.W. to the opposite point. On this bar is no more than two fathoms and a half of water, and on the N. point only two fathoms; so that the deepest part is at the S.W. end; wherefore ships come in under the S. shore, from that called Shipstern-point, to the bar; all which shore is bold and and clean. Besides the fort here at the mouth of St. John's-river, mounted with fourteen guns, there are seven other batteries raised, for the defence of a like number of landing-places, which in all are mounted with 26 guns.

Nonsuch-harbour lies in a spacious bay at the E. end of the island. The best way into this is between the Green island on the S. and the S. point of the harbour, called Hungry hill, where it is five fathoms water almost the whole way. But in the entrance on the N. side of Green island the road is foul and rocky; and not above six to eight fathoms water in the channel, except in one place, which is very difficult.

Willoughby-bay, lying near two leagues S. E. from Green-island, has a very wide entrance, little less than a league over: but above two-thirds of it is blocked up with a shoal or sand, stretching from the N. point directly to the S. point; from whence another sand, called Sandy-point, with an island in it, stretches off as if it would meet the first, and block up the harbour. Between these, however, is an open channel, where ships of good burthen may enter; and, when in, may have very good riding almost every where, except in the very entrance: and on the larboard-side is a little shoal, called the Horse-shoe; but it is generally above the water, and plainly to be discerned by the rippling of the sea.

From hence to the S. W. lie English and Falmouth harbours: English-harbour is the rendezvous and store-house for the king's ships on the Leeward-island station, and where is every requisite for refitting them except docking, and on this account is well fortified. Falmouth-harbour, at the bottom of which is the town of the same name, is defended by Fort-Charles, and that called Monk's-hill-fort, in which is a magazine of 410 muskets and 800 bayonets, and mounted with 30 pieces of ordnance.

The climate of Antego is hotter than that of Barbadoes, and very subject to hurricanes. The soil is light and sandy; but notwithstanding that it is fertile to a high degree, much of it is over-grown with wood. But the worst of it is, that Antego has no rivulets of fresh water, and very few springs (though lately some of these last have been discovered); which circumstance made it be looked upon as uninhabitable for a long time: but now they save with great care what water falls by rain from the skies in ponds and cisterns for the purpose, by which means they are seldom in great distress for want of water: and when they are, they fetch it from the neighbouring islands: yet notwithstanding all these inconveniences it is a thriving and very considerable plantation. Its product is much the same with that of the other Caribbee islands. Sugar, tobacco, indigo, and ginger, were its principal commodities when it was first planted: But the two last articles are now seldom cultivated. And in short it may be said, that it yields no other commodity of consequence but what is derived from the sugar-cane. The sugar of Antego was at first so black and coarse that our sugar-bakers not deigning to put it into their coppers, it was generally shipped off for Holland and Hamburgh, where it fetched but 16s. a hundred, when other Muscovado sugar fetched 18s. or 19s. But the planters here have, since that time, improved their art so far, that as good Muscovado sugar is now made in Antego as in any of the sugar-islands; and they have also learned the art of claying it.

This island contains about 70,000 acres; and, one year with another, yields 16,000 hogheads of sugar; but it does not make quite half that quantity of rum; though it is supposed, that, upon proper encouragement, the product of the former might be enlarged one-fifth part; and that of the latter near one-half.

On Antego are vast plenty of fowl and black cattle; and on its coast and in the country it has most of the animals which are common to the other islands.

In 1707 the people here were reckoned to be about 8000 whites, which are now but 7000, besides thrice that number of blacks, now but 20,000. The men introlled in the militia is no more than 1500. Nevertheless the island is rich; and though the forts are not so strong, nor the inhabitants so numerous as in other islands, yet the French, who have often threatened, have not lately been able to disturb it.

This island is divided into five parishes, four of which are towns; namely, on the N. W. part of the island, St. John's-town, the capital of Antego, near the harbour of the same name. It consists of about 200 houses. On the S. side are Falmouth, Parham, and Bridge-town; and St. Peter's almost in the center of the island.

This island is said to have been first discovered by the English, in the time of Sir Thomas Warner (see St. Christopher's), and almost as soon as that island, and some English families settled on it in 1636. And, according to father Tertre, in his history of the Antilles, the savages in 1640, killed 50 English here, and among others carried off the governor's lady. Nay, so precarious was their settlement, that the French intended to have possessed themselves of this island, after the Spaniards had driven them out of St. Christopher's, had they not afterwards recovered their part of that island.

The first grant of it from the crown was by Charles II. about the year 1663, to William lord Willoughby of Parham; and a colony was planted here about 1666 by this nobleman, who was made governor of the Caribbee-islands, and was killed the

the same year in a hurricane near Martinico. The aforesaid father Tertre says, that before the war betwixt England and France in that reign, several French, withdrawing from Guadaloupe to this island, lived here amicably with the English, till the arrival of one Mr. Henry Willoughby, who, being irritated at the miscarriage of his design upon St. Christopher's, landed at Antego, treated the French severely, and obliged most of them to swear fealty to the king of Great-Britain; but that some of them making their escape, prevailed on the French at Guadaloupe to attack this island, which they told them was then very weak. Whereupon, in 1666 they came with eight ships of force under English colours, and, landing by surprise, soon took the forts in the road, and made the governor prisoner, besides a great slaughter committed among the English, who at length agreed to surrender the island upon terms: but at this very juncture a reinforcement of English arriving from Barbadoes hindered the execution of the capitulation. Upon this Monf. de la Barre, lieutenant-general of the French islands, joined by the governors of Martinico, Guadaloupe, Mary-gallante, and the intendant of the French West-India company, landed in December 1677, when one Mr. Fish was governor here, and obliged the English to make good the agreement.

Yet after all it does not appear that Antego made any considerable figure among the Leeward-islands till the year 1680: and its improvements since, both in stock and commerce, have been mostly owing to the care and interest of colonel Christopher Codrington, deputy-governor of Barbadoes, who removed hither, and, after planting a good part of it, made this island the seat of his government when he was captain-general and general governor of all the Leeward islands: upon which this island flourished, and became populous and wealthy. It suffered much by a terrible hurricane in 1681, and by another in 1689, most of the houses, buildings, sugar-works, and wind-mills, for that purpose being of stone, were thrown down. The Indians of the neighbouring islands, in league with the French, came hither in their periaguas, and landed more than once in general Codrington's time; but after killing a few people that lived near the sea, they always ran away.

In the year 1706 colonel Parks, of Virginia, came over to the Leeward-islands, with a commission to succeed Sir William Mathews in the government of them, and made Antego the seat of it. On the tragical death of colonel Parks, in December 1710, who was seized and murdered by the planters, the government of the Leeward-islands fell of course to Walter Hamilton, esq. lieutenant-governor of Nevis, then lieutenant-general of the Leeward-islands; but in 1712 he was succeeded by Walter Douglas, esq. who suspended him from the exercise of all his offices. Upon this Mr. Hamilton came to England, where, joining his interest with that of the complainants in Antego against the person who had suspended him, he prevailed to be restored, and returned hither in 1715.

During all this time the Leeward-islands were not without their usual hurricanes; of which a dreadful one happened in the year 1707, that did great damage to all of them; but to Antego and Nevis more than any. The people, however, were now at leisure to follow their trade and planting, being no longer disturbed by the quarrels and contests betwixt the governors and the governed, till October 1736, when a general stop was put to all business, occasioned by the happy discovery of an infernal plot by the negroes of this island, not only to subvert the government, but to murder all the white inhabitants. This was to have been put in execution on the 11th of the same month, being the anniversary of his late Majesty's coronation, at which time the general usually treats the gentlemen and ladies of the whole island with a ball; but it happened then to be put off till the 30th, on account of the death of the general's son at St. Christopher's, and this proved the saving of their lives. The principal negroes in this horrid conspiracy were Court, Tomboy, and Hercules, who belonged to three different planters. The first of them was to have been king, and the other two his generals. During the intended ball, some gunpowder was to have been conveyed into the cellar, in order to have blown up the house. At the same time king Court and his two generals were to head a party of 400 men each, one from the east end of St. John's town, and the two others from Otter's and Morgan's pastures, all armed with cutlasses; and to fall on all the white men, women, and children in the town, without reserve or mercy, at the same time that the house blew up; which was to have been a general signal to other parts of the island, and notice to be conveyed throughout the whole, by fires which were to be made on certain eminences: then the negroes of the several plantations were to rise and destroy all the whites in their respective districts, and to have made themselves masters of the island. The three chiefs were broke on the wheel, and many others were executed in a different manner.

Antego is now the residence of an English governor, who has this and all the other Leeward islands belonging to Great-Britain under his management, and has the title of captain-general and governor in chief of all the Caribbee-islands from Guadaloupe to Porto Rico. His place is worth about 3500*l.* a year; and under him each island has its particular deputy-governor and its separate independent legislature, consisting of a council and an assembly of 24 members. It is divided into 11 districts, districts, of which 10 send 2 members each, and St. John's 4. The number of vessels which enter yearly is about 300. In 1770 they exported to the value of 446,000*l.* sterling, including 500*l.* cotton, the rest sugar, molasses, and rum.

ANTEMNÆ. We read in ancient Roman historians that the inhabitants of this city joined Acron, king of the Cænina, against the Romans, after the rape of the Sabine virgins. It is probable, therefore, that these people were either subject to the Sabines, or were their neighbours. Some geographers think Antemnæ stood on the Tiber, between the Tibertine and Normantine ways.

ANTEQUERA, or ANTEQUIERA, in Latin Antichera; supposed to be the Singilium of Pliny, and the Antiquaria of Antoninus's Itinerary. It is a genteel and large town of Granada, in Spain; though some place it in the kingdom of Seville. It is pleasantly situated on the banks of the Rio de la Villa, i. e. the river of the city; part of the town being built in a plain, and part of it on the hills at the foot of three mountains. It has long, broad, and beautiful streets, with the houses well-built. It is surrounded with good strong walls, has six gates, and at one end of it stands upon an eminence a fortified old castle. It contains 7000 families in six parishes, one of which is collegiate, with eleven monasteries, seven nunneries, eleven chapels, and three free-schools, besides a fine hospital for foundlings. Near the town is a famous salt-pit, which, according to a Geographical System, is three miles in length, and near two in breadth, and supplies the whole territory with that necessary article. About eight or ten miles from the town is a spring, the waters of which dissolve the stone, and bring it away by urine. Hence there is so great a resort to it that a small town has since been built about it, and is called by the name of that spring. Another great rarity near this city is a large parcel of high rocks, called El Torcal, which, at a distance, exhibit the representations of men, beasts, buildings, &c. and this is justly esteemed a surprising work of nature. Besides all these, here are still to be seen the subterraneous caverns of Merga and Camorra, which are the very mines formerly dug and carried on under ground a great way by the Romans; and from which they drew such immense quantities of precious metals. These caverns are so artfully arched and propped that one may run over them from end to end with pleasure, and without any danger. This city is besides famous for the stout defence which it made under the Moors, and the stratagem they used in order to set fire to some of the enemy's warlike engines; though this only served to prolong their misery, and make it fall the heavier upon them. Antequera lies 25 miles N. of Malaga, 220 leagues S. of Madrid, and about 15 in the same direction from the sea. Lat. 36, 40, N. Long. 4, 40, W.

ANTHIOCO, or ANTIOCHO, (St.) one of the larger islands to the S. of the Italian-sea, among the many small ones which lie round its island and kingdom of Sardinia. It is situated on the S. W. coast, and 4 miles from it. It is about 30 miles in circuit, and of a square figure; and within a few miles of the island of San Pietro.

St. ANTHONY, (Falls of) situated on the river Mississippi, in the Naudowessie country, North-America; Lat. 44, N. Long. 94, W. These falls received their name from father Louis Hennipin, a French missionary, who travelled into these parts about 1680, and was the first European ever seen by the natives. This amazing body of waters, which are from 250 to 300 yards over, form a pleasing cataract; they fall perpendicularly about 30 feet, and the rapids below in the space of 300 yards more render the descent considerably larger; so that viewed at a distance they appear to be much higher than they really are, and is an excuse for the above-mentioned traveller laying them down at above 60 feet fall. In the middle of the fall stands a small island, about 40 feet broad and somewhat longer, on which grow a few cragged hemlock and spruce trees, and about half way between this island and the eastern shore is a rock lying at the very edge of the fall, in an oblique position, that appeared to be about 5 or 6 feet broad and 30 or 40 long. These falls you may approach without finding the least obstruction from any hill or precipice.

ANTIBARI, or ANTIVARI, in Latin Antibarum, or Antiparos; so called as lying opposite to Apulia, in the kingdom of Naples. It is a pretty strong town of Albania in European Turkey, according to Busching; but the System of Geography places it in Turkish Dalmatia, towards the limits of Servia and Bosnia; but adds, that it is on the borders of Albania, of which it is sometimes reckoned a part. It is situated on the Adriatic gulph, and but thinly peopled, standing upon a hill, at the foot of which is the harbour. Under the first kings of Dalmatia it was a considerable archbishopric, the metropolitan of which had the first rank among the prelates of that kingdom. After the declension of that monarchy it fell under the dominion of the Venetians, and was unsuccessfully besieged by the Turks in the year 1538; but they afterwards took it from that republic in 1573. The Venetians having laid siege to it in the year 1648, were obliged to withdraw from it without being able to master it; so that the Turks are still in possession of this place. It lies 10 miles W. of Dalcigno, and 25 S. E. of Badon. Lat. 42, 10, N. Long. 19, 42, E.

ANTIBES, in Latin Antipolis, one of the oldest towns in the government of Provence, in France, situated on the confines of the country of Nice, and belongs to the jurisdiction of Grasse, in the provincial vincial bailiwick of the latter name. It was founded by the inhabitants of Marseilles, and in time became a considerable city: it was formerly a bishop's see, which was afterwards removed to Grasse. In spiritual matters, however, it is still governed by a vicar, with episcopal jurisdiction here, independent of the officiality of Grasse. In 1746 it was besieged in vain by the Allies. It stands in a very fruitful country, is defended by a castle or good citadel, and has a pretty convenient harbour, though only for vessels of a middling magnitude. Here are two convents, and several remains of Roman antiquities. A sort of small sardels, or anchovies, are very nicely pickled and prepared in this place. It lies two leagues E. of Grasse, the same from Venice, and 15 miles S. of Nice, in Lat. 43, 34. N. Long. 7, 15. E.

ANTICOSTI, by the savages called Naticotec; and Cartier, from the solemnity of the day on which he arrived at it, gave it the name of L'Isle de l'Assomption. The name of Anticosti however seems to have been also given it by the English, and it seems at the same time to insinuate the prior possession of that nation; and by this name it is commonly known. It is an island of Canada, in North America, lying in the mouth of the river St. Lawrence. It extends itself about forty miles N. E. and S. W. almost in the middle of the river; but has very little breadth. It is badly wooded, and has not a single harbour where a vessel may lie in safety. On the coasts of the island are fish enough. On the South point of Anticosti, and along that coast, are breakers caused by rocks which line it on that side; and there is also such a strong current, that a ship upon tacking will not run to windward. The island is situated in lat 50 deg. 30 min. long. 64 deg. 16 min. W.

ANTIGNANA, or ANTINJANA, a pretty large town, seated on a mountain in the duchy of Carniola-Austria. It contains four churches, and has one lying before the town, but is not very populous.

ANTIGNE, a town of France in the generality of Poitiers and election of Fontenoy.

ANTIGNY, a town of France in the generality of Bourges.

ANTIGONIA, a city founded by Antigonus, one of the successors of Alexander the Great, in Upper Syria, in the neighbourhood of Orontes, which he designed for the capital of his empire. But after Antigonus was slain in the battle of Ipsus, Seleucus razed it to the ground, employing the materials and its inhabitants to build and people his own new metropolis of Antioch. See ANTIOCH.

ANTILLES Islands, lying in form of a bow or semicircle, extend almost from the coast of Florida N. to that of Brasil S. in America. By some these islands are called Caribbees, but this appellation most geographers confine to the Leeward Islands; which last are distinguished by sailors into the Windward and Leeward Islands; and that with a view to the usual course of European ships, either from Old Spain or the Canary Islands, to Carthage or New Spain and Porto-Bello, in which course of sailing they must pass between some or other of the Antilles: and all these, both in geographical tables and maps are usually distinguished into the Great and Little Antilles, or Ant-isles. Besides their aborigines or original natives they are commonly inhabited by English, Spaniards, French, or Dutch; yet those inhabited among them are not all planted and cultivated; and some are quite desolate.

The islands, which go by the name of Great Antilles, and indeed the only ones so denominated by Acosta, are the four islands of Cuba, Jamaica, Hispaniola or St. Domingo, or Porto Rico, together with some smaller islands dependent on these respectively: all which, and their circumjacent isles, see under the proper word of each. See also CARIBBEES.

ANTIN, a duchy and peerage belonging to the district of the Plains, a subordinate division of the territory and ancient viscounty of Conserans, in Lower Armagnac, a subdivision of Gascony, which is the S. part of the government of Guyenne, in France.

ANTINOE, or ANTINOPOLIS, a city in Egypt, on the Nile, built or repaired by the emperor Hadrian, in honour of his favourite Antinous. It was the capital of Thebais, if we believe Palladius, an author of the fourth century. It was anciently called Befai, which was the name of the god worshipped there: Casauban assures us of this. Heladius, who was born there, joined the ancient and modern name together, and called it Befantinous. Palladius adds, that it was so well inhabited as to have twelve monasteries of women. Ammienus Marcellinus represents it as one of the three most famous cities of Thebais. As it is evident this city was seated on the banks of the Nile, we may thence conclude that the ruins, according to Moreri, which are to be seen 10 leagues from the Nile, are not those of Antinopolis; and we may conclude with more certainty against the ruins of a city which Baudrand has placed 49 leagues from that river. Gemelli says, the great renown of this city appears by its ruins and vast pillars, one of which is not much less than Pompey's. In this city Dioclesian martyred 160,000 Christians, and Nestorius was confined to it by order of the first council of Ephesus.

ANTIO, ANZIO, or TORRE DI CAPO D'ANZIO, a promontory in the campania of Rome, a province of the Ecclesiastical State, in the middle division of Italy. It has this name given it by the Italians, from the ruins of the ancient city of Antium; which see.

Italians,

ANTIOCH, in Latin Antiochia Pisidia, in contradistinction to the city of the same name in Syria. It is situated in Pisidia, a subdivision of Caramania, the fourth province of Asia Minor, belonging to the Turkish empire. It was the capital of this province under the Romans, and likewise called Casarea: but it is now reduced, like the other places of Asia, to a very mean town. The Turks give it the name of Versagelli, or Antachio. It is mentioned in Acts xiii. 14. on account of St. Paul's arrival there. The Notitiæ Imperii mention it as an episcopal see; and in ecclesiastical history we find the names of several of its prelates, particularly Pergamus, who was one of those that subscribed to the council of Chalcedon. It must here be observed, that many cities had this name, not only in Asia Minor, but in other Asiatic provinces: and two even in Pisidia; the one situated on the N. of Lydia; the other on the S. of it, nearer to Seleucia. But as many of them have scarcely any thing more left than their names, the only one of note which we shall mention is the following.

ANTIOCH, ANTIOCHIA, surnamed the GREAT, and by the Greeks called Epidaphne, from the oracle and grove of Apollo at Daphne, a small city in its neighbourhood. It was formerly the metropolis of Syria, and belongs to that subdivision called Cælo-Syria, in Asiatic Turkey. It is now called Antackia by the Turks, who have reduced it to a poor condition in comparison of what it formerly was when the seat of the kings of Syria. It is situated on the Ilasi, the ancient Orontes; which river widens its stream gradually as it approaches the city, so as to be of a considerable breadth before it. It has a delightful appearance, when one comes to it on that river, and to view at some distance a city in a forest, or a forest in a city, on account of the vast number of plantanes, poplars, sycamores and other trees growing in and about it, as well as those fruit-trees to be seen in the gardens and other uninhabited parts of this town.

Antioch is remarkable for its extraordinary situation as well as for having been one of the most considerable cities of the East. It was the residence of the Macedonian kings of Syria for several hundred years, and afterwards of the Roman governors of that province; so that it was called the Queen of the East. It is also remarkable in ecclesiastical history for being the see of the great patriarchate of the East, in which St. Peter first sat; it was here that Barnabas and Paul separated for the work of the Gospel, the latter embarking for Cyprus. This city is often mentioned in the Acts of the Apostles, and particularly that the disciples of Christ were here first named Christians; so that it was called the Eye of the Eastern Church: and principally on account of that sacred name given them, the emperor Justinian, who repaired Antioch after it had been destroyed by fire, called it Theopolis, i. e. The city of God. It was at this place that the great and unfortunate Germanicus sunk under the jealousy of Tiberius, who made use of Piso to poison him. Many emperors, when they came into the East, passed a considerable time in this city; and Lucius Verus in particular spent four summers at Daphne, near this place, passing his winters at Antioch and Laodicea. It was made the residence of the præfecti prætorii Orientis; once the seat of learning and politeness, and has been adorned with vast numbers of magnificent structures, now all in ruins. The exact situation of the city is still to be seen; because the old walls are standing, and some of them, built with the greatest strength, perfectly entire, though a great part of them has been very much shattered by earthquakes, which have been very terrible and frequent at this place. Antioch was situated on the summit and the N. side of two hills, and on the plain lying to the N. of them, which is between the hills and the river, and was about four miles in circumference. Pliny says that it was divided by the river Orontes, from which one would conclude that there was a suburb to the N. of the river, of which there are now no vestiges. The hill to the S. W. is high and very steep; that to the E. is lower, and there is a very small plain on the top of it.

The walls are built along the height of the hills; and to the S. where there is no descent, the approach is rendered difficult by a deep fosse. These hills are divided by a very deep narrow bed of a mountain torrent, across which a wall is built, at least sixty feet high; it had an arch below to let the water pass, which is in part built up, so that a great body of water often lies against the wall. It is called the Iron-gate, which name it might have from some grates or fences of iron to the arch, by which the water passed under it. About half way upon each side of the wall, there is a walk from the road on the hills. The eastern passage seems to have served for an aqueduct, for on the other side there are signs of a stone channel from it; and here the water of the lower aqueduct seems to have passed. This wall is a most extraordinary building, by which the two hills are joined for 60 feet at least, above the bed of the torrent that divides them; and the city-walls are carried from it up the steep hills in a most surprising manner; but though they are built on a rock, and with the utmost art, yet they could not withstand the shocks of so many great earthquakes that have happened. However, on the W. side of the western hill, the wall is built up the steep ascent in such a manner, that it hath resisted both both time and earthquakes: it is exceedingly strong, and well built of stone, with beautiful square towers at equal distances, which consist of several stories, and yet there is not the least breach, nor a sign of any; and from this one may judge how beautiful all the walls must have been. There were no battlements to the wall, but there was a walk on the top of it; and when there was any ascent the top of the wall was made in steps, so that they could go all round the city on the walls with the greatest ease; and it is probable there were such steps also on the walls which were built up the very steep precipices from the iron gate, where all is now in ruins; and by this wall of communication they, without doubt, went from one hill to the other. The S. side of the western hill might be assaulted with the greatest ease, though defended by fosses, and the walls there had been much repaired; those on the plain to the W. are defended by a deep bed of a winter-torrent. These walls must have been destroyed and entirely rebuilt; for they are of stone and brick, and probably were a Roman work: the towers are very high, but the greatest part of the walls are fallen down, and lie in large fragments on the ground, which demonstrate that the shock must have been great that overturned them. The wall to the N. is at some little distance from the river: the towers are about 70 paces asunder; and being near the river, and consequently not on so good a foundation as the others, one may see they have often been repaired. From these walls, which still retain their ancient circuit, we may observe that Antioch was 10,000 paces in compass, and situated partly on flat and partly on high grounds, on the latter of which was built most of its stately structures. It is remarkable, that within the thickness of the walls, at a certain place, is a space left open, and with a gradual and imperceptible ascent, by which any loaded carriages may easily be drawn from the bottom of the wall quite up to the castle. It is said that this city, which was about four miles in circumference, was built at four different times, and consisted in a manner of four cities, divided from one another by walls: the first was built by Seleucus Nicanor, and inhabited by the people brought from Antiochia. This was probably built on the high western hill, taking in the foot of it, so as that the wall might be so far above the plain as to receive some strength from that situation; and there are remains of the foundations of very thick walls by the roads which lie near the bottom of the hill. The second was built by those who came to dwell in this city, after the building of the first; for the people must necessarily have flocked to this place, when it became the residence of the kings of Syria. This probably was built between the hill and the river, being in all likelihood inhabited by merchants and tradesmen, to whom the neighbourhood of the river must be very convenient. The third city was built by king Seleucus Callinicus, possibly on the other hill. The fourth was the work of Antiochus Epiphanes, king of Syria, which might be in the plain between that hill and the river. The present town, which is about a mile in circumference, stands on the plain within the walls, being converted into gardens. The old city being composed in a manner of four cities had the name of Tetrapolis.

There are very little remains within the city of any ancient buildings. The high hill has three summits, and is divided into three parts, by shallow beds of winter-torrents; the middle summit is the highest. To the E. of that is another summit, on which are considerable remains of a castle; there are semicircular turrets in the front of it, which is to the W. At the N. E. corner there are remains of a bagnio, and the castle is built with vaults under it, which might serve as cisterns for the rain-water. They had also another provision for water, which is a round basin, between the castle and the middle summit; it is 53 paces in diameter, and is now eight feet deep, though doubtless the ground has risen. It is built of stone and brick, like the walls. There is an entrance to it to the S. W. with a round tower on each side of it, from which entrance there must have been a descent by steps. They have a tradition, that the Roman emperors used to divert themselves here in boats. Near the foot of this hill, in the present town, are remains of the front of a large building of brick, which they call Prince, and say it was the palace of the emperors; and they have a tradition, that a passage went to it from the castle, to give immediate notice of any thing that might happen. The architecture of it seems to be of the fourth or fifth century.

The aqueducts are the principal works of antiquity. Near the eastern part of the town there are indeed several springs, and particularly some within the E. gate, called Bablous, which may be a corruption from Babylon, this being the gate that leads that way: but the higher parts of the town were to be supplied with water, and the whole plain also below, concerning which the ancients were very provident, and spared no expence. The water of the aqueduct was conducted from a place called Battelma, about four or five miles distant, in the way to Latichea. Here the water flows out of the hill in great abundance, and turns several mills. Art had been used to bring other springs to it, for at that place were channels of hewn stone, which served for that purpose; it was then carried towards Antioch in the same manner. There is reason to think that all the springs are at some little distance, and conveyed to that place in channels; for it falls down like a cascade from its own bed into a little narrow vale, extending towards the Orontes; and from this place a sufficient quantity city of it was carried by channels of hewn stone, under ground, along the side of the hill. It runs in this manner about a mile, and then going to a little valley, in which there is a small rivulet that comes from the mountains, the water was from thence conveyed on arches, which still remain. It is in the manner of the ancient aqueduct, called Pont du Garde, near Nîmes in France, but much inferior to it, for there is but one arch in each of the two lower stories; the uppermost arches of it are built of brick: the channel afterwards is carried along the side of the hill; and where any waters run, or there is any bed of a torrent, a single high arch is built over the narrow vale. There is one between this and the stream called Zoiba where is a very lofty arch; there are two more aqueducts between that and the town, each consisting of a small arch; and at the bed of the torrent, under the western wall, is one of five arches. The water then runs on the side of the hill under ground; and wherever is an easy ascent at the foot of the S.W. hill, there are several arches turned, which appear like small arched chapels, where were conduits, from which they drew water for the conveniency of several parts of the town. Farther to the east, where the hill is steep, a channel is cut along through the rock, about two feet wide, and four or five high, worked archways at top; and one may walk in it as in those at Fege, near Damascus. It continues along in this manner towards the iron gate; and having passed on some arches, the channel is cut in the same manner, on the side of the other hill. It is to be observed, that there was a lower aqueduct, probably built by the kings of Syria, before the higher aqueduct was begun, and it is possible that the latter might be built by the Romans. There are remains of the lower aqueduct near the fountain of Zoiba, about two miles lower S. W. of Antioch; the arches are low and ruinous; part of the lower aqueduct is seen over a hollow ground along the side of the hill, and at that valley where the aqueduct is built.

In all these places this lower aqueduct consists of one arch; and it probably extended to the iron-gate, which served for a conveyance for the water to the other hill; for below the iron-gate, to the N. W. there are ruins of three arches across the valley, which seem to have had other arches built on them; and it is probable there were three stories of arches, the uppermost joining the channels which are on the opposite sides of the hills.

As to sepulchral caverns, none are observed to the E. of the town: there are indeed some grottoes cut into the mountain, which might be for another use; and possibly it was the custom here to burn their dead after the Grecian manner. It is probable that in the ancient city they had large works under ground, to carry off the water that came from the mountains, after rain: and they might also have cisterns under their houses, to preserve the water after the Eastern manner: for now, after rains, the water runs into the streets of the city, like mountain-torrents.

The present city of Antioch is ill-built; the houses low, with only one story above ground; the roofs are almost flat, made of light rafters laid from one wall to another, and covered with thin tiles, which seem to be contrivances to make their houses above as light as possible, that, as they are laid on a bad foundation, they may not sink by the weight above; or, if they chance to be thrown down by earthquakes, that the people in them may not be crushed by the weight of the roof. The governor here has the title of waiwode, and is under the pasha of Aleppo, but is appointed from Constantinople.

There are only remains of three or four churches in Antioch. That of St. Peter and Paul is about a quarter of the way up the eastern hill; but there are very little remains of it. There are seen some pieces of a marble Mosaic pavement. It is probable that this was the patriarchal church; and they might be determined to build it in so inconvenient a place, from the tradition that St. Peter or St. Paul either lived or preached the Gospel there. It was built by the emperor Constantine; and in it were holden several eminent councils, particularly that of the dedication of it, at which all the bishops under the patriarchate of Antioch assisted, besides many other. It is very probable that the patriarchal palace was on the top of this hill, which is a fine level spot, and the whole hill might belong to the church; for on the side of it, towards the iron gate, is the church of St. John, which is hewn out of the rock, being a sort of grotto open to the west. There is no altar in it; but the Greeks, who have service there every Sunday and holiday, bring an altar to the church: and near it they bury their dead.

About half way up the S. W. hill, and almost opposite to the aqueduct that is below the iron-gate, is the church of St. George; the ascent to which is very difficult. The Greeks say this church belongs to them; but they permit the Armenians to make use of it. There are about 300 of the former, and 50 of the latter, in Antioch. No Christians till lately resided here since the city was destroyed, in 1269, by Bibars, sultan of Egypt, who demolished their churches, which, it is said, were the finest in the world; and he likewise put most of the inhabitants to death; for at that time they they were mostly Christians: insomuch that in the time of Justinian it was called Theopolis, for this or the above-mentioned reason. This city was under the Christians, concerned in the holy war, from 1097 to the time it was destroyed, when Aleppo began to flourish, and to be the great mart for the Eastern goods, as Antioch had been before. Another piece of antiquity is what they call the house of St. John Chrysostom, and of his father and mother. It is about twenty feet square; there is no entering it, by reason that a Mahometan family, with their women, live in it. It is built of brick, much in the same stile as the palace called Prince. They have a tradition, that this great man being chose patriarch of Constantinople, the people of Antioch would not consent he should accept of it, until the emperor made it his particular request to them.

The hills of Antioch are part of them of a crumbling stone, like verde antique.

Antioch was, for the first time, taken from the Greeks by Caliph Omar in the year 1038; and afterwards by the Turks under sultan Selim I. who drove the Mammeluc sultan of Egypt out of it, who had formerly taken it from the Croisaders; which last, under the conduct of the valiant Godfrey of Boulogne, began the conquest of the Holy Land by the city of Antioch. And it was on the bridge here over the Orontes or Hasi, that this prince distinguished himself so remarkably as to strike a general panic into the enemy that garrisoned the place, which surrendered immediately after. Antioch was then raised to a principality, and given to one Boemund, a Norman; and also prince of Tarentum, to whose valour the reduction of the city was principally owing. His successor held it till 1120, when it was made part of the kingdom of Jerusalem. At length the Turks made themselves masters of it in the year 1188, and have held it ever since.

The walls of Antioch were flanked with 400 square towers, well and strongly built; of which a good number are still standing; and in every one of them is a cistern in the middle, quite entire to this day.

Antioch is situated near the Levant, thirty miles south of Scanderoon, and about fifty-four west of Aleppo. Lat. 36, 15, N. Long. 37, 5, E.

ANTIOCHETTA, a city of Caramania, the fourth province of Asia Minor, belonging to the Turkish empire, in Asia, situated on the gulph of Satalia, in the Levant sea, and East of the city of Fournio Gotanto, the ruins of the ancient Myrra.

ANTIPACHSU, and PACHSU, anciently Paxi, or Paxæ, two small islands situated in that formerly called the Ionian sea, and lying near Greece, in European Turkey, between the islands of St. Maure and Corfu. They are subject to the republic of Venice.

ANTIPAROS, anciently Oliaros, an island of the Archipelago, in European Turkey. It lies about two miles west from Paros. It is rocky, about 16 miles in circuit, and flat; but in some places it has a fruitful soil, which is well cultivated, and produces as much barley as serves for 60 or 70 families inhabiting a small village, the only one upon the island, and about a mile from the sea. The port belonging to it is only practicable for small barks; but in the middle of the channel, between this island and Paros, is a depth of water sufficient for the largest vessels. This channel, which is not more than a mile broad between the rocks of Strongyle Dia or Naxia, and Despotico, both which lie a little on one side of its opening, is full of other small rocks that have no name. The only remarkable thing in the island of Antiparos is a surprising grotto, which is a master-piece of nature. This cavern is upwards of 40 fathoms high, and 30 broad, containing a great variety of figures in white transparent, and crystalline-form marble, which resemble all sorts of vegetables, several pillars, and a very fine pyramid of the same stone; all which concretions Tournefort takes to be lapideous plants. "The roof, where the dimensions of the grotto are as above, says that French author, is a pretty good arch; which, in several places, projects into large round knobs; some bristling with points like Jupiter's thunder-bolt; others regularly indented, from which hang grapes, festoons, and lances of a surprising length. On the right and left are natural curtains, which stretch out every way, and form on the sides a sort of fluted spires, like towers, mostly hollow, resembling so many little closets all round the grotto. Among these cabinets, one large pavilion is particularly remarkable; it is formed by productions, which so exactly represent the roots, branches, and heads of colly-flowers, that one would think that nature intended here to prove one of the important truths in natural philosophy, namely, the vegetation of stones. All these figures generally break obliquely, and in different strata or layers, like the lapis judaicus: and most of these pieces are even covered with a white incrustation or bark; and, when struck, will sound like copper." Antiparos is situated in Lat. 37, 40, N. Long. 25, 50, E.

ANTIPATRIS, a city built or rather re-built by Herod, and thus named by him in honour of his father Antipater, the place having been named Capharsalama. It is mentioned in Acts xxiii. whence it is evident it could not stand far from Jerusalem in the road to Cæsarea.

ANTIQUERA, in Mexico. See GUAYACA.
ANTIR-

A N

ANTIRRHIUM, a promontory at the mouth of the Corinthian bay, where it is scarce a mile broad, and where it separates the Ætolians from the Peloponnesus; so called from its opposite situation to Rhium in Peloponnesus, both are now called the Dardanelles of Lepanto.

ANTIQUERA. See ANTEQUERA.

ANTISSA, a city in Lesbos. According to Strabo, it was anciently an island, and called Antissa, because it lay over against Lesbos, then known by the name of Issa. This city, having disoblged the Romans, was destroyed by Labeo, and the inhabitants transplanted to Methymna.

ANTIVARI. See ANTIBARI.

ANTIVETRIA, a subdivision of Terra Firma, a province of South America, and lying to the south of Carthage.

ANTIUM. See ANTIO and NETTUNO.

ANTOINE, St. a fort of Corunna, in Spain. See CORUNNA.

ANTIUM, ANTIA, a city of the Volsci, on the Tuican sea, yet without a harbour, because they had a neighbouring hamlet, called Ceno, with a harbour. The Romans gained their first reputation in naval affairs against the Antiates; part of whose ships they conveyed to the arsenal of Rome, and part they burnt, and with their beaks, or rostra, adorned the pulpit erected in the forum, thence called Rostra. Several colonies were successively sent thither. The epithet is Antianus, Antienfis, Antianus, and Antias, -atis; the people Antiates. Here stood a famous temple of Fortune. Addison says, there were two Fortunæ worshipped at Antium. The birth-place of Caligula and Nero; but, according to Pliny, the Ambiatinus Vicus was the birth-place of Caligula. It is now extinct, but the name still remains in the Capo d'Anzo.

ANTOCHIA AD TAURUM, a city in the province of Comagene, in Syria.

ANTONGIL, a large bay in the island of Madagascar, which is very safe for ships to ride in, and the land about it is remarkably fruitful.

ANTOINE, (St.) a village of Viennois, a territory belonging to the Lower Delphinat, in the government of Dauphiny, in France. It lies between two mountains, and owes its origin to the celebrated abbey, which is the principal and only foundation of the order of St. Antony in this country. In the year 1561 it was demolished by the Huguenots; but afterwards repaired.

ANTONIN, (St.) a little town of the lower marches of Rouergue, in the subdivision of that name, belonging to Guyenne Proper, in France, on the river Aveyron, and has a chapter and two convents. The principal trade which the inhabitants drive is in saffron, and fine large plums.

A N

ANTONIO, (St.) a small place of Biscay Proper, a subdivision of the province of Biscay, in Spain, situated on the sea, and has a harbour near a mountain of the same name.

ANTONIO, a mean place belonging to the duchy of Massa and Carrara, in Upper Italy, subject to the hereditary prince of Modena.

ANTONIO, after Simon had destroyed Mount Acra. See ARCA. He built fortifications round the mountain on which the temple stood, to secure it against insults from the heathens, within which he built a house to live in, which house seems to be the same that Hyrcanus made the castle Baris, where he and his successors of the Asmonean family dwelt and kept their court, and here laid up the pontifical stole, or sacred robes of the high priest, which continued to be done till Herod was made king of Judea; who, having observed the convenience of this place, built a very strong fortress upon it, and called it Antonio, in compliment to Marcus Antoninus, the triumvir, who at that time governed the Eastern provinces of the Roman empire. St. Paul made his speech to the Jews, who had attempted to kill him, from the steps which led up the mountain to the fortress, and which is contained in Acts, chap. xxii. This fortress was destroyed at the total destruction of Jerusalem, by Titus.

ANTONIO (St.) one of the Cape de Verd islands, on the Western coasts of Africa, 15 miles from St Vincent. It is full of high mountains, from whence proceed streams of excellent water, which render the land very fruitful. The principal town is seated among the mountains, and there are also some villages. Lon. 6. 26. E. Lat. 18. 10. N.

ANTONIO (St.), a Dutch fort in Axim, on the Gold-coast of Africa. It stands on a high rock, which projects into the sea in form of a peninsula; and is so environed by rocks and dangerous shoals as to be inaccessible to an enemy but by land, where it is fortified by a parapet, draw-bridge, and two batteries of heavy cannon. Besides this it has a battery towards the sea. The three batteries consist of 24 cannon. Its form is triangular; the building is neat, strong, and commodious for the extent, that being but small, on account of the narrowness of the rock on which it is built. The garrison is usually composed of 25 white men, and an equal number of negroes, under the command of a serjeant. It is maintained at the expence of the West-India Company; and, when well stored with provisions, is capable of making a long defence against any number of negroes. It is, however, as well as all other forts on this coast, liable to inconveniencies from the heavy and continual rains, which damage the walls, and render frequent quent reparations necessary. This obliges the Dutch always to keep ready a quantity of lime or cement made of calcined oyster-shells, of which the coast produces great numbers.

This settlement was first founded by the Portuguese during the reign of Emanuel. They fixed at first upon a small point; where finding themselves insecure, they built the fort where it now stands. They were driven out by the Dutch in 1642; and, upon the conclusion of a peace with the States-General, the fort remained by treaty in the hands of the Dutch West-India Company, who have kept possession of it ever since.

ANTONS-KLOSTER, St. in Russian Antonowski Gorka, i. e. the convent of St. Antony. It belongs to the circle of Novogrod, and government of Great Novogrod, in Russia, and is situated about two wersts from the town of Novogrod, upon the river Wolchow, and is the principal foundation in this country. Its founder, St. Antony, died and was buried here in the year 1147: and a mill-stone is shewn in this convent, upon which, according to the account of his votaries, he travelled hither from Rome; besides a cabbage, by which he is said to have supported himself during his whole journey, and yet it continued entire in his hand. Here also is shewn his monument.

ANTRAIN, or ENTRAIN, in Latin Interamnus, or Antranum, a small town belonging to the district of Donziviis, situated, according to Busching, in the government of Nivernois; but the Geographical System, together with our maps, make it a town of the bishopric of Rennes, in Upper Britany, in France, on the borders of Normandy, 15 miles south of Avranches, and lying on the river Cenesnon, 4 leagues from Dol to the north, as many from Fougères to the south, and 8 from Rennes. It is surrounded, according to Busching, with a lake; and is the seat of a castellany. Lat. 48, 22, N. Long. 1, 26, W.

ANTRIM, county of, the most N. E. in Ireland, bounded by that of Londonderry on the west, from which it is separated by the river Banne; by part of Armagh on the south, by the county of Down on the S. E. by the Deucalionian ocean on the north, and by St. George's channel on the east. It is one of the ten counties comprehended in the province of Ulster; is 46 miles long, and 27 broad; but of unequal dimensions both ways. The acres it contains are reckoned at about 383,000. The soil is pretty fruitful, and populous, mostly inhabited by Protestants; though encumbered with many large bogs and marshes, particularly towards the north. Antrim is subdivided into the following 9 baronies or smaller districts, namely, Bally-Cary, Dunlacy, Kilconway, Tome, Antrim, Glenarm, Carickfergus, Belfast, and Killallagh. This county sends ten members to the Irish parliament, namely, two for the county, and two for each of the towns of Lisburn, Belfast, Antrim, and Landalstown.

The large inland lake in this county called Lough-neagh, is remarkable for turning wood into stone; for such sort of petrified wood is frequently to be met with on its shore, and in no part of that wood is observed any external additament or accretion of matter joined to or settled upon it, but the heart and grain of the wood continue still the same: so that all the transmutation is made with regard to the gravity and thickness of the wood, the lapideous particles having prevailed and quite filled the pores of its substance. In the Hamburgh magazine may be seen a curious dissertation relating to the petrefactions of Lough-neagh, written by M. Simon.

On the coast of this county, as one comes from that of Londonderry, is a remarkable pile of rocks, which the country people fondly fancy to have been the works of giants; and for that reason it is called the Giants-causeway. It is eighty feet broad, and twenty feet high, above the rest of the strand, consisting of many thousand pillars, which stand most of them perpendicularly to the plane of the horizon, and so close to one another, that the blade of a knife can hardly be put in between them. The greatest part of these pillars are of a pentagonal or hexagonal figure; some heptagonal and octogonal, and yet almost every one of them is irregular, none of their sides being of equal breadth. They are from 15 to 24 inches diameter, and consist of several joints of different heights; one of them always concave, and the other convex in the middle. With regard to composition and figure, the stones pretty much resemble the entrochos and astroites, or lapis stellaris, and they come the nearest to the lapis basanus or basaltus. Yet some take them to be a kind of marble. When struck with another stone or an iron-bar, nothing resemble more the smell of burnt horn, than the strong offensive one which they emit. On this coast are many other such pillars. But whatever the country people may imagine, this causeway is evidently the work of nature, and runs from the bottom of a high hill into the northern ocean, no body knows how far. At low water, it is visible at least 600 feet in length, the breadth in its widest part being 240 feet, and in the narrowest 120. The height in some places is 36 feet, and in others about 15. The curious may see the account of this causeway at large, by Mr. Molineux, together with an accurate draught of it, in the Philosophical Transactions of London, Numb. 235 and 241: and in page 518 of Lowthorp's Abridgement, vol. II.. Hence the curious geographers may may have abundant matter for useful disquisition; and, among other problems, determine whether this rock in Antrim might not formerly have joined the opposite coast of Galloway or Kintyre, in Scotland, to Ireland, as it is the general opinion among philosophers that Calais and Dover were at some time one continued tract of dry land, till a disruption by an earthquake, or rather the violence of the sea, had gradually abraded the intermediate isthmus, where now runs the Pas de Calais, or Dover-strait. And it is to be observed, that the distance between Port Patrick in Scotland, and Carrickfergus in Ireland, is less, or much the same as that between Dover and Calais: and thus all Europe may at last be found to have been at some time one great continent; and consequently the peopling of its different parts westward be the more readily accounted for.

ANTRIM, a thriving little place belonging to the county of the same name, and province of Ulster, in Ireland, is a corporation and market-town, and the capital of Antrim, sending two members to the Irish parliament. It is pleasantly situated at the north end of Lough-neagh, upon both sides of that called the Six-mile water, joined by a handsome bridge. In this river is a harbour or pier only for boats. It lies 13 miles west of Carrickfergus. Lat. 54, 45, N. Long. 6, 26, W.

ANTWERP, (city of) by the natives called Anwerpen, by the French Anvers, and in Latin Antverpia, or Andoverpum. It is the capital of the marquisate of the same name, or improperly the marquisate of the Holy Empire, in the Austrian Netherlands. *See MARQUISATE. It stands in a low and fenny ground, on the east shore of the Scheld, and is surrounded by the province of Brabant. The city is built in form of a crescent on the river, which is here 20 feet deep. It is 400 yards in breadth; so that vessels of burthen can come up to the quay, and canals are cut through the town from the river, up which small vessels may be brought to their very doors. The city is surrounded with a fine wall, planted on each side of it with rows of trees, and walks between them broad enough for two coaches to go a-breast: so that one cannot imagine a more delightful prospect than in walking round these walls; one sees at every turn fresh objects of boroughs, towns, villages, country-seats, and, in short, the whole country round, finely planted with trees.

In this city are 22 public squares, 212 streets, (lanes and back-ways are no doubt included) all straight, broad, and the houses built high; the antiquity of which even adds to their beauty, as shewing what the city was at its first erection. Most of the houses have court-yards or areas within, and gardens behind. The principal street in Antwerp is called Mere, being well-paved, and so broad that six coaches may go a-breast in it, and the houses are generally of free-stone. At the head of the Mere is a fine brass crucifix, 33 feet high, on a marble pedestal, which was erected in the year 1633. Joining to this street is the exchange for merchants, from which Sir Thomas Gresham took the model of the Royal-exchange he erected in London; as did also the burghers of Amsterdam that of theirs, built in this last-mentioned city. The exchange of Antwerp has 4 spacious gates opposite to one another, and always open. The walks round it are supported by 43 pillars of blue marble, all engraved; but not two of them alike. This exchange is 180 feet long and 140 broad. Underneath are vaults or magazines, well stored with merchants goods; and above is an academy for painting, sculpture, architecture, and the mathematics. The building of this exchange cost the city of Antwerp 300,000 crowns; and indeed, upwards of 200 years ago, Antwerp was the greatest emporium or trading port on this side Europe; ships of the greatest burthen coming up to its quays, on the banks of the Scheld, as they do on the Thames at London. But upon the Seven United Provinces of Holland being declared a free state, and the navigation of the Scheld yielded to them by Spain, they built fort Lillo, about 7 miles below Antwerp, and on the narrowest part of the river, in order to hinder all ships from coming up, except such as paid them custom. And as Flushing, in the province of Zealand, is situated at the mouth of the river, the Dutch took effectual care to render the passage that way impracticable: so that now the trade has removed from Antwerp to Amsterdam, a town formerly very inconsiderable (See AMSTERDAM) but now one of the most flourishing in Europe for commerce. This loss of their trade put the merchants of Antwerp upon turning their heads to jewellery, painting, and banking; all which, particularly the last article, they have continued to this day in the highest perfection: for bills of exchange may be negotiated here for any sum, and to any part of Europe. And in queen Anne's war, the two brothers, De Koning, paid, the one the army of France, and the other that of the Confederates. On the Scheld, about 6 miles below Antwerp, is fort St. Mary, belonging to the house of Austria.

The great market-place, in which stands the town-house, is very spacious, and the scene of all public executions. In the year 1713 about 29 houses were pulled down, in order to widen this place, and render it the more beautiful. The town-house is a very good piece of architecture, and a large structure of free-stone, with a fine frontispiece, decorated with a variety of statues, a cupola, and an eagle at top. The house of the Hanse-towns, for the conveniency of the Eastern merchants from the Baltic, called Easterlings, and in the Flemish Oosterlingen, which was built when the trade of Antwerp flourished, namely, in the year 1568, is a square building of stone 230 feet, with magazines in the upper part for dry goods, and cellars below for wet. In the middle story, which has a gallery quite round the square, are 300 lodging-rooms for merchants: but now it is turned into a horse-bar-rack, the cellars of which serve for stables, and the rooms above for hay-lofts.

Antwerp

At Antwerp are seven gates, from each of which runs a long street, terminating at the cathedral, about the middle of the city. On the top of the gate which leads to the quay stands the statue of a giant with a gauntlet in his hand, and in a throwing attitude. And hence the origin, they say, of the name of this city; for the Antwerpers pretend, by a very high strain of derivation, that a giant, named Antigon, lived here, and cut off the hands of every stranger that fell in his way, and threw them into the river, werpen signifying to throw or sling, and ant, or ant, a hand; the very mention of which may seem to shew the ridiculousness of this and many other etymologies. This gate, as well as several others in this city, were designed by the famous painter and architect Sir Peter Paul Rubens, who was a native of Antwerp, and interred in St. James's church here.

The markets of Antwerp are at a proper distance from one another, each having a particular square or market-place. The fish-market by the river is very spacious; but the most curious among them all is the Friday-market, as they call it; where, on every Friday, all sorts of household-goods, pictures, and jewels are sold by auction, and often at a very cheap rate; pictures having been sold there for a crown a-piece, the frames of which alone cost double that price. The reason for this is, that, upon any person's dying, who leaves a family of children, his pictures are all sent to the Friday's-market, and the money arising from their sale is equally divided among them.

No city in all the Netherlands has so many churches and such fine structures as those of Antwerp, which is the see of a bishop, and a suffragan to the archbishop of Mechlin. The cathedral, also a parochial church, is a very grand pile, being upwards of 500 feet long, 230 broad, and 360 high. The emperor, Charles V. at his public entry into Antwerp, said, that it ought to be put in a case, and shewed only once a year as a rarity. Its spire is 466 feet high, the lantern at top 151, the diameter of the clock 30 feet, and the circumference 90. In its belfrey are 33 great bells and 2 chimes. This is a curious piece of workmanship, and arched at top like an imperial crown. The three principal doors of this cathedral are enshased with marble, and gilt. The altars in it are adorned with fine paintings, some of which are by the above-mentioned Sir Peter Rubens. The picture which represents the taking down of our Saviour from the cross, in which the figures are all as big as life, is reckoned a master-piece. Here are also some curious pieces by Quintin Massys, a blacksmith by trade, who falling in love with a painter's daughter, asked her in marriage; but her father answered, he would never bestow her in marriage on any except a painter. Upon this, the blacksmith going to Italy, put himself into the Lombard-school, and in a few years after returned a greater master than his sweetheart's father, and married her. At the entrance into this cathedral he is interred, where his effigy is put up, with this inscription:

"Connubialis amor de Mulcibre fecit Apellem."

Connubial love performs transactions strange;
It can a blacksmith to a painter change.

In this cathedral it was that Philip II. king of Spain, after the voluntary resignation of his father the emperor, Charles V. held on the 21st of January 1555, a chapter of the order of the Golden Fleece, in which he created 19 new knights, amongst whom were the 7 following, kings, Henry VIII. of England, Francis I. of France, his uncle Ferdinand king of the Romans, Christian king of Denmark, Maximilian of Bohemia, Sigismund of Poland, and John of Portugal, whose banners are still to be seen hanging in the choir. Here are 4 other parish churches, as St. George, St. James, which is also a collegiate, St. Andrew, and St. Walburge, besides 25 colleges, nunneries, and other religious foundations. Amongst these, that of the late Jesuits is looked upon as one of the finest in Europe. Its pavement is all of white marble, and the galleries are supported by 56 marble columns. The great altar is composed of the same materials, intermixed with jasper, porphyry, and gold; and on the ceiling are 38 pictures from the history of the New Testament, done by Rubens. The chapel of the Virgin, contiguous to it, is still more magnificent. The picture of the assumption of the Virgin, on the great altar, was performed by Rubens, and by him called his master-piece; round it are 6 statues of alabaster, which represent the founders of the chapel. Some years ago this church was very much damaged, and the marble-galleries beaten down by thunder. But it has since that been pretty well repaired; and is now much higher, by the galleries being removed. The late Jesuits-college, also, with its library, are worth seeing.

Near the ramparts, on the banks of the river, stands the noble and rich abbey of St. Michael, where all sovereign princes lodge when they pass this way. The apartments are truly grand, and the refectory or hall where the monks dine is as large and as well-painted as that of St. George's at Windsor. The monks are of the order of St. Norbertus, bertus, archbishop of Magdeburg, in Germany, who came to Antwerp in the year 1124, and established this order here. His pretended miracles are painted round the church belonging to it.

Among the nunneries in this city is an English one, of the order of St. Teresa. The nuns of it wear no linen, eat no flesh, and lie upon straw. The grates are so dismal that they give the place the appearance of a prison.

The citadel, which is reckoned one of the strongest in Europe, is very regular, being an exact pentagon. It stands on the south-side of Antwerp, on the banks of the Scheld, and commands the town, the river, and the neighbouring country. The erecting of this fortress, by order of Philip II. king of Spain, was the first check given to the trade and greatness of this city, which before was a free-port. It was built by the duke of Alva, in order to keep the Antwerpers in awe. It has five bastions, which from the regularity of the figure of the citadel defend one another; it has double ditches, large and deep; and but one gate to go in and out at. The circuit of it may be about 2500 paces.

In this citadel it was that the said duke of Alva erected a statue, which occasioned so much disturbance in Antwerp. He was represented to the life in complete armour, standing on a pedestal of blue marble, with his battoon in one hand, and stretching the other over the city, as an emblem of his protecting and having procured it peace: under his feet lay a monstrous figure with two heads, representing the nobility and people whom he pretended to have conquered and subdued. Here were also some other emblematical figures, as masks, snakes, clubs, and the like, alluding to several events. On the side of the pedestal towards the city was engraved the following inscription: "To the honour of Philip Alvarez de Toledo, duke of Alva, governor of the Netherlands, and most faithful servant of the most gracious king of Spain, Philip II. for having appeased sedition, chased away rebellion, re-established religion, and assured the peace of those provinces." This statue gave rise to great confusion, and so exasperated the people, that, getting together on a holiday, they by surprise forced their way into the citadel, and tore the statue to pieces, as they would have served the duke himself had he been there in person.

Among the many privileges granted this city by its princes, one is, that any person born in Antwerp is a citizen, though both father and mother be foreigners.

Francis of Valois, duke of Alencon, and brother of king Henry III. of France, having been installed duke of Brabant at Antwerp in the year 1582, and appointed governor of the Netherlands by the States-General, thought his authority circumscribed within too narrow limits; and to render himself the more absolute he resolved to surprize this city. Accordingly on Jan. 17, 1583, causing 17 companies of infantry to enter the town, he himself drew near its walls with his army, who were all Frenchmen, as if only to review it. But the citizens having discovered his design, made so gallant a defence, that they drove the French out of Antwerp, killed about 1500 of them, amongst which were about 300 noblemen, and took upwards of 2000 prisoners. In that action the citizens lost no more than 80 men. The duke of Alencon having thus miscarried in his project, endeavoured to excuse himself to the States; but they would not trust him any more: whereupon, retiring into France, he soon died there with grief.

In the year 1585 the duke of Parma, governor of the Netherlands for the king of Spain, took Antwerp after a twelvemonth's siege, which was one of the most remarkable ever heard of; yet he could never have taken it, had he not thrown a stupendous bridge over the river, for the better carrying on of his attacks. Here he re-established the Roman-catholics, who were but lately banished by the Antwerpers, and restored the city to the crown of Spain. It was seized by the French upon the death of Charles II. in the year 1700: but though it was provided with a strong garrison, it surrendered to the duke of Marlborough in 1706, in about a month's time after the memorable victory which was obtained over the French at Ramillies, and without waiting for a siege. After Ghent and Bruges had been betrayed to the French, they attempted also this city; but they miscarried in their design.

The jurisdiction or territory of Antwerp includes the following cities and great towns, viz. Liere, Herentals, Hoogstrate, Turnhout, and Guel: besides which are many considerable villages and boroughs, called liberties; namely, Mol, Arendonk, Borgerhout, &c. Many of these, though not walled, are equal to some cities, from the great number of their churches, the houses and inhabitants which they contain.

The city of Antwerp lies 25 miles N. of Brussels, and at the same distance N. E. of Ghent, in Lat. 51, 13, N. Long. 4, 29, E.

ANVERS-LEE HAMON, a town of France, in Anjou, and election of la Fleche.

ANWEILER, a town of France, in Lower Alsace, seated on the river Quich, above Landau.

ANXUR, a city of the Volsci, (Pliny, Livy,) in Latium; called Tarracina, by the Greeks and Latins: now Terracina; situated on an eminence (Livy, Horace, Sil. Italicus). Anxuras, a citizen of Anxur (Livy). And the epithet, Anxuras, a name of Jupiter, worshipped without a beard at Anxur (Virgil). Though others read Axurus or Axyrus, without a razor. E. Long. 14, 5, Lat. 41, 17.

ANZERMIA,

A N

ANZERMA, a small city of Popayan, a kingdom of South-America; situated on the river Cauca, near Cape Correntes, about 50 leagues from Popayan city to the north, and 12 from Calamanta to the south.

ANZI, a small place belonging to the Basilicate, a province of the kingdom of Naples, in Lower Italy; and has the title of a marquisate.

ANZICO, or ANXICO, kingdom of, belonging to Congo or Lower-Guinea, in Africa. The inhabitants are called Anzichi, and governed by one supreme monarch, who has many petty kings under him. It is situated westward of the kingdom of Loango, and is the country of the Jagas. Their boundaries to the north-east and south cannot be well ascertained. The inhabitants are very strong and nimble; and, making but little account of life, are hereby remarkably intrepid in all their attempts. They are an open and sincere people, and entirely unacquainted with frauds and deceit; but they are of a very barbarous disposition. They do not till the ground, have no property, nor settled habitation; but, like the Arabs, wander from place to place, and live by plunder. They go and trade in the kingdom of Angola, whither they carry slaves from their own country and from Nubia, exchanging them for salt, glass-beads, silk, knives, and other small wares. They have a multiplicity of idols, every one having his own particular deity.

AORNI, (in Ethiopia) as the Abassines call them, are rugged rocks of such incredible height that the Alps and Pyrennees are but low hills in comparison of them. Curtius relates, that the Indians called a famous rock in their country Aornos, as being above the flight of a bird. But that author mistakes the etymology, since the word cannot be looked upon of Greek extraction. Among the mountains in Abassia, and in the plains, arise several rocks of various forms, some resembling towers and pyramids.

AORNUS, the rock in India, above-mentioned by Curtius, and which Alexander the Great besieged and took; it is recorded to be 200 furlongs in circumference and eleven high. The way leading to it artificial and very narrow; yet on the top was a fine plain, part arable land and part covered with wood, with a fountain of excellent water. It is said Alexander became master of it by treachery, being shewn the private way of ascending it.

AORTE, or URT, viscounty of, a small district of Landes, or Lannes, one of the subdivisions of Gascony, belonging to the government of Guyenne and Gascony in France. It has its second name from Urt, which at present is only a little obscure village. The principal place in it is Pierre-hourade.

A O

AOSTA, or Aouste, duchy of, in Italian Ducato d'Aosta, or di Avosta: in Latin Augustinus Ducatus. It is a subdivision belonging to the principality of Piemont, in Upper Italy; is bounded on the north by Valais, on the east by the lordship of Vercelli and the valleys of Sesia, on the south by Maurienne, and on the west by Savoy and Faucigny. Its ancient inhabitants were the Salassi, a brave people, of Celtic extraction, who opposed the incursions of the Romans into Gaul with great valour, till they were overcome by Terentius Varro, the Roman General. The present name of Aosta and Aouste is only a corruption of the ancient name of its capital, which the Romans called Augusta Salasiorum, and Augusta Prætoriana or Prætoriana. The soil is fruitful, though the country be wholly mountainous. It includes seven pleasant valleys, into which it is generally divided: each of which anciently, that is after the expulsion of the Romans, was a distinct canton, and had its own magistrates; till in process of time one part of the country fell into the hands of the marquis of Sufa: and the bishops of Aouste became lords and proprietors of the rest, under the sovereignty of the emperor of Germany. Aouste was afterwards united to Savoy by the marriage of Adelaide, marchioness and heiress of Sufa, to Amadeus II. count of Savoy, together with the marquisate of Sufa and duchy of Turin: both which were afterwards raised to a duchy by the emperor Frederic II. in the year 1238.

On the confines of Savoy lies the little mount St. Bernard; and on those of the country of the Waldenses is the great mount St. Bernard (anciently called Mons Jovis), over which the road leads into this country. And for this reason also there has been built upon each of these mountains a convent, or, as others call it, an hospital, the better to accommodate travellers who go that way. The river Doria Baltea has its source in this country, and runs through the middle of it.

AOUSTA, AVOSTA, or Aouste, corruptly AVASTA, the capital of the duchy of the same name, in Piemont, in Upper Italy. It is commonly thought to have had its Latin name of Augusta from the emperor Augustus, who erected it into a Roman colony: but before that time it is supposed to have been called Cordella, from Cordellus Stasiellus, a famous leader of the Salassi, who is said to have founded it. Augustus added the title of Prætoriana to that of Augusta, on account of his settling in it 3000 of his Prætorian soldiers. It is situated on the river Duria, or Doria Baltea, at the foot of the Alps. Here are still to be seen the noble remains of Roman antiquities, according to some travellers, those of an amphitheatre; to others, particularly Miffon, the ruins of a palace; but others, more probably, of a triumphal triumphal arch, raised to the honour of the aforesaid emperor, in memory of the victory he obtained over the inhabitants of the Alps; though some inaccurate writers have from thence placed it at Turbia near Monacho.

Aouste is also mentioned by Ptolemy, Pliny, and the Itinerary, as the first town of Italy, from which they took the distances of places, as they travelled farther into it; and more particularly, as being situated on the banks of the Duria, the sand of which, when taken out by the ancient Salassi, and washed by means of a great number of channels cut out from that river, yielded some gold; and hence its name of Doria. In Pliny's time were two rivers of this name; and they still retain the same; the one, on which Aouste is built, was stiled the Greater; and the other, which runs into the Piemont, and empties itself into the Po, was called the Less.

This city is now the residence of a bishop, under the archbishop of Monstier, belonging to the Farentaise, in Savoy. It was taken, with many more places in Savoy, by the French in 1704: but now all these, and the duchy of Aouste, are subject to the king of Sardinia. It lies about 10 miles from the confines of the Milanese, 25 N.E. from Jura, and 50 N. from Turin, in Lat. 45, 38, N. Long. 7, 25, E.

APACHES, or APACI, a numerous and warlike nation, which nearly surround all the country of New Mexico, properly so called, in North America. See NEW MEXICO. Their country is very large. They are all idolaters, and live under the government of their cacique, having several strong holds in the mountains.

APAFALVA, or APAFIFALVA, a large village belonging to the county of Dobok, which is a subdivision of the seven counties, comprehending the west part of Transylvania, in the kingdom of Hungary.

APALACHICOLA, the river that is the boundary between East and West Florida, which rises in Carolina, and falls into the Apalachian-bay, near St. George's isle and Cape St. Blaze.

APALACHYA, the name of a town and harbour in Florida, 30 leagues east of Pensacola, and the same west from the river Del Spirito Santo, which falls into the Gulf of Mexico, at the N. W. end of the peninsula of Florida: on both sides of it live the several nations called the Apalachian Indians.

APALACHES, APALACHITES, or APALACHIANS, a nation of savages, in West-Florida, North America, towards the mountains of the same name, or Apalachi. The kingdom of the Apalachians contains several small provinces, of which some are in a fine valley, bounded to the east and north by a long ridge of the Apalachian mountains; on the south by the province of Tagouesta, the inhabitants of which are very cruel and barbarous; on the west by the river of Hitanachi, which the Spaniards call Spirito Santo. The most considerable of the valley-provinces is Bemarin or Bermarin, in which lies Melitot, the capital of the country, where the king keeps his court, and is acknowledged as sovereign by the particular chiefs of the other, called Paracouffes. The country is good and fertile, and the inhabitants open-hearted; their arms are bows and arrows, clubs, slings, and long javelins, which they throw with their hands when they have emptied their quivers.

APALACHIAN Mountains of North America. These give name to a country lying west of the British plantations there. They are situated between Lat. 30 and 40, N. and run in a parallel line with the Atlantic-ocean, and about 150 miles distant from it.

APALHAHO, a small town in the province of Alentejo, Portugal, containing about 1200 inhabitants.

APAMEA, or APAMI, anciently Apamea Cibotos. It is situated in Phrygia Major, a province of Asiatic Turkey, upon the river Mæander, a little above the junction of the Marsias with it. This was formerly one of the most considerable cities in Asia Minor, and the see of an archbishop; and it arose out of the ruins of the ancient Celene, whose inhabitants were transplanted thither by Seleucus, who gave it the name of Apamea, from that of his wife. And if he was not its founder, he at least greatly beautified and enriched it; but it is now gone to decay, and is but thinly inhabited. It lies 80 miles from Synnada to the south, and about 100 from Laodicea to the west, in Lat. 39, 50, N. Long. 59, 50, E.

APAMEA, or APAMI, an archiepiscopal city of Bithynia, in Asiatic Turkey, now called Myrica by the Turks, and is seated on the Propontis towards the gulph of Polmeire, between Byrsa and Cyzicum. Lat. 49, 56, N. Long. 56, 50, E.

APAMEA, also called MIANA, a town of Media, on the confines of Parthia. Of the same name are likewise two other towns in Mesopotamia; the one upon the Euphrates, and the other upon the Tygris.

APAMEA, a city of Cælo-Syria, a subdivision of Syria, in Asiatic Turkey. This, as well as that called by the same name in Phrygia above mentioned, was built and called so by Seleucus Nicator, and this in honour of his mother. It is now called Hama or Aman by the Greeks, and is situated on the river Orontes; and, though above half ruined, it is still much larger than Emesa, another considerable city of Syria. It is almost surrounded with a deep ditch formed by the river, rendering the gardens delightful; yet so as to have no communication with the land, but by a narrow isthmus.

It

A P

It stands on a pleasant hill, in the midst of a plain, which is encompassed with other hills, and extremely fertile in all sorts of grain and fruits. The neighbouring fields for a great many miles abound in pasturage, which the kings of Syria formerly reserved for their own horses, and Seleucus fed in its territory 500 elephants. And though this city is now much decayed, one half of it being gone to ruin, yet, next to Aleppo, it is the most populous in all Syria. It is noted for having been governed by its own kings till the coming of Pompey into Syria; and near it the brave Zenobia, queen of Palmyra, was overthrown by the emperor Aurelius, who led her in triumph at Rome, loaded with such a weight of jewels that she sunk under them. Apamea was very early erected into an episcopal see, many of whose prelates suffered martyrdom. One of these, called Thomas, by his address and prudence, preserved the city from the arms of Cosroes, king of Persia. In Apamea are still several noble edifices, public and private, all built of large square stones, black and white, and intermixed. The castle, which commands the town and the plain, though it has run to decay, is large and strongly built of the same materials; and it stands upon an eminence at one end of the city, on the Orontes, being surrounded with a wide wet ditch cut into the rock. The city, which at present extends itself less towards the hills, and more upon the plain than formerly, is every where watered by the said river, which runs quite across it; and, by means of a machine with 18 large wheels, turned by its stream, is conveyed by channels and aqueducts into every part of it, and into the gardens that are without, and opposite to the castle. Near the river is a grand mosque, partly surrounded with a spacious garden, and before its front stands a stately marble column, adorned with bas-reliefs of exquisite workmanship, representing human figures, beasts, birds, flowers, &c. Apamea was formerly governed by a simple commandant, who had a few soldiers under him: but it has now a bashaw, whose government is pretty extensive. It lies about 60 miles almost south of Antioch, 80 north of Damascus, and about 90 from Aleppo, in Lat. 34, 5, N. Long. 38, 30, E.

APANORMIA, a town on the island of Santorin, in the Mediterranean, or Candian-sea, in European Turkey. Near it is a spacious harbour in the form of a half-moon: but as its bottom is unfathomable, vessels cannot lie at anchor in it. Lat. 36, 18, N. Long. 25, 39, E.

APANTA, a province belonging to the continent of South America. It lies between the lake of Parino and the river of the Amazons. The country of the Apantes, Texeira affirms, extends itself on the other side of the said river to the west of the province of Coropa.

A P

APARIA, a province of Peru, in South America, near the river of the Amazons, towards that part where it receives the Curavaya to the north of the province of Pacomoro. On the other side, to the west, lies the country called Canella.

APATTI, a pretty large village belonging to the territory of the Jazyges or Philistes, which is a subdivision of the circle, on this side the Theiss, in Upper Hungary. It looks like a little town, and is situated in a country abounding with corn and pasture.

APEE, one of the Hebrides, in the South-sea, now Malicollo. See MALICOLLO.

APEN, a district in the county of Oldenburg, in which are the churches of Apen and Westerfede, and the fort of Apen, which has a commandant, and was strongly fortified by count Antony I. 1550.

APENNINE Mountains, in Latin Montes Apennini. These, with the Alps, are the most considerable in all Italy. They begin at Savona, in the dominions of the Genoese, and not far from their capital, where they join the Alps, called Alpes Maritimi; whence, running through Italy, which they almost divide into two equal parts, they form a long ridge of mountains, extending themselves like a bow, as far as the strait which parts Italy from the island of Sicily. Near the Apennine mountains, is the famous volcano of Vesuvius, about five miles from Naples. The Apennine mountains have several names, according to the different parts in which they lie. Between Linca and Modena is that called Monte St. Peregrino, which is of a vast height, though not quite so high as the Alps.

APENRADE. See ABENRADE.

APES HILL. See ABYLA.

APETOUS, in Latin Apetubæ, a people of Brasil, in North America, near the government of Puerto Seguro.

APENZEL. See APPENZEL.

APHACA, the name of a place in Syria, situated between the Heliopolis and Byblus, near Lebanon, (Zozimus); infamous for a temple of Venus, called Aphacitis, near which was a lake, round which fires usually burst forth, and its waters were so heavy that bodies floated on them. The temple was destroyed by Constantine, as being a school of incontinence, (Eusebius). The name is of Syriac original, signifying embraces.

APHEK, a city of Palestine, in Asiatic Turkey, formerly famous for a temple of Venus, where her votaries gave themselves up to all manner of lasciviousness, as being the place in which she is said to have had the company of her beloved Adonis. But it is more remarkable in sacred writ for the overthrow of the Israelites by the Philistines, and for the signal victory which king Ahab obtained over Benhadad king of Assyria.

APHETÆ

A P

APHETÆ, a city of Magnesia, a province of Thessaly, in European Turkey, situated on the bay called Il Golfo del Vollo; from which place the Argonauts put to sea, when bound to Colchos in quest of the golden fleece.

APHGASI, a tribe or clan of the Tartars, dwelling on the west side of the river Wolga, towards the south of the kingdom of Astracan, in Asiatic Russia, on the Caspian-sea, and as far as the river Cupa, which falls into the Palus Meotis. Beyond these the Circassian Tartars inhabit, between the Euxine and Caspian seas.

APHION, or APHIUM, a famous city of Galatia, a province of Anatolia Proper, in Asia Minor, and Asiatic Turkey. It has its name from the quantities of opium made in and about it, the whole territory producing vast crops of poppy, from which this drug, by the Turks called aphion, is extracted. The place is still in a tolerable condition, though it be dirty and ill-built. Some take it to be the same with Carahissar, or Carasser, i.e. the black castle, a name given by the Turks to the ancient Hieropolis ad Mæanderum. It is situated upon an eminence, and has an old castle of free-stone on a rock, separated from the mountains which lie south of it, and form a sort of semicircle. It had been formerly the patrimony of the great Othman, founder of the Turkish monarchy. Other authors call it Carachere, and place it to the south of Chiutya. This city was at first the see of a bishop, but now that of an archbishop. It lies 35 miles from Philadelphia to the south, on the confines of Cairo. Lat. 39, 45, N. Long. 32, 18, E.

APHRODISIA, one of the maritime towns of Cilicia, a province of Caramania and Asia Minor, in Asiatic Turkey. Its name latinized by Pliny, he called Oppidum Veneris, or the city of Venus. Some of Ptolemy's interpreters call it St. Theodoro. It is situated eastward from Jotapa, and is opposite to the island of Cyprus.

APHRODISIAS, or APODISIA, a city of Caria, formerly a bishop's see, under that of Stauropolis, now almost in ruins, and under the Turks. It gave birth to Alexander Aphrodisius and other great prelates and heretics.

APHRODISIUM, a strong and well fortified town of Barbary, in the kingdom of Tunis, in Africa, situated on the sea-coast, about 20 leagues from Adrumetum or Mahumeta.

APHYTE, or APHYTIS, a city of Thrace, in Asiatic Turkey, not far from Pallene, and was famed for an oracle of Apollo. The inhabitants had also Jupiter Ammon in high veneration.

APINA, an ancient town of Italy, said to have been built by Diomedes, who at the same time founded Trica; both which places having been ruined since, gave rise to the proverb Apina and

A P

Trica, to denote trifles. And for the same reason buffoons and parasites are called Apinari.

APIOLÆ, an ancient city of Italy, which was taken by Lucius Tarquinius the elder; and with the plunder of it, according to Pliny, he laid the foundation of the capitol at Rome.

APODISIA. See APHRODISIAS.

APOIGNY, a place close by Seignelay, belonging to the county and bailiwick of Auxerrois, a subdivision of the government of Burgundy, in France. Here is a mineral spring, the waters of which are cold, and of a ferruginous quality.

APOLO-BAMBA, a jurisdiction, consisting of missionaries belonging to the Franciscans, subject to the bishop of Cusco; 60 leagues from that city, lying in South-America, and the empire of Peru. These consist of 7 towns of Indians, newly converted. To protect these from the insults of their idolatrous brethren, and to give credit to the missionaries, there is kept here a militia, under a major-general, formed by the inhabitants of these towns and villages.

APOLLEDA, or APOLDA, a small town, but of great antiquity, in the principality of Wiemar. It belonged to the Shenks, then to the Witzhomes; but the last family becoming extinct in 1633, it escheated to the dukes of Saxony, who gave it to the university of Jena. It was almost destroyed by fire in 1750.

APOLLO Promontory, (the Promontorium Apollinis of Pliny and Ptolemy) seems to answer to the Nackos of the Moors, and Cape Tennes of modern geography, in Numidia, or Barbary.

APOLLONIA, now PIEGRO, a town of Albania, one of the provinces in European Turkey; situated about 35 miles from Dyrrachim to the south, and meanly inhabited. There is another of the same name in Macedonia, upon the river Chabrus or Cilargo, between Thessalonica and Aphipolis, now known by that of Erifso. Another, called the Great, and situated in Thrace, 20 miles from Renkas, now in ruins, and still known by the name of Sespoli. A fourth in the kingdom of Barca, in Barbary, in Africa, with a capacious harbour, yet meanly inhabited, by the Arabs called Bonandrea. And a fifth in Asia-Minor, which is situated by the sea-side, and thought to be the Assos, mentioned in the Acts of the Apostles, with several others of less note.

APOLLONIUS (Cape) is about 12 leagues to the south of Assinee, on the coast of Guinea Proper. The natives are of a jet black, very lively, bold, and accustomed to trade; better adorned than their neighbours with amber-heads, copper rings, &c. They have all a cross or dagger cut in their cheek and body, to distinguish them from those of the neighbouring countries, whom they steal and sell. A deal of ground about this cape is cleared and and sown with Indian-corn. The coast from Assinee to this cape bears E. S. E. and is every where furnished with great and small villages.

APOLLONIATIS, one of the provinces of Assyria, according to Ptolemy.

APONUS, its modern name ABANO (which see), a hot fountain in the neighbourhood of Padua, and dominions of the state of Venice. Bathing in it cures several disorders. The emperor Tiberius, says Suetonius, in his life ordered a lot to be thrown into it, from an idle report which then prevailed, that such an expedient would let him into the knowledge of future events.

APPENZEL, or APENZEL, the thirteenth and last in order of the cantons of Switzerland, in Latin Pagus Abbatis Cellensis. It is also one of the least among the whole, consisting only of three or four valleys. It has the town and abbey of St. Gall on the north, the county of Tockenburgh on the south, part of this last county and the bailiwick of Gams, in the county of the Grisons, on the south, and Reinthal on the east. Moll makes its extent each way to be about 18 miles; others make it 30 miles long and about 24 broad. It has pleasant hills, with rich pastures, covered with flocks and herds that yield great quantities of milk, from which butter and cheese are made: by the sale of both these articles, together with their linen manufactures, the inhabitants principally subsist. They are reckoned, says Mr. Stanyan, the roughest of all the Swiss; and even the better sort among them, he observes, enjoy so few of the comforts of life at home that they are very desirous to be settled in some foreign service. According to the character given of them in the Delves de la Suisse, they are frank, though not very polite; and are of a good shape and stature, being very lusty or sturdy men.

Anciently the inhabitants of Appenzel were subject to several lords or counts, but afterwards these became united under the government of the abbot of St. Gall; till at last forming themselves into a commonwealth, with the approbation of the emperor Rupert, they obtained their liberty from the said abbot, partly by force of arms, and partly by dint of money, in the year 1408. But about three years after, the abbot renewing his pretensions to their country, they entered into a confederacy with 6 of the other cantons; and, as producing many warlike men, one of which sometimes put it is said a whole troop of the enemy to flight, they were admitted into the Helvetic league in the year 1513. But the abbot, provoked at this union, got the emperor to proscribe or put them under the ban of the empire, and the pope to excommunicate them. To the latter they opposed a contrary decree, banishing his legate, and driving out some of the more obstinate priests, who refused to officiate among them, and killing others. And being entrenched within their mountains, as so many ramparts, they were defended from the emperor, and defied him. The abbot, farther accusing them to the college of German electors, obtained a decree that the other towns of Swisserland and the Upper Rhine should reduce them: so that the people of Appenzel having lost two battles, a peace was concluded; but it was violated by the neighbouring nobility about four years afterwards. In the mean time the canton, having gained a victory, possessed themselves of two contiguous valleys, and for a sum of money had the emperor's proscription taken off; and, having entered into the aforesaid league, they were received as the thirteenth canton, and a part of the Helvetic republic. Both Papists and Protestants, however are now tolerated in this canton, and their magistrates are of both religions, but the Protestants are the most numerous inhabitants. The canton is divided into 12 communities, namely, 6 of them called the Inner Appenzel, lying to the east, and near the town; and the other 6 called the Outer Appenzel, to the west. The Catholics and Protestants used to live in both divisions promiscuously and peaceably enough till the year 1584; whence arose so terrible a division in the country that they were just ready to murder one another. But the same year, by the mediation of the other cantons, the two parties concluded a peace; by which it was agreed that the Protestants should live alone for the future in the Outer Appenzel, and the Catholics in the Inner: so that now each have their respective chief-magistrate, court of justice, police, and banderret; but in spirituals, as matrimonial affairs, &c. they both have recourse to the bishop of Constance. They have one general sovereign council of 144, which is composed of 12 persons taken from each community. This country is encompassed with extremely high mountains, on the confines of Rhetia; and in that part of them which separates this canton from the Rheinthal are three small lakes abounding with fish, some of which are very large. here are several medicinal springs.

APPENZEL, the capital of the last-mentioned canton of the same name in Swisserland. In Latin it is called Abbatis cella; which name it had from an abbot's cell built here in the 8th century, which Sigebert king of Austrasia granted to the abbot of St. Gall in the year 1151. But being weary of his tyranny, they freed themselves and shook off his yoke, principally by force of arms; they afterwards purchased his title, formed themselves into a commonwealth, defeated the abbot of Constance, who had joined with the abbot of St. Gall against them, in the year 1525; and, having expelled all the nobles who oppressed them, they were admitted into the number of the cantons, as has been just mentioned. (See the preceding article.) This place, though only a village of Swisserland, is in all respects spects equal to a city, being very rich, well-inhabited, and large. It is situated at the foot of mount Alpstein, on the bank of the river Sitter, in Latin Sintria. Other books of Geography place it on the Chur. It lies 12 miles S. of St. Gall, 25 S. E. of Constance, and 31 E. of Zurich. Lat. 47, 36, N. Long. 9, 1, E.

APPERSHOVEN, a small village belonging to the circle of Suabia, in Germany, on the river Kyffel, and noted for having been the place before which the confederate army encamped, at the corner of a wood, the night preceding the memorable battle of Hochstet, August 2, 1704; in which the French and Bavarians were totally routed. See HOCHSTET. Lat 31, 50, N. Long. 48, 50, E.

APPEVILLE, a marquiseat belonging to Vexin-Normand, a jurisdiction or bailiwick of Upper Normandy, in the government of this last name, in France.

APPIAN WAY, (Via Appia) the longest, being no less than 350 miles, and the most considerable highway in all Italy, beginning within the city of Rome, and at that very place where Constantine's triumphal arch is erected. From thence it led to Capua, passing by the Septizonium of Severus, the Capena-gate between Tusculum and Alba, then through Aricia, Algidam, the Forum Appii, Terracina Anxur, Fundi, Formiæ, Minturnum, and Sinessa. The first contriver of it was Appius Claudius Cæcus, when censor, in the year of Rome 440, under the consulship of Marcus Valerius and P. Decius Mus. He called it by his own name; and the charge was so great that the public treasury was exhausted. Notwithstanding what Tacitus says, "that Appius caused this way to be paved from Rome to Brundisium," he carried it no farther than the city of Capua, the limits of the Roman dominions in those days. Some authors write that Julius Cæsar continued it from Capua to Benevento, and Augustus from this last city to that of Brundisium, now Brindisi.

This road is wide enough for two chariots to drive upon it with ease, when they happen to meet; being about 15 feet broad. The form of the stones is in general irregular, the largest not being above 3 feet in extent, and the smallest not less than one foot, and all of them about 12 inches thick; but to this day so perfectly joined and closely connected, that the point of a sword cannot be thrust between the junctures. In the year of Rome 580 the censors, Q. Fulvius Flaccus and Aulus Posthumius Albinus, bordered this and the other highways with paved stones (marginæ or gomphi) which were larger and higher than the rest, in order to make the roads still more firm, and prevent their being overflowed by the rain-water, either falling upon or running into them by the sides. Caius Gracchus placed also on the borders of the road, particularly the Via Appia, a great many stones still larger and higher than the former, and about 12 feet asunder. These stones, called cippi, were of singular use to tired travellers to sit and rest on, or wearied porters to unload their burthens and take breath; and even to riders, who in those days had no stirrups, for dismounting or remounting their horses. He likewise caused to be erected on each side of the road, and from mile to mile, that is, at the distance of 1000 paces, small pillars, with numbers upon them, shewing travellers what progress they had made in their journey, and how much they had still to perform. These were sometimes called signæ or notæ, but most commonly milliaria or lapides.

What puzzles the learned is, that not one historian of those times has given the least hint concerning the place whence was drawn that immense quantity of stones employed in making the several famous highways, namely, the Æmilian, Flaminian, and Appian, leading from Rome, and which seem, by their entirely similar colour, hardness, and form, to have been hewn out of the same rock or quarry. Notwithstanding the several conjectures of the learned on this head, the difficulty seems insuperable, especially from the silence of historians.

The reason why these celebrated roads have stood firm, and without sinking in the least for so many ages, is the solidity of their foundation: for the pavement is not laid upon the bare ground, as is generally the practice at present; but on a layer of stone called tophus, which is naturally soft and brittle, but hardens much in the air; and this layer rests on a bed of sand, thoroughly beaten, and made almost as solid as the stone itself.

That the direct road from Rome to Capua went cross the Palus Pomptina, though travellers are at present obliged to take a long and round about way, by Cala Nova, Piperno, &c. is very plain, from several large fragments of the ancient pavement appearing sometimes in the middle of an inaccessible morass, sometimes rising considerably above the surface of the waters, and at other times half-buried among the ruins of bridges and other edifices, occasioned by great falls of water, or earthquakes at different times. Notwithstanding these revolutions, which have entirely changed the ancient superficies of this part of Italy, between two or three miles on this side of Terracina is an extent of about much the same length of this Via Appia, pretty entire, and level with the ground near it. And now and then upon each side of the road are some of the ancient marginæ and cippi still standing; as also here and there many ruins of those tombs, small temples, and other monuments, which anciently very much embellished this stately road of Appius.

APPLEBY, or APULBY, once a flourishing, but now a declining borough, and an inland market-town town of Westmoreland; and though claiming the first place, on account of its antiquity, and being the county-town, is not very rich nor large, and in both these respects much inferior to Kendal: yet it is a neat pretty place, very agreeably situated near the river Eden, which almost surrounds it, and in the midst of pleasant corn-fields, on an elevated situation. Its name is a corruption of the ancient Aballaba, mentioned in the Notitia Imperii. In the time of the Romans it was a station of the Mauri Aureliani, a band of soldiers so called, as having been sent thither by the emperor Aurelian. King Henry I. of England gave it privileges equal to those of York, that city's charter having been granted, as it is said, in the forenoon, and the charter of this in the afternoon of the same day. It still retains its ancient privileges, its charter having been confirmed by king Henry II. and likewise by king Henry III. in whose time an exchequer was kept here, as also by the succeeding kings of England. In the reign of king Edward I. it had a mayor and two provosts, who usually signed all the public acts of the town, together with the mayor; though at present these officers only attend the mayor with two halberds. Brompton mentions Applebyshire; so that Appleby, it is supposed, either had once sheriffs of its own, as most cities anciently had, some of which still retain them to this day; or else Westmoreland was called Applebyshire, or the county of Appleby. In the 22d of Henry II. it was set on fire by the Scots; as it was again in the 12th of Richard II. In 1598 it suffered also greatly by a kind of pestilence, which so depopulated it, as appears from an inscription placed in the garden belonging to the school-house, describing those calamities from which, and the aforesaid inroads of the Scots, it has never yet recovered, so that during the plague the market was removed to Gillsaughlin, about 4 or 5 miles from the town. William, king of Scots, took Appleby and Brough, under Stanemore, by surprise, a little before himself was taken prisoner at Alnwick: but both were afterwards recovered by king John, who gave the castle and barony of this town and borough to John de Vipont. It is now in possession of the Tufon family, Earls of Thanet, who are hereditary sheriffs of Westmoreland.

The assizes are holden here in the town-hall (the judges lodging in the castle, where formerly the court also sat, which is of great antiquity) which hall is now at the end of the bridge. At Appleby is one of the best corn-markets in all these northern parts; and indeed the whole country round it abounds with very rich and extensive arable lands. But the principal beauty of the town consists in one broad street, running with an easy ascent from north to south, at the head of which stands the aforesaid castle, a good strong one, and belonging now to the earl of Thanet, being almost surrounded with the Eden, and with trenches where that river does not come. Here anciently parliaments were holden, as appears from our old English statutes. At the lower end of the town are a church and a school; and the buildings in general are ancient.

The town is governed by a mayor, recorder, 12 aldermen, a common-council, and serjeants at mace. Besides, it has a jail, a town-hall, a free-school, and hospital for a governess and 12 widows of capital burghers, fallen to decay; which last was founded in 1651. Appleby stands on a great Roman military way, which crosses the county from Rearchcros or Reecrofs, Stanemore on the E. to the Eden, a little below Perith in Cumberland, on the W. Its markets on Saturday are remarkable for corn, when the sale begins at the tolling of a bell, and ceases exactly at the tolling of another, and lasts an hour. Its fairs are on October 29, on Whitfun-eve, and on Whitfun-Monday. The bridge of Appleby consists of one arch, and stands a little to the S. of the town. The water here, which looks of a remarkably black colour from its considerable depth, has a still course, the channel being narrow; but it widens considerably all along to Carlisle, where, when the freshes are out, and by the addition of several streams and small rivulets on both sides, it has the appearance of a little sea, and particularly near that city, it occupies a great deal of ground about the bridge. Appleby is the only borough in Westmoreland, and sends two representatives to the British parliament. Appleby is situated 6 miles N. of Kirby Steven, 10 S. E. of Penrith, 20 in the same direction from Carlisle, and upwards of 200 N. of London, in Lat. 45. 30, N. Long. 2, 29, W.

APPLEDORE, a little town or village of Blackburn-hundred, in the S. part of the county of Kent, near the river Rother; but through disuse it has lost its market, and is now of little or no note at all. It lies somewhat to the S. of Tenderden, near the Wild of Kent, 54 miles from London.

APPLEGARTH (forest of) in Richmond, and to the northward of it, is a district in the North riding of Yorkshire, but of no great extent.

APPLESHAW, a village in Hampshire, four miles W. of Andover, that has two fairs, on May 23, and Nov. 5, for sheep.

APPLETERWICK, a village in the W. riding of Yorkshire, five miles N. of Skipton, with a fair on Oct. 2, for cattle and horses.

APREMONT, situated between the rivers Maas and Moselle, but not dependent either on Lorraine or Bar. This signiory, with its barony, borders on the bailiwick of St. Mihiel, this last lying in that part of the duchy of Bar called Barrois, which is not a fief of France, and is one of the oldest fiefs belonging to the bishopric of Metz. But having been been in the hands of several possessors, at length, in the 16th century, it came to the house of Lorrain.

APROSITA, (or the inaccessible island) one of the Canaries in the Atlantic ocean. Some will have it to be Porto Santo, near Madeira; though Sanfon is of opinion that it is Isla de San Borondon, otherwise Ombria; and by the Spaniards often called la Incantada e la non Tronada.

APS, ALPS, or ALBE, a small village belonging to Lower Vivarais, in the diocese of Viviers, one of the fourteen bishoprics of Lower Languedoc, and government of this last name, in France. It was anciently the capital of the Helvii.

APT, APTA, or APTA JULIA, a small city belonging to the district or viguerie of the same name, in the territory of Forcalquier, belonging to Upper Provence, in the government of the same name in France. It is very advantageously situated on the little river Calavon, where it falls into the Durance, and thence called Apt sur le Calavon. It lies near the mountains. This city was anciently one of the largest and most considerable belonging to the Celtæ, and the capital of the Vulgentes, in the time of the Romans. It was enlarged also by Julius Cæsar, who made it a Roman colony, and caused it to be called by his own name. Apt is the seat of a bailiwick called Viguerie, and of a collection; also the see of a bishop, who styles himself Prince of Apt, though he is not the lord of the town, but is first suffragan to the archbishop of Aix. His predecessors had anciently, among other privileges, that of coining money; but this has been long since abolished. His diocese includes 33 parishes, he has a revenue of 9000 livres, and the tax he pays the court of Rome is 250 florins. The most ancient bishop of Apt was St. Auspicius the Martyr, who lived A. D. 92, or according to others, in 162: a wide difference in chronology.— Besides the cathedral, here are two abbeys and eight convents. This city boasts of having in its possession the body of St. Anne; but with greater truth it may value itself for several remains of Roman antiquities, particularly an amphitheatre. In the court of the bishop's palace is still to be seen the epitaph which the emperor Adrian made on his horse Boryllenes, having built him a sepulchre for that purpose. In the year 1365, a council was held at Apt, in order to settle church discipline. It consisted of the three provinces of Arles, Aix, and Ambrun. The famous M. Scuderi was a native of this place. The plums of Apt are very much commended. It lies eight leagues to the N. and 22 miles from Avignon to the E. in Lat. 43, 50 N. long. 5, 20, E.

APTERA, a city in the isle of Crete, where, according to the poets, the Syrens lost their wings, and fell into the sea; and being quite overpowered with grief, were conquered by the Muses.

APUA, a large and very strong town of Liguria, in the Genoese territories, in Italy, on the confines of Tuscany; it is five miles from the source of the river Magra, and about four from the Apennine mountains, and confines of Parma. It is under the jurisdiction of the dukes of Tuscany, who redeemed it from the Spaniards not many years ago. It was anciently a fief of the Milanese.

APUEIS, an Indian nation of Brazil, in South America. Their country lies towards the springs of Rio del Janeiro, and bordering on the province called Capitanía di Rio Janeiro, which the Portuguese are at present masters of.

APULIA, APUGLIA, now PUGLIA, a large part of the kingdom of Naples, in Lower Italy, and to the eastward. It was once a kingdom of itself, under Roger the Norman, Charles of Anjou, and several other princes. It includes the three provinces of Capitanata, Bari, and Otranto: but at present the first of these territories is comprehended under Apulia, when taken only in a larger sense. It is situated between the Apennine mountains to the south and the Adriatic-sea to the north. As in Apulia, says baron Popowitsch, especially in the provinces of the Capitanate and Bari above-mentioned, are but few or no mountains, nor springs or rivulets; for which reason the inhabitants are obliged to drink rain-water out of cisterns, which they have either built in their houses, or which have been erected at the public expence, in the open market-places. The cattle drink also rain-water out of reservoirs, formed by nature in the rocky bottom. The dew, which undoubtedly, on account of the vicinity of the sea, falls more plentifully in such a hot country as this than it does in Germany, must serve to invigorate and refresh the corn-lands and vineyards instead of rain. At a time of excessive heat they continually moisten the garden-vegetables day and night with that saltish and stinking water, which is taken from the cisterns where the cattle drink. In the parts from Manfredonia, as far as Mount-Gargano, are springs of fine sweet water to be met with. The sea-coast between the towns of Manfredonia and Barletta is a mere tract of sand, which probably the sea (for here it forms a bay or creek) has thrown up within these few centuries past. In some places the sand lies piled up in heaps many fathoms high, and upon it grows nothing but myrtle-shrubs, and such plants as strike a deep root, in order to reach the moisture in the ground: but yet the sand has more than one way benefited this country, which nature has left almost desolate and waste. In the adjacent shallow sea, or lacunes, cumes, a considerable black fishery is carried on in the months of April and May. The fishermen throw several bundles of myrtle-boughs or shrubs into the sea, when, upon the fish swimming to it, in order to spawn, they are surrounded with nets and taken. The fishermen broil the fish they catch upon a fire made of dry buffalo-dung, which they gather on this sandy coast; as no houses are to be met with for a considerable distance, where their necessary occasions can be supplied. Herds of buffaloes feed here, and lie down in the water, during the greatest part of the heat of the day, and, when the tide flows, they let the waves roll over their heads, and then shake the water out of their ears. In this tract, especially towards Barletta, are gardens and vineyards cultivated. The garden-plats are covered with myrtle-trees, so as not to be incommoded by the winds, or in order to keep off the sand; and the vegetables are nourished for the most part by the sea-water, which transudes to them: besides, the vine-stocks are planted so deep in the sand that their roots stand in the salt-water; and the seeds of garden-vegetables which are sown here, as gourds, melons, and cucumbers, are sown at the same depth. The wine produced here is somewhat saltish, probably from the vine-stocks being cut off short and close to the ground. On the other hand, the water-melons of this country, which are so highly valued, and carried for sale to the city of Naples, having an excellent poignancy on the palate in the heats of summer, are as sweet as sugar, probably from their having long stalks and a great many leaves, as the properest instruments for percolating their juices. On the bay of Tarentum are likewise broad, waste, and uninhabited tracts, consisting entirely of sand-hills, upon which grow nothing but sea-jumper, with red berries, together with some other small shrubs and plants.

It is divided into Apulia Darnia (see CAPITANTE), and Apulia Peucetie, now Terra di Bari (see BARI). This last division stretching from the river Aufidus, now Lo Fanlo, contains these modern cities, Andria, Ascoli, Bari, Barletta, Bitonto, Bovino, Gravina, Luceria, Manfredonio, Trani, Troia, Venosa; all which see under their names.

Apulia is a great corn-country, but excessively hot, and in some years all is burnt up. The Jesuits are the proprietors of half this province; and they treat the tenants with the same rigour as the Neapolitan lords generally exercise towards their farmers; so that, Burnet says, they sometimes die of hunger in the most plentiful years; their corn being exported from them into Spain.

APURIMA, a river of Peru, in South America. It rises in the province of Parinococha, at the foot of the Cordillera mountains de los Andes; and, running through Cusco, after a course of about 70

A P

Spanish leagues, throws itself into the Xauxa, or river Maragnon, between those of Albancai and Incai, which empty themselves also into the Xauxa.

APURWACA, or CAPERWACA a river of Guiana, a province of South America, one of the largest and most considerable in this country.

AQUA-DOLCI, GLACINERO, or ATHIRAS, a river of Thrace, falling into the Propontis near Celiverea.

AQUALLO, one of the two principal places belonging to the Lota, a district in that division of the island of Corsica, lying on this side the mountains, or its N. E. part, in Upper Italy.

AQUAMBOE (Territory) on the coasts of S. Guinea, has for its boundaries Abonee and Aboera, E. Akim W. Quakoe N. and Agonna S. The people have no commerce with the Europeans.

AQUANIGRA, a small place belonging to the Mantuan, in Upper Italy, situated on the river Chiese, a little above its junction with the Ogrio. It stands 22 miles W. of the city of Mantua, and is subject to the house of Austria. Lat. 45, 7, N. Long. 30, 5, E.

AQUA PENDENTE, in Latin Aquila, Aqua Tarina, and Acula, a poorly inhabited town of the territory d'Orvieto, belonging to the Ecclesiastical State in the middle division of Italy (see ACQUAPENDENTE). It stands on an eminence near the river Paglia, over which is the Gregorian bridge. In 1650 pope Innocent X. removed the bishopric hither from Castro; which last city he caused to be razed for murdering their bishop.

AQUARIA, a little place belonging to the territory of Frignano, a district of the duchy of Modena, in Upper Italy.

AQUA SPARTA, or AQUÆ SPARTE, a town and castle of Spoleto or Umbria, in the Ecclesiastical State and middle division of Italy. It stands on the Flaminian Way (Via Flaminia) and gives the title of Duke, which is in the family of Cesi; it lies about four miles from Amelia, and between that and Spoleto city.

AQUAPULCO. See ACAPULCO.

AQUAVIVA (see ACQUIVIVA), a little town of Bari, a province in the kingdom of Naples, in the lower division of Italy. It gives name to an illustrious and ancient family, from which several great men have descended.

AQUELEIA. See AQUILEIA.

AQUELUNDA, a lake in the E. parts of Congo and Angola, Africa. It lies 600 miles from the Atlantic ocean, to which it sends considerable rivers.

AQUI and AQUITA, a city and province in the island of Nipponia, belonging to Japan, near the straits of Pangua.

AQUIGISES, in Latin Aquagine, a people of Brasil, in North America, near the province of the Holy Ghost.

AQUILA

AQUILA, anciently Avia or Avella, the capital of the Farther Abruzzo, a province belonging to the kingdom of Naples, in the lower division of Italy. It rose out of the ruins of the ancient Amiternum, the site of which is about four miles north of Aquila. It is the seat of the provincial court; is situated on a small mountain, at the foot of which runs the river Aterno. It hath an ancient castle, and is the see of a bishop, who was formerly a suffragan to that of Chieti, but is now immediately subject to the pope. Its bishopric was translated thither from Tortuno by pope Alexander IV. It was almost destroyed by an earthquake in February 2, 1703, before which time it was a fair and beautiful city. The first shock was so terrible, that the inhabitants abandoned the city; but having returned again in order to assist at the vespers, it being Candlemas-eve, new shocks followed with such violence that 2400 people perished in it, besides 1500 that were greatly hurt: 800 were destroyed in one church; and several other churches, as well as monasteries, with many noble buildings, particularly the town-house, were either swallowed up or overturned, together with the greater part of the town and town-walls. The neighbouring country produces saffron plentifully. Aquila lies 35 miles west of the Adriatic-sea, and 90 N.E. of Rome, in Lat. 42, 40, N. Long. 14, 20, E.

AQUILANDO, a lake in the foreland of Africa, receives a branch of the lake Zaire, and pours many rivers into the kingdom of Congo.

AQUILARIA, (mentioned by Cæsar, lib. ii. civ. bell. c. 23.) in the Carthaginian territory, or Africa Propria, now the kingdom of Tunis, where Curio landed his troops from Sicily, which were afterwards cut to pieces by Sabura. It is now supposed to be named Lowah-reah. Cæsar tells us it was a very convenient station in the summer season, and in the neighbourhood of two promontories. Of these, in all probability, that of Mercury (now called Ras-adder by the Moors, and Cape Bon by the French) was one, since this is about a league to the north of Lowah-reah. Many fragments of antiquity are still extant here, but nothing very remarkable. However, says our author, Shaw, from the sea-shore to this village, which is at half a mile distance, the interjacent mountain, from the level of the sea to the height of 20 or 30 feet, is all the way very artfully scooped and hollowed; small openings being carried up, in several places, to the surface, for the admission of fresh air; whilst large pillars and arches are left standing, at proper distances below, to support the mountain. These are the quarries which Strabo takes notice of, from whence the buildings of Carthage, Utica, and the many other adjacent cities, might receive their materials. Moreover, as the mountain above is all over shaded with trees;

as the arches below lie open to the sea, having a large cliff on each side, with the island Ægimurus placed over-against them; as there are likewise some fountains perpetually draining from the rocks, and seats for the weary labourer; we have little room to doubt (from such a concurrence of circumstances so exactly corresponding) but this is the cave which Virgil mentions to be somewhere in this gulph, in Æn. i. 163.

AQUILAR DEL CAMPO, a little town of Old Castile, in Spain, on the river Pisuergo.

AQUILEIA, AQUILA, AQUELEIA, or AQUILEGIA, called also by the Germans Aglar, and by Stephen of Byzantium Acyliæ, a city of Friuli, in Upper Italy, on the extremity of the Adriatic-sea. It was anciently, according to Livy and Pliny, a city of the Carni, and became a considerable colony of the Romans, consisting of about 3000 families, which afterwards were increased to 1500 families more. These, as Strabo tells us, fortified it, to keep in awe the Barbarians who occupied the higher countries, meaning the Alps. The emperor Augustus enlarged and embellished Aquileia, often making it the place of his residence; and here Herod the Great accused his two sons by Mariamne before him. Tiberius resided here also for some time; and Vespasian was proclaimed likewise first in this city. The tyrant Maximin besieged it, and was slain before it in 234, at which time the Aquileians, wanting bow-strings, they, to shew their fidelity to the Romans, cut off their wives hair, in order to supply that deficiency; in memory of which action the senate of Rome ordered a temple to be erected, and dedicated to Venus the Bald. This city was 12 miles in circuit, and the seat of many Roman emperors. It became so opulent in time, that Julian the Apostate says it was the richest and most trading town in all Italy; and for a long time it was looked upon as one of its strongest bulwarks against the Barbarians, until Attila took it after three years siege, with the greatest army ever heard of, which almost perished before it in the year 452. He plundered and in a great measure destroyed it; but soon after it was rebuilt by Narces, and its fortifications repaired.

The Lombards entering Italy 100 years after, burnt it to the ground: a little before which time Paulus Diaconus tells us that the then patriarch fled into the island of Grado, and took with him all the treasures of the church. After this Charlemagne having quite extirpated the empire of the Lombards, Aquileia belonged to the emperors and kings of Italy: but their claim ceasing, it fell successively to the dukes of Friuli; to the patriarchs; then to the Venetians; and afterwards to the archdukes of Austria; to which house it is now subject. The first council of Aquileia was assembled in 381 against the Arians, in the time of pope Damasus, which lasted from one in the afternoon to seven in the evening of the same day. They wrote a letter to the emperors Gratian and Valentinian, for the union of the churches of the East. Pope Gregory XII. who had been deposed by the council of Pifa, held a synod here to propose an accommodation.

Aquileia, which was formerly imperial, is now become the habitation of fishermen, its bad air having driven away the rest of its inhabitants. In travelling from Venice to Trieste, on this side of Monte Falcone, and on the right-hand side of the road, are seen some old walls, and a tower, which are the melancholy remains of the celebrated city of Aquileia; on the antiquities of which the venerable bishop Philip à Terre, has written a very judicious dissertation, called De Beleno et aliis Diis Aquilejensibus, which he has added to his Monumenta veteris Antii.

The patriarchal see was not removed from Aquileia; nor did that city fall into decay, till after the Venetians had made themselves masters both of it and almost the whole country, by force of arms: at which time, in order to suppress the power of those prelates, and prevent the Emperors, who lay claim to these conquests, from ever raising it to its ancient authority, they removed the see to Udino; where they have kept it ever since, in spite of all the endeavours of the Emperor to bring it back to its ancient residence: and at the same time the republic have so lessened their power, that those patriarchs are but the humble slaves of the state, and have no more than two or three benefices in their gift. They retain indeed the title of patriarch of Aquileia, and have an income sufficient to support the dignity; but in other respects they are inferior to those of Venice; and how small their power now is, see under VENICE.

The patriarchate of Aquileia is considerably more ancient than that of Venice; and his jurisdiction extends not only over the Friulense, Istria, and some other hereditary provinces of the house of Austria, but over the greatest part of those possessed by the republic in Lombardy. And as Venice has a right to nominate to this patriarchate, she has fallen upon the means of perpetuating it, by the power given to the patriarch to nominate his coadjutor as soon as he arrives at that dignity. So that this right must be always in the state of Venice; because none are ever raised to that dignity but noble Venetians, and those of the first families. This coadjutor, called Electo d'Aquileia, upon the death of the prelate, enters immediately into the possession of the patriarchate.

Besides the above-mentioned causes of the decay of Aquileia, may be added the stagnated waters, which, through neglect, and the rubbish of the city, are now turned into stinking marshes; that there are not above thirty or forty poor houses left, belonging principally to fishermen, as before observed, who get their living either from some lagunes, which are about three miles distant from it, or by the two rivers of Lizonzo and Ansa; the former of which waters it on the east, and the latter on the west side. Aquileia lies about three miles W. of Trieste, in Lat. 45. 51, N. Long. 30, 5, E.

AQUINO, or ALIFE, in Latin Aquinum, a small episcopal city of the Terra di Lavarò, a province of the kingdom of Naples, in the lower division of Italy; and its bishop is a suffragan to the archbishop of Capua. This is a very ancient place, and was formerly a Roman colony, on the confines of the Camagina; but now is almost in ruins, having been plundered and sacked by the Emperor Conrad. It gives the title of Count to the house of Avolostothe, now the Dukes of Sara. Aquino was the birth-place of Juvenal the poet, and of Thomas Aquinas the famous school-man, besides other great men. It stands on the rivulet Melfa, not far from the Gangliano, and about five miles from the confines of the Papal dominions, and 30 N. W. of Capua, in Lat. 41, 30, N. Long. 14, 30, E.

AQUISGRANUM. See AIX-LA-CHAPELLE.

AQUITAIN, or AQUITANIA, (of which Guyenne is a corruption) a name given by the Romans to a province of France. It was the third part of the ancient Gaul, which Julius Cæsar in his Commentaries includes between the Garonne, the Pyrenees, and the ocean, being of a much larger extent than it is at present: for what may be truly called the modern Aquitain, or, as it is at this day, is inclosed by the Loire, the ocean, and the Pyrenees. Some modern authors divide all Aquitain into three parts: the first of which comprehends Berry and Bourbonnois, both on this and the other side of the river Allier, Upper and Lower Auvergne, Rouvergne, Albigeois, Le Velay, Gevaudan, Le Quercy, the Upper and Lower Limosin, and the Upper and Lower Marche. The second part includes the Bourdelois, Medoc, Xaintonge, Aunis, and Angoumois. The third includes Armagnac, Bigorre, Comminges and Conserans, Bearn, Lower Navarre, Basques, Laudes, Bazadois, and the Lesser Gascony. These three parts contain the cities of Auch or Aix, Bourdeaux, Bourges, Agen, Aire, Albi, Angoulesme, Bayonne, Clermont, Cahors, Condom, Dax, Lescar, Le Bure, Limoges, Lombes, Oleron, Perigueux, Le Puy, Comminges, Conserans, Basas, Rodes, Xaintes, Sarlat, Torbes, Vabres, Moulis, Bergerac, Brayes, Brive, Pau, St. Licer, &c. (See GUYENNE or GUYENNE, and the above names respectively.)

AQUITAIN, in the Roman division of Gaul by Augustus, was distinguished into Prima and Secunda, comprising, as above, all the country between the Loire and the Pyrenees.

The

A R

The Romans made several attempts on this province. Pompey subdued the people of Comminges, and Cofferans, or Conserans, by the name of Conforani and Convenæ; and Crassus, Cæsar's quæstor, conquered all the rest. After the declension of the Roman empire, Aquitain came under the power of the Goths in the year 409, till these were conquered by the Franks, and expelled by Clovis in 507, who recovered the provinces of Aquitain, and made it a part of his kingdom. Lewis the pious made it a distinct one, and gave it to his son Pepin. But Charles the bald dispossessing the sons of Pepin, bestowed it on Arnulph of Burgundy, in the year 844, whose nephew William Count of Auvergne, who succeeded him, bequeathed his estates to Ebles III. Count of Poitou, from whom descended Eleanor, wife of king Henry II. of England, who, in right of his wife, succeeded to the Duchy of Aquitain, and his sons Richard and John possessed it successively after him. But in the time of the latter it was seized upon by the French king Lewis VIII. in the year 1202; which causing bloody wars between both nations, it was at length agreed between Henry III. king of England, and Lewis IX. king of France, the latter creating the former duke of Aquitain and peer of France, that the English should quietly possess Guienne, bounded on the north by the river Charante, and on the south by the Pyrennees, on their abandoning Normandy, Anjou, Touraine, and Maine; and from this time the kings of England were stiled only Dukes of Guienne. In this very province Edward III. defeated and took John king of France prisoner. The crown of England enjoyed this dignity and country until the time of the unfortunate Henry VI. when Charles VII. of France recovered Guienne, after a bloody battle won from the English in 1452. Lewis XI. gave it to his brother Charles; but he dying without issue, it returned to the Crown of France, of which kingdom it has ever since been a part.

AR, the chief city of Moab, Deut. ii. 9, 18, 29. Numb. xxi. 15, 28. Isaiah xv. 1. &c. situated on the river Arnon, called also Rabbah (or the Great), Josh. xiii. 25. and, to distinguish it from a city of the same name in the land of Ammon, Rabbath Moab. (Hieron. in Moab.) In after-times it was called Areopolis, by the addition of the Greek word polis, which signifies a city. Dr. Wells adds, that the Greeks thought it named Ar from their worshipping the god of war, called by them (the Greeks) Ares, and Mars by the Latins. But the likeness between the Hebrew word Ar and the Greek word Ares, seems to be the only foundation for this etymology. It is said by some writers to be the same city that appears in the geography of Ptolemy under the name of Rhalmathum. Some take this Ar to have been the same with Aroer; but the contrary opinion is the most probable, so far as Aroer was given to the tribe of Gad, and on the north-side of the Arnon; whereas Ar was all along inhabited by the Moabites, and was situated on the south-side of the said river. It is farther here to be remarked, that after the captivity of the Ten Tribes, and of the tribes of Reuben and Gad, that were possessed of the country between the river Arnon and Jabbok, the Moabites re-possessed themselves of several places on the north of the river Arnon. Whence it is, that in the prophecies against Moab we find mention made of Heshbon, and several other places, once belonging to the Reubenites and Gadites, as belonging then to the Moabites. Not but that even in the writings of Moses we find the plains on the east of Jordan called the Plains of Moab; namely, as appertaining once to the Moabites, therefore retain their old name.

ARABAT, ARABET, or ORBOTEC, a little town of Crim Tartary, in European Turkey, near the Palus Mæotis, and stands on a peninsula or neck of land about half a quarter of a league over, which is pallisadoed from sea to sea. It has two castles to defend it. Here the Khan of Tartary keeps his stud of horses, which are reckoned to amount to about 7000.

ARABAY, the principal town of Madura, one of the East Indian islands in Asia; situated at the bottom of a deep bay, eight leagues from the most westerly land of Java.

ARABIA, in Hebrew Harab, Hereb, and Ereb, by the orientals called Arabistana, a country of vast extent in Asia, reaching from lat. 11 to 30 N. and from long. 35 to 60 E. Its dimensions in length, as given by modern geographers, vary greatly. Whatever its true breadth be, which is computed from Jodda on the west, to Cape Roselda or Razalgate on the east; it is much contracted in the middle, and at both extremities, especially on the north side, where it runs into a narrow point between Syria and Palestine and Diarbeck. Arabia lying between the second, third, fourth, and fifth climates; their longest day in the south is about 14 hours and a half, and in the north about 18 and a half. This great diversity of climates, added to the nature of the soil in many parts, renders the country for the most part barren, hot and dry, yielding but little sustenance either for man or beast, with regard to corn, vegetables, and water, and consequently is but thinly peopled. It is bounded by part of Asiatic Turkey, namely, Palestine and Syria Propria on the north, by Persia and its gulph on the east, by the Indian or main ocean on the south, and by the Red-sea; with the Isthmus of Suez on the west.

Among most nations this country hath all along retained its ancient name; but whence it had it, is not agreed. The justest etymology which the Jews also also adopt, is from the Hebrew Harabi, which word signifies a robber; such as the inhabitants have always been: and so much have they in all ages been addicted to robbery and plunder, that, as Martin del Rio observes, it was as usual among the Hebrews to call a thief an Arabian, as to stile a merchant a Canaanite, or an astronomer a Chaldean.

This country, though so very extensive, is the best described of any in all Asia. And this is the more remarkable, its inhabitants having made, it is well known, no figure in the world till the decline of the Roman empire; when Heraclius, emperor of the east, making use of them against the Persians, caused them to be instructed in the art of war, of which they appear to have been utterly ignorant before that period.

It is usually subdivided into these three parts; 1. Arabia Deserta, or Desert, at this day Beriara or Arden; 2. Arabia Petræa or Stony, now Barrab; and 3. Arabia Fœlix or Happy, called also Hyaman, which name it is said the Saracens gave it.

Arabia Deserta extends itself from Syria and Arabia Petræa, to the gulph of Bassora, between the river Euphrates and the mountains of Arabia Fœlix. It is a more level country than Arabia Petræa, but fuller of sands and deserts, whence it has acquired its name; and, if it has any fertile parts, they lie mostly on that side next the Euphrates. It contains two cities, both called by the name of Anna; but that which lies on the Euphrates is the most considerable. The plains of sand are so spacious and long, as to take up 12 days in passing them: and travellers are obliged to direct their course by the compass; and, with their beasts, suffer greatly for want of water, that which they find being always ill-tasted.

Arabia Petræa derives its name from the city Petra, situated on the lake of Sodom, now called Arach, as being built upon rocks. This part has the Red-sea and Egypt to the west, the deserts of Arabia to the east, Palestine and Syria to the north, and a chain of mountains which divide it from Arabia Fœlix, to the south. Besides Betra, it contains the cities of Bosra and Buffereth, Mada and Madbah, with Toror Eltor, on the Red-sea. It is thought that the Israelites took their route this way into the desert, and made their abode here for 40 years together. It is a very barren country. In it are the mountains of Sinai and Horeb, which are so famous in scripture.

Arabia Fœlix, called in scripture Saba and Sabæa, from Saba, Ham's grandson, extends from the mountains which separate the two other Arabias, to the ocean. Upon the right-hand westward lies the Red-sea or sea of Mecca, called also the Arabian gulph; on the left eastward is the gulph of Bassora and Ormus, called the Persian gulph; southward, right before it, lies the Eastern or Indian sea, called also the sea of Arabia. The chief towns of this country are Medina, Mecca, Zibit, Tatach, Almacarana, Maroba, Missa, Masfat, Sohar, Bahr, Mascalat, besides many others; some of which are under particular princes; and others, a thing rare in Asia, observe a democratical government.

These three joined together constitute the largest peninsula in the world, and in some of the hottest climates; part of it being under the torrid zone, the tropic of Cancer passing over Arabia Fœlix. The air in the northern parts is extremely hot during the summer-months, the sky then being seldom or never overcast; but on its south side it is much more temperate by reason of refreshing dews; and is in general healthy.

The Latin titles annexed to the three Arabias, sufficiently indicate the nature of their respective soils; the Northern or Petræa being extremely barren, and encumbered with huge dreary rocks; the other or Deserta, over-run with vast mountains of sand: but the southern, deservedly stiled the Happy, is blessed with an excellent soil, which in many places is extraordinarily fruitful. Yet in general the whole country is but poorly watered, having few springs or rivers, and these small and shallow, and very little rain or other refreshments than what is had from the above-mentioned dews: so that in most parts the ground does not produce enough for the support of its inhabitants. The best of it lies on the sea-coast, and along the banks of rivers, where the soil being more fertile, is consequently better peopled. But here they hold most of their markets in the night, by reason of the extreme heat in the day-time.

The product of Arabia is aloes, cassia, spikenard, frankincense, myrrh, manna, and other costly gums, cinnamon, pepper, cardomum, dates, oranges, lemons, pomegranates, figs, and other fruits; honey and wax in plenty. In their seas are found coral, pearl, and a species of cornelian much esteemed, because easy to be engraved. Among other domestic animals in this country, the camels, which are very numerous here, and of singular use for carriage, especially for the carravans, seem purposely created by Providence for this sultry dry soil, where there are so many sandy deserts, in which no water is to be found in many days travelling. This creature is so wisely formed by the God of nature, that it can throw up the liquids in its stomach into its throat, so as not to require water for three days, and can subsist even a fortnight without it. They can carry on their backs about six hundred weight, which need never be unloaded during the journey; for they naturally kneel down to rest, and in due time they rise up with their load. These are the carriage-beasts mostly in use, and especially in their long journeys performed in carravans, or numerous troops troops of merchants, with a sufficient escort to guard them from the Arabian robbers. They have horses in this country, which are very fleet, but small and ill-shaped, and they are mostly used by those plunderers, who are exceeding swift of foot, as well as their horses. These they bring up to any thing, and are such great lovers of them, that they keep their genealogy, though they are generally ignorant of their own. The Arabs are also very sly, and fall upon you before you are aware, and are gone before you can think of pursuing.

This odd species of creatures, hardly deserving the title of human, are all swarthy, of a middling stature, raw-boned, of a wild fierce look, and very swift of foot; their voices are effeminate as well as their dispositions. They have no settled habitations, except such as live on the sea-coasts, where their cities and towns are more regularly built and peopled, and they are more addicted to trade: whereas those of the inland countries rove about, sleeping under tents, which they pitch at night, wherever their convenience for pasture, or their fancy leads them. Afterwards we find them to have been intermixed with the Saracens, and called by that name, which signifies thieves or plunderers living upon robbery.

As the character given of this people by Ammianus Marcellinus, a Roman writer, who lived in the 4th century, exactly tallies with that of the modern Arabs, so far as we learn from travellers, or such as have fallen unluckily into their hands, it will not be foreign to our present purpose to insert it here.

"They are a people whom we are not to wish either for our friends or enemies; a martial race, half-naked, being clad a little below the waist, with painted cassocks, roving up and down on camels and fleet horses, as well in peace as in time of war. They are used neither to plow, plant, or till the ground, but wander from place to place, without either house or home, or constant habitation. They are not governed by any laws, nor can they brook any restraint. They cannot even endure to be long confined on the same soil, or under the same climate; their manner of living being always fleeting, like ravenous vultures, who snatch their prey in their flight, but never tarry or stay if it require any time for carrying it off. Their food is commonly such venison and fowl as they catch, or milk, or such herbs as fall in their way; knowing nothing either of corn or wine. Their wives they only hire for a time, who, though for a show of marriage they present their husbands with a spear and tent, can readily part with them whenever they will. Both sexes are excessively addicted to lust. The women are as roving as the men, married in one place, and brought to bed in another, leaving their children wherever they are born, without any farther care about them.

They are still to be found a rude rapacious rabble, who always go in droves, catching all that comes within their reach, and fleeing to their boards like beasts of prey; plundering whole countries and caravans, and murdering all that make head against them. The Turks, who have subdued the greater part of the Arabs, do all they can to curb them. But they possess only a small part of Arabia, and that towards the N. So that though this country be reckoned under the Turkish government, yet it may be said more properly to be under their protection than dependence. The cheriff of Mecca, who is reckoned a descendant of Mahomet, holds still very large dominions; and many other princes in that country look upon themselves as independent. Those in Arabia Felix are indeed kept under some curb, by the Turkish galleys on the Red sea: but the rest are left to rove on the mountainous parts, some in the deserts of Lybia and Thebais; others on the frontiers of Idumea, Syria, Palestine, &c. These the Turkish bashaws endeavour all they can to suppress, and they often cut off such as fall into their hands. But great numbers of them still subsist there, by retiring into such mountains and deserts as no army can come at them. Some of them nearer to Syria are something more orderly, and maintain themselves by making of pot-ash, and are Mahometans of the Abulmazar sect. But the rest, more out of their reach, having supplies of gunpowder and fire-arms, from Persia, to annoy the Turks, are the most to be dreaded. Those Arabs who live on the borders of Egypt are the poorest and most miserable, except some few to whom the Turks give lands to defend the frontiers against the rest. The Grand Signior it is said, keeps always 30,000 men in pay, for defending against them the pilgrims which go to Mecca and Medina, as also the caravans; and for the same intention he makes very considerable presents to the above-mentioned cheriff.

Though what has been said may be justly looked upon as the character of the far greater part of the Arabs, yet many of them, especially such as live in towns, who apply themselves to trades and commerce, to arts and sciences, generally excel in these. And this is more particularly true with regard to the ancient Arabians, whose extraordinary performances in physic, astronomy, and the mathematics, shew them to have been men of great genius, application, and industry. They are to this day allowed to be very ingenious, subtle, witty, and generous, great admirers of poetry and rhetoric: but on the other hand, very superstitious, much addicted to astrology, and vindictive. With regard to their living altogether upon plunder, the Ishmaelites in particular are so far from being ashamed of it, that they think themselves the only nation which is entitled to that way of living, as Abraham, the father of their progenitor, is recorded to have sent him away without any portion; whence they infer that he left that son, when he first sent him out, the whole world to range in at pleasure. It should be remembered that the figures which we use in arithmetic are not only allowed to have been invented by them, but retain also their ancient form.

To the character of the Arabians in general it may be added that they are of a melancholy, thoughtful turn; they are sober, frugal, and contented with little, four milk is a delicious drink among them. They have a meagre look, and wear their beards long, looking upon them as sacred; and for that reason they perfume those of their guests in token of their great esteem for them. They swear also by their beards, and look upon it as a great injury to have any body touch them.

The common language used in the three Arabias is the Arabesque or corrupt Arabic; which is not only used in this country, but with some variation of dialect, as is usual in some cases over a great part of the east. The true ancient Arabic, which is a sort of dialect of the Hebrew, is only taught in the schools, as Greek and Latin among us, being understood only by the learned, but so far understood in general as to be used by all the Mahometans in their worship. They are very fond of it, and look upon it as the language which was spoken by Adam and Eve in paradise. In it the Alcoran was written, and therefore they will not suffer it to be read in any other. This indeed is a fine ancient language, and their letters are joined together, several of them being only distinguishable by points.

Christianity was first preached among them by St. Paul, and some other of his eminent disciples. St. Jude also preached in this country; so that Arabia received the light of the Gospel from the earliest time; but in many parts of it was much clouded, if not totally eclipsed, long before the grand impostor, Mahomet, their countryman, appeared. And upon their being subdued by the Turks they all embraced his religion, as most suited their depraved inclinations. In ancient days they were all idolaters; and Herodotus tells us that they acknowledged but two deities, namely, Bacchus and the celestial Venus; the former they called Urotalt, and the latter Alilat; both which names seem from their etymology to signify no other than the sun and moon. Hence Alexander the Great was very desirous to have conquered them, if possible, that he might be worshipped by them as a third deity. But the modern Arabs, who are descended from Ishmael, acquaint us with many other deities, whose names varied according to the several blessings they enjoyed or prayed for; and it is not unlikely, that these were some of the planets. It is likewise not improbable that they worshipped the two antelopes mentioned so often in their histories, and which were at length presented to their temples of Mecca. They are accused also by Christian authors, as well as by several of their own, that they paid a sort of worship to a black stone, which has since been fixed in the portico of that temple. The Arabs are divided, by their own writers, into Gentile and Moslem, or Mussulman. The former are stiled Arabs of the times of ignorance, and the others the faithful, or true believers. With regard to the Christian religion, they themselves acknowledge that three of their tribes, namely, Thannouk, Bahera, and Naclab, had embraced it; and add, that the first of these having quarrelled with its neighbours on account of their religion, went and settled in the province of Baharim, on the Persian gulph.

This country was first peopled by Chus, the son of Cham or Ham, whose posterity spread themselves over Arabia Petraea and Arabia Felix, where they founded several monarchies and separate governments. But the learned Bochart makes those of Arabia Felix to be descended from Joctan the son of Shem; and the other two, namely, the Stony and Desert, from the aforesaid Cush. They no doubt have been greatly intermixed with other nations, and they are accordingly stiled by the prophet Jeremiah, chap. xxv. "The mixed people that dwell in the wilderness." — Afterwards the Midianites, sons of Abraham by Keturah, the Ishmaelites, descended from the same patriarch by Agar or Hagar, and the posterity of Amalek, the grandson of Esau, grew up to mighty nations and kingdoms in Arabia Petraea. The Midianites (a different branch of Midian's family from that in Palestine) dwelt in that part of Arabia contiguous to Egypt, and had probably preserved the worship of the true God, when Moses retired thither on his slaying an Egyptian, and where he married the daughter of Jethro, who was prince and priest of that country. This last was therefore very assisting to the Jewish lawgiver and people when they passed through this country in their flight from Egypt. And of these the Kenites, mentioned often in Scripture, and esteemed always as friends to the Israelites, were a branch, and are recorded to have lived in tents like the generality of the Arabs. The Amalekites, sworn enemies to the Israelites, who, after many defeats from the latter, were at length totally extirpated, according to God's express command, were seated likewise in this country; and what remained undestroyed of them were wholly blended with the Arabs and Saracens, and even the name of them buried in theirs.

The Ishmaelites were very powerful also, and formed 12 distinct petty kingdoms, the princes of each being descended from one of the 12 sons of Ishmael. These had spread themselves over the greatest part of Arabia, and had fallen very early into the method of trading into Egypt, and carrying thither spices, balms, frankincense, myrrh, opium, opium, and other costly merchandise. And these are observed likewise to have travelled in troops or caravans, and used camels for carriage. But as very few of them carried on that trade, so the rest lived like some of the Arabs on plunder, and like them were a vagabond race, whose hand was against every man, and every man's against them, according to the angel's prediction in Genesis xvi. concerning Ishmael, their progenitor. And from them came the Saracens, who were the same nation with them, though under a different name. They used to circumcise all their males at 13 years old, because Ishmael was circumcised at that age, according to Genesis xvii. These people were from him first called Ishmaelites, next Hagarites, and at last Saracens, choosing rather, says Collier, to be called after the mistress than the maid. They call themselves the noblest people in the world, and for that reason match with no other.

The barrenness of that part of Arabia bordering on Idumæa, Chaldæa, or Egypt, may be a natural reason why it was never conquered by the great monarchies of antiquity, or by Egyptians, Greeks, Romans, or Turks; since otherwise the spices, balm, gums, and other valuable productions of Arabia Felix, with which they were all sufficiently acquainted, would unquestionably have tempted some of them to such an enterprise. But the latter part of the prophecy just mentioned, which says that Ishmael should live in the face of all his brethren, and which hath been always understood of their remaining unconquered, has been their greatest security: so that though their country hath been frequently attempted, yet it has been always without success. Accordingly Alexander the Great had intended to try his invincible arms against it, but was prevented by death. Augustus sent an army against it out of Egypt; but the excessive heat of the air and drought of the soil so affected them, that, after the first defeat, they were forced to return. Both this emperor and some of his successors have been complimented with the conquest of it: but it is well known that they found out an easy way of challenging countries which they never subdued; and triumphing over nations that never submitted to them. So that it is an opinion still generally received that they never were conquered, but were under their own government, though divided into many kingdoms, states, tribes, &c. till the grand impostor Mahomet appeared, who, by broaching his new religion, laid the foundation for a new monarchy. (See TURKY.) Since which time this religion found so many votaries that it spread itself over the greatest part of Asia and Africa, and even some considerable provinces of Europe: for they were his disciples who had founded the four great empires of Turkey, Persia, Morocco, and Fez; and of the great mogul, to say nothing of the many countries they occupy in India, in all which Mahometanism is universally professed; though they have divided into innumerable sects, some of which vastly differ from, and bear each other a more inveterate hatred than to those of any other religion or nation whatever. It will not be impertinent to our present purpose to give here a short account of the rise and progress of this new religion and its author.

Mohammed, or, as he is commonly called among us; Mahomet, was a person of obscure birth and mean fortune, who, getting into the service of a wealthy merchant at Mecca, and after his death into the favour of his widow, so far as to take him for her second husband, he acquired at once a plentiful estate, which he improved for some years, by driving a considerable trade with it. Having had but a mean education, he was very illiterate; but he so far made up this defect by unmeasurable ambition and some share at least of cunning; if not genius, that he quickly had the reputation of a prophet and lawgiver among a people universally corrupted and depraved. The falling-sickness, to which he was subject, it is said, greatly contributed to facilitate his designs, by his pretending those fits to be supernatural, or rather divine transports, in which his soul was at such times carried up to heaven, and he conversed with the Deity. And the pidgeon which he had trained to peck out of his ear, gave no small countenance to his illusions, gaining ground among the people. One Sergius, a Greek monk, banished his country for Nestorianism, and a person of more learning than honesty, became intimately acquainted with him; and by the help of a renegade Jew, he was assisted in forming his new religion, which was an odd medley of Arianism, Judaism, and Gentilism; but so artfully blended, that it had the appearance of a new religion; not so much founded upon, as levelled against the other three.

The ground of this pretended revelation was, that the heathen had miserably corrupted themselves by their polytheism and idolatries. That the Jews likewise, who had received the law of Moses, instead of keeping it had perverted it; upon which account God had sent his next great prophet Jesus, to enforce on them the true observance of the Mosaic law, and to instruct them in a more sublime doctrine than that of the Jews; but that this prophet, having been rejected also by the Jews, and his doctrine corrupted by the Christians, God had now sent his last and greatest prophet Mahomet, with a new and more excellent law, the acceptance and observance of which he should enforce, not by miracles, as Jesus and Moses had done, but by the power of the sword. Thus, by acknowledging Moses to be a prophet and lawgiver, he strove to gain the Jews; by granting Jesus Christ to be a still greater prophet, which was nearly all that the Arians acknowledged him to be, he was likely to gain many of them; and his declaring himself so peremptorily against the use of images in churches, he obliged the Iconoclastes, which two sects of Christians having been driven out of the Roman empire, became very numerous and turbulent in Arabia. Again, by his allowance of polygamy, and the gratification of other carnal and irregular appetites, as well as by means of the pleasures which he promised to them in his paradise, he captivated the libertines and effeminate persons of the age; insomuch that he found the number of his followers increase much beyond his expectation; though he still depended principally on his last and most cogent argument, the sword, which would effectually force into his religion such as the other means could not prevail on to become his converts.

This last expedient, he not only made use of himself, wherever the others failed, but he has also strictly enjoined it to all his votaries: at the same time promising to all that lost their lives in that service a peculiar sort of beatitude in the other world, and such as could not fail to inspire them with a more than ordinary zeal for the propagation of his doctrine, by the most severe and inhuman methods. The magistrates of Mecca, however, were so alarmed at the setting up of this bold pretender for himself, and his uncommon success in gaining proselytes, that they issued out an order for having him seized. But upon his receiving timely notice of it, he fled to Medina, before it was put in execution; and there propagated his doctrine with such surprising facility and quickness that it soon spread itself on all sides. About this time it happened that the Saracens, who had served the Christian emperors in some of their wars against the Persians, not thinking themselves sufficiently rewarded, grew to such a height of discontent, that they went and seized upon Damascus, which they made the seat of their government, and it continued so for several centuries. These readily fell in afterwards with Mahomet's doctrine, as most agreeable to their licentious way of life, and made him emperor of Arabia.

Mahomet seeing himself thus raised and powerfully supported, took upon him the title of Cherif or Caliph, which signifies both a prince and high priest. Others say that he did not assume this title, but that it was taken by his successor. However, this new monarch began his reign in the year of Christ 622; and not only strongly established his throne, but also greatly enlarged his dominions before his death, which happened 10 years after.

His successor, Ubabezer's short reign of two years did not permit him to make any great conquests. But the next, who was named Omar or Hawmar, subdued Persia, Egypt, Palestine, and part of Syria and Mesopotamia. To Oman succeeded Osmin or Osman, who added Barbary to his other dominions, and raised that empire to the greatest height it ever arrived at from the æra of Mahomet; for by that time they began to divide into parties and form various dissensions. Hali, Mahomet's kinsman, claimed the government, which after some hard struggles he obtained, but was shortly after murdered by Osman; whose successor again mounting the throne, made some farther additions to their old conquests, particularly Asia Minor, Armenia, and Mesopotamia; all which, within the space of 100 years, became subject to the Mahometan Saracens, together with the countries above-mentioned. A swift progress indeed! but such as Divine Providence had pleased to permit, as a just punishment for the great enormities which had crept into the eastern empire. Mahomet II. of that name, and the 20th caliph, about the year of Christ 760, removed the imperial seat to Bagdat, which is either the ancient Babylon, or a city built upon its ruins, and situated on the Tigris, in the province of Hurat. About 100 years after this transaction, Egypt revolted, and set up a caliph of its own, to whom the Arabians on that side submitted. But that race, after a series of 300 years, was entirely routed by the Turks; and these again by the Mamelucks, who held the government for the space of about 250 years: till at length both Egypt, and all the other dominions of that Mameluck Caliphate, were subdued to the Turkish empire by Sultan Selim I. in the year 1517. With regard to the Turks, who so long possessed all the Saracenic empire, (see Turcomania) their original country. It will suffice to say here, that they are strict believers in Mahomet, and annually make pilgrimages, out of their high veneration for this country, to Medina, the city where their false prophet lies buried, and also to Mecca, the place of his nativity. The æra or date used among the Arabians is the Hegira, being the famous flight of the impostor Mahomet from Mecca to Medina, on account of the order issued by the magistrates of the former city for apprehending him, and which is usually placed in the year of Christ 622. They had anciently very potent princes, who made war against the Assyrians, Egyptians, Persians, Romans, Jews, and Grecians; and, under the caliphs of the Saracen race, acquired a great command in Asia and Africa, as has been shewn above.

The Arabians adhere now to Melick's interpretations of the Alcoran, though some follow Odman or Osman. But the Arabians of Africa have set up above 60 different sects. Amongst the Arabians of Asia are some Greek Christians, towards the mounts Sinai and Horeb, the Red-sea, and the deserts of Arabia Petrea, and Deserts; but few or none in Arabia Felix, unless it be at Mascat and Galafat, and in some other places belonging to the Portuguese.

In Arabia two councils were holden; the first against Beryllus, bishop of Bosra, who denied that Christ had a distinct essence from the Father before his incarnation, from which Origen reclaimed him, about the year 229. Another council was held, about the year 246, against some bishops, who maintained that the soul died and rose again with the body: which tenet Origen also refuted.

After this general account of Arabia, we come now to treat more distinctly of it, with regard to its threefold division, into Desert, Stony, and Happy.

I. ARABIA DESERTA, or FIRST ARABIA, generally by the moderns called Berii, Arbiſtan, and Beriara, was by ancient geographers placed as bounded by the Trachonitis on the west, the kingdom of Damascus on the north, whence that capital of Syria and its territory is sometimes reckoned part Arabia. On its most northern limits it had Syria and Mesopotamia, and on the south and east Arabia Felix. But, according to modern geography and the names now in use, it is bounded on the east by the province of Diarbeckr, or the ancient Mesopotamia, and the Persian territory of Hierak; on the west by Palestine or Sowrie, otherwise Souristan, and Arabia Petraea; on the north by the river Farat or the Euphrates, which parts it from Diarbeckr, and by Palmyrene or part of Syria; and on the south by Arabia Felix, from which it is divided by a long chain of mountains.

The ancient inhabitants of this country were the posterity of Huz, the son of Nabor, and of Abraham's sons by Ketura. It is also reckoned to be the country where holy Job dwelt, and from which the eastern wise-men, or magi, came with presents to worship the great Messiah, when in the manger, (see Frederick Spanheim's History of Job). Among those were intermixed likewise some tribes of the Edomites, who were the descendants of Esau, since called Idumeans; of the Moabites, Midianites, Itureans, Amalekites, Nabatheans, &c. Here the Israelites, after passing the Red-sea, sojourned for the 40 years they wandered in the wilderness: so that it became the scene of innumerable miracles both of mercy and judgment, performed by the Divine Providence, through the mediation of their great law-giver, Moses; particularly those of the divine law given him from Mount Sinai, with so august, and at the same time dreadful, solemnity; of manna, which continued falling down from heaven, in order to feed those refractory and murmuring rebels, during their so long abode here; of the miraculous stream, which came gushing from the rock to allay their thirst; the evident vestiges of which fissure or disruptions in the rock at that very place, Dr.

Clayton, bishop of Clogher, in his Defence of Christianity, says are still visible even to this day: besides many other prodigies well known: all which manifested a divine interposition in their favour. Moses properly called it the Wilderness or Desert; for such it really was in general, being intersected almost every where by high barren mountains; and many of its plains no other than vast tracks of sands and heaths, through which travellers must not only carry provisions, but steer their course by the stars and the mariner's compass. Ginland Melchoir, who went over some of these, tells us, that neither men, beasts, birds, or trees, grass, or pasture, are to be seen, or any thing but waste sands and craggy mountains; but that the lands lying on the east-side, along the river Euphrates, afford both plants and food for the inhabitants of divers cities and towns, situated in that part. There are some plains and valleys also, which feed great numbers of sheep and goats, and the like small cattle that love to browse on such dry lands. With regard to horses, cows, or oxen, hogs, &c. these, requiring another sort of food, could find no sustenance here; only camels can subsist in these parts, and are bred in great numbers: whence it was that those ancient inhabitants were induced to lead a migratory and vagabond life, without cities, houses, or any fixed habitation; pitching their tents where they found most convenient pasture for their small cattle, the milk of which was, for the most part, their principal food. But as hence they were not furnished with sufficient and constant supplies, they were obliged to make use of the hostile as well as roving method, and live in part upon the plunder of such as fell in their way; and therefore they shifted their habitations the oftener, to go in quest of new prey. On account of their living thus in tents, the old geographers have stiled them Scenites: but they call themselves Bedoni or Bedouins, from the Arabic word Bedoat, which denotes a desert or level country.

They commonly look for fresh pasture, particularly near places where they can find water for themselves and their cattle; and, when that is eaten up, seek out for fresh. Their fear of being surprised, as living upon plunder, makes them shift their abodes sooner than otherwise they would. From the high opinion which they have of their extraction, they think it below them to follow any mechanic employment, or even cultivate the lands; so that they are wholly taken up in riding and feeding their flocks. They acknowledge subjection to none but their own emirs or princes; and seldom or ever have any commerce, much less alliance, with the Turks, Moors, &c. whom they look upon as usurpers of their inheritance, and as bastards. The Turks claiming no dominion, except over a few of them towards the north, which pay the Porte some small acknowledgment for its protection, leave the rest to do as they will; and, as has been above hinted, they even pay an annual tribute to them, especially to the caliph of Mecca, that they may spare plundering the caravans and pilgrims, which pass to and from that city. These emirs have each cheichs under them, more or less, according to the extent of their dominions, who are a kind of sub-governors. Cheich denotes an elder, and is equally applied to men of learning as well as these governors. The latter are lords over a certain number of families, out of which they choose the soldiery, both for their plundering-expeditions, and for guarding their camps. In other respects these Bedoni value themselves much for their fidelity and hospitality, especially to such as put themselves under their protection.

The Arab's weapons in general are the spear, sword, an iron-club, and sometimes a hatchet. Fire-arms of any kind are never used, except by such of them as lie towards Persia; whence, as has been hinted, they are supplied to annoy the Turks; for it is death to any of the sultan's subjects to furnish them. The Arabs, in most of the other parts in this country, are so little used to gunpowder, that the noise and even smoke of it throw them into a panic; but they are expert marksmen with their spear and darts, and are commonly well-mounted. And generally with the best of these horses their emirs present the grand sultan; and this is all the tribute they pay him.

Some of these Bedoni having spread themselves as far as Egypt, commonly encamp between the cities and the sea or river. They live like gypsies among us, roving about with their wives, children, and cattle. The children go quite naked; the women wear only a kind of blue long shift, and the men a coarse linen jacket, reaching down to their knees. They all profess Mahometanism; but without troubling their heads much about the various interpretations of the Alcoran. They keep the feasts and fasts of the Turkish law with great exactness, using the same washings and hours of prayer as the rest do. At the circumcision of their children they make great rejoicings, commonly sacrificing an ox or a few sheep, giving away the flesh to the poorer sort. They are very civil, it is said, to Christians, whom they suffer to live among them with all freedom: so that to see their hospitable behaviour in their communities, and meet them on the highway in their plundering excursions, one would not take them to be the same people.

They have neither laws, lawyers, nor judges, the cheichs reconciling all differences among them; and to the emir they appeal from their sentence. They affect extraordinary gravity in their discourse and deportment, and look upon the beard as a distinguishing gift of Providence; and that no greater punishment can be inflicted upon them than cutting it off. Wives shew their respect to their husbands, children to their parents, and friends to each other, by kissing their beards. To ascertain the genealogy of their horses, especially those of an extraordinary breed, they call witnesses to every foal that is dropt; their pedigree, colour, marks, &c. are registered by a cheich, or man of letters, all which is faithfully produced and attested, when the creatures come to be sold; and some of them bear a very high price, and bring from 1000 to 2000 crowns. For this reason they are very solicitous, as was said before, about the genealogy of their horses; but as to their own, if they know only from what root they have sprung, and who was their father and grandfather, they mind no more.

Arabia Deserta is subdivided into three principalities; namely, 1. Anna, 2. Argia, and 3. Chavabeda. The capitals of each have also the same names.

II. ARABIA PETRÆA, the most westerly province of the three; now called Das-lik Arabistan by the Turks, Barraah Arabistan by the natives, and by others Bâthalabah; but most commonly the beglerbergate of Bosra, from its capital of the same name. It is bounded on the N. by Syria and Palestine; on the E. by Arabia Deserta, and part of Arabia Felix, which also bounds it on the S. and on the W. by the Red sea, and the Isthmus of Suez or Egypt. Its extent from N. to S. is reckoned about 180 miles, and from E. to W. 150. It includes part of ancient Idumea to the N. and some extend it a good way into the territory of Mecca to the S. The northern part of Arabia Petraea is full of barren mountains; for which reason it is but poorly inhabited, and is under the Turks in the beglerbergate of Cairo; but the southern is both fertile and well-inhabited, being governed by princes of its own, except in some places on the coast. It is also more frequented, for the sake of trade; but anciently it was more famed for the deserts of Zin, Parân, &c. in which the Israelites so long wandered.

The reason of its name Petraea has been shewn above. This country is also called in ancient authors Syria, Sobal, and Zabal; by others, as Josephus, St. Jerom, &c. Nabathea, and Nabathene, either from Nabajoth the first-born of Ishmael; or rather from Nabatha, which some geographers say was its metropolis before Petraea became so. However, though in most respects it resembles Arabia Deserta, for its stony, sandy, waste and barren grounds, yet in some parts it affords sufficient maintenance for cattle, the milk of which, and camel's flesh are the principal food of the inhabitants. But some particular tracts are uninhabited and impassable.

III. ARABIA FÆLIX. This province, which is by far the largest and most considerable of the three, the inhabitants call Yeman, Yaman, and Hayaman, from one of its largest districts, which gives name to all the rest. It has been entitled Felix, or happy, from its uncommon fertility and continual verdure. It was anciently called Saba, Sabea, and Seba, by the sacred writers, Josephus, and St. Jerom, from Seba the son of Cush, and grandson of Ham (Gen. x.) who founded a city calling it by his own name, and was anciently famous for its opulence, especially in gold and silver. This Arabia Fælix lies to the S. of the other two, and is surrounded on all the three remaining sides by the sea: namely, the Red-sea on the W. the gulph of Persia and Ormus on the E. and the ocean or Arabian sea on the S. The ancients not only called it the Happy, but added the title of Sacred, on account of its aromatic gums and fragrant woods used in sacrifices; particularly frankincense, myrrh, aloes, nard, cinnamon, cassia, cedar, and other odoriferous woods, which are here so plentiful that the natives use them for common fuel.

From the high praises which the ancients have given the country in their accounts of this Arabia, one would take it for the richest and most delightful tract on the whole globe. According to them it not only produced the above-mentioned costly gums and plants, besides a vast variety of precious drugs, medicinal shrubs, herbs, &c. but also abundance of gold and silver, besides the baser metals and minerals, diamonds, rubies, emeralds, sardonyxes, and a great many other precious stones, of exquisite beauty and diversity of colours. The sea likewise afforded the greatest quantity of shells and richest pearls. It also exceeded all other countries in the fertility of its soil and immense produce of grain, wine, oil, and the most delicious fruits and spices of all sorts. For, according to Strabo, corn was sown there twice a year, and yielded a prodigious increase, and so did every thing else in proportion. It had a vast number of rich and opulent cities, besides towns and villages; and it was reckoned the most populous province in all Asia. And it was in such esteem among the Romans, even so late as Ammianus Marcellinus, that the high panegyric which he gives upon it concludes, "Besides most wholesome springs of medicinal waters, they enjoy the benefit of many brooks and rivers very pure and clear, and a temperature of air exceeding healthy." But were the rest of the character he gives of this country to be judged from the last article, what he says must go for nothing: for the air and climate cannot be different from what it was in his time; and how he should extol the temperature of a country lying two parts in three within the tropics is not easy to be conceived. What this author says of trading towns and commodious harbours might indeed be true then; but the case is quite altered since: for the Red-sea was very much resorted to by merchant-ships before the discovery of the Cape of Good Hope, and the passage that way to the Indies was found out; so that Arabia was the mart where all the commodities brought from India, China, and the Indian-islands were sold to the merchants of Egypt and Barbary, and carried by the latter over land to Cairo, and other ports in the Mediterranean, to which the English, Venetians, and other European nations resorted, to take these off their hands. But at present, as Indian and Persian goods are brought directly to us by sea, our commerce with Arabia is for that reason considerably decreased. However, if this account, given by the ancient writers, be really true, and not taken upon trust, it at least shews how surprisingly the face of things has altered since; for at this time no such extraordinary fecundity, much less that great numbers of cities and inhabitants appears, only in some few detached spots, which bear but a very small proportion with the rest: for the midland being sandy or mountainous, the sea-coasts and lands along the banks and rivers are the only places which deserve the name of fertile or happy, except when put in the scale with the Arabia Deserta and Petrea.

In this respect, indeed, it may well enough deserve those titles, were it only for its fine spices and odoriferous plants, particularly its frankincense, which is peculiar to this country, and found in great abundance almost every where in it. To this may be added the coffee-trees, which, we are told are only to be found in three or four districts of the province of Yeman Proper, and which grow in its mountainous parts. It produces also abundance of other exquisite fruits, is watered with fine springs, refreshed with agreeable breezes, and has a constant verdure all the year round. But even in this province some parts are almost as barren as the Arabia Petrea or Deserta, producing nothing for 30 or 40 miles together, especially where it runs contiguous to the Red-sea.

The inhabitants divide Arabia Fælix into the 6 following districts, namely, Yeman, Higjaz, Tehaman, Negid, Jemaman, and Baharein: and under the first of these, which is by much the largest of the 6, are reckoned these 4 provinces, Hadra, Oman, Saba, and Xora or Xehra; but anciently it was divided into a vast many nations, the most considerable of which were, according to Ptolemy, the 57 following, Rhamyditæ, Sideni, Darraæ, Bannabari, Arfaæ, Cunedocolpitæ, Cassanitæ, Elissari, Homeritæ, Adramitæ, Saltralitæ, Ichthiopogi, Maccæ, Nareti, Cetaæ, Geræi, Themî, Leaniti, Abucæi, Scenitæ or Scenites, Thaditæ, Saraceni, Thamnydeni, Napatrei, Athritæ, Mnafemanes, Vadeni, Læeni, Astageni, Astageni, Jolyfitæ, Calanitzæ, Thannetæ, Manitzæ, Salapeni, Magetæ, Minæi, Dofareni, Mocoreæ, Sabæi, Anchitzæ, Melangitzæ, Dachareni, Zeeritzæ, Blintæi, Omanitzæ, Cattabeni, Jobaritzæ, Allumeotæ, Spanitzæ, Bithibanitzæ, Chatrammitæ, Rabanitzæ, Mafonitzæ, Saritzæ, Sappharitzæ, Rhathini, and Maphoritzæ. For farther particulars of these nations see the last volume of the Universal History, folio edition.

Most of the modern geographers divide Arabia Fœlix into 13 provinces, some of which are stiled kingdoms and others principalities. The three principalities of Baharein, Hagiaz or Higiaz, and Jemama: the ten kingdoms of Aden or Mocha, Seger or Alibinali, Aman, Zirifden or Oman, Fartach, Yemen, Mafcalat, Ormus Xael or Hadramut, Zibith, and the territory of Tehaman. But for the greater conveniency of the reader these territories may be divided into maritime and inland, and under each the principal cities and places belonging thereto may be given.

Those on the sea-coast are the ten following: 1. The kingdom or principality of Mecca, whose principal places are the city of the same name, Medina, Egra or Hagiar, Giedda, Yambo, and Zebith. 2. The maritime Tehamah al Dhafar, containing the cities of this last name, Jazuf, Adiud, and Trazza. 3. The principality of Zibith, Zebeth, Zaba or Saba, with the towns of Zibeth, Gilan, and Chala-fæa. 4. The principality of Mocha, or kingdom of Aden, with the towns of both these names, and that of Laghi. 5. The principality of Xael or kingdom of Hadramut, in which are the towns of the former name, Dofar, &c. 6. The principality of Seger or kingdom of Alibanli, with the cities of Alibanli and Guebelhaman. 7. The principality of Yeman, with the towns of Calhat al Quelhat, Mafcate, &c. 8. Vodane, with the towns of Sohar, Borfcan, &c. 9. Mafchalat, with the city of the same name, Nuban, and Suchula. 10. Barhaim, with the towns of Elcatif, Labfah or Laffach, Abfa, Bifca, &c.

In the inland are the following five principalities or kingdoms: 1. Jemaman, with the capital of its name, Chodoia, Tima, &c. 2. Higiaz, Hagiaz, or Haggiaz, with the towns of Cafailo, Bain, Nabel, Carn, Almanfel, &c. 3. Tehama, with the towns of Saana, Saada, &c. 4. Fartach, with its capital of the same name, Mahri, Negram, &c. 5. Oman, with the towns of Ziriffdin or Amanziriffdin, Marair, &c. To these might be added the kingdom of Ormus, formerly a considerable kingdom or principality of Arabia.

ARABIAN-GULPH. The Arabian Gulph, or Red-sea floweth out of the Indian Ocean between Aden, a Town in Arabia, and Cape Mustedon, in Africa, having Africa west and Arabia east. It runs to the eastward as far as the isthmus of Africa, to the town of Suez, where is a harbour for the Turkish fleet, and receiveth only a few small rivers, but not one out of Africa. It is extended from the south-east to the north-west. As to its name Red-sea, some will have it to be only a bare name, and taken from Erythros [the Greek word for red] sometime king on that coast. Some will have this to be the same with Esau or Edom, [the Hebrew word for red] who first inhabited Idumæa, a country near the Arabian gulph; from whence, say they, it came to be called the Red-sea. Others will have it to be called red from a certain orient brightness peculiar to it. But it is certain there are waters really red, as being tinged with a red mineral earth; for instance, the river Adonis, &c. and upon the coast of Congo, not far from Baya d'Alvaro, where the small river Gonzales falls into the sea, the water is reddish. And it is confirmed by experience that the Arabian gulph probably came to be called Red-sea, from the red sand that lies upon the shore, and is often, contrary to its nature, mixed with the water by the vehement flux and reflux of the sea, which is extraordinary in this gulph; insomuch that it tosses it to and again like ashes, and keeps it from falling to the bottom by its violent agitation. This is related by sailors, who tell us that it sometimes appears as red as blood; but, if it be kept in a vessel without shaking, the red sand will subside, and may be seen at the bottom. It very often happens, that violent storms blowing from the Red-sea, either towards Arabia or Africa, carry with them such heaps of red sand as to cover whole caravans, (or troops of men and beasts) whose bodies in time are thus converted into true mummy. There are other opinions among authors about the name of this gulph; but they are all of no weight, as appears from experience.

ARABO, commonly called Raab, one of the nine principal rivers of Hungary. It has its source in the marquise of Stiria or Steiermark, and runs by the town of Raab into the Danube.

ARABRIGA, in Old Lusitania, seems to have been a place of note, between Conimbrica and the Tagus, though we have scarce any particulars handed down to us by the antient geographers.

ARACH, or rather PETRÆA, the capital city of Arabia Petræa (which see), in Asiatic Turkey. It is supposed to be the same with Rahab, the old capital of the Moabites. Afterwards it became the see of an archbishop, first under the patriarch of Alexandria, and then under him of Jerusalem. It was formerly also called Syriacopolis, and Mons Regalis. It still retains the name of Arach, and is situated on the confines of Palestine. Lat. 30. 20, N. Long. 66. 45, E. Of the same name was also a town built by Nimrod, as mentioned in the 10th chapter of Genesis.

ARACCAN, or ARRACAN, a kingdom belonging to the empire of Ava, a division of the peninsula of of India, beyond the Ganges in Asia. It is bounded on the east and south-east by the country of Ava, better known to merchants under the name of Pegu; by Tipra on the north, and by the bay and country of Bengal on the north-east. Some call it the empire of Mogo, on account of that king's conquest over the king of Pegu, whose vassal he formerly was. The inhabitants affect, according to Ovington, odd shapes and features, particularly broad and flat foreheads, for which end they bind leaden plates hard on the children's foreheads as soon as born, and continue them till the purpose is answered. They have large nostrils, small eyes, but quick; and their ears hang as low as their shoulders. They love their habits to be of a dark purple colour. They are said to be ostentatious; but temperate with regard to diet. They have plenty of provisions, yet mix their best dishes with rats, mice, and serpents. They eat no fish till quite corrupted; when, beating their back-bones with their putrid flesh into a kind of paste, they dry it to a powder, which they strew over their victuals. They use rice for bread. Among them are three orders of priests, who shave their heads and go uncovered, except the highest order, which wear a yellow mitre. As they vow celibacy, if they marry they are degraded. Some of them live in cloisters; and here are hermits, whom the vulgar highly esteem: but though they pretend to virtue and chastity, they make pathics of the youth whom they keep about them as scholars. When any of the natives are sick, they send for these priests, who, after blowing upon them, say certain prayers, and make them offer sacrifices of fowl, &c. according to the ability of the sick person, on which the priests and the relations live jovially. If the patient recovers it is ascribed to these fooleries; and if not, the priests pretend that their sacrifices are accepted, but God designs the patient a greater favour in the other world: and with regard to such as are incurable, they think it charity to drown them. Upon the death of persons of note, they make such a dreadful noise like that of the Irish howl at their burials, and they burn the bodies; but those of the poor they cast into a river, on account of the scarcity of wood in this country. As they believe the metempsychosis or transmigration, they adorn the coffins with the figures of such creatures as they reckon the noblest. Each family has its domestic idol, by which they swear, and before which marriages are performed. They make, with a burning iron, the idol's mark upon their arms, sides, or shoulders. Part of their provisions they offer him before they eat. They have also a variety of common idols in their temples, which are built in the form of a steeple. To these they send also provisions, and in winter they clothe them. Annually they have a festival in remembrance of their dead, at which time they carry, in a heavy chariot, one of their idols in procession, attended by 90 priests, dressed in yellow sattin; and many of the poor blind bigots throw themselves under the chariot-wheels, or tear their flesh with iron hooks fastened to the chariot for that purpose; they sprinkle the idol with their blood, and hang up those hooks in their temples as sacred reliques. The natives, according to Schouten, are so brutish, that they scorn to marry a virgin: so that they expose their daughters to the leud seamen; and she that becomes pregnant is soonest married. All persons of note keep concubines and dancing girls.

He adds, that in this kingdom are many cities, towns, and villages, and that some of the towns are extremely populous. And this he ascribes to polygamy, which is permitted among them, and to their avoiding of war and sea-voyages: for if they think their enemies too strong, they retire to the mountains, and leave their country to be plundered. The longest voyages which they undertake, are when they carry on by sea a war against their neighbours of Bengal or Pegu. Their houses are slight structures, being made up with palm-tree branches, or canes raised upon pillars, and covered with cocoa-leaves. These seldom exceed the height of five or six feet, but they have several little windows, and are very airy. Persons of quality have numerous and convenient apartments. Their women dress their victuals in earthen-pots without doors, having no chimneys, granaries, nor cellars within. In the country are woods, and consequently it has timber for building; it also abounds with orchards and gardens, which have a continual verdure all the year, producing the usual fruits of the East-Indies. Here are some sorts of grain, but neither wheat nor rye. Their ordinary drink is a liquor drawn from trees resembling palms; it is of a whey-colour, and sweet as sugar, if drank soon, but in three or four days it turns as sour as vinegar. It is sold to travellers, both in public and private houses, at the rate of two-pence for five or six pints. The winter, or what may be called so here, lasts from April to October, during which time the season is very rainy, and sometimes so tempestuous that there is no travelling, the soil being a deep clay: and all this time they are subject to agues. But in general the climate is healthy, and their summer is very delightful. They have great numbers of goats, fowl and fish, with elephants and buffaloes, which last run furiously at all who wear red; but they are easily managed by their herdsmen, who call them together by a horn, and they will cross a river standing upright upon the back of one of them, which the rest of the herd will follow.

Their king, according to Ovington, is as potent as any of the east, having made extensive conquests both both in Bengal and Pegu. He has 12 princes under him, who have grand palaces in his principal cities, and are allowed the title of Kings. His own titles are, Emperor of Araccan, Possessor of the White Elephant, with the two Canques, rightful Heir of Pegu and Brama, and Lord of the twelve Kings, who lay the hair of their heads under the soles of his feet, &c. He generally resides at Araccan, and in summer makes a progress by water to Orietan, attended by his nobility in boats, so artfully disposed, that the whole resembles a floating palace. Each of his governors is obliged to keep a seraglio of 12 girls for him, who are chosen every year out of the natives of his particular precinct; and are maintained at the king's charge till they arrive at 12 years of age, at which time they are brought to court. The king chooses from among them such as he likes, and gives the rest to his courtiers: but, to preserve the royal blood unmixed, he is always obliged to marry his eldest sister. No prince in the world, says Schouten, is so much revered; and he adds, that the deputies from the Dutch East-India company, when admitted to their audience, being conducted to it with great state upon elephants, were obliged to turn their faces to the ground, without presuming to look up directly upon him. The king shews himself publicly to his subjects once in 5 years, at which time all between 18 and 60 years of age are summoned to Araccan, under the penalty of 1000 a head; which fine is so small that few go thither, except for their pleasure. All the places about the royal palace being covered with scaffolds and amphitheatres, and guards set to prevent disorders, the king comes out of his palace, sitting in a splendid tent on an elephant, and dressed in the most sumptuous apparel which Asia can afford. The courtiers follow also upon elephants, whose harnesses are embroidered and decorated with diamonds, &c. And thus the king making a procession through the principal streets of the city, returns to the great square, where his subjects renew their oaths of fidelity to him: and the whole ceremony is concluded with music, discharge of ordinance, and playing off fire-works, in which they exceed all the other Indians. At other times none must presume to look upon the king, but such as hold the principal posts of state.

We are told by captain Hamilton, that, in the year 1690, a king of Araccan dying without issue, two princes of the blood quarrelled for the succession with such animosity and vehemence that in one year themselves and families were wholly cut off; and that ever since the kingdom has been in a state of anarchy. According to Schouten, they punish criminals by impaling them alive. The sovereign used to pass most of his time with his concubines, who all learned to play on instruments of music. The courtiers of quality wear white cotton over their arms, breast, and belly; and over that a long robe of the same. Besides which they have an apron before, and a sort of bag behind, folded up in plaits: so that they look as if they wore a bundle of cloth on their backs. They walk very stately in the streets, and have numbers of servants attending them, in proportion to their quality and ability. They never cut their hair, but tie it up in locks behind, and adorn it with knots of very fine cloth. Their women are tolerably fair, wear thin flowered gauze over their breasts and shoulders, with a fine cotton apron which goes 3 or 4 times round them, and hangs down as low as their feet. The richer sort among them wear a silk scarf upon one of their arms; and they adorn and curl their hair very agreeably. On their ears they have rings of glass, made so long as to reach their shoulders; and, when they move, these beat on their necks like the bells of a fool's cap. They wear so many bracelets of ivory, copper, silver, &c. round their arms and legs, that they are rather a burthen than an ornament to them.

Their ordinary money is shells or little stones, 80 of which they value at 9d. and they have also a silver coin, worth about 2s. for which they have 1660 shells in exchange: so that when they carry this sort of money to market it is a porter's load. Here the Moors are the most considerable traders. Many of the rivers in this country ebb and flow, rising from 12 to 20 feet high; by which means they perform long voyages in a short time. The principal towns are Araccan, which is the capital, Orietan, Dobazi, Chedube or Cabubel, Diang, Peroem or Prom, and Rama.

The sea-coasts of Araccan extend from Cape Negrais to Katigan, in Bengal, being about 400 miles, but not much inhabited, by reason of the vast numbers of wild elephants, buffaloes, and tigers therein; some of the islands in the sea are peopled with poor fishermen. Count Hamel says, that the little islands close to the shore are numerous here. The Buffalo-islands lie about 4 leagues off the coast. In the channel betwixt these and the continent is a rock which is seen above water. With regard to the other channels among these islands, they are reckoned to be free from danger, and have above 20 fathoms water. But about 8 leagues off the north end of the great island Negrais, and in about 15 fathoms water, is a dangerous rock, which only appears in the low ebbs of spring-tides.

ARACCAN, the capital of the little kingdom of the same name, in India, beyond the Ganges, a province in Asia; situated, according to Ovington, in a valley, is 15 miles in circuit, defended by high and thick stone walls, and surrounded also with a continued ridge of steep and craggy mountains, cut by art like fortifications, which render the city impregnable; besides, its castle within is so strong that that the king of Brama is said to have besieged it with an army of 300,000 men and 40,000 elephants, but without success. A large and beautiful river, called Chaberis, glides through this city in several streams, and afterwards forms two channels, which fall into the bay of Bengal, about 30 miles from this city; the one at Orietan, the other at Dobazi. The common houses are mean, being built of bamboos; but those belonging to persons of quality are of a different wood, richly carved and gilt on the inside, with several spacious piazzas and bazars. The palace is very extensive, supported by large tall pillars, made of whole trees, and covered with plates of gold. The apartments are built of red and white sandal and other very fragrant woods; and those of the king and his concubines have gilded roofs, and turrets resembling steeples. In the middle of the palace is a large hall, overlaid in the inside with gold from top to bottom; and in it is a canopy of massy gold, with 100 wedges of the same metal round it, in the form of sugar-loaves, weighing 40 pounds each. Here are also 7 idols of gold, as high as a man, and 2 inches thick, but hollow within, and adorned with the richest and largest jewels. In the middle of the hall is a large stool of pure gold supporting a cabinet of the same, which is covered with precious stones, and contains the 2 caneques or famous pendants of rubies, in the form of pyramids, as long as one's little finger, and as large at the base as a pullet's egg. Upon these pendants, which are only worn by the king at his coronation, and mentioned in his titles above recited, he founds a claim of dominion over the neighbouring princes, which has occasioned a deal of bloodshed. According to our author's account, in this city are 600 idol temples and 16,000 inhabitants, besides foreigners. Near the palace, adds he, is a large lake, with small islands in it, inhabited by the priests, and encompassed with a bank, by the cutting of which the court may, in case of exigency, overflow the city, and retire to these islands. About the palace are fine stables for the king's horses, elephants, lions, tigers, &c.

This city, according to Schouten, is almost as large as Amsterdam, but much more populous; and its suburbs are some leagues in extent. On the ridges of the rocks are several streets full of shops, containing the richest goods of all Asia; which are brought thither and carried away on elephants, so tame that boys who ride on their necks commonly guide them. The Dutch have a factory in the neighbourhood; and, according to the same author, the country is very agreeably diversified with mountains, towns, villages, fields of rice and meadows of grass, intermixed with ponds of good water, and numerous flocks of great and small cattle. Captain Hamilton says that some of the mogul's subjects trade hither, and meet sometimes with good bargains of diamonds, rubies, and other precious stones, with gold rousees. He adds, that the mouth of its noble and spacious river is large and deep enough to accommodate ships of the greatest burden in going into a harbour, which is large enough to hold all the ships in Europe. Araccan is situated in Lat. 20, 6, N. Long. 93, 5, E.

ARACHOSIA, a province of ancient Persia, was bounded on the west by Drangiana, north by Paropamisus, east by the river Indus, and south by Geerofia. Its modern name is not well settled. Its inhabitants were the Arimaspi (afterward called Margyetae, and then Euergetae) the Sydri, Koplatæ, and Eortæ. Ptolemy reckons 13 cities in this province, the 3 chief of which were, Arachotus, built on a lake of the same name by Semiramis; Alexandria, built by Alexander the Great, and thought to be the city now called Cabul; and Arbaca, supposed to have derived its name from Arbaces, king of Parthia. As to modern towns of note, we know of none within the limits of the ancient Arachosia; not being certain whether Cabul has any thing to do with it, since Caboulistan lies beyond Candahar, and is generally reckoned part of the mogul's dominions.

ARAD, or ARADUS, was not, strictly speaking, a city of Phœnice: it was an island city, like Tyre, and stood opposite to the south limits of the sea-coast of Syria. That the Phœnicians, however, reckoned this city as a part of themselves is plain by several good authors. Bochart takes this, and that part of the continent opposite to it, to be the seat of the Canaanitish tribe, called Arvadites; and we are very much inclined to subscribe to his judgment upon this head. Hence, says Wells, it is probably thought to be the same called in the Book of Kings and of Isaiah Arpad, or Arphad, or Arvad; whence the Greeks framed the name Aradus, which is mentioned in the History of the Maccabees. The island of Aradus, which lies to the north of Tripolis, is about 20 stades, or 2 Roman miles and an half from the shore, and about 7-8ths of a Roman mile in circumference. The buildings were like those of Tyre, of many stories high. There are some remains of it extant. It seems to the eye, says Mr. Maundrel, to be not above 2 or 3 furlongs in length, and is wholly filled up with tall buildings, like castles. The Turks call it Rudad. The ancient inhabitants of this isle were famous for navigation, and had command on the continent as far as Gabala. In 648 the Saracens, under Mahius, or Mahuvius, took both this island and city.

ARAD, in Latin Aradiensis comitalus, a county belonging to the circle on the farther side of the Theiss, in Upper Hungary. It is inhabited by Hungarians and Russians, and is situated in the mountains of Walachia.

ARAD,

A R

ARAD, Old, in Hungarian O-Arad, a town belonging to the aforesaid county of the same name in Upper Hungary; in a fruitful country, and was formerly in a better condition than at present.

ARAD, New, in Hungarian Uj-Arad; a strong fortress in the county of the same name above-mentioned, on the north-side of the Maros or Morisch, over which is a bridge. The Imperialists took it by storm in 1685, and burnt it. Here a Greek bishop resides. Both these are contiguous to one another.

ARA DUCTA, or, according to Reinesius, Ara Traducta, was an old Roman town, standing to the west of Langobrida. We find it in Ptolemy's list of the towns appertaining to Lusitania, now Portugal.

ARAFAT, or GIBEL EL ORPHAT, the Mountain of Knowledge; a mountain in Arabia, near Mecca. The Mahometans say this was the place where Adam first met with and knew his wife Eve after their expulsion from paradise. This mountain not being large enough to contain all the devotees that come annually in pilgrimage to Mecca, stones are set up all round it to shew how far it reaches. The pilgrims are clad in robes of humility and mortification, with their heads uncovered. They seem to be very much affected; for the tears flow down their cheeks, and they sob and sigh most bitterly, begging earnestly for remission of sins, and promising to lead a new life. They continue here about four or five hours, and at half an hour after sun-set they all decamp to perform a religious duty called Asham-nomas. After this they all receive the honourable title of Hadgees, which is conferred upon them by the imam or priest. This being pronounced the trumpet sounds, and they all return to Mecca.

ARAGON, kingdom of, in Latin Hispania Tarraconensis, formerly inhabited by the Jacentani, Lacetani, and Acitani, now a province of Spain. It takes its name, some think, from the river of the same name; others take it to be only a corruption of Darragon, or ancient Tarraco: whilst others fetch it from an origin which seems the most strained of all; namely, Ara, i. e. an altar, and Ludi agonales, that is, games for wrestling, &c. which were celebrated anciently in this country to the honour of Mercury. It was at first a county or earldom, and raised to that dignity in the year 780, by Garcia, king of Navarre. The first count of Aragon was Don Asnar, son to Eudo, duke of Guyenne, and lord of Biscay. It anciently consisted also of two parts, namely, the earldom of Aragon, properly so called, and the county or territory of Sobrarbe. Aragon continued an earldom till about the year 1034, when the noble Rammirus or Rammir, son of Sancho the Great of Navarre, is allowed on all hands to have been raised to it for his bravery in vindicating the then queen, his mother-in-law's chastity, against the accusation of her two sons, whom he vanquished in single combat, and so forced them to own their perfidy. This Rammir was Sancho's son by a former wife, or, according to some, by a concubine. However, his singular merit in undertaking thus the cause of the injured queen, when all the nobles besides had declined it, so pleased her and the king, that at her request he bestowed this earldom, with the royal title annexed to it, on Rammir: So far the Geographical System. But Busching, without having recourse to this piece of Spanish chivalry, accounts for it as follows. "In the beginning of the eleventh century, Aragon and Sobrarbe were both erected into kingdoms, upon Sancho the Great, king of Navarre, making a partition of his estates among his sons, by which settlement he gave Sobrarbe to Gonsalvo, and the earldom of Aragon to Rammir. But Gonsalvo dying soon after, the kingdom of Sobrarbe came by inheritance to his brother Rammir, who united it to his own kingdom; upon which its name ceased to be used any longer." About the year 1137, the principality of Catalonia was added to it, and in 1238 the kingdom of Valencia. At length king Ferdinand II. of Aragon, marrying Isabella, princess of Castile, in the year 1469, these two crowns were united, and have continued so ever since. This Ferdinand, who joined the two crowns, was the fifth of that name in Castile, and the nineteenth king of Aragon from Rammir inclusive. All of them had the title of king in the said series of succession, except Raymond VI. who coming to the crown in right of his wife Petronilla, it was stipulated that he should stile himself only prince of Aragon.

The kingdom of Aragon is bounded on the west by Navarre and Castile, on the south by Valencia, on the east by Catalonia, and on the north by the Pyrenean mountains. Its extent from south to north is upwards of 160 miles, and from west to east above 104. The river Ebro runs from north-east to south-east quite across the country, dividing it into two almost equal parts. Into it empty themselves the following small rivers; namely, from the north-side, the rapid river Cinca or Ginja, which rises in the mountains of Bielsa; the Callego, anciently Gallienus, which issues from mount Gavas, near the county of Bigorre; the Isnela, whose source is a little below Huesca, with the smaller streams of Aragon, Riguelo, Guerva, Rio de Aquas, Rio Martin, and Guadalupe. But on the south-side fall into it the Xalon or Salo, which comes from New Castile, and the still smaller streams of Guadalquivar and Alhambra; all of them having plenty of good fish. The Torio or Turio fertilizes a great part of the country by its slow and gentle course.

course, which gives opportunity to the husbandmen and gardeners to cut channels from it to water their grounds, which are much admired for their continual verdure and fertility; though we may question, as much exaggerated, what they tell us of their trees yielding fruit three and often four times in a year. In short, Aragon on all these accounts, as well as for the serenity of its air, is compared to Egypt, or at least that part of the country called Delta, from its triangular figure; to which they have also hammered out, as it were, a kind of resemblance, by placing Castile upon one side, Catalonia on another, and the sea on the third, as the base of the triangle: which last, namely, part of the Mediterranean, though the narrowest of the three sides, very much contributes to enrich the country, both by foreign traffic and the large quantity of fish caught on these coasts.

Busching says, that Aragon, notwithstanding the variety of its rivers, is but in general a barren and unfruitful country; for which reason several districts in it are uninhabited. The soil is for the most part sandy, mountainous, and stony; consequently, wherever the land is not watered by small rivers, or the waters from these rivers are not conveyed into it, it yields nothing. But on the other hand, in the parts which are watered, one finds corn, wine, oil, flax, and fruit; also in some places saltpetre: and in these consist the whole riches of the country.

Formerly Aragon had its own laws and privileges; some of which last were so considerable and so well confirmed by their kings, that they had always a supreme magistrate, called El Justicia Mayor de Aragon, or chief-justice of Aragon, whose office was a check upon them, and to do the subjects right against the sovereign: so that all appeals lay to him from the other courts, and even from the king himself. Ennecus, surnamed Arista, from his love of fighting, who had been chosen king of Navarre by the people's vote, was the first chosen into this office. They had besides, by a special contract made with their first king, and sworn to by all his successors, this farther considerable privilege, that if any of those monarchs should chance to infringe their franchises, they might lawfully take up arms against them, under the said Justicia Mayor, without being looked upon as rebels. Peter, one of the kings of Aragon, was the first who prevailed on their cortes or parliaments to abolish this privilege, and accept of some others in lieu of it. At length Philip II. of Spain, the emperor Charles V.'s son, being enraged at the Aragonians for defending his secretary, Antony Perez, sent an army against them; in consequence of whose success he deprived them of all their privileges and liberties, reducing them to the level of the meanest province. But Busching accounts for this otherwife: he says, that the inhabitants of Aragon having, in the year 1705, embraced the party of the archduke Charles III. Philip V. of Spain, and before that duke of Anjou, annulled all their privileges and subjected them to the laws of Castile: since which time the revenues of the crown from this country have also increased.

Aragon is divided into seven dioceses; namely, one archbishopric and six episcopal sees. In it are ten cities (Saragossa being the capital), also two famous universities, seven considerable abbeys, besides monasteries, nunneries, hospitals, &c.

The natives of Aragon are mostly courteous, well-bred, ingenious, generous, well-versed in military affairs, courageous, strict observers of their laws, but bigoted in religion, and positive in their opinions. They were very jealous of their liberties and privileges, of which they had a considerable number, now no where extant but upon record, having been stripped of them in the manner above-related.

With regard to their language, it is a mixture of Catalan and old Gallic, with a vast number of old idioms, supposed to be of Greek and Arabic, but more probably of Celtic extraction. But most part of them speak Spanish pretty tolerably, and the better sort among them as well as they do in Castile.

It is to be observed, that the ancient earldom of Aragon was a little country in the mountains, comprehending several fine valleys, as Canfranc, Aisa, Aragnes, &c. in which were some small towns, and several boroughs and villages. In Sallent, or Val de Tena, i. e. the valley of Tena, one of the largest and best in the Aragonian mountains, and extremely delightful in summer, are eleven villages; the principal of which are Sallent, Panticosa, Pueyo, and Lanüca.

Among several earldoms and lordships in this kingdom of Aragon, one of the most remarkable, on account of its origin and duration, is that of Ribagorza (which see), situated in the Pyrenean mountains.

ARAGON, a river which rises out of the Pyrennees, near the village of Santa Christina. It belongs to the kingdom of the same name, and now a province of Spain (see the preceding article), runs by Sanguessa, &c. when joining with the Arga, it discharges itself into the Ebro in the kingdom of Navarre, a little below Calahorra, in Old Castile.

ARAGONA, a principality belonging to Val di Mazara, a subdivision of the kingdom of Sicily, in the lower part of Italy.

ARAGUIES, or ARACINTES, a people of Brasil, in South-America. Their country lies near the government of Pernambuco, belonging to the Portuguese.

ARAKIL

A R

ARAKIL-VANC, i. e. the monastery of the apostles. It is a village and convent at the foot of mount Ararat, in Armenia, a province of Asiatic Turkey. This is a place for which the Armenians have a high veneration, believing that Noah retired thither after the deluge, in order to offer sacrifice to God for his own and family's preservation. They give out also that the bodies of St. Andrew and St. Matthew were found here.

ARAL, one of the principal lakes in the Asiatic part of the empire of Russia; or by some a bay of the Eastern Ocean; situated not a great way from the Caspian sea, and is one of the largest inland lakes in all Asia. It is said to be 30 miles long from N. to S. and half as broad from W. to E. Its water is very salt. From this lake the neighbouring Caracalpacks, Casatcha-hords, and Turkomanns, have, by means of small canals, conveyed some of its water into the sandy parts; so that as large a quantity of salt is prepared from it by the sun's exhalation as they have occasion for. It is moreover to be observed, that in this lake are the same sort of fish to be met with as in the Caspian sea; and Aral has as little visible outlet or efflux from it as that has.

ARAM, the name in scripture for Syria. See SYRIA.

ARAMON, a little town and barony on the river Rhone, belonging to the diocese of Uzez, a subdivision of Lower Languedoc, in the government of this last name, in France.

ARAN, in Latin Arantia, a very fertile valley of Aragon, a province of Spain, in the Pyrennees, near St. Beat. In its mountains the river Garonne has its source. The most considerable borough or village in this valley is La Vieilla.

ARANAES, formerly a royal residence and castle, of which some remains are still to be seen. It belongs to the Scaraborg territory, in West-Gothland, Sweden.

ARANCEY, a joint prevot, or provostship with Marville, belonging to French Luxemburg, in the government of Metz.

ARANDA DE DOURO, a pretty large and fine town of Old Castile, in Spain, on the river Douro, as the addition to its name shews.

ARANIAS, in Latin Aranus, a river of Transylvania, in the kingdom of Hungary. It rises near Clausenburg, and afterwards joins with the Maros.

ARANJUEZ, a royal palace or pleasure-house, on the river Tagus, in the province of New Castile, in Spain. It is worth seeing, not so much for its own beauty, as on account of its extremely delightful and pleasant situation; 6 miles from Toledo, in a fine plain, on an island, formed by the confluence of the Tagus and Xarama, both which rivers are besides united by a canal. This edifice, though much inferior to the Escorial, both with regard to magnitude and elegance of structure; yet far exceeds it for delicious gardens, fountains, water-falls and grottos, by which it is rendered an uncommon natural curiosity. Its gardens are so well supplied with water, by means of the vast and numerous water-works here, which are set in motion by the stream, that they are never scorched by the heat of the sun, but kept in continual bloom and very beautiful verdure.

ARANTA, a port in Peru, South America, south of Callao, in point of excellence the second in that part of the world, which by the communication of a river (Chila) supplies Arequippa with all kinds of goods imported, being distant from it but 20 leagues.

ARANYAS SZEK, (i. e. jurisdiction of Aranyas,) in Latin Sedes Aranyensis. It is a subdivision of that part of Transylvania in the kingdom of Hungary, called the country of the Sicilians; and is situated on the river bearing its name, below the seven Hungarian counties, and between those of Torda and Kukol.

ARANYOS-MAROTH, MORAWETZ, or MORAWEZE, a small and despicable town in the Kistopoltsan district and county of Barich, belonging to the circle on this side the Danube, in the kingdom of Hungary Proper. It carries on a good trade in corn, and belongs to the Paluski family.

ARANYOS-MEDGYES, a handsome town in the county of Szathmar, a subdivision of the circle on the farther side of the Theiss, in the kingdom of Hungary Proper. It had formerly a strong castle.

ARANY-VAR, a well-fortified and fine castle in the neighbourhood of Kapot-palace, belonging to the county of Hunyad, a subdivision of those called the seven Hungarian provinces of Transylvania, in the kingdom of Hungary.

ARARAT, a mountain of Turcomania, or Armenia Major, in Asiatic Turkey. This celebrated mountain is the Gordienian on which Noah's ark is supposed to have rested, and is situated between the Euxine and Caspian seas. It is not like Taurus, Caucasus, and many others, which are rather vast chains of mountains of extraordinary length; for this is one single mountain, with two summits, one larger and somewhat higher than the other. The Armenians call it Messina; the Persians, Agri; the Arabians, Subeilalm: or according to M. Tournefort, it is called by the first Macis, and by the Turks Agrida; though Baudrand prefers that of Messonat, i. e. the mountain of the Ark. It begins about three miles from Nackfivan, a town on the eastern frontiers of Turcomania, and rises to such a vast height that it out-tops by much all the other mountains in this province, and may be seen, says Taverner, at the distance of five days journey. To it the Armenians pay a great veneration, from a belief that it was the place on which the ark rested, after the waters had gone off the earth. And they pretend pretend to shew some fragments of it; which they say have been preserved, not so much by miracle, as through the serenity of the air at that vast height, which is so much above the clouds, that here is no rain, snow, dew, or any such thing, but a continual sun-shine: all this they say of it; and such is their veneration for that place, as, at the first sight of it, they fall down on their knees, kiss the ground, cross themselves over and over, at the same time repeating some prayers suitable to the object in view.

The ascent to it is not only difficult and fatiguing, but also dangerous, through the ruggedness of some parts, the deep sands of others, the dreadful precipices one is obliged to behold, not without horror and giddiness which seize the stoutest among them; want of all provisions, except what they carry with them; and lastly, from the number of tigers, which are to be met with in some parts of the way. Some travellers have talked of monasteries, hermitages, and other places of refreshment; but Tournefort assures us, that he neither met with any on his way, nor, upon inquiring of his guides, could he find that any such were there, except two, which are at the foot of the mountain. There are no living creatures; only at this lower part of the mountain, or a little higher, here and there are some few shepherds, who live in miserable huts, and feed their lean, starved flocks on the little herbage to be met with here. Some few partridges are to be seen likewise flying about: but upon coming up to what is called the second region, one meets with nothing but tigers, which commonly keep a due distance; and here and there a flight of crows. All the remainder of the mountain is covered with snow, some of which has probably laid there ever since the flood; and it is for at least one half of the year overcast with clouds, that keep it entirely from sight; which does not correspond with the perpetual serenity ascribed to it in the former part of this account. — See Tournefort's Travels.

ARARI, a river in the government of Tamaraca, belonging to Brasil, in South America. It falls into the North or Atlantic ocean.

ARASSI, a maritime, populous, and trading town of Italy, in the territory of Genoa. E. Long. 7. 20. N. lat. 44. 3.

ARAS. See ARAXES.

ARASTH, a city belonging to the province of Asgar, in the kingdom of Fez, in Africa, situated on the western coast, where the river Lucar falls into the Atlantic ocean. It is said to be surrounded with good walls, and has the advantage of a commodious harbour for small vessels. The country round it affords a quantity of cotton; and the river yields its inhabitants excellent shads, if that fish can deserve such a title.

A R

ARAU, a town of Berne, in Switzerland, lying on the river Aren, over which it has a covered bridge. The government here is the same as at Zoffinguen: and the inhabitants are so jealous of their franchises, that if a burgher, condemned by his judges, appeals to Berne, he loses his freedom. It is noted for being the place where the Protestant cantons hold their diets, at which meeting its avoyer is always their secretary, though he is appointed by the lords of Berne. The government is the same as at Zottinguen. The inhabitants are all Protestants, and have several noble privileges. There is a singular custom here in the assemblies of the cantons, which is to make the servants dine in the same hall with the deputies, their masters, and to be served at the same time, with the same victuals, though at different tables; because those servants, being citizens of their towns as well as their masters, have a chance to be deputies also some time or other. Its most remarkable buildings are the church; an old fort called Alter Thurm, built entirely of flints, in which a garrison is kept in time of war; and the town-house.

ARAVA, a fortress of Upper Hungary, in a county and on a river of the same name, E. Long. 20. N. Lat. 49. 20.

ARAUCO, the capital city of one of the finest valleys of the same name, belonging to the province of Chili, in South America, situated between the cities of Conception and Imperiale, near the river Lebo. It lies in Lat. 37. 5. S. Long. 78. 6. W.

ARAUOS, a tribe of Indians in the province of Chili, in the vice-royalty of Lima, South America, whose spirited resistance to the Spanish generals maintained their independence, which to this day they have preserved, and they possess the mountainous part of the country. These formidable neighbours to the Spaniards, have during the course of two centuries, been obliged to maintain perpetual hostilities, suspended only by a few intervals of insecure peace. The assembling the different tribes for war is done with the utmost secrecy and perseverance, so as to resist and defeat every measure of the Spaniards, and render themselves invincible; in their intercourse with the Spaniards they are remarkably faithful, and there never was known an instance of dishonesty in their traffic.

ARAVIO, a small place of Galicia, a province belonging to Spain. In it is a strong castle.

ARAXES, a famous river, which rises, according to some, from mount Albos, in Turcomania, and others say in Georgia, both provinces of Asiatic Turkey. It is now called Arrasse, or rather Aras, or Arrafs (which see); and running E. and S. E. with a serpentine course of 500 miles, after receiving some other considerable rivers, discharges itself into the Caspian sea. Some authors imagine that it hath its its source in Mount Ararat; but Tournefort, who saw both, assures us, that it comes no nearer to it than twelve miles; and that no other stream flows from this mountain except the Accourlou, which is only a brook that falls into the Araxes a good way below. The Araxes is a very rapid river, whence it has that Greek name; and it is supposed to be the Gihon mentioned in Genesis, this name in Hebrew denoting the same thing. Besides its extreme rapidity, which is greatly increased by the accession of several nameless rivers, torrents, and brooks in its way, it is apt, after rains or thaws, to overflow its banks. Bridges have several times been built over it above Julfa; and all the art of man (though some of them appear, from the arches still remaining, to have been built of the best materials, and in the strongest manner) could never make them sufficient to resist the violence of its stream; for which reason Virgil, in his 8th Aeneid, gives it the following epithet, Et pontem indignatus Araxes. After the melting of the snow in the mountains, or the violent falling of rain, no mound or dam is so compact and firm but what its impetuosity beats down before it; so that at such times nothing is more stunning than the noise of its waves; yet when the waters are low, particularly in winter, it may be forded upon camels, about half a mile from Elqui-Julfa, where, the channel being broad, it is neither too deep, nor the stream too violent. Notwithstanding what is mentioned above, Lucas tells us that he rode by a large stone-bridge, under which this river runs; and another traveller says, the Araxes joins its waves with the Kur or ancient Cyrus.

ARAYA, one of the most famous capes in South-America, stretching with a sharp point from west to east, opposite to the west point of Margaretha, it forms the north point of the Oronoque. Here are salt-pits, which yield a vast quantity of that commodity much beyond what was ever discovered in any other part of the world. As the sea never overflows Araya, this salt is produced from the nature of the soil, which, being coagulated with rain-water, is condensed into salt by the intense heat of the sun here, as is the case in the inland parts of Africa and Asia. The soil yields nothing else of use to human life; the inhabitants fetch their water at 3 miles distance. Until 1605 the Dutch fetched salt freely from hence; but their ships were unexpectedly destroyed by 18 Spanish men of war; and in 1622 the king of Spain built a fort here, to hinder them from approaching these salt-pits.

ARAZIBO, one of the principal places on Porto Rico, yet has but few inhabitants or little trade but smuggling.

ARBA, a city of Palestine, formerly called Hebron and Mamre. It was, some think, the burying-place of Adam, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, mentioned in Gen. xxxiii.

ARBAGO, a place which furnishes a vast quantity of iron. Situated in Westmoreland, See WESTMORELAND.

ARBE, according to Ptolemy is called Scardona, and by the Sclavonians, Rab, Arba, Arbun. An island, delightfully situated in the Adriatic-sea, and near Austria, on the coast of Venetian Dalmatia, belonging to Hungarian Illyricum. It produces large quantities of figs and costly wines. On it also are great numbers of small cattle. The city bearing the same name with it is an episcopal see under the archbishop of Zara.

ARBELA, the ancient name of Irby, in Cumberland. See IRBY.

ARBELA, or IRBIL, a city of Assyria Propria, now Kurdistan or Adiabene, in Asiatic Turkey; famous in history for the third battle fought at Guagamela, an inconsiderable village in its neighbourhood, between Darius III. surnamed Codomannus, and Alexander the Great, which proved a decisive blow to the Persian empire. The Macedonian conqueror, with the loss of only 300 men on his side, defeated an army of 200,000 foot and 50,000 horse, with the slaughter of 90,000 on the spot, unless the historians have greatly exaggerated the account of this victory. The battle is said to have been fought October 1, in the 2d year of the 112th Olympiad, and 331 years before the birth of Christ. And several authors, particularly Pliny and Ptolemy, take notice that a remarkable eclipse of the moon happened 11 days before it. The unhappy Darius, flying to Media, was killed by Bessus, governor of Bactria, in the year of the world 3724, and 6th of his reign; so that the Persian monarchy ended in this prince about 230 years after its foundation by Cyrus. Arbela, by some of the ancients represented as a mere village, and by others as an inconsiderable town, seems at least to have been a place of some strength, as the unfortunate Darius laid up his immense treasure in it, and which Alexander seized upon immediately after the surrender of the town. The place where the battle is supposed to have been fought is a delightful plain, being 15 leagues in extent, watered with several rivulets, and producing great variety of fine fruit trees.

Arbela was situated near mount Nicatiorion, and both these flood between the rivers Capros and Lycus, since called the Adiabas. The Arabic geographers call it Erbel. Tavernier mentions the castle on an eminence, from which Darius saw his army routed; and the ruins of that and the town are still to be seen. The hill in the plain, which is about half a league in circuit, is covered with stately oaks. Arbela lies about 60 miles south-east of Mosul, the ancient Nineveh, in Lat. 35. 15. N. Long. 44. 5. E.

ARBELITIS, according to Ptolemy, the name of one of the ancient provinces of Assyria.

ARBEN, or ARBON, in Latin Arbor Fœlix, a city of Switzerland. It belongs to the bishop of Constance, and is situated between Windisch and Bregends, in Suabia.

ARBEROU, one of the 5 districts into which the kingdom of Lower Navarre, belonging to the government of this last name and Berne, in France, is subdivided. See NAVARRÉ.

ARBES, a city belonging to the kingdom of Tunis, in Barbary. It stands on one of the most beautiful plains in Africa, and is watered by a great variety of fine springs. It is situated 2 days journey from Bona to the south and 3 from Cairouan to the south-west. Its walls are beautiful and strong. In this place are several Roman antiquities and inscriptions to be met with.

ARBOGA, ARBOGEN, or ARBO, in Latin Arboga and Arbogia, an old, but neat, inland-town, belonging to what is called the New Land, and two mine districts of Westmanland Proper, in Sweden. It was formerly in a better condition than it is at present. Through it runs a river called Storæ, i. e. the large river, which a little lower falls into the Mæler lake. It contains between 8 and 900 inhabitants; drives a considerable trade; has a large iron-weigh-house or steel-yard; a manufacture of harness, and a coinage: here also a part of the king's life-guards are quartered. In the year 1710 the senate of the kingdom sat here during the plague, which raged at that time at Stockholm. It had anciently a castle, several convents, chapels, fortifications, and squares, of which some remains are still to be seen. At present here are two churches: and in this town were holden also several general and provincial diets. In the neighbourhood of Arboga is a remarkable heathen grove for sacrificing, together with many other rudera of antiquity. It holds the 26th place in the diet of the kingdom; and Dahlberg has given a view of it in his Suecia. About a quarter of a mile from hence is the Arboga canal, which joins the lakes of Hielmar and Mæler, consisting of nine sluices. Arboga lies 60 miles west of Stockholm.

ARBOIS, a small town of Aval, one of the four bailiwicks belonging to the government of Franche Comté, in France. It is famous for its rivers and good wines, and is supposed to be the Arborossa of Ammianus Marcellinus. It has a chapter, a priory, and three convents; and is situated 18 miles S. E. of Dole, in Lat. 46, 50, N. Long. 5, 40, E.

ARBON, an ancient town belonging to the bishopric of Constance, in the county of Bern, in Switzerland, on the lake of Constance, about eight miles N. of St. Gall. The bishop of Constance keeps here a bailiff, and all other officers of justice; the former of which resides in an old castle, said to have been built by the Romans, and where St. Gall died in 640. In time of war the Swiss have a right to garrison it by virtue of their sovereignty. The town was formerly larger than it is at present; and when the water in the lake is low, the ruins of its old walls are to be seen. Though it partly depends on the bishop of Constance as to its temporal jurisdiction, yet it has some peculiar privileges: for they choose their own chief magistrate and council, who, when a bailiff apprehends a malefactor, it is said, try him, and if guilty order him for execution. Both Popish and Protestant religions are tolerated here. It lies in Lat. 47, 40, N. Long. 9, 30, E.

ARBOURG, or ARBERG, a fortress in the canton of Berne, Switzerland, on the river Aar: the castle is one of the most considerable in the canton. It stands on the top of high rocks, which command the country, and is fortified in the modern taste by the said canton. The magistrates of Berne generally keep a garrison of 50 men here, in order to cover the country against any incursions from the neighbouring cantons of Solothurn and Lucerne. This castle very much resembles the citadel of Wurtzburg, in Franconia; and is said also to have the like provision of large casks full of the best wine stowed under it, drinking being as much the fashion here as it is in Germany. It consists of several ramparts, one above another, to a considerable height. This castle and territory of Arberg constitute one of the best bailiwicks in the canton of Berne. It is situated 15 miles N. E. of Solothurn, 23 in the same direction from Berne, 25 S. of Basil, and 29 W. of Zurich.

It must be distinguished from a little town of the same name on the river Aar, which lies 6 miles E. from Erlach, and 16 S. W. of Solothurn.

ARBURY-BANKS, a spot of ground at half a mile's distance from Ashwell, in Hartfordshire (see ASHWELL). It is taken in by a vallum, and generally thought to be one of the Castra Exploratorum of the Romans. It consists of about 12 acres, and Roman coins have been found in this place. But still it seems to want the several requisites for such a camp.

ARBUTHIE, a district belonging to the shire of Kincardin or Mearns, in Scotland, in which lies Fordun, celebrated for the reliques of St. Palladius, the first bishop in Scotland, whom pope Celestine sent over to Scotland in the year 431, to preach the gospel, and confute the Pelagians. See FORDUN.

ARC, a river of Savoy, in Upper Italy. Its source is beyond Lanebourg, on the side of Mount Cennis, in Maurienne: it afterwards joins the Isere, and waters Montmelian. It has a rapid course, and its surface is foamy by reason of its many waterfalls: both which shew the land to be very high, and it continues rising till one reaches the foot of Mount Cennis. In the road betwixt St. Victor and Modane, part of which lies along the Arc, the contrast of the froth, and greenness of the water, has a charming effect on the traveller's eye; and its cascades along the huge stones fallen down from each side of the mountain, are equal, if not superior to many artificial ones. Besides this, the numerous springs and streams pouring down the precipice, heighten, by their translucency and noise, the pleasure of this romantic place. But, on the other hand, the road is every where so narrow, and sometimes so steep, that it is often the safest way to alight from one's horse, and walk it.

ARCADI (convent of), in the territory of Retimo; a subdivision of the island of Candia, in the Mediterranean, belonging to Turkey in Europe. It stands on the site of the ancient city of Arcadia; which see.

ARCADIA, a province of Peloponnesus, in European Turkey. It is now called Traconia; bounded by the country of Argos on the east, by Elis on the west, by Achaia Propria on the north, and by Messenia on the south. It was first called Pelasgia, from Pelasgus king of the country; and afterwards Arcadia, from Arcas son of Jupiter and Calisto. Its chief towns are Megalopolis and Mantinea; the last, famous for the battle fought between the Thebans under the command of Epaminondas, and the Lacedaemonians. These last, according to the historians of those times, killed 10,000 Arcadians about the year of Rome 386: but what seems utterly incredible is, that this slaughter was committed without the loss of one man on their side. Some time after the Arcadians drew all Greece upon them, for their sacrilege in plundering the temple of Jupiter Olympus. This country was under the dominion of the Turks for 280 years, till with the rest of the Peloponnesus or Morea, it was ceded by the Turks to the Venetians, at the peace of Carlowitz. But in the year 1715 the Turks took it entirely away again. See MOREA.

Arcadia was under the government of kings, till about the year of the world 3210; when Aristocrates, the last of them, being engaged in a bloody war with the Lacedaemonians, killed himself at his daughter's tomb. The country is mountainous and woody, but fruitful in corn, and abounding in springs, lakes, and rivers. The people are valiant and warlike, at least they were anciently so. And in this country lies the scene of the famous novel, written by the celebrated Sir Philip Sidney.

ARCADIA, a town of the Morea, belonging to Turkey in Europe, on the Mediterranean. It lies in Belvidere, one of the present districts of that province, but is now a mean place, defended by an old castle. Several geographers take it to be the ancient Cyparissia or Cyparissa: but in Sanfon's map of the Morea, he calls Arcadia, Pylus Nestoris, and places Cyparissia more southward, at St. Elia, on the gulph of Zunchio. Arcadia stands on the west coast of the Morea, at the mouth of a small river which falls into a gulph, both which bear the same name with it. The latter was also called by the ancients Sinus Cyparissus. It lies almost opposite to the isle of Zante, Lat. 37, 20, N. Long. 22, 5, E.

ARCADIA, a city of ancient Crete, (now called Candia) mentioned by Ptolemy, Theophrastus, Seneca, Pliny, &c. who all tell us, that this city being once destroyed (by what means we have not learned), all the springs in that neighbourhood dried up, and began again to run as soon as the city was rebuilt.

ARCA, the capital of Arabia Deserta, and the same with Petraea, according to Collier, in Asiatic Turkey.

ARC EN BAROIS, a town on the small river Saugon, in the province of Burgundy. It contains a mayoralty, a salt-office, and a ducal manor court. And was raised to a dukedom and peerage in 1703.

ARCES, a town of France, in the generality of Rochelle, and election of Saintes.

ARCHANGEL, or St. MICHAEL ARCHANGEL, by the Muscovites called Gorod Archangelskoi, and Archania, in Latin Archangelopolis, or Fanum Sancti Michaelis Archangeli. A city of Russia in the province of Dwina, situated on the east-side of the river Dwina, about 6 miles from the White-sea, in E. Long. 39. N. Lat. 64, 30. The city extends about 2 miles in length; is rich, populous, and built in the modern taste: it is a metropolitan-see. Archangel owed its wealth and importance originally to the English, by whom it was discovered in the year 1553. Richard Chancellor, master of one of the ships fitted out under the command of Sir Hugh Willoughby, who had received a commission to go in quest of the north-east passage to China, was separated from the rest of the fleet, and obliged by stress of weather to put into the bay of St. Nicolas on the White-sea. The czar Ivan Basilewitz, being informed of his arrival, invited him to his court, where he was hospitably entertained; and the czar indulged the English with a free trade in his dominions: in consequence of this permission, a company of merchants was incorporated in London; and, being encouraged by particular privileges from the czar, set on foot a considerable commerce, to the mutual advantage of both

Both nations. Before this period, the Russian commodities were usually conveyed to Narva, in the gulph of Finland: but the channel of trade was soon turned to Archangel, and this traffic the English for some time enjoyed without competition. The Dutch, however, and other nations, gradually insinuated themselves into this commerce: which they carried on to a very great disadvantage, as not being favoured with those privileges which the czar had granted to the English company: these were at last unhappily lost in the time of the great rebellion. When the czar heard that the English nation had brought their sovereign to the scaffold, he was so exasperated against them, that he forthwith deprived them of the immunities in trade, which they had hitherto enjoyed in the dominions of Russia; nor could our company, with all its efforts, retrieve them in the sequel; so that our merchants were obliged to trade at Archangel on the footing of other European nations.

The commodities chiefly imported into Archangel, were gold and silver stuffs and laces, gold wire, cochineal, indigo, and other drugs for dying; wine, brandy, and other distilled spirits. The customs arising to the czar, were computed at 200,000 rubles a year, and the number of foreign ships at 400 annually: but since the ports of Petersburg and Riga were opened, great part of the trade has been removed to the Baltic, and the commerce of Archangel is greatly decayed.

The houses of Archangel are generally of wood, but well contrived; and every chamber is provided with a stove, as a fence against the cold, which is here excessive in the winter. The streets are paved with broken pieces of timber and rubbish, disposed so unskilfully, that one cannot walk over it without running the risk of falling, except when the streets are rendered smooth and equal by the snow that falls and freezes in the winter. Notwithstanding the severity of the cold in this place, there is always plenty of good provisions: butcher's meat, poultry, wild fowl, and fish, in great variety, are sold surprisingly cheap. A brace of partridges may be bought for four-pence. These birds, as well as the hares of this country, grow white in the winter; and when the weather becomes more mild, resume their natural colour.

The most remarkable edifice in Archangel is a large town-house, built of square stones in the Italian manner, and divided into three parts. One of these consists of large commodious apartments in for the accommodation of merchants, strangers as well as natives: here they are permitted to reside with their merchandise till the month of October, when all the foreign ships set sail for the respective countries to which they belong. Then the traders are obliged to remove their quarters from the townhouse or palace, which hath a spacious court, that reaches down to the river.

In the year 1663 Archangel was not large, but so populous as scarcely to contain the inhabitants, together with the people who resorted thither to trade with the English and Dutch, &c. Soon after this it was burnt, and almost totally reduced to ashes. On October 17, 1777, it had upwards of 200 houses destroyed by an accidental fire. The castle or citadel of Archangel was built about the year 1506, and this town became a great emporium or mart about 1591, the road for ships being at St. Nicholas on Rose-island. It has become principally considerable, by English ships coming hither to traffic, and thereby causing a great resort of merchants from most parts of Muscovy, as well as from Holland, Sweden, Denmark, &c. So that in those months in which the Dwina is not frozen, (for this is the case at least three months in winter) between 3 and 400, and sometimes more sail of ships, may be seen in that harbour. The first land which British ships make in their voyages home from Archangel, is Buchaness in Scotland. It lies in Lat. 64, 30, N. Long. 39, 0, E.

ARCHANGEL-GOROD, one of the governments of the European part of Muscovy, in Russian Archangel-gorodskaja Gubernia. It comprehends not only a part of Lapland, but also the ancient kingdom of Holmogard. Concerning the Lapps or Laplanders, see Sweden. And as great numbers of Samojeds dwell in this government, we shall here give some account of that people. The Samojeds inhabit the coasts of the North and Frozen seas, both in Europe and Asia, and are divided into Samajedi, Tawgi, and Munzala. Their name is explained by that of men-eaters: but probably they have been taken for such as eat both the dead bodies among themselves, and those of their enemies they have overcome in battle, from their being observed to feed on the raw and even bloody flesh of the beasts and fish they catch. They themselves derive their name from Samoje, which in their language denotes an inhabitant, as they have never changed the place they pitched upon for their first habitation. Their original, like that of the other people in Russia and Siberia, is undoubtedly to be drawn from the ancient Finns, with whom they have the same religion, manners, and customs. The Samojedi, who dwell in the parts about Archangel, are entirely different from the others, and excluded as it were from their community; and they have also quite another language: however, they pretty much agree with them in religion, and the rest of their manners. They are extremely poor and simple, have a low stature and small feet, especially the women; their skin is of a yellowish burnt colour; and on account of their large eyes, and and swollen or bloated cheeks, they make a hideous appearance. In the winter their clothing is of the skins of rein-deer, with the rough side outermost; and generally the hood or cape, the mantle, gloves, breeches, and stockings, are sewed together: so that the whole garment forms but one piece. In the summer they make themselves commodious clothes of fish-skins; and instead of thread they make use of the guts of beasts, split into long thongs for sewing them. They in general maintain themselves by hunting and fishing; and indeed their principal subsistence is on rein-deer, bears, sea-dogs, birds, and dried fish; as also on turneps, and the like roots. Flesh they eat both raw and boiled. For hunting they make use of darts and javelin pointed with bone, and frequently also with iron. When they cannot have a convenient subsistence in one place, they remove to another. In summer they dwell in tents made of birch-bark, and in winter they go into caverns of the earth. Their whole substance consists in tents, clothes, and rein-deer. The men and women are hardly distinguishable from one another, as the clothing of both is the same, and their visages and features are alike hideous and ugly. Their marriages are concluded by the mere consent of the parties concerned with each other. They take two or three wives, and know of no forbidden degrees of affinity, only that parents and children do not intermarry. They, like the Ostiaks, give their newborn children the name of the first creature they happen to meet with. Before they came under the dominion of the Russians, the only punishment they had among them was, that he who committed some great crime, for instance, murder, was by their ruler or commander sold, together with his whole family, as slaves. But at present, in their principal places, the Russian polity has been introduced among them. They have but very little knowledge of a Deity; yet they partly worship the sun and moon, partly unformed images of men, beasts, fishes, birds, &c. made of wood; and also the heads of wild beasts, which they hang up in the forests, pray to, and probably expect from them good luck in hunting. The oddest persons among them are their priests, which they call schamans or kodefniks; and these pretend, that they can reveal to them the will of their deities, foretel future events, and, by some odd gestures and grimaces set about all kinds of forceries. The account of their idol Solocaja Baba, or golden old woman, is one of the fables of antiquity.

Till the reign of the czar Feodor Iwanowitz they knew no other rulers among them than the oldest of their nation, to whom they were subject either by families or villages. But under this czar, one called Oneko sent his son among them in order to discover the country, who, upon his return gave the court large accounts of it. The fine furs among them were principal inducements to the Russians; for which reason the abovementioned czar first sent an embassy to treat with them about a free trade, and to desire leave, that, for the security of the Russian nation, strong places might be built here and there in the country. The Samojedi readily agreed to this, and also to pay a tribute of furs which was laid upon them. By degrees the tenable places were planted with Russian colonies and governors. These people twice attempted to shake off the Russian yoke, once when they seized upon Petschora, and another time when they took Pusto-Oserkoi; but they were soon again reduced to obedience. Among them are produced the best furs in all Russia, which they sell to the Muscovites for bawbles, or, when their fishing and hunting turn out but indifferently, for meal, which they only mix up with water, and eat out of a kettle or pan that continually stands over the fire. Thus far Busching with regard to the Samojedi.

But to return to the description of the government of Archangel-gorod, which Möll distinguishes only by the province of Dwina, and says, that it is computed to be near 100 leagues long, in form of a lozenge; bounded on the north and north-west by the White or Frozen sea, and part of Ingria; on the west by the provinces of Vaga and Ouega, from which it is parted by the Dwina; on the south by that of Oustiong; and on the east by part of that of Ziranina. It is watered by several rivers, besides the above-mentioned Dwina; some of which, particularly the Pinega, fall into it a little above the town of Upsnaga. Here are likewise several lakes, especially those of Culvio, Onozero, and Sgolmgova: but the country, however, is full of forests and barren lands; so that the inhabitants are obliged to live mostly on fish, especially dried, the soil producing no corn, nor breeding any number of cattle. Their principal commodity here is salt, the vent of which was their only commerce before the English came to traffic at Archangel, the capital. But this last being now one of the principal marts for all the commodities of Muscovy, which are conveyed to it, not only that city, but the whole province, hath reaped considerable benefit from it. The other principal commodities brought into this port are gold and silver stuffs, silks, gold and silver lace, other sorts of lace, gold-wire, cochineal, indigo, and other materials for dying; wine, brandy, and other distilled liquors. The cold in this country is so extreme that they have hot stones in the inside of every house to guard against it; and during winter no divine service is performed, such is the severity of that season.

Before

Before the year 1700 the government of Archangel was lodged in the governor of the city : but the czar Peter creating 4 burgomasters to take care of all civil and mercantile affairs, his power is now confined to the militia only. Hither the court sends annually a commissioner to receive the customs laid on all merchandises, and he appoints 4 delegates to collect and get them ready in his absence. The revenue which the czar receives from these customs has been reckoned to be between 150,000 and 200,000 roubles per annum. The peculiar privileges granted to the English company were, according to Moll, unhappily lost in the time of our grand rebellion, when the czar was so exasperated against the English nation, on his hearing of the murder of king Charles I. that he wholly deprived it of them ; since which time all our efforts have not been able to regain them ; so that our merchants now trade thither upon the same footing with other Europeans. This capital is the see and residence of a Russian archbishop.

Bulching divides the government of Archangelgorod into the 12 following circles ; namely, Kola, Dwina, Kewrolskoi, Mefen, Pustoser, Jarenkoi, Soliwytschegotikoi, Ufiuskoi, Totma, Wologda, and Galitsch.

ARCHELAIS, an ancient city of Cappadocia ; so called from Archelaus, king of that country, who either founded it or rebuilt and embellished it.

ARCHENFIELD, a place near the city of Hereford, in Herefordshire, which seems to retain the name of the ancient Roman Ariconium. Nothing remains of its splendor but a piece of a structure, probably a temple, with a niche, 5 feet high, and 3 broad, within, built of brick, stone, and indissoluble mortar. Near it are many large foundations. A few years ago, a very fine Mosaic floor was found entire, but soon torn to pieces by the ignorant country people. Here was a bath, found by Sir John Hoskings, about 7-feet square, with leaden pipes, which were entire : those of brick were a foot long and 3 inches square, let artificially into one another ; and over these probably was a pavement. This, as Dr. Stukely observes, is an excellent invention for heating a room, and might well be introduced among us in winter. See HEREFORD.

ARCHES, a town belonging to the bailiwick of Voisge or Vauge, in Lorrain, and government of this name, and of Bar, subject to France, on the Moselle, and is the principal place of a prevote or castellany, the jurisdiction of which extends itself to the frontiers of Alsace, and includes the whole territory of Havend, which lies in the Wasgau mountains. The chapter of Remiremont has a share in the lordship of the place.

ARCHIDONA, a fine town belonging to the kingdom of Cordova, a subdivision of Andalusia, in Spain. It lies in a plain at the foot of a mountain, and on the confines of Granada. The number of its inhabitants is said to be about 700.

ARCHINTO, a town in the territory of Como, a province belonging to the Milanese, in the upper division of Italy. It gives the title of count.

ARCHIPELAGUS, or ARCHIPELAGO, i. e. a principal sea, as being the most remarkable and the largest in European Turkey, and on the coast of Greece. It was anciently called the Ægean-sea. It divides Europe from Asia, having Romania, Macedonia and Greece on the north and west, and Natolia or Asia Minor on the east. This sea English sailors call the Arches. It is very full of large and small islands, which the ancient geographers comprehend under two general denominations. The first, which lie round the island of Delos, as their centre, and in some measure form a circle, are called Cyclades, i. e. Circle-islands : but the second, which lie farther from Delos, and are scattered up and down in the Archipelago, have the name of Sporades, that is, islands strewed here and there. But as we have no account under what kind of government these islands are divided by the Turks, we will follow for the most part the division made of them by the ancients. All the Cyclades and some of the Sporades belong to Europe ; but the rest of the Sporades lie on the Asiatic coast.

The islands lying round the coast of Greece may, according to the seas where they are found, be divided into those in the Archipelago, the Mediterranean-sea, in the parts about the island of Candia, and in what was anciently called the Ionian-sea.

I. The islands in the Archipelago are, Samondrachi, Embro, Thassus, Stalimene, Pelagnisi, Sciatho, Piperi, Icus, Sciro, Negropont, Andros, Macronisi, Coluri Ægina, Poros, Zia, Joura, Tine, Mycone, Tragonisi, Delos, Sdili, Syra, Thermia, Serpho, Siphanto, Argenticere, Prepefinthus, Milo, Antiparos, Paros, Naxia, Amorgus, Caloyero, Nio, Sikino, and Policandro.

II. The islands in the Mediterranean, which are situated in the parts about the island of Candia, or in the Candian-sea ; namely, Candia, which is the ancient Crete, Gorzo, Gaiduronisia, Chrikina, Strandia, Scarpanto, Stampala, Namphio, Santorin, and Cerigo.

III. The islands lying in what was anciently called the Ionian-sea are, Sapienze and Strivali.—These following belong to the Venetians ; namely, Zante, Cephalonia, Val di Compari or Ithaca, Santa Maura, Pachfu, Antipachfu, Corfu or the ancient Drepane.

western coast are, Tenedos, Lesbos, Chios, Samos, Nicaria, Pathmos, Leria, Claros, Caos, Aftypata, Carpathus, with many other small ones. — 2. Those on the south coast are, Rhodes, Cyprus, with some smaller islands lying about them, (all which see) ARCHIPELAGO NORTHERN, situated between Kamtchatka and America. A thirst after riches was the chief motive which excited the Spaniards to the discovery of America, and which turned the attention of other maritime nations to discoveries in that quarter. The same passion for riches, occasioned, about the middle of the 16th century, the discovery and conquest of Northern Asia, a country before that time as unknown to the Europeans as Thule to the ancients. The first foundation of this conquest was laid by the celebrated Yermac, at the head of a band of adventurers less civilized, but at the same time not so inhuman as the conquerors of America. By the accession of this vast territory, now known by the name of Siberia, the Russians have acquired an extent of empire never before attained by any other nation.

The first project of making discoveries in that tempestuous sea, which lies between Kamtchatka and America was planned by Peter the Great. The completion of this project under his immediate successors, is well known to the public from the relation of the celebrated Muller. One Beering made several voyages, in order to ascertain whether the two continents of Asia and America were separated. In 1728 and 1729, in particular, he coasted along the eastern shore of Siberia, as high as latitude 67, 18, but without making any discovery of the opposite continent. In 1741, he sailed with Tschirikoff on an expedition which led the way to all the important discoveries since made by the Russians. His vessel was wrecked in December of the same year; but Tschirikoff had better success, returning to Kamtchatka on the 9th of October, 1742. No sooner had these two adventurers, in the prosecution of their plan, opened their way to islands abounding in valuable furs, than their private merchants engaged with ardour in similar expeditions.

Soon after the return of Beering's crew, from the island where he was shipwrecked and died, and which is called after his name, the inhabitants of Kamtchatka ventured over to that island. Copper-land, which lies full in sight of Beering's Isle, was next an easy discovery. This island takes its name from the great quantity of copper found upon its beach, which being washed up by the sea, covers the shore in such abundance that many ships may load with it. This copper is, mostly in a metallic or malleable state, and many pieces seem as if they had formerly been in fusion. The island is not high, but has many hillocks, each of which has the appearance of being the funnel of a volcano.

These two small uninhabited spots were for some time the only islands that were known, till a scarcity of land and sea-animals, greatly diminished by the Russian hunters, occasioned other expeditions. Several of these vessels being driven by stormy weather to the S. E. discovered the Aleutian isles, situated about the 195th degree of Long. To the N. E. of these, at the distance of 600 or 800 versts, lies another group of six or more islands, called the Andreanoffski Ostrova. The inhabitants of these islands live in holes dug in the earth, in which they make no fires even in winter. Their clothes are made like shirts, of the skins of the guilliot and puffin, which they catch with springs. Over these, in rainy weather, they wear an upper garment, made of the bladder and other dried intestines of seals and sea-lions, oiled and stitched together. They catch cod and turbot with bone hooks, and eat them raw. As they never lay in a store of provision, they suffer greatly from hunger in stormy weather, when they cannot go out to fish: at which time they are reduced to live upon small shell-fish and sea-wreck, which they pick up upon the beach, and eat raw. In the severest weather they make no addition to their usual clothing. In order to warm themselves in winter, whenever it freezes very hard, they burn a heap of dry grass, over which they stand, and catch the heat under their clothes. The clothes of the women and children are made of sea-otter skins, in the same form as those of the men. Whenever they pass a night at a distance from home, they dig a hole in the earth and lay themselves down in it, covered only with their clothes and mats of platted grass. Regardless of every thing but the present moment, destitute of religion, and without the least appearance of decency, they seem but a few degrees removed from brutes.

S. E. or E. S. of these islands, at the distance of about 15 degrees, and N. by E. of the Aleutian, begin the Fox-islands. This chain of isles and rocks stretches E. N. E. between 56 and 61 degrees of N. latitude, from 211 degrees of longitude most probably to the coast of America, and in a line of direction crossing with that in which are the Aleutian-isles. In general they are very populous. Unalashka, which is the largest, is supposed to contain several thousand inhabitants. These savages live together in several communities, composed of 50, and sometimes of 200 or even 300 persons. They dwell in large caves from 40 to 80 yards long, from 6 to 8 broad, and from 4 to 5 high. The roof of these caves is a kind of wooden grate, which is first spread over with a layer of grass, and then covered with earth. Several openings are made in the top, through which the inhabitants go up up and down by ladders. The smallest dwellings have 2 or 3 entrances of this sort and the longest five or six. Each cave is divided into a certain number of partitions, appropriated to the several families; and these partitions are marked by means of stakes driven into the earth. The men and women sit on the ground; and the children lie down, having their legs bound under them, in order to make them learn to sit upon their hams. They feed their children when very young with the coarsest flesh, and for the most part raw. If an infant cries, the mother immediately carries it to the sea-side, and be it summer or winter holds it naked in the water till it is quiet. This does the children no harm, but hardens them against the cold.

Although no fire is made in their caves, they are generally so warm that both sexes sit naked. These people obey the calls of nature openly, and without esteeming it indecent. They wash themselves first with their own urine, and afterwards with water. In winter they go always bare-footed; and when they want to warm themselves, especially before they go to sleep, they set fire to dry grass, and walk over it. Their habitations being almost dark, they use, particularly in winter, a sort of large lamps, made by hollowing out a stone, into which they put a rush-wick, and burn train oil. The natives are white, with black hair, have flat faces, and are of a good stature. The men shave, with a sharp stone or knife, the circumference and top of the head, and let the hair which remains hang from the crown. The women cut their hair in a straight line over the foreheads; behind they let it grow to a considerable length, and tie it in a bunch. Some of the men wear their beards; others shave, or pull them out by the roots.

They mark various figures on their faces, backs of their hands, and the lower parts of their arms, by pricking them first with a needle, and then rubbing the parts with a sort of black clay. They make three incisions in the under lip; they place in the middle one a flat bone, or a small coloured stone, and in each of the side ones they place a long pointed piece of bone, which bends and reaches almost to the ears. They likewise make a hole through the gristle of the nose, into which they put a small piece of bone in such a manner as to keep the nostrils extended. They also pierce holes in their ears, and wear in them what little ornaments they can procure.

Their dress consists of a cap and a fur coat, which reaches down to the knee. Some of them wear common caps of a party-coloured bird-skin, upon which they leave part of the wings and tail. On the forepart of their hunting and fishing caps they have a small board like a screen, adorned with the jaw-bones of sea-bears, and ornamented with glass beads, which they receive in barter from the Russians. At their festivals and dancing parties they use a much more showy sort of caps. Their fur coats are made like shirts. The mens dress is made of birds skins, but the womens of sea-otters and sea-bears. These skins are dyed with a sort of red earth, and neatly sewed with sinews, and ornamented with various stripes of sea-otter skins and leathern fringes. They have also upper garments made of the intestines of the largest sea-calves and sea-lions.

Their vessels consist of two sorts: the larger are leathern-boats or baidars, which have oars on both sides, and can hold 30 or 40 people. The smaller vessels are rowed with a double paddle, and resemble the canoes of the Greenlanders, containing only one or two persons: they never weigh above 30 pounds, being nothing but a thin skeleton of a boat covered with leather. In these, however, they pass from one island to another, and even venture out to sea a considerable distance. In calm weather they go out in them to catch turbot and cod, with bone-hooks and lines made of sinews and seaweed. They strike the fish in the rivalets with darts. Whales and other sea animals thrown ashore by the waves are carefully looked after, and no part of them is lost. The quantity of provisions which they procure by hunting and fishing being far too small for their wants, the greatest part of their food consists of sea-wreck and shell-fish, which they find on the shore.

No stranger is allowed to hunt or fish near a village, or to carry off any thing fit for food. When they are on a journey, and their provisions are exhausted, they beg from village to village, or call upon their friends and relations for assistance.

They feed upon the flesh of all sorts of sea animals, and generally eat it raw. But if at any time they choose to dress their victuals, they make use of a hollow stone: having placed the fish or flesh thereon, they cover it with another, and close the interstices with lime or clay. They then lay it horizontally upon two stones, and light a fire under it. The provision intended for keeping is dried without salt in open air. They are at present very fond of snuff, which the Russians have introduced amongst them.

No traces were found of any kind of worship among them. Several persons indeed pass for sorcerers, pretending to know past and future things, and are held in high veneration, but without receiving any emolument. If a whale happen to be cast on shore, the inhabitants assemble with great marks of joy, and perform a number of extraordinary ceremonies. They dance and beat drums, and then cut up the fish, of which the best part is consumed on the spot. On such occasions they wear showy caps; and some of them dance naked in wooden masks, which reach down to their shoulders, and represent various sorts of sea animals. Their dances consist of short steps forwards, accompanied with strange gestures.

and

Feasts are very common; particularly when the inhabitants of one island are visited by those of the others. The men of the village meet their guests beating drums, and preceded by the women, who sing and dance. At the conclusion of the dance, the host invites them to partake of the feasts; after which ceremony the former return to their dwellings, place mats in order, and serve up their best provision. The guests next enter, take their places; and after they are satisfied the diversions begin; which are chiefly dancing and capering, beating drums, and singing.

Marriage ceremonies are unknown amongst them, and each man takes as many wives as he can maintain; but the number seldom exceeds four. These women are occasionally allowed to cohabit with other men; they and their children are also not unfrequently bartered in exchange for commodities. Filial duty towards the aged is not held in estimation by these islanders. They are not, however, deficient in fidelity to each other. When a rich islander dies, the body is bound with thongs, and afterwards left to rot in the air in a sort of wooden cradle, hung upon a cross-bar, supported by forks. Upon these occasions they cry and make bitter lamentations. But the bodies of poor people, wrapped up in their clothes or mats, are buried in the earth.

Their toigons or princes are those who have numerous families, and are skilful and successful in hunting and fishing.

Their weapons consist of bows, arrows, and darts: they throw the latter very dexterously, and to a great distance, from a hand-board. For defence they use wooden shields. Whenever they are wounded in any encounter, or bruised by any accident, they apply a sort of yellow root to the wound, and fast for some time. When their head aches, they open a vein in that part with a stone-lancet. When they want to glue the points of their arrows to the shaft, they strike their nose till it bleeds, and use the blood as glue. Notwithstanding their savageness they are very docile; and the boys, whom the Russians keep as hostages, soon acquire a knowledge of their language.

No large trees were seen upon these islands, but they produce underwood, small shrubs, and plants. The winter is much milder than in the eastern parts of Siberia, and continues only from November to the end of March. The snow seldom lies upon the ground for any time.

Rein-deer, bears, wolves, and ice-foxes, are not found in these islands; but they abound in black, grey, brown, and red foxes, for which reason they are called the Fox-Islands. During the day they lie in caves and clefts of rocks; towards evening they come to the shore in search of food. They have long ago extirpated the brood of mice, and other small animals. They are not in the smallest degree afraid of the inhabitants, but distinguish the Russians by the scent, having experienced the effects of their fire-arms. The number of sealions, sea-bears, and sea-otters, is very considerable. Upon some of the islands warm springs are to be found, and in Unalashka there are two burning mountains. Indeed, all these islands abound with such funnels of volcanos as were found on Copper-Island; insomuch, that no island, however small, was found without one; and many of them consisted of nothing else. In short, these islands, without any stretch of imagination, may be considered as thrown up by some late volcanos. The apparent novelty of every thing seems to justify this conjecture; nor can any objection be derived from the vegetable productions with which these islands abound; for, the summer after the lower district of Holland was gained from the sea, it was covered over with wild mustard. All these isles are subject to violent and frequent earthquakes, and abound in sulphur. It is not said whether any lava was found upon them; but there was a sort of party-coloured stone as heavy as iron. From this account it is by no means improbable, that the copper found on Copper-Island has been melted in some eruption.

The customs and manners of the inhabitants of Aleutian isles are nearly similar to those of the inhabitants of the Fox-Islands. The former, indeed, are rendered tributary, and entirely subject to Russia; and most of them have a slight acquaintance with the Russian language, which they have learned from the crews of the different vessels who have landed there.

Having thus described the produce of these islands, with the customs and manners of their inhabitants, it will be requisite to give some idea of the commerce carried on by the Russians. Most of the vessels equipped for these expeditions are two-masted; they are commonly built without iron, and in general so badly constructed, that it is wonderful how they can live in so stormy a sea. They are called in Russia shetiki, or sewed vessels, because the planks are sewed together with thongs of leather. The largest of these vessels are manned with 70 men, and the smallest with 40. The crew generally generally consists of an equal number of Russians and Kamtchatdals. The latter occasion a considerable saving, as their pay is small. But Russian mariners are more enterprising and more to be depended on in time of danger than the others; some therefore are unavoidably necessary.

The equipment of each vessel ordinarily costs from 15,000 to 20,000 roubles (a rouble on an average is equal to four shillings); and sometimes the expences amount to 30,000. Every vessel is divided into a certain number of shares, generally from 30 to 50, and each share is worth from 300 to 500 roubles.

The risk of the trade is very great, as shipwrecks are common in the sea of Kamtchatka, which is full of rocks, and very tempestuous. Besides the crews are frequently surprized and killed by the islanders and the vessels destroyed. In return the profits are very considerable; the gain upon a successful voyage being at a moderate computation cent. per cent. Should the vessel be capable of performing a second voyage, the expences are of course considerably lessened, and the shares at a lower price.

Some idea of the profits of a successful voyage may be deduced from the sale of a rich cargo of furs brought to Kamtchatka 1772. The tenth part of the skins being delivered to the customs, the remainder was distributed in 55 shares. Each share consisted of 20 sea-otters, 16 black and brown foxes, 10 red foxes, 3 sea-otters tails; and such a portion was sold upon the spot from 800 to 1000 roubles; so that, according to this price, the whole lading was worth about 50,000 roubles.

ARCHIPELAGO di Maldiyas, a part of the Indian-ocean, toward the coast of Malabar and Maldivas, where are 600 islands.

ARCHIPELAGO di Mexico, is the gulph of Mexico, commonly so called by the English, Dutch, and French; where is an infinite number of islands.

ARCHIPELAGO di Nouveau Pais Bas, part of the Northern-ocean, in North-America; lying between the coast of New Belgium and the island vulgarly called L'Ange Eylandt. It is strewed with many little islands.

ARCHIPELAGO di St. Lazaro, part of the Eastern-sea, towards the Ladrone-islands, between Japan, the Philippines, and New Guinea.

ARCIGOVINA, or HERZEGOWINA, a duchy or province of Venetian Dalmatia. It is bounded by Bosnia, Mantenero, and the Adriatic sea. The Italians call it Santa Sabata; or rather it is Ducatus St. Sabæ. This duchy is 70 leagues long and 30 broad; and is generally reckoned to contain about 70,000 families. Its capital is Castel Nuovo, which was taken by the Venetians in the year 1687. The only places now said to be possessed and garrisoned by the Turks, are the castles of Mocrovarz and the town of Blafala. The rest of this province is a fruitful plain, full of populous villages, and mostly inhabited by Christians; who, after the taking of Castel Nuovo, in the beginning of the year 1688, appeared very willing to shake off the Turkish yoke, and submit themselves to the Venetians.

ARCIS, ARCY, or ARCIES, in Latin Arciaca, a little town of Lower Champagne, belonging to the government of this name and Brie, in France. It stands on a hill on the Aube. And hence it is generally called Arcies-sur-l'Aube; Arciaca ad Albam, to distinguish it by this addition from other towns of the same name. Here is a salt-house. It is commonly reported, that in the year 456, after Attila had retired, upon a great famine happening at Paris, St. Genevieve went to Champagne in order to buy corn; and having bought a great deal at Troyes and at Arcies-sur-l'Aube, she sent it to Paris by the rivers Seine and Aube. She loaded 11 boats from Arcies only; whence it is concluded that this town was then a considerable place.

ARCISSA, a large lake of Armenia Major, which several modern authors call Mer de Van, from the city of this last name standing near it. They called it a sea, as its waters are salt. Some call it Lac de Vassan, and others La Mer d'Armenie.

ARCLOW, one of the 6 baronies into which the county of Wicklow, belonging to the province of Leinster, in Ireland, is subdivided.

ARCLOW, or ARKLOW, a little market-town belonging to the last-mentioned barony, in Ireland, and to which it gives its name. It is on the coast, about 31 miles south of Dublin; gives the title of baron to the dukes of Ormond; and sends 2 mem- to the Irish parliament.

ARCO, in Latin Arcus, by the Germans called Arch, a fortified town belonging to the bishopric of Trent; which, though among the Alps, and consequently by some reckoned in Italy, is by the Germans generally placed in the circle of Austria, as the bishop of Trent is a prince of the empire. It is under the protection of the house of Austria; and is situated on the Sarca, near the north extremity of the Garda lake, about 4 miles and a half above the influx of that river into the said lake, and 16 miles south-west of Trent-city. Lat. 46, 5, N. Long. 10, 40, E.

ARCOS, a little town of Lamego, a subdivision belonging to the province of Beira, in Portugal, and contains 190 inhabitants.

ARCOS, with the addition de la Frontera, i. e. of the frontier, a town in the kingdom of Seville, a subdivision belonging to the province of Andalusia, in Spain. It was an ancient city of the Cæta. The Romans called it Arcobriga and Colonia

Arcensium

A R

Artensum. Of the same Celtic termination, Brigas, are several cities in this neighbourhood, particularly Meidobriga, Mirobriga, and Cetobriga. It is an old fortified town, now but small, containing, according to the Geographical System, about 2000 inhabitants, 2 parishes, 3 monasteries, 2 nunneries, and some chapels. It is situated on a high and steep rock, accessible only on the east side, at the foot of which runs the river Guadalete, encompassing the other three sides of the rock. Alphonso the Wise recovered it from the Moors. It has the title of a duchy. Arcos stands about 36 miles south from Seville, and nearly at the same distance north-east from Cadiz.

ARCOS, a village of Old Castile, a province of Spain.

ARCOS, with the addition de Valdevez, a small place of Viana, a district belonging to the province of Entre Douro e Minho, in Portugal. It contains about 440 inhabitants and one parish-church. To its jurisdiction belong 45 parishes.

ARCUEIL, a village within a league of Paris, in the government of this last name, in France. It is called corruptly Arcueil; whereas, according to others, the true name of it is Arcus Julianus, from an aqueduct built there by Julian the Apostate, in the year 357, when he came to refresh himself at Paris after the fatigues of the German war. According to Busching, in this village was built an aqueduct in the year 1624, which is about 200 fathoms long, and in its lowest part 12 high. It conveys excellent water from Rougis to Paris.

ARDACH, or ARDOCH, the name of 4 towns in Ireland; the first in the county of Letchim, the second in the county of East Meath, the third in the county of Longford, and the fourth in the county of Cork, which is the see of a bishop. But Busching has only a barony of that name, a subdivision belonging to the county of Longford, and province of Leinster; together with the little town of Ardagh, which has the privilege of a market. See ARDOCH.

ARDANGER, a town containing a provostship, which the sovereign presents, in the circle above the forest of Wiener, Austria.

ARDASCHAT, anciently Artaxat, a city of Armenia, on the confines of Erivan or Schirwan. See ARTAXATA.

ARDEA, according to Busching a village of the Campagna di Roma, one of the provinces of the Ecclesiastical State, in the middle division of Italy. Collier says it is an ancient city of Latium, the royal seat of Turnus, and metropolis of the Rutuli, now in ruins: only here is still a castle, with the title of a marquisate, belonging to the family of the Cesarini, and upon the coast of the Tyrrhenian sea. Lat. 41, 30, N. Long. 36, 25, E. Of the same name, continues he, is a river of Normandy, France, which falls into the British ocean near the city of Avranches. But Busching has no such river under that name.

ARDEBEL. See ARDEVIL.

ARDECA, or ARDESCHE, a river of Vivarais, a subdivision of Lower Languedoc, in France. It comes from Mirabel and Montpezat, says J. Collier, runs to Aubenas; and having received the Ahofejac, Hebri, Logni, Bordefac, &c. it falls into the Rhone about a league beyond the bridge of St. Esprit, where it divides Languedoc from Vivarais.

ARDEE, or ATHERDEE, a little market and borough town in the county of Louth, and province of Ulster, in the north of Ireland. It sends 2 members to the Irish parliament. In the county of Louth the late James II. encamped with 20,000 men, while duke Schomberg lay at Dundalk, another town in this county, with a force by much smaller; and yet the said king never offered him battle, till a French captain, who had fled his country for murder, and listed himself as a trooper under the duke, had conspired with other French Papists, and promised to betray the quarter they were in: but the plot being discovered, the traitors were seized, seven of them hanged, and about 170 expelled the duke's army. Lieutenant-general Douglass having made all the French regiments stand to their arms, commanded such as were Papists to lay their arms down, upon pain of death to such as did not. After this the duke of Schomberg kept close in his camp till reinforced with new succours; and the late king retreated to Ardee, October 16, 1689, from thence to Drogheda, burning the country before him, and not daring to attack the duke.

ARDEMBURG, or ARDENBURG, anciently Rodenburg, a small city of Flanders in the Austrian Netherlands. It was formerly one of the most considerable places of this part of the country, and pretty well fortified; till the Dutch, having taken it in 1604, caused it to be dismantled; and, by the treaty of Munster in 1648, it was yielded to them by Philip IV. king of Spain; since which time it has continued in their hands, and the reformed religion has been established in it, though the Roman Catholics are also tolerated. It lies about 4 miles from Sluys to the south-east, as many from Middleburg in Flanders towards the north-east, and 12 in the east direction from Bruges. Lat. 51, 50, N. Long. 3, 20, E.

ARDEN, the common name of forests among the Celts, from the wildly-extensive one which ranged for 500 miles in length across the country of Gaul, or covered more than half the county of Warwick, in Britain, and the sites of which still retain the appellation of Arden, to the much smaller one of the ancient Mancenion, that covered and surrounded the site of the present Manchester.

Written

A R

Written Arduen by Cæsar and Tacitus in speaking of the forest in Gaul, and Ardven by Ossian, in mentioning the woods of Caledonia; it cannot be compounded of ar, the prepositive article in Celtic, and the substantive den, as Baxter and Cambden assert it to be; but it is formed from ard an adjective, and ven the same as den. The meaning of the name therefore is not, as Mr. Baxter renders it, simply the hills, or even, as the ingenious translator of Ossian interprets it, the high hill. Ard signifies either high or great, and ven or den either an hill or wood. Arduen, Ardven, or Arden, then, means a considerable wood. Hence, only, the name became applicable to such very different sites, as the plains of Warwickshire and the hills of Scotland: and it was given, not only to the most extensive forests, to that which was the greatest in Gaul, or so considerable in Britain; but to many that were important only within their own contracted districts, as the wood of Mancenion above-mentioned, and others.

ARDENNES, ARDENNE, or ARDEN, a famous forest near Chimay, in French Hainault; it is called in Latin Ardenna, Arduenna Sylva, and sometimes Ardænenfis Sylva. Anciently it was the largest forest in all Gallia Belgica. Cæsar asserts, it began upon the banks of the Rhine, that is, the diocese of Rheims; and in another place of his Commentaries, that it reached from the banks of that river just mentioned, and the country of Trièves or Triers, to that of the Nervii, that is, Hainault, Cambresis, and French Flanders, comprehending 50,000 paces in length, as far as Tournay. But now it begins at Thionville, near the country of Liege, extending over the whole duchy of Luxemburg, the S. part of the bishopric of Liege and Hainault, and reaches to Donchery and Sedan on the frontiers of Champagne, though with several interruptions: for it has been cut down in a great many places, particularly towards its extremities, and several towns and boroughs built there. — About the middle of it is the abbey of St. Hubert, patron of hunters. In many places of this forest are such difficult and narrow passes, that two carts cannot go a-breast in them.

ARDES, in Latin Ardesia, it is a little town on the confines of Upper and Lower Auvergne in France, in a very fruitful country: for which reason it is in a manner the staple-town for the trade which is carried on between these two parts of the province. It is also the principal place of the ancient duchy of Mercoeur, and not far from the castle of this last name, lying between Clermont and St. Flour, which was erected by King Charles IX. into a dukedom and peerage in the year 1569, and gave its name to the ancient house of Mercoeur: it now belongs to that of Vendôme.

A R

ARDES, a tract of land in form of a peninsula, situated on Lake Coin, in the county of Down, and province of Ulster, in the N. of Ireland.

ARDECHE. See ARDECA.

ARDEVIL, or ARDEBEL. This was the capital of Persia before Alexander the Great's time, and has been since honoured with the residence of several of their kings; particularly Schich Eidar, the author of the Shah sect, and to whom the late Sophi family owed its origin, lived and died here; as also Sophia Ismael, the first of that race, lies buried there. It is situated in the province of Alderbeitzan, in a valley encompassed all round with very high mountains, which in winter are covered with snow; and hence reckoned unhealthy, particularly to strangers not used to sudden changes. Here every day at noon is a whirlwind of an hour's continuance; so that they have no oranges, lemons, or grapes, but torn in abundance, and very cheap; also good pastures. To the jurisdiction of this city belongs seventy-five villages. It is large, but not close built, nor fortified. It is watered by a small rivulet called Baluchlu, which in April is very much swelled by the rains and the mountain snows, so as to endanger the town with an inundation, unless good care be taken against it, by making trenches to carry it off. This place, besides natural baths of warm water, is honoured with the sepulchre of twelve kings of Persia. The revenue arising from these sepulchres, is greater than that of the crown. It drives a considerable trade with Gilan, Georgia, and Curdistan. The King of Persia has a fine garden here; and, by reason of the tombs of his ancestors, is a sanctuary for offenders, much visited by pilgrims, and is accounted so holy, that the use of wine is forbidden in it; but to no purpose. It is the road for the caravans of silk that go to Smyrna and Constantinople, which have 900 camels at a time. The buildings are better than those of Shamaki; and the bazars are finer, and better covered; but they deal very little in gold stuffs and jewels to what they formerly did. They have a great number of mosques adorned with domes, the most considerable of which stands on the E. side of the town within the walls; and being on a small eminence, is conspicuous at a distance. It is divided into several parts, where they perform their service: the principal of these is tolerably large and round, under a dome raised on a circular wall somewhat low, and rises from the body of the building like a steeple. Before this mosque is a basin, supplied with water from the hills by pipes laid under-ground, and serves to refresh those who in great numbers resort thither to perform their devotions. There are also many bagnios in this town. In Ardebil are only three or four large streets, where the principal shops are. The houses are flat at top, and not very handsome to look at.

Here

A R

Here are not so many caravanseras as at Shamaki : the Indians have three, though they are in no great numbers ; and the Chinese have none. This town in many parts abounds with alders and lindens. The meidan or great square is 300 paces long, and half as broad, having shops all round it. But the richest goods, when this place flourished, were kept in another exchange, which is a square building, arched over, and opening at three gates into three long streets. The sepulchre of the above-mentioned Scich Eidar is no small ornament to the city. The structures over it, and contiguous to it, compose a sort of castle, consisting of neat courts, cloister-walks, large rooms, and arched vaults, all richly adorned with gold, silver, tapestry, especially the tomb itself, and the chapels leading to it, where are gates plated with gold, rails of massy gold and silver, &c. for the particulars of which see Olearius. But what is most remarkable is Sephi's kitchen, which he himself endowed with a revenue of fifty crowns a-day, to provide food for the poor ; which endowment has been so increased by succeeding kings, that in Olearius's time, 1000 persons were at least fed three times a-day out of it. Most of the houses which are not in the bazars, have the convenience of gardens full of fruit-trees ; and there are some large spots in the out-parts of the town, where the houses stand at a distance, and the intervals are planted with trees. Hence the city is of a large extent, with many salient angles. It lies 30 miles E. of Tauris, in Lat. 36, 5, N. Long. 47, 6. E.

ARDFERT, or ARDFREAT, a borough town in the county of Kerry, and province of Munster, in the S. W. parts of Ireland. It is the see of a bishop, lies on the coast, and sends two members to the Irish parliament. See ARDRET.

ARDGLASS, one mile from Killogh, and fix from Down-Patrick, in the county of Down, and province of Ulster, Ireland, was, next to Carrickfergus, the principal town of trade in Ulster before the reign of Queen Elizabeth ; formerly a parliamentary borough, but is now a heap of noble ruins, consisting of several castles. It was situated upon a rocky creek, fit only for small vessels or fishing-boats ; but its trade was carried on in Killogh harbour, thence called the haven of Ardglass.

ARDINGLEY, a village in Suffex, five miles N. W. of East Grinstead, with a fair on May 30, for pedlar's ware.

ARDMEANACH, a large territory of Ross-shire in Scotland. It is a peninsula lying E. and W. betwixt the bay or firth of Cromartie, and the Murray and Beaulay firths. It is called by the natives Elland Dow, i. e. the black island ; for the rivers and fresh streams to the N. W. form it in a manner into an isle, and it formerly belonged to the royal family of Scotland, Charles I. having borne the title of Baron or Lord of Ardmeanach, when but two years old. The principal places on it are the royal boroughs of Fortrose and Rosemarky, with the villages of Cromartie, Kilboky, &c. At the first of these was anciently the famous canonry of Ross, as it is commonly pronounced Chennerly, with a bishop's seat, (which, and Fortrose, see).

It is for the most part a fertile tract, abounding in corn and cattle, with numerous seats of gentlemen, particularly of the name of Mackenzie. In it is a famous waste or common, called the Muhlbuy, extending for some miles, and in parts of it almost from one side of the firth to the other, and particularly along the Cromarty-firth. Yet this heath is not utterly barren, but makes a very good walk for cattle, particularly sheep ; and the mosses in it furnish the inhabitants with plenty of firing, called peat and turf, the only fuel they use ; together with large roots and trunks of fir-trees, dug many fathoms out of the ground, so rich and resinous as to serve the middling sort instead of candles in winter. But a stranger, who travels this way, particularly to or from Ferrintosh, had need to be very wary of the many deep pits in the way, from the digging of the above-mentioned peat and firs, and not venture without a guide ; since the road is very far from being well marked, and as even some of the inhabitants have been known at times to have lost their lives there, and tumbled in horse and all irrecoverably. See FERRINTOSH.

In this peninsula are several kains, as they are called, particularly of Drumferkit, where a battle is said to have been fought ; and a remarkable large one to the westward, not far from Kinkell. See SCOTLAND.

In Ardmeanach, a very pompous house, like a palace, called New-hall, was begun by Colonel Urquhart, of the Squad faction for Sunderland ; but misfortunes, and his death soon after, prevented its being finished. The shell still remains standing.

ARDMACH. See ARMAGH.

ARDOCH, a place in Strathern, which is a subdivision of Perthshire, in Scotland, where are the remains of a Roman camp (if indeed the Roman eagle penetrated so far) ; and here several medals, sepulchral urns, and other monuments of antiquity are said to be found.

ARDRA, or ARDRES, a kingdom, with a capital of the same name, on the Slave coast of Guinea, in Africa.

The city is situated near the river Lagos, about twelve leagues from a little bay called La Praye, where the ships ride. Its walls are only of earth, but so firm, that no mortar is comparable to it, and the ditches are within the wall. No body, it is said, enters the king's apartment, unless expressly sent for, except the grand Marabout, who enters at all hours, and none but he appears in the king's presence, otherwise than prostrate. The inhabitants are very licentious, and have neither temple nor any place for religious worship. However, they are very courageous; and their king was absolute till lately, that the king of Dahomy made war upon this and the neighbouring territories, brought them under subjection, and burnt the towns, particularly Ardres. The air is very unwholesome to Europeans, yet the natives live to a very great age, but the small-pox makes great destruction among them. This country is fertile in Indian corn, palm-wine, plants, and fruits, which last all the year; and they make a great deal of salt.

The palace is large and well built, with charming gardens about it. The great Marabout's decisions are authentic, and without appeal in all matters, as well of religion as state. In the year 1670 this prince sent an ambassador to the king of France, to offer him an assurance of commerce, a particular protection for his ships, and an abatement of customs in favour of the French nation. This emperor's ambassador, called Mattheo Lopez, was accompanied by three of his children, three of his wives, and several slaves. Ardra lies in Lat. 5, 5. N. Long. 4, 10, E.

ARDRACH, a town of Longford, in the province of Leinster, in Ireland. See ADRACH.

ARDRATHEN, or ARDRAT, in Latin Ardratum, a town with the see of a bishop, who is suffragan to Armagh, in the county of Kerry, and province of Munster, in Ireland.

ARDRES, in Latin Ardra, Arda, or Ardea, a strong town, belonging to the county of Guines, a subdivision of what is called the re-conquered country of the Boulognois, in the government of Picardy and Artois, in France. It is divided into the upper and lower town, stands on a hill in the midst of morasses, has the title of a principality, and was formerly subject to its own lords; but has long since been united to the crown of France. Here also is the seat of a royal provostship, consisting of a lieutenant-general, an attorney of the king and recorder, which likewise serves for the county of Guines, and is under the bailiwick of Montreuil; and it is also a royal mayor or mayoralty. Near this town, in June 1520, was a famous interview betwixt Henry VIII. king of England, and Francis I. king of France, for the rectifying of a treaty of peace: at this time they appointed also a tournament, at which the attendants of both princes were very richly clothed; and the appearance was so splendid, that the place where they met was called Le champs de drap d'or, i. e. the field of cloth of gold. In 1596, Cardinal Albert of Austria took Ardres for the Spaniards, but soon after was obliged to resign it to the French. Since that time the Spaniards have often attempted to take it, but in vain. The government of Ardres is under that of Picardy, and comprehends 19 parishes, and is free from taile or imposts. It lies about two leagues from Guines, and ten S. of Calais. Lat. 50, 45. N. Long 2, 3. E.

ARDROSS, i. e. in Erse, the heights or high parts of Ross-shire in Scotland. These are the middle, hilly, and most uninhabited districts of that county, being chiefly for pasture: though a gentleman of the name of Mackenzie has a mansion here, which bears the name of Ardross; and there appears to be a good deal of arable land round it.

ARDS, a pretty large district in the shire of Inverness, to the north-west of the town of that name, inhabited mostly by the clan of Frasers, where stood Castle-downy, (now demolished) the seat of the unfortunate Simon, lord Lovat. In this country, the name of which signifies high, great part of the family estate lay, as did another part of it in Stratherrie, on the south-side of Lochness. This too is inhabited principally by the Frasers; and both are vassals to the family of Lovat, who are chieftains of the clan. The Ards abound with rich corn-fields, and has also wide pastures and high hills for feeding of cattle. Along it runs up north-west Beaulieu frith, an arm of that of Murray; and at the entrance into it from Inverness is Bunchrow, a seat of the late president Forbes. At the battle of Culloden fire and sword were carried into the Ards, under the command of one Lockhart. It consists of two parishes, Kirkhill and Kiltarilly. Of this country was the reverend Mr. James Frazer, minister of Kirkhill, a paper of whose, concerning Beaulieu-frith and Lochness, we find among the earliest of our Philosophical Transactions. And the late Mr. James Frazer, of Relick, was also a native of Ards, and well known for his skill in the Arabic, from which language he gave the world the life of the late Shach Nadir of Persia: he was also noted for his collection of Arabic and other oriental manuscripts, which were purchased by the university of Oxford. From the same hands were obtained, by a gentleman of Scotland, a set of eastern heads, curiously painted in miniature, who gave them to the late Mr. Pope; which last virtuoso presented them to the university above-mentioned; and, if our information be right, this successive conveyance is recorded in their public acts.

ARDS, one of the baronies of the county of Down, belonging to the province of Ulster, in the north of Ireland. It is situated between the lake of Strangford and the sea; its south part lying opposite to Lecale. Ards is a narrow strip of land, in some places three, and in none above six miles broad. The soil is for the most part tolerably good. Sir Thomas Smith obtained a patent for the barony of Ards from queen Elizabeth, and sent his natural son with a colony to possess it; but was intercepted, and and slain by some Irishman, probably its natural proprietor. This attempt cost Sir Thomas 10000*l*. Yet after his death it was neglected, and king James I. granted Ards to some of the Scottish nobility.

ARE, one of the principal rivers in the West-riding or west part of Yorkshire. It rises at the foot of Pennigent, the highest hill on this side of the country, in that rough and rocky tract called Craven, from the British word crage or craig, i. e. a rock. This river is so winding and crooked towards its source, that people pass over it seven or eight times in half an hour, by walking in a straight road; and its course is so smooth and gentle, that it hardly appears to move; whence it has its name, the British ara signifying slow and easy. It runs south-eastwards a long way, and almost across this riding, before it falls into the Don near Snath; and so passes into the Ouse, between six and seven miles below York city. On the river of Are stand the towns of Otley and Wetherby.

AREBALILLO, one of the rivers of Old Castile in Spain. It rises also in that province, and falls into the Douro.

AREBON, AREBO, or AREBA, a fine, large, and oblong town; situated on the coast of Guinea, in Africa, and at the mouth of the river Formosa, though Mr. Bosman says 50 miles higher, and ships may go farther on its numerous branches. It is indifferently furnished with houses and inhabitants; the former are built of reeds and leaves. This place, and the country round it, is governed by a viceroy. Here were formerly two factories, the one belonging to the English, and the other to the Dutch. But the English not having traded hither for many years past, their house is fallen down, and the factors and brokers of that nation, who remained here, were incorporated with those of the Dutch. If a woman has twins in this place, she and they are sacrificed; unless the mother is bought off by a woman slave; but the children are sure to become victims to a demon, supposed to be hovering in a wood near the town. Arebon lies in lat. 5, 7, N. Long. 5, 9, W.

AREDEM, a town on the coast of Malabar, near the island of Goa, in the East-Indies; with a good harbour, defended by a fort, named Tiracol, which the Portuguese took sword in hand from the natives in 1747. They then seized upon the arsenal of the town, where they found above 200 cannon; and in the harbour they also attacked and seized 32 vessels, ten of which were twenty-gun ships, called pallasés.

AREGA, a small place belonging to the district of Thomar, a subdivision of Portuguese Estremadura. It contains about 700 inhabitants.

AREGNO, one of the small districts comprehended under that of Balagna, in the country on this side the mountains, or north-east part of the island of Corsica, in the upper division of Italy.

AREKEA, a sea-port town of the Red-sea, 55 miles from Suaquem. It is large and well-fortified, and at the entrance of the port is an island of about 200 paces in diameter.

AREMBERG, a principality lying in the Eyfell, between the archbishopric of Cologne, the duchy of Juliers, and the county of Blankenheim, being but small in circuit. The dukes of Aremberg and Arschat are a line of the princely house of Ligne. Aremberg was only a county, till Margaret, heiress and daughter of Robert, count of Aremberg, carried it to her consort, John of Barbançon. The emperor, Maximilian II. raised this John, or his son Charles, in 1576, to be a prince of the empire, and the county to be a principality; and, in 1644, the emperor, Ferdinand III. conferred on this house the ducal dignity. The chief place of this principality is a small town of the same name, containing a citadel. There are also the villages of Reetz and Hylingen.

ARENA, a little place belonging to the Farther Calabria, a province of the kingdom of Naples, in the lower division of Italy.

ARENBOUT-CAPEL, (chapel of) belonging to the jurisdiction of Dunkirk, in the government of this last name, in France. See DUNKIRK.

ARENDONK, a borough or village called a liberty, within the jurisdiction and territory of Antwerp, belonging to the marquisate of the Holy Empire, in the Austrian Netherlands: though not walled, it is not inferior to many cities, on account of the great number of houses, inhabitants, and churches contained in it.

ARENDSEE, a district containing a lake of the same name, about a German mile in circuit; in the Old Mark, electorate of Mark, Germany. The chief town is of the same name, situated on the lake, which is from 20 to 30 fathoms deep. The town is divided into the old and new town, and has a noble Protestant cloister, in which reside an abbeys and six ladies.

ARENS, or ARENSHARDE, i. e. the district of Arens, belonging to the bailiwick of Gottorf, a subdivision of the duchy of Sleswick, in Denmark. It is almost 2 short miles in length, and very nearly of the same breadth. Its soil is generally but poor and indifferent. In Arens lies the most part of the famous Dannewerk, that is, the great wall or rampart, which the Danish king, Gotric, about the beginning of the 9th century, caused to be built across the country from Hollingsted, as far as the Sley, which is a length of between 8 and 9 German miles, or upwards of 46 English, in order to be a defence against the incursions of the Saxons and Slavi. It was at first 60 feet high, and of the same breadth: some centuries after it was improved and raised with with 18 feet of stone-wall, being provided with several towers; and in succeeding ages it had farther additions made to it and better fortified. A great part of it still remains. In this district are the parishes of Hollingsted, and Haddeby or Haddebue. The church of the latter, built in the year 826, is the first and oldest in the duchy of Sleswick, and even in all Denmark; but it has been several times demolished by those people, who returned again to idolatry. It lies opposite to the town of Sleswick towards the south, and on the farther side of the Sley; the people of this district were the first Christians that were baptised in this country. Its name is written 8 different ways; and some would explain it by Hafenstadt, but others by Hauptstadt; for in this place anciently stood a town, of which the church is the only remainder.

ARENSBERG, a district in the county of Schauenburg, Westphalia, which contains the parish of Steinbergen, 6 villages, and feignorial-farm, which probably was a predatory citadel. In it count Hermann of Holstein Schauenburg resided from 1582 to 1592, having resigned the bishopric of Minden.

ARENSBERG, the chief town of a county of the same name in the bishopric of Cologne; is the assembly of the provincial states; lying on the Ruhr, and the seat of the head free choir. The county is for the greatest part woody and mountainous; nevertheless it contains several gentlemen's seats, villages, and some small towns.

ARENSBURG, the principal place on the isle of Oesel, in the entrance of Riga-bay, which formerly belonged to Sweden, but is now a part of the general government of Riga, and under the dominion of Russia. It is situated near the southern coast, and fortified with a castle. Here resides the governor of the country.

ARENSWALD, a circle in the New Mark of Brandenburg.

ARENSWALD, a town belonging to the marquisate or electorate of Brandenburg, in Germany, in the circle of the same name, near the lake Slavin, upon the confines of Pomerania, about 4 leagues from Lansperg to the north, and 8 from Stetin to the north-east.

ARENTIM, a kind of district called Conto, belonging to the audience of Braga, a subdivision of the province of Entre Douro e Minho, in Portugal. It has only one parish.

AREQUIPA, a mountain in Peru, being one of the most considerable of the Andes, on account of its being a far more formidable Volcano than any in the known world.

AREQUIPPA, a city of Peru, in South-America; in the valley of Quilea, 20 leagues from the sea, one of the most considerable in this province, both for the goodness of its soil, which produces corn and wine, and likewise for the conveniency of carriage by the river Chila, which runs through the city, falls into the South-sea, and at its mouth forms the commodious harbour, Aranta, from which all sorts of merchandise are brought up to Arequipa: nor is this place less wealthy on account of the silver-mines, which are not above 14 leagues off. The country where it stands is liable to earthquakes, it having experienced 4 in a few years, which laid it in ruins; besides, there is in it a volcano, or burning mountain, which in the year 1600 threw out red hot stones and ashes with such a hideous noise as was heard as far as Lima, and spoiled the fruits of Peru. This city is subject to the Spaniards. The houses are handsomely built of stone, and vaulted; though not all of an equal height, they are generally lofty, commodious, finely decorated without, and elegantly furnished within. The temperature of the air here is so remarkably mild that there is never an excess of heat or cold, and the surrounding fields are perpetually covered with verdure and enamelled with flowers. What greatly contributes to the health of the inhabitants is their care in keeping the streets clean by means of canals, which extend to a river near the city, by which all the filth is swept away. It is very populous, and many noble families reside there. It is the see of a bishop, under the metropolitan of Lima, from whence it is situated 100 leagues. Lat. 17, 5. N. Long. 73, 5. W.

ARESGOL, or HARESGOL, a province of Africa. It is so called from its capital, where its governor resides. It is bounded by Oran on the east, by the Mediterranean on the north, by Humanbar on the west, and by Tremecen on the south, part of which kingdom it formerly was. The town is of such antiquity that its origin cannot be traced: but it has been often destroyed and rebuilt. It was taken and plundered, particularly in the year 1570, by Peter, count of Navarre; and since rebuilt by the Arabs, who are now in possession of it by consent of the Turks, paying them a small tribute as an acknowledgment: and the citadel, where their governor resides, is garrisoned by troops of the latter. This was anciently a considerable place, and is supposed to be Ptolemy's Siga Colonia, the ruins of which are still to be seen on the shore east of Oran. The present town, Marmol tells us, stands at the mouth of a river of the same name; but now called the Tefenez or Tefene, which washes it all round, except on the south side, where is a narrow passage among the rocks. It was once the capital of the kingdom of Tremecen, then but an inconsiderable place, but hath since raised itself on its ruins.

ARETHUSA, a city of Syria, in Asiatic Turkey, with the see of a bishop, a suffragan of Apamea. Also another city of Macedonia, in European Turkey. And

A R

And likewise a lake of Armenia bears the same name.

ARETHUSA, a celebrated fountain near the city of Syracuse, in Sicily; famous for the quantity of its waters and the number of fishes it contained. Many fables were invented by the ancients concerning this fountain.

ARETIUM, the same with Arezzo; which see.

ARANALO, a town belonging to the province of Old Castile, in Spain; situated near the confluence of the rivers Andaja and Arebalillo. It is called the Noble, as many considerable families of that rank derive their origin from it.

AREZZO, a city belonging to the territory of Florence, in the middle division of Italy. It is the ancient Aretium of Pliny, or Arretium of Ptolemy; and is said to have been built by Areta, the son of Janus. It was one of the 12 Etrurian cities, or Tuscan colonies; and of such opulence that it assisted the Romans at one time with 30,000 pieces of gold. Yet it had fallen into decay, when Cosmo de Medicis, the first grand duke of Tuscany, took it under his protection; since which time it has successively recovered itself. It was famed in ancient times for a fine kind of earthen vessels which were made here, and much esteemed by the Romans, as appears from one of Martial's epigrams. Arezzo is situated on the declivity of a mountain, in the middle of a fruitful plain, about 3 miles from the fens of Chianus, which empty themselves into the Arno, a little below it. In it are fine old houses and churches; and it is a bishop's see, formerly under the jurisdiction of Florence, but now exempt from it. It was much depopulated and wasted by the Goths, Lombards, and many other tyrants, till it fell under the dominion of the Florentines. It has been often taken and retaken, particularly during the last wars of Florence, about two centuries ago. It hath given birth to several celebrated persons, as Mecænas, Augustus's favourite, the great patron of learned men; so that all future favourers of literature have been dignified with his name. Here also was born Guido Aretini, the inventor of the 6 notes of music, ut, re, mi, fa, sol, la; and likewise his infamous favourite, Peter Aretini, well known for his biting satires and shameful dialogues. He lies interred in St. Luke's church at Venice. Donatus, bishop of Arezzo suffered martyrdom here, and is buried in the cathedral built during the reign of the emperor Valentinian, by Zenobius, one of his tribunes. Pope Gregory X. is also interred in it. Arezzo lies 17 miles west of Civita or Citta de Castadella, and 40 south east from the city of Florence. Lat. 43, 15, N. Long. 13, 15, E.

ARFWIDSJERF, or ARFWIDSJAUR, one of the two pastorates or parishes, of which all Pitea-Lapmark consists, this last being one of the subdivisions of Lapland, the fourth great district of Sweden. In it is a jurisdiction and judiciary court, house; and it has also a market-place, where the burghers of the town of Pitea, which lies 12 miles off, resort to carry on a trade at the fair. Arwidjaur, the only Lap-village in this parish, consists of 38 Laplander families, who pay tribute only to the crown of Sweden.

ARGA, one of the three principal rivers which water the kingdom of Navarre, in Spain. It empties itself into the Ebro.

ARGAN, a city of New Castile, in the diocese of Toledo, and kingdom of Spain. It is noted, according to Collier, for a council which was held here in the year 1473, where it was enacted, "That all such clergymen as did not understand Latin were to be excluded from church-preferments; all bishops were obliged to say mass thrice, and every single, regular priest four times a year." But if this be the same place with what Busching calls Argenta, in the province of New Castile for (he mentions no other like it) he only says, that it is a small town, with a castle.

ARGANIL, a small town of Coimbra, one of the districts belonging to the province of Beira, in Portugal. It contains 1100 inhabitants, with only one parish; gives the title of count, and belongs to the bishop of Coimbra. Under its jurisdiction are placed 4 parishes.

ARGANTA. See ARGAN.

ARGENCES, a borough or large village and barony of Campagne de Caen, a territory of Lower Normandy, in the government of this last name, in France.

ARGENS, or L'ARGENS, in Latin Fluvius Argenteus, so called from the clearness of its waters; a river of Provence in France, which has three springs, one that issues from Seillous, or, as Busching has it, near St. Maximin; the second, in the district of St. Martin de Varages, and the third in that of Barjols. After receiving the Caulon, Caramie, Grannegonne, and Lendolle, it falls at length into the sea below Frejus.

This is the river which Marc Antony, in his expedition against Lepidus, flung himself into, to encourage his army in gaining the opposite side, and where he surprized Lepidus asleep in his tent, a-bed, &c. &c.

ARGENTA, or ARGENTEA, one of the principal rivers of Albania, a province of European Turkey.

ARGENTAC, a town of France on the Limosin, on the river Dordogne, 15 miles S. E. of Tullies, and 25 N. W. of Aurillac. Long. 2, 3, E. Lat. 45, 5, N.

ARGENTAN, or ARGENTON, hence in Latin Argentamum, and Argentomum; the Argentomagus of the ancients, and by the Romans called Ara Genue. It is a town situated in Les Marches, a territory belonging to Lower Normandy, in the government of this last name in France, upon a rising ground, on the banks of the river Orne, in the middle of a very fruitful plain. It is well built, and its walls are flanked with towers and surrounded with ditches. Here are four suburbs. It is a viscounty and marquisate; is the seat of an election, bailiwick, forest-court, salt-house, or granary; has three parish churches, four convents, and two hospitals, with a town-house. It is governed by a mayor and three aldermen. The trade of this town and its neighbourhood consists in corn; several manufactories, in which are made fine linen, lawn, and gauze, with other thin cloths; likewise hats and tanned leather. It lies between Falaise and Sees, four leagues S. E. of the former, and five N. W. of the latter, and about 45 miles S. W. of Bourges, in Lat. 48, 46, N. Long. 0, 3, E. Of the same name is a town in Berry.

ARGENTARIA, a town of ancient Gaul, thought to stand in the place where the city Colmar now stands. It is remarkable for a great victory gained by the emperor Gratian over the Lentienses, in the month of May, A. D. 378. The Romans, being but few in number, were at first overpowered, and obliged to give ground; but soon returning to the charge, they gained in the end a complete victory. Thirty thousand of the barbarians, and among the rest their king Triarius, were killed on the spot; and all the rest, except 5000, taken prisoners.

ARGENTARO (Monte) in Latin Mons Argentarius, a cape and promontory of the state called Presidii, in the middle division of Italy, according to the author of the Geographical System, and on the Tuscan coast, about 12 miles south of Orbitello. It juts out into the sea, in the form of a peninsula, and is a serviceable land-mark on that coast. It has its name either from a silver-like whiteness, or on account of some mines of that metal formerly worked here; but which is the true origin has not been certainly determined. Busching says that it is a small fortified place.

ARGENTAT a little town belonging to the viscounty of Turenne, a subdivision of the government of Limosin, in France. It has an abbey.

ARGENTEA, or LA PLATA, a large city, one of the most remarkable of Peru, and the capital of Los Charcas, a province of South-America. It is situated near the river Picolmago, and extremely rich in silver-mines, 18 miles east of Potosi, and 180 south of Cusco. It is also the see of a bishop, under the metropolitan of Lima, and in possession of the Spaniards.

ARGENTEUIL, a town of the isle of France; seated on the river Seine, 5 miles north-west of Paris, and 12 south-east of Pontoise. It is a very beautiful place, with a fine vineyard. In the Benedictine priory they pretend to have the seamless coat of Christ: in the environs they have quarries of the plaster of Paris. Long. 2, 28, E. Lat. 48, 52, N.

ARGENTEUIL, a town of France, in Champagne, near the river Armancon, 8 miles south of Tonnarre, 8 north-east of Noyers, and 5 north-west of Reviere.

ARGENTIERE, a little town of Lower Vivarais, in the diocese of Viviers, a subdivision of Lower Languedoc, belonging to the government of this last name, in France.

ARGENTIERE (Col de) in Latin Mons Argentarius, is, according to Collier one of the Alps, bordering on the marquisate of Saluzzo, a subdivision of Piedmont, in Upper Italy, which opens a passage out of France into that country.

ARGENTIERE, or ARGENTIERA, is an island of the Grecian Archipelago, formerly known by the name of Cimolis, and which is still by the modern inhabitants called Kimoli. The French navigators have named it Argentiere, from the silver mines discovered in it; but these are now shut up, and the natives deny all knowledge of such metal being in the island, from an apprehension that the Turks might compel them to labour in the mines. It is a barren spot, destitute of all water but what can be saved in cisterns; and has but one village in it. Lat. 36, 50, N. Long. 23, 10, E.

There is not a more dismal place in all the Levant than this island, which is covered with rocks that scarcely suffer a few trees to grow; and in which the land exhibits no verdure. Some fields of barley and cotton are indeed to be found round the village, which is only an assemblage of miserable cottages, where the women, children, and cattle all croud promiscuously together. The dress of the women is inconceivably ridiculous, consisting of an enormous load of linen sufficiently dirty. Their under-petticoat is only their short shift embroidered with red, that leaves their legs exposed; the thickness of which is esteemed a principal article of female beauty; those to whom nature has denied this advantage endeavour to supply the deficiency by three or four pair of thick stockings. When the leg is so uniformly thick all the way as to be truly perfect according to their standard; the ladies add a pair of half boots of cut velvet, frequently decorated with small silver buttons. The pirates who infest the Archipelago pass their winter in Argentiera, and by spending their money among the natives, console them for all their inconveniences.

An usage is established in this island, well known to East-India sailors, of taking a wife for the term of a man's residence there. The issue of such occasional adventures are sufficiently handsome to be distinguished among the women, notwithstanding the the dress by which they disfigure themselves. The number of inhabitants is much diminished of late years, and they now scarcely amount to 200. Those Catholic families that were here in the time of Tournesfort have since joined the Greek church.

This island is celebrated for the earth, known by the name of Cimolia terra; which, according to the ancients, was efficacious in St. Anthony's-fire, inflammations, and other external affections; being applied by way of cataplasm. They also used it for bleaching linen and cleaning of clothes. This earth, though long disregarded and supposed to be lost, is however still very plentiful in Argeptiera, Siphanto, Milo, and other of those islands; and is a marble of a lax and friable texture, of a pure bright white colour, and soft to the touch. It is evidently the same substance as that is found in the county of Cornwall, and which we call Stearites, or the Soap-rock.

ARGENTINE, a small town, or large village, in the county of Marienne, a subdivision of Savoy, in Upper Italy.

ARGENTON, in Latin Argentomagus, and according to some modern writers, Argentomum, a town of Lower Berry, belonging to the government of this last name, in France. It stands near the borders of the province of Poitou, on the banks of the river Creuse, which divides it into the Upper and Lower town: in the former is a chapel, dedicated to St. Benedict, and a college for polite literature; in the latter is a convent of Franciscan friars, and the church of St. Saviour, which is a chapel of ease to the parochial church of St. Stephen, standing without, but very near the city. It lies 18 leagues from Bourges, to the S. W. See ARGENTAN.

ARGIA, ARGOLICA, or ARGOLIS, a province of Peloponnesus, in European Turkey. It is bounded on the south by Laconia, and the Sinus Argolicus, now Golfo di Napoli; on the east by the Egean sea; on the north by Sinus Saronicus, now Golfo d'Engina, and by Corinthia; and on the west by Arcadia. Its ancient inhabitants were the Argivi, and the latter the Pelasgi. The soil is marshy, and abounding with vines. The beginning of the kingdom of the Argives was about the year of the world 2091, which was 300 years before the reign of Cecrops, the first king of the Athenians; 674 years before the destruction of Troy, in the time of Abraham, and the 44th year of the life of Isaac: and this Inachus was the progenitor of the most celebrated families in the Peloponnesus. The kingdom of the Argives ended with Acrisius, anno mundi 2742.

ARGILE (shire of). See ARGYLE.

ARGINUSÆ, a small island belonging to Greece, near which the Athenians under Conon gained a victory over the Lacedæmonians, who lost their general, Callicratides.

ARGLASS, or rather ARDGLASS, i. e. the Grey height, a small town belonging to the county of Down (perhaps in the barony of Ards, which see), and province of Ulster, in the North of Ireland: it has a haven, and formerly gave title of earl to Lord Cromwell of Oakham. Here are noble ruins of several castles, which seem to have been of vast extent. Next to Newry and Down, it was once the principal town for trade in all the province. It is situated on a rocky creek, fit only for small vessels or fishing-boats, but its trade was carried on at Killock harbour, thence called the haven of Ardglass. It hath several proprietors; but the greatest part of it, with a good estate about it, belongs to the earl of Kildare. It is about a mile from Killogh, and six miles from Down-Patrick.

ARGOB. We read, Deut. iii. 4. that the Israelites took all his (viz. Og's) cities, all the region of Argob, the kingdom of Og in Bashan. It is controverted among writers, whether Argob and Bashan were equivalent terms, or quite distinct, or whether the former denoted only some part of the country denoted by the latter. Now this matter may, I think, be cleared from verses 13, 14, 15, for here Moses saith, I gave unto the half tribe of Manasseh all the region of Argob, with all Bashan. Jair, the son of Manasseh took all the country of Argob. And I gave Gilead unto Machir. Here in verse 14 the region of Argob seems plainly to be spoken of as a part of Bashan; and verse 14, 15, the region of Argob is said to be given unto Jair, and Gilead unto Machir: So that these two together seem to have made up the country, or at least the kingdom, of Bashan. As to the particular situation of these two tracts, viz. Argob and Gilead, it is evident enough that Gilead, properly so called, was the tract wherein lies the mount or hills of Gilead; and consequently that the remaining part of the kingdom of Og was that called the region of Argob, lying N. of the other.

ARGONAUTS, in Latin Argonautæ, the name given to those valiant Greeks, who, in the infant state of Greece, and before the siege of Troy accompanied Jason to Colchis, the present Mingrelia, a province of Asiatic Turkey, in order to take away the golden fleece. The number of those adventurous Argives and Thessalians is said to have been 52 or 54, the principal of whom were Jason, Orpheus, the two brothers Castor and Pollux, Telamon and Peleus, both sons of Æacus, and fathers of Ajax, and Achilles, Laertes the father of Ulysses, Amphiarus a famed soothsayer, Hercules, Hylas, Theseus, and Perithous, with others of less note. These, having agreed upon this Argonautic expedition, which is computed to have happened in the 11th year of Gideon, judge of Israel, and about the year of the world 2700, embarked in a ship called

Argo

A R

Argo, 50 cubits in length, the first long ship seen in Greece, whence they had the name of Argonauts; and having sailed through the Hellespont, Propontis, and Thracian Bosphorus, boldly launched into the Euxine sea, and at last arrived at the court of Oetes, king of Colchis, where they met with a kind reception. His great wealth, or golden mines, couched under the figure of the golden fleece, being kept under a strong guard, or, as the poets feign, by a watchful and furious dragon, there was no possibility of surprising, much less attempting it by force. But Medea, the king's daughter, being enamoured of Jason, agreed to come away with him after she had found means to circumvent the guards, and bring off all the wealth, with which they returned to Greece. Though this matter seems to be wrapt up in deep allegory, has all the marks of mere romance and fable; yet chronologers, particularly the celebrated Sir Isaac Newton, looked upon it as a real event; and has accordingly, in his chronology, endeavoured to fix the æra of this Argonautic expedition, nearly as above-mentioned. But thus much seemed necessary to be said of it here. See COLCHIS and MINGRELIA.

ARGONNE, one of the subdivisions of Lower Champagne, in the government of this last name, and of Brie, in France. It extends itself from Champagne into the duchy of Barr, and is a strip of land about 20 French leagues in length. Some reckon St. Menehould its capital, which Busching places in the territory of Chalons. In Argonne are the following places; namely, Clermont, Beaumont, Villefranche, Varennes, Grand Pre, and Montfaucou.

ARGOON, or ARGUN, a river on the confines of the Mongol desert and Siberia. It has its source in about 49 degrees N. Lat. and 135 Long. E. and falls into the Amoor.

ARGOS. This ancient kingdom, in Greece, was more anciently called Ægiala and Apia; but it changed such its name for that of Argolis, from Argos, the son of Jupiter and Niobe, who was sister to Apis, upon whom the kingdom devolved, because Apis died without issue. It was also sometimes stiled Hippim and Hippoboton (signifying in Greek breeding horses), from the neighbouring pastures, in which Neptune is said to have fed his horses, but rather in fact for an excellent breed of horses, which that country was famed for. This kingdom is situated on the north-east side of Peloponnesus, surrounded on the east by the two bays of Saron, (now Golfo de Neapoli) and of Argos, and has the kingdom of Sicyon, or Achaia Propria and Arcadia on north and west, and that of Laconia on the south. What its ancient limits were is hard to say: but it was very much enlarged by some of its monarchs, so that it extended itself from east to west from 38, 43, to 40, E. Long. (or about 70 miles), and north and south from 37 and a half to 38, 20, N. Lat. (or about 50 miles). Its chief river is the Inachus, so called from Inachus the founder of the kingdom, to whom Argos above-said was the third successor. It empties itself into the bay of Argos, now called Golfo de Engia, near the port Asine. On this river was situated the metropolis, called also Inachus, and famous (among other things) for the death of Pyrrhus, a king of Epirus, who, having forced an entrance into it, was knocked on the head with a tile, flung by an old woman from the top of a house. Here was also the brazen tower, in which Danaë, being there confined by her father, was deflowered by Jupiter. It was much enriched by its trade, and particularly that of a fine breed of horses, as above observed. The government of Argos (and afterwards Mycena) continued altogether monarchical from its first foundation to its establishing itself into a downright democracy. Pausanias indeed observes, that the Argives were extremely jealous of their liberties, and were ever endeavouring to encroach upon the royal prerogative. However, they did not wholly clip it till after a long succession of princes. The Heraclidæ, who were of the family of Perseus, recovered the kingdom from that of Pelops, about 80 years after the taking of Troy, or about 40 years before its becoming a commonwealth; for it was during that space that the people gained so much ground upon their kings, that they left them little else but the bare name. But by what laws they were anciently governed, or by whom they were enacted, and how far these monarchs were tied by them, is what we will not pretend to say. This kingdom, Eusebius tells us out of Castor, was founded 1080 years before the first Olympiad, that is (according to Usher) in the year of the world 2148. So that Inachus, the founder of it, was cotemporary with Abraham, and with Thurimachus, the 7th king of Sicyon. It continued under the name of the Argolic kingdom till the reign of Acrisius, the 14th king of it, who transferred the seat of it to Mycena, a city of his own founding, about the year of the world 2700, and about the year 550 of its foundation; from which time that part of it continued to be called the kingdom of Mycena, till the dissolution, which happened about the year 2020, when the Heraclidæ made themselves masters again both of this and the whole Peninsula, after it had stood upwards of 77 years, and under the government of 21 monarchs. The Argolic kingdom, properly so called, retained likewise its own kings after this division, until the Heraclidæ, whose family had been set aside by that of Euristheus, the implacable enemy of Hercules and all his race, above an age before. These dividing the Peninsula into three kingdoms, that of Argos had not continued above 40 years before Melas, their last king, having made a push to recover cover the royal prerogative, which was dwindled by that time to its lowest pitch, lost the kingdom and his life, after which the Argovic government was changed into a democracy.

A R

ARGOS, or ARGO (the city of) was anciently the metropolis of Agamemnon, king of the preceding. It is situated on the river Planizza, the antient Inachus above-mentioned, 14 miles from Napoli di Romania to the north, 24 from Corinth towards the south-east, and 43 from Leontari towards the east. It was anciently a very stately and magnificent city, and for several ages capital of a kingdom, afterwards a common-wealth as above-related. But it is now only a village, with a castle; yet it is the see of a Greek archbishop, who has a tolerable palace, though the rest of the houses are very indifferent. The town was sold to the Venetians in 1388, from whom it was taken by Mahomet II. in 1463, but recovered by General Morosini in 1686, and lost again to the Turks in the present century. Lat. 37, 30. Long. 23 E.

ARGOSTOLI, a sea-port town of the isle of Cephallonia, over-against Albania; it is the best harbour in all the island, and the proveditor resides in the fortress, which is 5 miles distant.

ARGOW, a country of Switzerland, according to Collier, bordering on the lake of Constance; it is so called from the river Arg. Some modern authors, who divide Switzerland into four parts, make Argow one of them.

ARGUIN, or ARGUIM, an island on the coast of Africa, about 16 miles distant from Cape Blanco, situated in W. Long. 16, 30, N. Lat. 20, 20. It is scarce two miles in length; notwithstanding which, it was a bone of contention for 87 years between the Portuguese, Dutch, English, and French; and, after a variety of fortune, has at last been totally abandoned.

This island was first discovered by the Portuguese in 1444, when a fleet bound to the east touched at Arguim, and from some little trade carried on with the natives it was imagined, that a settlement there might be of some advantage to Portugal. In consequence of this opinion, a fort was erected on the island, and the Portuguese enjoyed the peaceable possession of it till 1638. At this time the Dutch, having received a minute account of the condition of the island, resolved to attack it; and accordingly landed without molestation from the garrison, which was too weak to oppose them. The Portuguese, however, defended themselves with great intrepidity, and at last surrendered upon honourable terms. The Dutch immediately set about repairing the fortifications, and securing it in the best manner they could: however, in 1665, the fort was reduced almost to an heap of rubbish by an English squadron; but as the fortifications were totally destroyed, and only a small garrison left there, it was easily re-taken by the Dutch the next year. They now redoubled their diligence in strengthening the island; entering into alliance with Moorish chiefs, procuring a number of families to settle under protection of the fort, and giving extravagant prices for gums, in order to monopolize the gum-trade. By this means the gum-trade of the French Senegal company was almost entirely destroyed; upon which they fitted out a squadron, dispossessed the Dutch, and had the island finally ceded to them by the treaty of Nimeguen.

Though the Dutch now seemed to be finally expelled, they resolved not to part so easily with such a valuable settlement. Under pretence of being subjects of the elector of Brandenburg, therefore they erected one of the forts which had been demolished, and there maintained themselves in spite of the utmost endeavours of the French company to dispossess them. Numberless were the memorials, protests, rescripts, &c. which were published on this occasion, till a new war in 1701 put an end to them. In 1717, however, the French company having found all their remonstrances ineffectual, fitted out a new squadron; but this armament did not arrive at Arguim before Feb. 26, 1721. The Dutch defended themselves with such intrepidity and conduct as had almost baffled the utmost efforts of the French; but the latter having found means to draw off a Moorish chief from his allegiance, the Dutch were obliged to evacuate Arguim, and retire to Portendic, where they fortified themselves, determining to watch a favourable opportunity for recovering their settlement at Arguim. This was not long wanting by means of the weakness of the garrison, and the imprudence of Daval, the French director; who, having quarrelled with the Moors, was surprized, defeated, and killed by them: in consequence of which, the settlement fell again into the hands of the Dutch, on the 11th of January 1722. In 1723 the Dutch were attacked by another French squadron, under the command of the Sieur Riguadiere. This gentleman boasted, that the fort could not hold out one day; but though he prevailed so far as to get possession of the cisterns which contained the water of the besieged, he was at last shamefully repulsed, and forced to raise the siege with precipitation. The Dutch however did not long enjoy the possession which they had so bravely defended; for in 1725 their fort was entirely demolished by the French under Du Casse, and has never since been re-built by any European nation.

ARGUN, a river, which, together with Schilk, forms that of Amur, a famous and considerable stream in the Asiatic part of the Russian empire, dividing it from China.

ARGUNSK,

A R

ARGUNSK, an ostrog, i. e. a kind of strong place, but surrounded only with palisadoes, and sometimes banks of earth with boards; situated in the circle of Nertschinskoi, a subdivision of the province of Jokutzkor, belonging to Siberia, in the Asiatic part of Russia. It was erected in the year 1682, on the western shore of Argun, in order to assist the levying of the tribute from the Tungusi, a people in this neighbourhood, who dwell on the eastern banks of that river: but in 1689 it was removed to its present site. It is the farthestmost frontier or fortress on the confines of the Mungals country towards the east, is provided with a stout garrison, and drives also a good trade with the Mungals. The land about this place is some of the most fruitful and healthy in all Siberia; but the cold here is uncommonly severe, so that in summer the thaw does not reach above an ell and a half into the ground. The territory of Argunsk is also for the most part subject in the spring to a slight earthquake; and in the beginning of winter it is said actually to experience a shock; the epilepsy or falling-sickness, and a sort of malady called wolloz are prevalent in these parts. Among the most common disorders is the venereal disease, with which old and young of both sexes are so dreadfully afflicted that hence nothing less than a total extirpation of the inhabitants must in time be expected to ensue from it. In the neighbourhood of Argun the Chinese set up annually new pales as a boundary-line on their side.

The silver-mine of Argunsk is also called that of Nertschinskoi: their small huts or workshops for smelting the ore stand on the rivulet of Tufatchi, about 14 wersts from the river Argun, and 6 and a half from the brook Serebrenka, in a valley between 2 mountains, extending from west to east. The ore does not lie very deep, and frequently large heaps or clumps of it are met with in one place. The profit arising from it is indeed not very considerable, though of some importance. A pound of fine silver contains 2 ducats and a half of fine gold, of a beautiful colour and fabric. In 1740 and 1741, from this mine were delivered at Petersburg, for the use of the crown, about 26 quintals and some odd pounds of fine silver, also upwards of 27 pounds of fine gold. Here also is found blue vitriol. About 2 hours distance from hence, towards the south-east, is a mountain which consists of fine green jasper, though very much mixed with common or rock-stone, so that seldom pieces weighing 3 pounds are to be met with, which are free from flaws or cracks, and clear. In the neighbouring steep cliffs, or crags, are some salt lakes; among which is particularly one, about 3 wersts in circuit, with a good culinary salt swimming like a skin or scurf on the surface of it.

A R

ARGYLESHIRE, or ARGATHILIA, in Scotland; which, together with Perthshire and the Western Islands, is said to have constituted the ancient kingdom of the Scots, while the rest of Caledonia was subject to the Picts and Romans, comprehends Kintyre, Knapdale, Argyle Proper, Cowal, Lorn, with the islands of Bute and Arran. It is bounded on the south by the Irish sea, and the frith of Clyde; on the east by Perthshire; on the north-east by Lochaber; and on the north-west by several islands. The extent of it from south to north, between the Mull of Kintyre and Lochaber, amounts to 90 miles; and the breadth in some places, including the isles, to 70. This country, like all other parts of the Highlands, affords a very wild and horrid prospect of hills, rocks, and huge mountains, piled upon each other in a stupendous and dreadful disorder; bare, bleak, and barren to the view; or at best covered with shagged heath, which appears black and dismal to the eye, except in the summer, when it is variegated with an agreeable bloom of a purple colour. The coast of Argyle is rocky; yet indented with bays and inlets, that afford good harbours for shipping. The country is well watered by rivers, brooks, and lakes, abounding with fish; the vales and flat parts of it are cultivated for corn; the mountains feed an innumerable quantity of black cattle, which run wild among the hills in winter as well as in summer; the heath and woods, of which there is a considerable number, afford shelter to deer, roebucks, and all sorts of game in great plenty: the circumference of the sea, with its locks, bays, and harbours, pours forth myriads of fish; but the innate wealth of the country is dug from the bowels of the mountains, in iron, copper, lead, and other metals and minerals.

Argyle is the seat of a provincial synod, consisting of 5 presbyteries and 49 parishes; and gives the titles of duke and earl to the noble family of Campbell, the most powerful of all the Scottish nobility. The duke of Argyle is, by hereditary right, great master of the king's household in Scotland, admiral of the Western isles, general of Dumbarton castle, and, before the jurisdictions were abolished, enjoyed other hereditary offices, which rendered him too powerful as the subject of a limited monarchy. He still possesses many royalties; his vassals, even of the name of Campbell, are so numerous, and his influence extends so far, that he could, on occasion, bring 3 or 4000 fighting men into the field. Argyleshire is in general peopled by this clan; and affords a great number of castles and seats belonging to gentlemen who hold of the duke, and boast themselves descended from his family. Argyle Proper is bounded by Knapdale and Cowal on the south; Lochaber on the north; Lennox and the

Grampian hills on the east; and Lorne on the west. It lies between Lochfyn and Lochow; which last is a fresh-water lake, about a mile broad, but extending 24 in length, including 12 islands, on two of which there are the castles of Enconel and Glenurquhart. This lake, which gives the title of viscount to the duke of Argyle, issues in the river Aw, which after a course of 6 or 7 miles, enters Loch Ettiff, and this falls into the western sea, opposite to the isle of Mull: all these abound with excellent trout and salmon. For a description of the other divisions of Argyleshire, see KINTYRE, &c.

ARHUSSE. See AARHUSSE.

ARIA, a province of Old Persia, was bounded on the north by Margiana and Bactria; west by Parthia and Carmania the desert; south by Drangiana; east by Parapamisus, now comprehended under the province of Chorasan. It was anciently a very populous country, though much subject to heats, and intermixed with deserts, heaths, and forests. However, where the heat of the sun is a little rebated, they have very fruitful plains, which among other things produce grapes; the wine of which hath so strong a body as to keep 80 or 100 years without diminution of colour or flavour. The ancient city of Aria, now known by the name of Heri or Herat, is still large and populous. Sir Thomas Herbert, in his travels, tells us, that when he was there he found it under a governor of its own; and adds, that the adjacent country abounds with roses, of which they make a water much stronger in its smell than that made in Europe. There are likewise tapestries made in the neighbourhood of this place, such as transcend not only the tapestries of Europe, but even those that come from the best of the Persian looms. This city was rebuilt and splendidly adorned by the sultan Heussien Mirza.

ARIANO, in Latin Arianum, an ancient town of the Hirpini; now a small city of the Farther Principate, belonging to the kingdom of Naples, in the lower division of Italy. It is situated on a steep hill, at the foot of the Appenine mountains. It gives the title of count to the duke of Bovino, to whom it is subject. It is also the see of a bishop, under the archbishop of Benevento. It lies 15 miles east of the city of this last name, in Lat. 41, 16, N. Long. 15, 35, E.

ARIANO, a town or large village belonging to the duchy of Ferrara, in the Papal dominions, and middle division of Italy. It is situated on the Po, near the confines of the Venetian territories.

ARICA, a town of Los Charcas, in the kingdom of Peru, in South-America. It is a port to Potosi, though upwards of 270 miles to the north-west of it, and a very good one; situated on the Pacific-ocean, being the embarcadero or place for shipping the treasure from most of the mine-towns of Peru. It is a place of considerable trade and well-peopled.

A R

Here is a capacious haven; the shore is full of great stones, has but little water, and always rough; so that boats cannot come to set any thing on shore, but in three creeks or guts, the best of which is at the foot of the headland. To enter the harbour one must pass between two rocks, and the coast on the starboard-side among stones. It is quite bare at low water, and may be perceived at high water. When boats have passed it they turn short to the larboard-side, and, steering directly to the first houses, they enter the great creek, the bottom of which is always upon a level; and here is so little water at low ebb, that canoes are not afloat, and boats laden touch at high water: so that to prevent their being staved, their keels are strengthened with iron-bars.

In order to prevent the landing of an enemy at that place, the Spaniards made entrenchments of unburnt bricks, and a battery in the form of a small fort, which flanks the three creeks; but wretchedly built, and now quite falling to decay. It might have been a strong place, when Dampier was repulsed here in 1680; though decayed in 1712, when M. Frezier was there.

The earthquakes, frequent here, have at length ruined this town, which at present is no more than a village of about 150 families, mostly blacks, Mulattoes, and Indians, with but few whites. In November 1605, the sea, agitated by an earthquake, suddenly flooded; and bore down the greatest part of the town, the ruins of its streets being still to be seen, stretching out about a quarter of a league from its present site. What remains now of the town is not liable to the like accidents, as being situated on a small eminence, at the foot of the headland above-mentioned. Most of the houses here are built only of fascines or wattles, made of a sort of flag or sedge, which is called totora; these are bound together, standing endwise, with leather-thongs, and canes set across; or else they are made of canes set upright, and the intervals filled up with earth. The unburnt bricks are reserved for building the more stately houses, and for churches. No rain ever falling here, the roofs are nothing but mats, which give the houses, when viewed on the outside, the appearance of ruins. The parish-church is pretty handsome, and also that of the Invocation of St. Mark. Here is a monastery of the order of Mercy, containing only 7 or 8 monks, an hospital of the brethren of St. John of God; and a monastery of Franciscans, who came and settled in the town, after destroying the house they had half a quarter of a league from it, though situated in the most delightful part of the vale of Arica, and near the sea. This vale, otherwise called the jurisdiction of Arica, belonging to the diocese of Arequipa, in that of the audience of Lima, extends about a league along the coast of the South sea. Besides the heat and and inclemency of the air, the greatest part of the country is barren, except the site of the old town, which is divided into little meadows of clover-grass, some spots of sugar-cane, with olive and cotton trees intermixed, and marshes full of the sedge above-mentioned, with which the houses are constructed. The vale being contracted to the eastward, becomes more fertile that way. About a league up is the village of St. Michael de Sapa. The produce in several scattered farms here, and throughout all the rest of the vale, is only aji, or Guinea-pepper, with which alone the inhabitants drive a very profitable trade, as may be easily imagined from the vast consumption of it in all these parts of America: for the Spaniards of Peru are in general so much addicted to that sort of spice, that they can dress no meat without it, though so very hot and biting that there is no enduring of it, unless one be used to it. The dealers in this commodity resort hither from the provinces on the other side of the mountains: and the annual amount of these plantations is computed to be no less than 60,000 dollars. The pods of this pepper are about a quarter of a yard in length; and when gathered are dried in the sun, and packed up in bags of rushes, each containing an aroba, or quarter of a hundred weight; and thus they are exported to all parts of the kingdom. Some other parts of this jurisdiction are famous for producing vast quantities of large and excellent olives, far exceeding the finest produced in Europe, being almost as large as a hen's egg. They extract some oil from their olives, and find a good market for it in the provinces of Cordillera: others are pickled; and some, together with a small quantity of oil, exported to Callao.

Formerly, in March or April, the silver was brought by land from Potosi to the town of Arica, where it was shipped off in May for Lima; by which means Arica was much enriched. But since Sir Francis Drake, in the year 1578, took here 3 barks, in which not a soul was found, and in one of them was 1140lb. weight of silver, they would no longer expose such treasures to be plundered: but resolved to send their silver to Lima by land, though a very tedious and expensive journey. At that time the town consisted but of 20 houses; afterwards it rose to 100. Mr. Thomas Cavendish, who visited this place in 1517, says, this town was once very populous and rich: and, having but a few men, he durst not attempt it: yet he took 2 ships out of the port. In 1599 the Dutch found this to be rather a safe road than a harbour, it being well defended from the north, east, and south winds, but not from the west, nor of easy and safe approach. In the beginning of the preceding century the Spaniards first fortified this place, being obliged to it by the depredations of the English and Dutch. It is governed by a corregidor, nominated once in 6 years by the king of Spain. Lat. 18, 26, N. Long. 71, 6, W.

ARICA, supposed by Camden to be the island of Alderney, in the British channel, and on the coast of Normandy, in France.

ARICIA, now called LA RICCIA, was anciently a considerable town of Latium, and in the Campagna di Roma, in the middle division of Italy. It was situated on the Via Appia, about 3 miles from Alba Longa, and one mile from Albano. The brave and eloquent Turnus Hardonius, whom Tarquin the Proud put to death for hindering the Latins from uniting with him, was a native of this place. According to the historian Florus, it was made a Roman colony, together with Lanuvium, in the year of Rome 630. It must have been but inconsiderable in those days, as Horace, in sat. v. says, Aricia furnished him but with indifferent accommodation in his coming from Rome. Pliny commends its cabbages, and Martial its leeks. It lies 16 miles from Rome, and gives the title of duke, belonging to the noble family of Chigi. In this town is a handsome church, built by pope Alexander VII. The lake of Aricia is now dried up, and called Lago de Nemi. Martial gives the town the epithet of Nemoralis Aricia. See RICCIA.

ARIENZA, a small place and principality of the Terra di Lavoro, a province belonging to the kingdom of Naples, in the lower division of Italy.

ARIEPATI, one of the most considerable towns of Marava, a large kingdom, tributary to that of Madura, in the peninsula of India within the Ganges.

ARJEPLÖG, a pastorate or parish of Pitea-Lapmark, a subdivision of Lapland, in Sweden. It lies 10 miles from that of Arfwidsjerf, more contiguous to the mountains, and close by the large lake of Hornawam. Ever since the year 1743 it has had a school for 6 Lapland children: there is a chapel of ease at Silbojock; and the whole community consists of 5 Lap villages; namely, Lurkt or Loctea, Mahas or the north-west village, Simesjaur or Simesjerf, Niarg or the south-west village, and that of Arjeplögs. These all pay tribute to Sweden.

ARIMA, a city and sea-port belonging to the kingdom of Ximo, in Japan. The inhabitants, according to Collier, have banished all Christians thence.

ARIMATHEA, the same which is called in the sacred Hebrew books Ramah and Ramathah, and signifies a high place. It is spoken of as the seat of Joseph, who begged the body of Jesus.

ARIMOA, an island of New Guinea, belonging to those called the Southern or Antarctic countries. It lies in lat. 3, S. and by the Amsterdam map seems to be above 100 leagues to the south-east of Schouten's island. Arimoa is the largest island hereabouts; but they all are well-peopled, abounding ing with cocoa-nuts, Indian figs, and various sorts of roots. The inhabitants have vast numbers of canoes: and they go all armed with bows and arrows, even the women and children. And it seems they are in a perpetual war with some neighbouring people, probably the people of one island against those of the other. But none are so populous as Arimoa, though equally pleasant and fertile.

ARIMASPI, a people of European Sarmatia, who dwell in those countries, which at this day are comprehended in Ingermanland, the duchy of Novogorod, and that of Pleskow, in Muscovy.

ARIOLA, a small place belonging to the Farther Principality, a province of the kingdom of Naples, in the lower division of Italy; it has the title of a duchy, which is in the house of Caraccioli. It is situated between St. Agatha and Monte Sarchio.

ARIPO, a strong town of Asia, on the western coast of the island of Ceylon, at the mouth of the river Sarunda. It belongs to the Dutch; and to the east of it is a bank, where they fish for pearls. Long. 80, 25. E. Lat. 8, 42, N.

ARIQUIPA, a city in the diocese of the audience of Lima, belonging to Peru, in South-America. It was founded in the year 1539, by order of Don Francisco Pizarro, in a place known by the same name. But this situation having been found inconvenient, the inhabitants obtained permission to remove it to the valley of Quilca, where it stands at present, about 20 leagues distant from the sea. The lands in its dependency having been united to the empire of the Incas by Maita Capac, the goodness of the soil and purity of the air induced that monarch, for the farther improvement of the country, to draw 3000 families from such neighbouring provinces as were less fertile, and with these to people four or five towns.

This is one of the largest cities in all Peru; delightfully situated in a plain, and the houses well built of stone, and vaulted. These are not all of an equal height, though mostly lofty; but commodious, finely decorated on the outside, and neatly furnished within. It has a pretty good harbour; but the entrance to it is narrow, having fine anchoring in 18 fathom water. The temperature of the air is remarkably wholesome: and though sometimes a little frost is seen here, yet the cold is never excessive, nor is the heat troublesome. So that the fields are always clothed with verdure, and enamelled with flowers, as in a perpetual spring. The inhabitants also enjoy an exemption from many diseases, common in other countries; and this is partly owing to their care in keeping the streets clean, by means of canals, which extend to a river running near the city; and by these all the filth of the city is washed away.

But these pleasures and advantages are much abated, by the dreadful shocks of earthquakes, to which in common, with all those parts of America, it is so subject, that it has been four times laid in ruins by these convulsions of nature; besides other small shocks, not attended with such terrible consequences. The first of these shocks was felt in the year 1582; the second on the 24th of February 1600, which was accompanied with an eruption of a volcano, called Guayna Patina in the neighbourhood of the city, which burning mountain may perhaps one time or other destroy the whole town; the third happened in 1604, and the last in 1725. And though the desolation attending the three last was not so universal, yet the public buildings, and the most stately ones, were laid in ruins.

The city is very populous, containing still between 4 and 500 houses; and among its inhabitants are many noble families, this being the place where most of the Spaniards settled, on account of the goodness of the air and fertility of the soil; as also for the conveniency of commerce at the port of Aranta, which is only 20 leagues distant.

The soil about the town is very fruitful, producing plenty of corn, of which they make excellent bread. The town is but badly fortified, considering its importance; the greatest part of the silver from Los Charcas, and from the mines of Potosi and Porco, being brought hither to be sent to Callao, and from thence to Panama. It contains about 600 Spanish families, who trade in wine and brandy. The civil, political, and military government of the city is executed by a corregidor, who is placed at the head of the regidores, from among which are annually chosen two ordinary alcaldes.

The city of Ariquipa did belong to the diocese of Cusco, till the year 1609, when it was erected into a particular bishopric on the 20th of July, under that of Lima.

Captain Rogers observes, that under the cape of Ariquipa is a bay, which makes a good harbour, and called Port Chala, which must be the same that is named Quilca by Frazier and others.

The chapter of Ariquipa, besides the bishop, consists of the five usual dignitaries; namely, the dean, archdeacon, chanter, rector, and treasurer, three canons, and two prebends. Besides the sacristy, which is served by two priests for the Spaniards, the parish of Santa Martha is appropriated to all the Indian inhabitants. Here are two Franciscan convents: one of Observants, and the other of Recollets, both belonging to the province of Cusco; also one of Dominicans, and another of Augustines, depending on Lima; and a monastery of the Fathers of Mercy, subordinate to that of Cusco. Under their respective fraternities of Lima, here are also a college of Jesuits, and a convent or hospital of St. Juan de Dios. Here is a seminary for the service of the cathedral, and two nunneries; namely, one of Carmelites, and the other of St. Catherine. A third was lately built, for those of the order of Santa Rosa. At Ariquipa is also an office of revenue, under the direction of an accomptant and treasurer, together with commissaries of the inquisition and croisades, with their subalterns, as in all the other cities. Lat. 17, 5, S. Long. 73, 5, W.

The jurisdictions in the diocese of Ariquipa are, Ariquipa properly so called, Camana, Condesuyos de Ariquipa, Caylloma, Monquegua, and Arica.

ARIQUIPA (jurisdiction of), comprehends the suburbs and towns in its neighbourhood, where the climate being the same as in the city, the country is perpetually covered with flowers, corn, and fruits, while the excellence of the pastures is sufficiently evident, from the numbers of fine cattle fed in them.

ARIS, a community or congregation belonging to the principal bailiwick of Rhein, in the anciently populous Sudavia, and circle of Scheft, a subdivision of the kingdom of Prussia. Here is a chancery-bailiwick, upon which king Frederic William bestowed the privileges of a town, by which its reputation and buildings have hitherto increased.

ARISSA, as Sandys calls it, or LARISSA, a town situated not far from the frontiers of Judæa, in Asiatic Turkey, and about two miles from the sea, on some part of the famed Mount Cassius. It is supposed to be the ancient Laris of Idumea, and 63 miles south of Gaza, where that unfortunate general, Pompey the Great, was murdered and buried; having received his death by the command of the treacherous Ptolemy, king of Egypt, to whom he had fled for succour, and his sepulchre, from a generous private soldier. The emperor Adrian afterwards erected a noble monument to his memory on that very spot. The town is now poor and inconsiderable, and is only defended by an old castle, and garrison of about 100 men.

ARIZA, a small fortified town of Arragon, a province of Spain, with a castle. It is situated on the river Xalon. It has the title of a marquissate. The neighbouring country abounds in fruit, corn, and wine: and here is produced also saffron.

ARK, a river in Yorkshire, which falls into the Swale, near Grinton.

ARKICO, ARQUICO, ERCOCO, or ERQUICAS, supposed to be the Adula of the ancients, a famous sea-port of Barnagass, or rather Bahr-Naghass, i. e. Lordship of the sea, belonging to the kingdom of Tigra, and on the coasts of Abex or Habash, in Africa. This is a town of no great extent or opulence, but is defended with a castle. Some place it within 2 leagues of the isle of Massua; whereas, by our latest maps, it appears to stand near 20 from it.

ARKLOW, a barony belonging to the county of Wicklow, and province of Leinster, in Ireland. Of the same name is a pretty little town; with a harbour, near the sea. It has the privilege of holding a market, and sends two members to the Irish parliament. Here was a castle of the earls of Ormond, who, in Camden's time, stiled themselves Lords of Arklow; and it anciently gave name also to a county. In it likewise are barracks for two companies of foot. It lies 13 miles S. of Wicklow in Lat. 52, 55, N. Long. 6, 20, W.

ARLBERG, in Latin Arula, or Adula, forms part of the anciently famous Mons-Rhætius, and dividing some seigniories from Tyrol, whence they are called the seigniories before the Arlberg, and which will be mentioned in their places.

ARLES (provincial bailiwick of), one of the subdivisions of Lower Provence, in the government of the latter name, in France. It contains the vigueries of Arles and Tarascon; and in these the principal place is a large and well-built city, situated on the eastern bank of the Rhone. The Romans established their sixth colony in this city, and caused the general assemblies of the six neighbouring provinces to be holden annually here. Many marks of its ancient grandeur are to be seen. Among the most considerable Roman antiquities is, 1. A large collection of monumental inscriptions, urns, and the like, which are in the archbishop's palace; and particularly an extraordinary large sepulchral urn, that will very well hold between 80 and 90 measures, or quarts. 2. Here is also a large obelisk of porphyry, or oriental granate, very much admired by the curious, as one of the most noble remains of antiquity, and the only one of that kind which is to be seen in France. It is 52 feet high, and 7 feet diameter at the base; and yet but one entire stone. It had lain many ages in the ground, in a private garden near the Rhone. At last the magistrates of Arles had it dug up in the year 1675, and set up in 1676 in their city, where it makes a very agreeable appearance, having dedicated it to Lewis XIV. But the new pedestal being of a sorry sandstone, which has been made to it, little corresponds with the valuable pillar standing upon it. 3. A bust of Æsculapius, with a serpent twined round him. 4. The remains of an amphitheatre, which is 1280 feet in diameter, and contains in all 120 arches in two rows, 60 above, and as many below; which was a noble building: but on its inside and outside it is almost entirely filled up now with private houses, and it also seems as if it had never been finished. 5. A piece of a theatre, which consists of a door, with two large and curious marble pillars, of the Corinthian order. 6. The remains of the Roman capitol, which stood here. 7. The Elysian fields, as they are called, which are close to the city, and where the Romans used to bury the ashes of their dead bodies. In this last place is an incredible number of stone sarcophagi or coffins, also some of marble, some half out of the ground, and entirely above it, both with and without covers or lids, tids, and inscriptions. Here, in after times, Christians were buried. These parts yield a perfect fund and mere mine of antiquities, where a lover of such things may spend his whole life in digging and searching; than which no employment is more highly beneficial, though it is certain at the same time that none is more laborious.

The marshes round this city, as hinted above, fill the air with noxious and unalutary exhalations. Arles is the see of an archbishop. It is a provincial bailiwick, viguerie, admiralty, and board of the five great tailles or imposts. Under the archbishop are the prelates of Marseilles, St. Paul trois Châteaux, Toulon, and Orange. He styles himself prince of Mondragon; he has a diocese of 51 parishes, a revenue of 33,000 livres, and he pays a tax of 2008 florins to the court of Rome. Besides the cathedral, here is a collegiate church, with 7 parish-churches, an abbey, 14 convents, a Jesuits college, an hospital, and an academy of men of letters, which is known by the name of the Royal Academy of Sciences and Languages. It owes its first rise to some conferences of several gentlemen of this city, who were lovers of polite literature, and was raised to be an academy in the year 1668, by the king's letters patent; by which it was ordered, that the number of the members should not exceed 20, who must all be noble by birth. Since its first institution, 10 other members have been added to it by new letters-patent.

Arles was anciently the seat and capital of the kingdom of Burgundy, first erected by Boson, and it was also called the kingdom of Arles. The emperors from time to time granted this city several privileges; which, though its princes have since deprived them of, yet it has still a large territory of about 10 leagues depending on it; particularly the following islands formed by the Rhone, dividing itself near Arles into two principal branches: namely, the Camarque and Crau, or Campi Lapidei of Strabo and Pliny; being a large country, covered with stones, and reaching from the Rhone to the sea of Martigne, a small bay between that and Marseilles.

Constantine the Great made Arles the seat of the Roman empire in Gaul; and here several councils were held. Among these the oldest and most considerable was that of the year 312 or 314, which was composed of African bishops assembled here by order of that emperor, who came thither in person, to take cognizance of the accusations against Cæcilian bishop of Carthage. The number of bishops was 200, who made 22 canons, in some of which they condemned the Donatists. This was 16 years before the general council of Nice: the same emperor held another council here in the year 354, where the Arians condemned St. Athanasius. In 449 Ravenius, archbishop of this place, held several councils for the reformation of manners, and for the due executing of the discipline of the church. The first of those councils is learnedly treated of by bishop Stillington, and the fourth by archbishop Usher.

Arles was besieged by the Visigoths in 429; but Aetius relieved it. About the year 513 it was taken by the Franks, who made themselves masters of all the rest of the province. In 730 the Saracens took it; but it was soon recovered by Charles Martel; and so remained in the possession of the Franks till 879, when the above-mentioned Boson caused himself to be declared king of Arles, that is, of the province of Burgundy. And this was the origin of the kingdom of Arles. In the year 1213, Frederic II. granted such particular privileges to this city, that it declared itself a commonwealth, and was governed by a chief magistrate called a podestat, by consuls, and a judge. The people elected the podestat, the archbishop named the consuls, and the podestat appointed the judge. But this republic did not last above 37 years, being utterly dissolved by Charles I. count of Provence, in the year 1251. The fidelity of this city to Rudolphus gained it great advantages, and succeeding emperors enlarged its immunities, especially Conrad III. and Frederic I. who in the year 1167 constrained the dukes of Zuringen to quit all their claims to the kingdom of Arles, to William de Beaux prince of Orange. In 1214 Raymund the son of William surrendered all his title to Charles I. count of Provence; under which counts it continued, till at length it was reunited with the rest of the province to the crown of France.

Over the Rhone here is a wooden bridge. It lies 13 leagues W. of Aix, and almost the same E. of Montpellier, in the midway between Avignon to the S. and the Mediterranean to the N. being 35 miles N. W. of Marseilles, and 430 S. E. of Paris. Lat. 43. 40. N. Long. 4. 43.

ARLES, a small town belonging to the viguerie of Perpignan, a subdivision of the county of Roussillon, in the government of this last name, in France. It is situated at the foot of the Mount Canignon, near the river Tec, with two parish-churches, and a Benedictine abbey, the most considerable in all the country.

ARLESHEIM, or ALLESHEIM, a large open town belonging to the bishopric of Basil, and circle of Suabia, in Germany. It was once the seat of the Protestant chapter, removed thither from Fribourg upon the taking of this last town by the French in the year 1677. The canons built a fine street of houses here, with a church. This is reckoned the principal place of the lordship of Birseck.

ARLEUF, a town of France, in the generality of Moulins, and election of Chateauchinon.

ARLEFRID, a village in the district of the Imperial

A R

perial city of Memmingen, in Germany, remarkable only for its being inhabited chiefly by Protestants.

ARLEUX, a small town of Hainault, in the French Netherlands. It is situated about 6 miles S. of Douay, and a little more to the N. E. of Cambrai, in lat. 50, 26, N. Long. 3, 10, E.

ARLINGTON, a small village, in the midway between Harlington and Shepston, the birth-place of the famous Henry Bennet, son of John Bennet of Arlington. He was bred at Oxford, where, during the civil war, he became under-secretary to George Lord Digby, principal secretary of state; afterwards a volunteer in the army, signalizing himself at Andover. He followed king Charles II. beyond sea, who knighted him at Bruges, March 1658, and sent him lieger to the court of Spain. After king Charles's restoration, he was created baron of Arlington, March 4, 1664, and earl of the same, April 22, 1672. He was made privy-purse, principal secretary of state, knight of the garter, and one of the plenipotentiaries to treat of a peace between the French king and the states of Holland in 1672, and between the emperor and French king in 1674. He died July 28, 1685.

ARLON, marquisate of, belonging to the duchy of Luxemburg, in the Austrian or Roman Catholic Netherlands. It comprehends, besides the town of the same name, about 100 villages or hamlets; and within its district is an abbey of nuns of the Cistercian order, called Bardenburg, or Claire-fontaine, founded in the year 1212, by Ermenfonne countess of Luxemburg.

ARLON, or ARLON, in Latin Arolanum, Ardonum, or Ara Lunæ, from an altar consecrated here to the moon, which planet the ancient inhabitants worshipped. It belongs to the above-mentioned marquisate of the same name, and is situated near the source of the river Semoi, upon a hill. It stands in the earldom of Chiny, and was formerly one itself, but raised to a marquisate in the year 1102. It was yielded with its territory to the French in 1684, but restored to the Spaniards in 1697 by the treaty of Ryswick. Its principal church is dedicated to St. Mark: besides which, here is a convent of Franciscans, and another of Carmelite friars. It was anciently a considerable place, and very well-peopled: but having suffered extremely by the wars, and dismantled in 1671, it is now reduced to a borough. It lies 76 miles W. of Luxemburg; Moll and Collier say only 12 to the N. W. and 27 from Montmed to the N. E. in lat. 49, 45, N. Long. 5, 30, E.

ARMA, Collier says, is both a city and province of Popayan, a kingdom belonging to South America. It lies 25 miles from St. Foy, and fifty from Popayan; but Ulloa says nothing of it, at least under that name.

A R

ARMADABAD, or AMADABAD, a large and rich city of Asia, near the Indian ocean, and is the metropolis of Guzurat, or kingdom of Cambaya, as the Portuguese now call it. It is one of the principal towns belonging to the Mogul, and thought to be the Barbary of the ancients. It lies 18 leagues from Cambaya, or Cambaut city, and 45 N. of Surat. It was taken by storm from the Mahrattas, Feb. 15, 1780, by the British East India Company's forces, from Bombay, commanded by Gen. Goddard, with the loss only of about 100 men, killed and wounded.

ARMAGH, or ARDMAGH, a county belonging to the province of Ulster, in the North of Ireland, the most fruitful district in all the kingdom, as its name in Erse and Irish, probably Arar, or Aran-magh, i. e. from its producing good corn or bread, seems to denote; if the first part of the word, namely Ard, does not refer to the high ground in it; and it is accordingly well improved in all parts, except a ridge of rugged mountains, called the Fews. Armagh is sub-divided in the 5 following baronies, which are, Onealan, Towrany, Armagh properly so called, Fewes, and Orior. Armagh is separated in part from the county of Down to the northward, and on the east by the river Newry: it has the counties of Tyrone and Monaghan on the west; Lough-Neagh on the north, and the county of Louth on the south. It is 32 miles long and 17 broad; containing 170,620 acres, divided into the baronies above-mentioned. It sends 2 members to the Irish parliament.

ARMAGH, belonging to the last mentioned county of the same name, is situated near the river Kalin. The Irish tradition is, that it was so called from queen Armachan. But it seems, according to Moll, to be the same with that which the venerable Bede calls Dearmach, i. e. in the Scottish, Erse, or Irish, a field of oaks; Darrach indeed the Highlanders call an oak, where the said Bede says, St. Patrick built a very fine city. But to this he subjoins a circumstance very romantic, namely, that the model of it was drawn for him by the angels. Whoever was the founder of it, it is said to have been built about the year 445, its ancient name being Druin Shilogh or Shelloch, i. e. a willow grove. However, it is certain, that in 1142 it was made an archbishop's see in honour of St. Patrick, when Cardinal Papirio was sent over as pope's legate from Rome, into this country, in order to revive the decaying discipline of the church. Collier adds, that the primate was subject to the Archbishop of Canterbury, till the period last mentioned; when that Cardinal exempted it. And here, if we may credit the life of St. Patrick, was erected the first public public school or academy in Ireland. Nor is Armagh only an archbishopric, but the metropolis of the whole kingdom, in Latin called Armacha or Ardinacha, the Archbishop hereof being stiled Primate of Ireland. This city was reduced under the power of the Irish by John de Curcy; but miserably defaced by fire, and entirely destroyed with its cathedral, in Tir-Owen's or O'Neal's rebellion, in Queen Elizabeth's reign: so that nothing remained but a few miserable thatched cottages, which hardly preserved the reputation of a market and borough town; with the ruins of the monastery, priory, and Archbishop's palace. Yet, in consequence of its ancient rights, Armagh has the privilege of holding a weekly market, and also sends two members to the Irish parliament. It was afterwards rebuilt, and garrisoned by the English; but it never recovered its ancient lustre. This place was taken by Oliver Cromwell in 1650. The late primate, Dr. Boulter, was a prelate of a very amiable character, and universally beloved, for whom an elegant marble bust has been erected in Westminster-abbey, with a monumental inscription. It lies about 30 miles south of Londonderry, in lat. 54, 30 N. Long. 5, 30 E.

ARMAGNAC, in Latin, Aremorica, or Comitatus Armeniacensis, a territory in the government of Guyenne, and Gascony, in France, bounded by Languedoc on the east; by Agenois and Condomois on the north; by Gascony Proper on the west; and by Comenges on the south. Armagnac, with the neighbouring lordships, was anciently an earldom, which had its own counts, famous in the history of France. In it are reckoned above 1800 fiefs, subject to the ban and arriere ban. It is 22 French leagues in length, and about 16 in breadth. The country is fruitful in corn and wine. Here they make large quantities of brandy, which they send to Bayonne and Bourdeaux. They trade also in wool and flax. Here is a mine of chalk in the town of Laverdan; and at Auch and Mauvesin they make about 100 quintals of salt. Armagnac is divided into Upper and Lower. The Upper Armagnac is very narrow, and situated among the Pyrenean mountains. It contains the 4 following valleys, namely, Magnoac, Nestez, Barousse, and Aure; and has but 2 cities belonging to it. Lower Armagnac is much larger, and more fruitful, than the other; comprehending the following districts: Armagnac Proper, the capital of which is Auch; the county of Fezenzac, the small territory of Eausan, the county of Gaure, the small district and viscounty of Brullos, the ancient viscounty of Lomagne, that of Fezenzaguel, the territory of Riviere, the county of Astarac, the ancient earldom of Comenges, both Upper and Lower, the territory and ancient viscounty of Conferans, and the ancient earldom of Bigorre; which last contains these three parts, namely, the Plains, the Mountains, and Roustan.

ARMAMAR, a small town belonging to the jurisdiction of Lamego, a district in the province of Beira, in Portugal. It has 2 parishes, containing 1300 souls.

ARMANCON, a river of France. It rises in the government of Burgundy; concerning which it is a proverbial saying among the people, "It is a bad river; but it has good fish."

ARMENIA. Whence the tract we commonly call Armenia borrowed its name is not determined. The Greeks will have it to be so called from one Armenus, who after attending Jason in his Argonautic expedition, settled in this country. Others, transforming Armenia into Aramia, derive its name from Aram, the son of Shem, or from one of the kings of Armenia bearing that name. Bochart takes Armenia to be a contraction or compound of Aar (signifying in Hebrew a mountain) and Mini or Minni, the name of a province in this country mentioned, Jer. li. 27, and placed by that prophet between Ararat and Ashchenaz. This opinion seems supported by the Chaldee interpreters, who, on this passage, instead of Mini read Armenia: so that Armenia signifies the mountain, or mountainous part, of Mini, or Nynias, as Nicolas of Damascus calls it. The name of Mini, Menni, and Mynias or Mylias, was at first peculiar to one province; but in process of time became common to the whole country. As to the word Mini or Menni, it is thought to be originally derived from an Hebrew word signifying metal, seeing Armenia abounded in mines, as is plain from Procopius. Armenia was anciently divided into the Greater and Lesser, or Armenia Major and Minor. In its largest sense, it was one of the greatest provinces of Asia Minor. Armenia the Greater was, according to Strabo, bounded on the south by mount Taurus, separating it from Mesopotamia; east by both Medias, (viz. the Great Media and Atropatia); north by Iberia and Albania, or rather that part of the Caucasus which surrounds them both; west by Armenia the Lesser, or the mountains Parydares, some Pontic nations, and the Euphrates. Ptolemy divides all Armenia into 3 districts; the 1st comprehending that part lying between the Cyrus and Araxes; 2d, those provinces which extend west to the bending of the Euphrates; 3d, all lying between the springs of the Tigris and that part of the Euphrates which separates Commagene from Armenia Major. But in truth there is so much difference between author and author as to these particulars, that the division, &c. is become pretty obsolete. As for the cities in this country, it is sufficient in this general article to enumerate some of the principal barely by name, they being more properly described under their own several articles.

Artaxata

Artaxata was the metropolis; Sebastia, Armesata, Tigranocerta, Artagora, Carcathiocerta, Colonia, Chorsia. As to the rivers, Strabo enumerates 6 of great note, the Lycus, Phasis, Cyrus, Araxes, Tigris, and Euphrates, besides several of less note. The most considerable mountains are, the Moschic mountains, Paryadra, Mafius, Niphates, Abus, the Gordyean, Ararat. As to the soil, we above observed the country is very hilly and mountainous; yet the hills are here and there interspersed with fruitful and most beautiful dales and vallies. All sorts of grain are very indifferent, in most places yielding but poor four-fold. If they had not the convenience of watering their lands they would be almost barren. What the country produces is almost entirely owing to painful labour, being either actually watered by hand or by dug trenches, &c. for the fecundation of the fields. The wine too is generally cried down. The cold is so extraordinary here, that all manner of fruits are more backward than in most of the northern countries. The hills (See ARARAT) are covered with snow the whole year round; and it sometimes falls even in the month of June. Lucullus, when appointed to command the Roman army in Armenia, was greatly surprised to find the whole country covered with snow at the autumnal equinox (Sept. 11) to see most of the rivers frozen up, and vast numbers of the horses of his army dying every day by the coldness of the waters. Alexander Severus was no better pleased with this country, having lost on his march through it great part of his army; the cold being then so excessive that many of the soldiers were frozen under their tents, and many lost their hands and feet, being obliged to encamp in the snow. Tournefort tells us, that even in the middle of July he often found ice about the springs before the rising of the sun, though exceeding hot in day-time. This cold keeps every thing so back, that the corn, as that modern traveller observed, was not at that time of the year a foot high, nor other fruits of the earth so forward as they are about Paris at the end of April. Their method of ploughing is very surprising; for they usually put to one plough 10 or 12 yoke of oxen, each yoke having a driver; and this to make deeper furrows, experience having taught them that it was necessary to go very deep, either to mix the upper soil, which is too dry, with that which lies beneath, and is less so, or to preserve the seed from the hard frosts. Notwithstanding all, the corn would be quite burnt up, were not the fields frequently watered as before said. Perhaps great plenty of water is necessary to dissolve the salt and nitre wherewithal the soil is here in most parts impregnated, and which would burn up the roots if the clods were not well moistened with a proportionable quantity of liquid. However, the earth of this country produces an excellent medicine, viz. that which from the name of this territory receives its own surname, Bole Armenic, which was anciently as well as at present found in Armenia, and was by Galen first introduced into medicine, and used with success in the time of a terrible plague at Rome. It was of the yellow kind, and is confessedly a most valuable astringent, and also recommended as an alexipharmic and sudorific. This sort is perhaps the best medicine of all the earths, and, though seldom known or looked for amongst us, might easily be procured, great quantities of it being annually dug out of a pit in the mountains to the north-east of Erzerum. There is also a white sort, which is scarcer, and unknown in our shops, the reddish kind passing among us for the true Bole Armenic; and a good medicine it is if we had it genuine; but instead thereof we are too often imposed on by tobacco-pipe clay, and an other known by painters under the name of Spanish Brown. As to the origin of the Armenians, Herodotus, and after him Stephanus, derives them from the Scythians, by reason of many Phrygian words crept into the Armenian language; but this might have been by the communication they had with the Phrygians as merchants: and we are told that a colony of Ascanians, who were Phrygians, settled in Armenia; which Jeremiah seems to insinuate in joining Ararat (i. e. Armenia) with Aschenaz, (as above) who is generally believed to be the founder of the Phrygian nation, and therefore is taken for the Phrygians, seeing the name of the founder is commonly used in scripture for the nation he founded. Others suppose Hul or Chul, the son of Aram, (see ARAM) and Mesech the son of Japhet, to have been the progenitors of the ancient Armenians; which opinion has no better foundation than the small similitude we find between Mesech and Moschick, between Chul and Cholna, the name of a town in Armenia. Berosus, for his part, tells us, that the ark rested in Armenia, and that Noah (going from thence) left his mother, his wife, and several of his descendants, to people the country; supposing thereby Noah to have remained many years after the flood in Armenia.

Strabo again takes them to be originally Syrians, or rather considers the Syrians and Armenians as two tribes of one and the same nation. This Bochart looks upon as the most probable, finding a great agreement between these two nations both in manners and language. In time many foreigners settled among them, Phrygians, Greeks, and Persians. Armenia advanced very early to the honour of a kingdom; and in time it was divided into several petty kingdoms. The Armenians were at length subdued and made tributaries by the Medes, though they continued to be ruled by kings of their own country. But during their subjection to the Persians we find no mention but of prefects appointed by the kings of Persia. The Macedonians succeeded the Persians in dominion over them; but they at length shook off the Macedonian yoke, and had kings of their own again. We have no system of their laws, and scarce wherewithal to form any particular idea of them. But as to their religion we are not so much at a loss, since Strabo assures they worshipped the same deities with the Medes and Persians. And as to that religion we refer to our article, PERSIA. However, the chief deity of the Armenians seems to have been the goddess Tanais, or Anaitis. To her many temples were erected, especially in the province Acilefina, where she was worshipped in a particular manner. Here she had a most rich and magnificent temple, with a statue of solid gold, of inestimable workmanship. This temple was plundered by the Romans in M. Antony's wars with the Persians, on which occasion it was reported, and universally believed, that the person who first laid sacrilegious hands on the treasure and sacred utensils was struck blind by the deity of the place, and was so terrified that he died soon after. But, many years after, Augustus being entertained at Bononia by an old commander who had served in the war, and inquiring about the truth of the said report, the old officer frankly owned that he was the man, and added that the only evil that happened to him on that occasion was a plentiful estate, which was altogether owing to that sacrilege. In honour of this goddess, and in her temple, the Armenians used to prostitute their daughters; it being a custom among the young women to consecrate their virginity to Tanais; that is, to her priests. Baris was another deity; but as to the manner of worshipping him we are ignorant. Juvenal (sat. 6.) charges them with foretelling future events, by examining the intrails of pigeons, dogs, and sometimes children. Others tell us they used human sacrifices. We can say nothing particular as to their learning and arts, but what we have from writers of no good credit. Berosus tells us, that Noah instructed here his posterity in all human and divine sciences, and committed to writing many natural secrets, which the priests alone were allowed to learn or even see. The Armenians tell us that Noah taught them husbandry and the planting of vines, and shew even now vines which they aver to be of Noah's own planting. These, and such-like fables, are looked on by them now as truths not to be called in question.

Their language was much the same with that of the Syrians; at least they used the Syriac characters. The modern Armenians use two languages, the vulgar and the learned; the latter, they say, having no affinity with any other oriental language. Though the modern Armenians are perhaps now the greatest traders on the earth, yet we find no mention of any commerce carried on by them in ancient times. Sha-Abbas the Great, king of Persia, is said to have been the first who, considering the economy and indefatigable industry of this people, put them upon trade, and settled a colony of them at Julfa, the famous suburb of Ispahan. This place contains at present above 30,000 inhabitants, all Armenians and merchants. Sha-Abbas, by thus settling a numerous colony of Armenians at this place, and other colonies in divers other parts of the kingdom, had two things in view; namely, to secure his dominions from being attacked by the Turks, and to enrich them by trade and commerce. As Armenia was the chief place where the Turks used to make their attempts to penetrate into Persia, he unpeopled it so far as to make it impossible for them to maintain an army in that country. The inhabitants of Julfa, the most populous and greatest city then of Armenia, were ordered to retire with their effects to Ispahan, from whence they were soon after removed to the other side of the river Zenderou, to separate them from the Mohammedans, who despised them on account of their then religion. This new settlement they called Julfa, in memory of their ancient habitation, the ruins whereof are to be seen at this day on the banks of the Araxes, between Erivan and Tauris. The inhabitants of Nachivan were also dispersed into several parts of the kingdom, and above 20,000 Armenian families transplanted into the single province of Guilan. The king, having thus secured his frontiers, employed the Armenians in carrying on the silk trade, trusting them at first with a great many bales, to carry by caravans into foreign countries, on condition they should pay at their return for each bale a certain price settled by persons of judgment before their departure. For their greater encouragement he allowed them, by the way of reward for their pains and industry, whatever they could get above the price agreed on, which was very reasonable. The success answered the hopes both of the king and the merchants, and silver and gold (which to that time had been very scarce in Persia) began to appear in great plenty at the return of the caravans. To that expedient the wealth of Persia is owing even to this day. However, though none of the ancients have, as above observed, mentioned the trade of the Armenians in former ages, yet the easy and safe navigation of the Tigris and Euphrates, and the example of their next and most industrious neighbours the Syrians, may perhaps have induced them to have carried on a trade as well for their own growth as for foreign productions; neither do we see by what other means they could acquire the great wealth they enjoyed under some of their kings. In the reign of Justinian II. the Saracens subdued Armenia, and held it till the irruptions of the Turks, who possessed themselves of this country, and called it Turcomania; but the eastern part is subject to the Persians. Neither was the extirpation of the royal race of Armenia completed; for Leo, king of

of Armenia, came to England in the reign of Richard II. to sue for aid against the Turks.

ARMENIA MINOR, or the Less, one of the two provinces (Cappadocia being the other) which belongs to Aladulia, a subdivision of Asia Minor, or Anatolia, in Asiatic Turkey. It is so called in contradistinction to Armenia Major, or the Greater; of which hereafter. These two are also distinguished into Higher and Lower, Eastern and Western; the former (of which Maraz, or Marasch, is the capital) belonging entirely to the Turks, and the latter to the Persians. The boundaries commonly assigned to Armenia Minor are, Armenia Major on the E. Syria on the S. the Euxine sea, on the W. and Cappadocia on the N. But this neither agrees with ancient geographers, who placed it between Cappadocia and the Euphrates; nor with some moderns, who place it more to the southward of the Euxine sea.

Ptolemy divided it into the five following countries, namely, Orbalizene on the N. Thence going southward, Cetulana, Eretiqua, Orzene: and the southernmost of all, Orbesina. The five following prefectures are reckoned in it; 1. Melitene, near the Euphrates; 2. Cataonia, placed by Strabo in Cappadocia; 3. Muriana; 4. Lavenianefina or Laviana; and, 5. Rhayena or Abarene. In general it is to be observed, that this province hath not always had the same limits; but often run into those of the neighbouring provinces.

At present its division, as a beglerbergate under its capital of Marasch, is as follows:

Sangiacs.	Ziamets.	Timars.
Marasch - - -	10 - -	118
Malathia - - -	8 - -	276
Afab - - -	9 - -	118
Total	27	512

The total amount for the entertainment of these is 9,420,317 aspers.

In the time of the Romans it was divided into four provinces, Laviana, Mariana, Aravena, and Melitene. As to the manners, &c. of the people, they were much the same with those of Armenia Major. Pompey bestowed the kingship on Dejotarus, adding thereto part of Pontus, and a large portion of Colchis, with some provinces of Galatia; which Dejotarus lived in intimacy and friendship with the Roman chiefs of his time; and his son, Dejotarus II. succeeded him. But he dying, and that family becoming thereby extinct, the kingdom of Armenia Minor was first given to Artualdes, king of Media; and afterwards by M. Antony to Ptolemy, king of Pontus. He was succeeded by Archelaus the Cappadocian, and he by Cotys of Bosphorus. Nero bestowed the kingdom on Aristobulus, great grandson to Herod the Great; upon whose death it fell to Tigranes, his near relation; who dying without issue, Armenia Minor was by Vespasian made a province of the Roman empire, and so continued till the division of the empire, when it was subjected to the emperors of the East; and, on the decline of their power, it was subdued first by the Persians, and afterwards by the Turks, who gave it the name of Genech, and have held it ever since.

ARMENTIERES, a small city in the quarter called La Wepe, belonging to the chatellany of Lille, in the government of French Flanders, in Latin Armentaria. It is situated on the Lys. In 1647 the archduke, governor of the Netherlands, took it from the French, who not long after became masters of it again, and are still in possession of it, by the first treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle. Its ancient fortifications Lewis XIV. caused to be demolished. It is considerable for its trade, particularly linen manufactures. It lies 7 miles W. of Lille city, in lat. 50, 42, N. Long. 2, 50, E.

ARMAUTKOY, one of the Grand Signior's country-houses, in the neighbourhood of Constantinople.

ARMIERS, a town of French Hainault, in the Netherlands. It is situated on the Sambre, about 8 miles S. W. of Maubeuge, in lat. 50, 15, N. Long. 3, 40, E.

ARMIRA, or ARMIRO, a port-town of Thesaly, or Janua, one of the provinces of European Turkey, situated on the Golfo dell Amiro, and taken to be the Eretria of the ancients; it is mentioned by Strabo, Thucydides, Polybius, Stephanus, Livy, &c. and also supposed to be the port from which the Argonauts set sail. Here Xerxes' fleet was so shattered by a tempest that Greece was delivered from his intended invasion. It lies 30 miles N. W. of the island of Negropont, in lat. 39, 42, N. Long. 23, 50, E.

ARMORICA, Britany in France was anciently so called: but the word in the Gallic or Celtic language signifying Maritime, may include the provinces on the coast of Gaul, as Flanders, Picardy, Normandy, and Britany; the inhabitants of all which were stiled Amorigi.

ARMOUCHIQUOIS, a wild nation of Indians, in Canada.

ARMOZA, or HARMOZIA, a town in Carmania, at the mouth of the Anamis, which falls into the Persian Gulf. (Arrian;) Armuza, (Ptolemy;) and from this the neighbouring island, and a small kingdom, take the modern name of Ormus. E. long. 56, 17. N. lat. 27, 20.

ARMSTORF, a market-town, on the small river Kolbach, in lower Bavaria, having two castles, and belongs to the barons of Kloofz.

ARMUYDEN, or ARNEMYDEN, a town of Zealand, one of the Seven United Provinces, in Latin Armuydena or Arnemuda, so called from its being being situated at the mouth of the Arne, a small river or canal, which loses itself in the sea near Middleburg. Nothing of the old town now remains but the church and hall. The new town, above 180 years ago, exceeded Middleburg in wealth, having then a good harbour, capable to receive vessels of 300 tons. It was purchased of Philip of Burgundy by the Middleburghers: but the harbour being since choaked up with sand, their principal subsistence is now from refining of salt. It has walls, and is governed by its own magistrates, and lies 3 miles E. of Middleburg. Lat. 51, 30, N. Long. 3, 25, E.

ARNA, a town of Andros, one of the islands in the Archipelago, in European Turkey; has a harbour, is the seat of a cadi and aga, as also of a Latin and Greek bishop. At some distance from it are the ruins of a large and strong wall, several pillars and pedestals of broken statues, with a variety of inscriptions; some of which mention the senate and people of Andros, and the priests of Bacchus; from which it is concluded that this was the site of the ancient and considerable city of Andros.

ARNAU, a place in Neuhausen bailiwick, and circle of Schaak, belonging to the kingdom of Prussia; famous for a church, to which pilgrims anciently resorted.

ARNAUT, the same with ALBANIA (which see), a province of European Turkey.

ARNAY LE DUC, in Latin Arnæum Ducum, a town of Auxois, one of the districts of government of Burgundy in France. It is situated in the middle of the province, on the river Arroux; but Busching places the river in Nivernois. It is the seat of a collection, royal jurisdiction, bailiwick, and salt-magazine. Here is a parish-church, a priory with two convents, a Jesuits college, and an hospital. The counts of Armagnac are lords and barons of this place. It is pleasantly situated about 5 or 6 leagues from Autun, and 35 miles north west of Chalons. Lat. 47, 7, N. Long. 4, 3, E.

ARNDAL, a small town of Nidenas district, belonging to the diocese of Christianland, in Norway. It is a large lading-place or staple, situated on a rock in the middle of the stream Nid. The houses here are mostly built upon the rock, but some of them on piles driven into the water. The streets are bridges made of ships or boats, upon which the people go from one house to another, and even the largest vessels can lie close to these bridges opposite to the houses. The church of Arndal stands a little higher, almost in the middle of the rock, and to it they go from the houses by steps hewn along the rock. The place has a most commodious site for trade, which it drives very considerably in timber, and has several ships belonging to it. It has a town-bailiff in common with Risoer, and the privileges of a borough, but not of an early date. About 2 miles from Arndal, is the iron-work or forge of Bareboe, or Baafelandf-werk, which is one of the oldest in this country, and in some tolerable condition. In the neighbourhood are also several iron-mines. It lies 4 miles from Risoer.

ARNEBURG, a small town on the Elbe, in the electoral Old Mark Brandenburg which in the tenth century was a noted place and a barrier citadel against the Wends. In 1005 the emperor Henry II. fortified it anew, and its agreeable situation invited several of the Saxon emperors to reside here, as well as divers of the Margraval line, both men and women. From the town of Arneburg are denominated a circle and provincial riding.

ARNEDE, a town of Peru, in South-America; situated on the Pacific ocean, or South-sea, and has a good harbour.

ARNES, a subdivision of the fourth-quarter of the isle of Iceland, belonging to Norway.

ARNHEIM, one of the quarters of Guelderland, belonging to the Seven United Provinces, otherwise called the Veluwe, or Velaw; is bounded on the west by the province of Utrecht; on the north by the Zuyder-sea; on the east it is divided from Over-Issel by the river of this last name, as also from the country of Zutphen; and on the south the Rhine parts it from the quarter of Nimeguen, or the Betwe. Its greatest extent from south to north is about 35 miles, and 25 from east to west.

ARNHEIM, or ARNEN, in Latin Arnhemium, or Arenacum, the capital of the above-mentioned quarter of the same name, in Guelderland, one of the seven United Provinces. It is situated upon the north bank of the Rhine, in that part of Dutch Guelderland called Veluwe. Here the states of the province hold their assembly; also the court of Guelderland resides here, which judges of civil and criminal causes. It was taken from the Spaniards by count de Meurs, who joined with the Dutch in 1585. During the war in 1672, this city surrendered to the marshal Turenne, after one day's attack; though Blainville says, without the least resistance: but the French, upon leaving it, forced the city to pay them 170,000 guilders. This town was offered to the prince of Orange, by a deputation of the states and nobility of Guelderland, but for political reasons he wisely declined accepting it. It is a very ancient city, and was surrounded with a wall by Otho IV. count of Guelderland, who exempted it from toll through the duchy; and it has other considerable immunities. In 1443 it was made a Haps town. The church, dedicated to St. Eusebius, or St. Martin, was built by him; its fortifications are pretty good, though somewhat impaired by time, having a large ditch faced faced with free-stone, brick-walls, and ramparts. The inhabitants of this country were called Meneſici, in ancient times. Alting, in his Germania Inferior, proves, that there were at least ten miles between the Arenacum of Tacitus, and the present Arnheim. It is overlooked by a hill on the north-west side, from which flows a large stream of water, which turns their mills, and fills the city ditch. It has five gates, which anciently served as fortresses. They have an hospital for decayed citizens, nobly endowed, with two others of less note. The duke of Guelderland's palace here was mostly blown up by accident in 1589. Near the Rhine-gate is a bridge of boats into the Betuwe. The government of the city consists of a high-bailiff, who has also jurisdiction over a great part of the Veluwe, and of two burgomasters, chosen annually out of their 12 ſcheepens. They have likewise six masters of corporations, and 48 jurats to assist in the management of their public affairs. Arnheim is situated on the Leach, ten miles north of Nimeguen, in Lat. 52, N. Long. 5, 50, E.

ARNHEMII REGIO, t'land van Armheimd, a part of the Terra Australis, discovered not long ago by the Dutch, upon the coast of Auchidol, lying south of New Guinea, between Carpentaria and the region of Concord.

ARNHUSEN, in Latin Arnhusia, a small town of Lower Pomerania, in Germany, belonging to the elector of Brandenburgh, now king of Prussia. It is situated near the river Riga, four leagues from Colberg, and the Baltic sea.

ARNIS, an island belonging to the district of the cathedral of the Sleswic, in Denmark. It lies in the Sley. Only near its church the chapter of the said cathedral has a right of patronage. This island had formerly wood growing on it: but upon the proprietor of the noble domain or state of Koſt attempting to burthen the inhabitants of the village of Cappel with unusual taxes, and in the year 1667 driving out of it about 100 families, which consisted of above 600 souls, they came to this island, and settled themselves in it; upon which duke Christian Albert granted them privileges. There now are about 56 houses on the island, and most part of the inhabitants subsist by the sea-faring business.

ARNO, in Latin Arnus, one of the largest rivers of Italy, and the most considerable of the Grand duchy of Tuscany. It rises in the Florentine territories to the east, and among the Appenine mountains, near the sources of the Tiber: it runs west quite through that duchy, and having passed by Florence, after receiving in its course the Sieva, Pesa, and Elſa, it falls a little below Pisa into the Tuscan sea. The valley which it waters in its way is extremely delightful, abounding in all sorts of fruit.

A R

ARNO, Val di, is at present a very fruitful and pleasant valley, though formerly it was quite a barren and desolate spot of ground; it lies in the territory of Florence, belonging to the Grand duchy of Tuscany, in the middle division of Italy. The learned Targioni looked upon the upper part of it as the bed of a lake, which in ancient times was united with that of Perugia, and was caused by the river Arno, before it had broke through the rock at Rignano, made a way for itself, and forsaken the valley. Here the strata of the earth are commonly regular, and the water-course moderate. In these parts the bones of elephants are frequently to be met with.

ARNOGNES, Les, one of the eight districts into which the government of Nivernois in France is subdivided. It is extremely fertile in grain, wine, wood, and pasture: but has neither town nor village in it.

ARNON, a river which rises in the mountain of Arabia, and, passing through the whole desert, falls into the lake Asphaltites, dividing the country of the Moabites from that of the Amorites. It is very difficult to pass, as abounding with stones; though the Almighty made it easy to the Israelites, as may be gathered from Numbers xxxi. where it is mentioned what he did in the Red-sea and at the brooks of Arnon.

ARNOO, a considerable seat in the district of Upland, a subdivision of Sweden Proper, of which Dahlberg has a view in his Suecia, antiq. et mod.

ARNOTS, people of Albania, on the eastern coasts of the gulph of Venice. They are a kind of vagabonds, without any settled habitation. The Albanois of the isle of Nio, in the Archipelago, are called Arnots.

ARNOULD, (St.) a town of France, in Beauce, on the road from Chartres to Paris, and in the forest of Iveline.

ARNSBERG, a county of Westphalia, in Germany, with its capital of the same name. It has Paderborn on the east, La Marche on the north and west, and Westerwald on the south. It formerly was subject to its own counts, but now to the archbishop of Cologne.

ARNSBURG, a small city, and the capital of the isle of Oesel, in the Baltic. It is subject to Sweden, and defended by a strong castle.

ARNSHAUSEN, a town in Hinder Pomeranea, belonging to the family of Zastrow.

ARNSPERG, an old mountain-castle belonging to the bailiwick of Niederbrun, in the lordships of Lichtenberg and Ochsenstein, a subdivision of the government of Alsace, now a province of France.

ARNSTADT, a town in the principality of Schwarzburg, on the Gera, which above this place divides itself into two branches. At the Langwitz gate is a handsome stone bridge of six arches over it.

The buildings here, both public and private, have been greatly improved. Here is a residentiary castle, with a church and a palace, for the prince's Dowager, built 1732, three churches, and a provincial school of eight classes, a regency, a consistory, and exchequer. The counts of Schwarzburg, in 1332, became sole Lords of Arnstadt by purchase, which they have since gradually enlarged. It suffered much by fire in the years 1581, 1670, and 1693. On the Gera are erected some iron works, besides several mills, and near the town is a house for making saltpetre.

ARNSTEIN, a small town on the Werén, in the bishopric of Wurtzburg, in which is an hospital, built by bishop Maurice, of Hutten. In 1292 count Conrad, of Trimberg, conferred it on the bishopric.

AROER, one of the cities mentioned in scripture on the Arnon. It was called Rabbath Moab, being the capital of the nation; but losing it to Seon, king of the Amorites, before the children of Israel came to it, the place fell to the Gadites. Near it Jephtha overthrew the Amonites. Numbers xxxi.

AROESUNDSFEHRE, i. e. the Ferry of Aroe-fund, in the bailiwick of Hadersleben, and duchy of Sleswic, in Denmark. It is situated on the Little Belt.

AROK-SZALLAS, a well-peopled town in the territory of the Jazyges or Philistines, belonging to the circle on this side the Theiss, in Upper Hungary. It is situated in a level and fruitful country.

AROMAIA, a province of New Andalusia, in South-America. It lies, according to Collier, near the mouth of the river Orinoque, and is adjacent to the country of the Caribbees.

ARONA, a small city belonging to the county of Anghiera, which was formerly a part of the Milanese, in the Upper Division of Italy; but is now subject to the king of Sardinia. It lies on the left-side of the Lago Maggiore. It hath a castle belonging to the Boromeo family; but was much damaged by a fire in 1674. It has since recovered itself pretty well through the great concourse of devotees, who resort to the relics of two famed saints, Gratignano and Faliciano, brought from Brouse, and deposited in the Benedictine abbey here. St. Charles de Boromeo was abbot of it at 12 years of age, anno 1550: he afterwards gave it to the Jesuits. On an eminence contiguous to the above-mentioned lake the Boromeo family have erected a bronze-statue, 35 ells high, to the famous saint of their own name, who was a cardinal and archbishop of Milan, and also the principal saint in the Milanese. It stands on a pedestal 25 ells high; and among the many statues which have been erected to him, this is the best and most worthy of seeing. In 1706 Arona was taken from the Spaniards by the Imperialists. It lies 35 miles west of the city of Milan. Lat. 45, 40, N. Long. 8, 15, E.

ARONCHES, or ARRONCHES, a fortified town belonging to Portalegre, a jurisdiction in the province of Alentejo, in Portugal. It is situated on a somewhat rising ground, near the confluence of the little rivers, Alegrette and Caya. It contains upwards of 1200 inhabitants, has a church, a casa da misericordia, an hospital, and a convent. In 1672, king Peter II. raised it to a marquissate. To its district belong six parishes. Its judge is subject to the Comarca; and lies 13 miles N. of Elvas. Lat. 39, 5, N. Long. 7, 30, W.

AROO, a town of the Russian empire, in the Ukrain; seated on the river Occa, 200 miles north of Moscow. Long. 38, 20, E. Lat. 51, 58, N.

AROSBAY, a town of the East-Indies, on the coast of the island of Madura, near the island of Java. Long. 114, 30, E. Lat. 9, 30, N.

ARSEN, or WESTERAHNS, in Latin Arosia or Westerasium, the capital of Westmannia, a subdivision of Sweden Proper. It is a very ancient island town; situated in the place where the Swart-a, which runs through the town, falls into the Maler-lake, on the northern bank of the latter. Its second name is compounded of Westra-aros. Here is the see of a bishop, under the archbishop of Upsal, a gymnasium, and castle, in which is a corn-magazine or granary; also a large steel-yard, from which is annually exported to Stockholm a large quantity of iron, with some copper and tin. Here the provincial governor or headman resides. The number of inhabitants is about 1300. In the large and stately cathedral here, which is particularly remarkable for its curious and beautiful tower, lies Eric XIV. In this church are several Gothic inscriptions. Here it was that duke Gustavus I. or Vasa, afterwards king of Sweden, with his Dalecarlians, defeated Christiern II. of Denmark, in the year 1521. Among the general diets holden here, those of 1527 and 1544 are the most remarkable; in the latter of which was concluded the hereditary union, that is, the agreement, by which the crown of Sweden, that before had been elective, was made hereditary in the family of the said Gustavus Vasa. The town carries on a considerable trade; but it has frequently suffered great damage by fire. The last misfortune of this kind happened in the year 1714. It holds the 25th place in the general diet, and is situated between Kopping and Enkopping, about 35 miles from Stockholm.

AROUCA, a small place of Lamego district, belonging to the province of Beira, in Portugal. It has one parish, containing upwards of 1400 souls; and to its jurisdiction belong 5 parishes.

AROW. See AARAW.

ARPAD (mentioned II. Kings xviii. 34.) probably denotes the country lying above the land of Hamath

A R

Hamath (probably that by the Greeks called Epiphania), and over against which lies the small island called Aradus by the Greeks and Latins; which name (says Dr. Wells) contains in it apparent footsteps of the Hebrew name Arpad or Arvad.

ARPAIA, anciently Caudium. It is situated on the confines of Naples and the Ecclesiastical State, in Italy; near which are the famous Furiae Caudinae, now called Stretto d'Arpaia, being a narrow pass betwixt two mountains, where not above two persons can go a-breast. The Roman generals, T. Veturius and S. P. Posthumius, having imprudently brought their army into that pass, were invested by the Samnites, and obliged to surrender on the following ignominious terms, That they should pass by couples through a yoke composed of two pikes, and another crossing them a-top, without arms, their hands tied behind them, and bare-headed.

ARPAION, formerly Chatres, a small town belonging to Hutepoix, a subdivision of the government of the Isle of France, in that kingdom. In the years 1720 and 1723 it was raised to a dukedom. It is the seat of a bailiwick and prevote; which jurisdictions belong to the duke of Arpaion. Of the same name, according to Collier, is the eldest barony of Rouergne, a subdivision of Guyenne Proper; but neither Busching, nor Moll says any thing of it.

ARPENTRAS, formerly a city, now a village, called Vidy, on the Leman lake, below Lausanne, in Switzerland. From the effigies of a brass bull, with the sacrificer, ploughed up here in 1629, besides medals and several remains of antiquity found here, it appears to have been a place of greater note than it is now.

ARPIGLIANO, a small place in the Hither Calabria, in the kingdom of Naples, in Lower Italy.

ARPINO, a castle, with a town called Santo Dominico, in the Terra di Lavoro, belonging to the kingdom of Naples, and bordering on St. Peter's patrimony, anciently called Arpinum, a city of the Volsi, and the birth-place of Caius Marius, 7 times consul of Rome; whence he was surnamed Arpinas. Long. 12, 50, E. Lat. 41, 45, N.

ARQUA, or ARQUATO, a village of the Paduan, in Upper Italy. It lies at the foot of mountains, separating between Este and Monfalcone, upon a small lake, which discharges its superfluous waters by the old and new canal of Arqua into the Bacchiglione. This place is noted, as the celebrated poet, Francis Petrarch, after the death of his beloved Lauretta or Laura, resided here; he died also at Arqua, where his tomb is, with a mean inscription. They shew likewise here the house of that ingenious author, who contributed so much to the polishing of the Italian language, and revival of the Latin poetry. Arqua is situated between Este and Padua, about 4 miles from the former and 9 from the latter. Lat. 45, 43, N. Long. 11, 43, E.

ARQUA DEL POLESINO, in the Ferrarese, and Upper Italy; has a church, which is handsome enough, and the paintings in it are very good, particularly that of St. Febuarius, the patron of this place.

ARQUES, a small place, but a county of itself, in the bailiwick of St. Omer, one of the subdivisions of Artois, in the government of that name, and of Picardy, in France. For upwards of 1000 years it has belonged to the abbey of St. Berthuin, at St. Omer's.

ARQUES, a barony belonging to the states of Lower Languedoc, in France. It lies in the diocese of Alet.

ARQUES, a small town of Ceaux, one of the bailiwicks belonging to Upper Normandy, in the government of the latter name, in France. It is situated on the river Arques; and has indeed only the appearance of a village, yet is the seat of a viscounty, admiralty, election, and forest-jurisdiction. Here also is an abbey. It is memorable for a victory obtained in its neighbourhood, Sept. 21, 1589, when Henry IV. of France routed the army of the League under the duke of Maine, which consisted of above 30,000 men, with only a body of 500 horse, 120 French foot, and 2000 Swiss.

ARQUES, or ARC, is a borough of France, near the Meuse, in the duchy of Barr; the place, as is supposed, where Joan of Arc, the maid of Orleans, was born, under the reign of Charles VII. of France. This seems to be Busching's Arc en Barrois (which see) and which he places in Burgundy, on the little river Sangeon.

ARRA, in Arabia. As the Arraceni and Saraceni of the ancients were, according to the greatest probability, one and the same people; so, from the situation assigned them by the old geographers, it can scarce be doubted but the Arra of Pliny and Ptolemy was the capital of the region they inhabited, and gave them the appellation they went under. Strabo, describing Aelius Gallus's expedition into Arabia, intimates that the province of Ardena was 30 days journey from Petra, and 50 from the city of the Negrani, or Negara metropolis of Ptolemy, i. e. the modern Nag'ran; that it was for the most part desert, and inhabited by the Nomades or Arabes Scenitæ; and that the interjacent tract betwixt it and the former city was a wild pathless region, interspersed in some parts with palm-trees. All which particulars, as well as the name itself, clearly evince this province to be the country of the Arraceni or Saraceni, which had this Arra for its capital. It farther appears from Dio, that Arraceni or Saraceni were sometimes in the east denominated Agareni, and their chief town Arra, Atra, or Atræ. It is therefore highly probable that the ancient Saracens racens were stiled Hagarenes, either from the disposition of the tract they inhabited, or from Hagar the mother of Ishmael.

ARRACAN. See ARACAN.

ARRACIF, i. e. in Portuguese, a ridge of rocks or sand-banks, a harbour belonging to the captainship of Pernambuco, in the Brasils, South-America. It is small; and shut up by those rocks and sands, which form a kind of bar: so that large vessels are forced to enter by a very narrow opening. After this they come into a small bay, into which a little river discharges itself. This port consists of a small suburb, in which are some large magazines for sugar and other merchandize, and is defended by a castle on a narrow passage opposite to it, from which the entrance of any ship may be easily obstructed. Yet James Lancaster got into it in the year 1595 with 7 or 8 English vessels, and made himself master of the castle and port; the Portuguese, upon sight of him, abandoning both. After a month's stay here he came away laden with rich plunder; and, after his departure, the Portuguese built a second castle on a rock in the sea, and opposite to the old one, with some other forts and outworks, which render the entrance of any strangers into it now impracticable. Arracif stands in Lat. 8, 20, S. and Long. 35, 10, W.

ARRAN, an island of Scotland, in the frith of Clyde, between Kintyre and Cunningham. Lat. 54, 48. Long. 8, 59. — Arran, or properly Arr-inn, or the island of mountains, seems not to have been noticed by the ancients, notwithstanding it must have been known to the Romans, whose navy, from the time of Agricola, had its station in the Glota Æstuarium, or the frith of Clyde. Camden indeed makes this island the Glota of Antonine; but no such name occurs in his Itinerary: it therefore was bestowed on Arran by some of his commentators.

By the immense cairns, the vast monumental stones, and many reliques of druidism, this island must have been considerable in very ancient times. Here are still traditions of the hero Fingal, or Finma-coul, who is supposed here to have enjoyed the pleasures of the chase; and many places retain his name: but I can discover nothing but oral history that relates to the island till the time of Magnus the Barefooted, the Norwegian victor, who probably included Arran in his conquests of Kintyre. If he did not conquer that island, it was certainly included among those that Donald-bane was to cede; for it appears that Acho, one of the successors of Magnus, in 1263, laid claim to Arran, Bute, and the Cumrays, in consequence of that promise; the two first he subdued but the defeat he met with at Largs soon obliged him to give up his conquests.

Arran was the property of the crown. Robert Bruce retired thither during his distresses, and met with protection from his faithful vassals: numbers of them followed his fortunes; and after the battle of Bannockburn he rewarded several, such as the Mac-cooks, Mac-kinnons, Mac-brides, and Mac-louis or Fullertons, with different charters of land in their native country. All these are now absorbed by this great family, except the Fullertons, and a Stewart, descended from a son of Robert III. who gave him a settlement here. In the time of the Dean of the Isles, his descendant possessed Castle-douand; and he and his bluid, says the dean, are the best men in that countrey.

About the year 1334, this island appears to have formed part of the estate of Robert Stewart, great steward of Scotland, afterwards Robert II. At that time they took arms to support the cause of their master; who afterwards, in reward, not only granted at their request an immunity from their annual tribute of corn, but added several new privileges, and a donative to all the inhabitants that were present.

In 1456, the whole island was ravaged by Donald, earl of Ross, and lord of the isles. At that period it was still the property of James II. but in the reign of his successor James III. when that monarch matched his sister to Thomas lord Boyd, he created him earl of Arran, and gave him the island as a portion: soon after, on the disgrace of that family, he caused the countess to be divorced from her unfortunate husband, and bestowed both the lady and the island on Sir James Hamilton, in whose family it continues to this time, a very few farms excepted.

Arran is of great extent, being 23 miles from Sgreadan point north, to Beinnean south; and the number of inhabitants are about 7000, who chiefly inhabit the coasts; the far greater part of the country being uninhabited, by reason of the vast and barren mountains. Here are only two parishes, Kilbride and Kill-more; with a sort of chapel of ease to each, founded in the last century, in the golden age of this island, when it was blessed with Anne dutchess of Hamilton, whose amiable disposition and humane attention to the welfare of Arran, render at this distant time her memory dear to every inhabitant.

The principal mountains of Arran are, Goatfield, or Gaoilbheinn, or the mountain of the winds; of a height equal to most of the Scottish Alps, composed of immense piles of moor-stone, in form of wool-packs, clothed only with lichens and mosses, inhabited by eagles and ptarmigans; Bein-bharrain, or the sharp-pointed; Ceum-na-caillich, the step of the carline or old hag; and Grianan-Athol, that yields to none in ruggedness.

The lakes are, Loch-jorsa, where salmon come to spawn; Loch-tana; Loch-nah-jura, on the top of a high hill; Loch-mhachirai, and Loch-knoc-a-char-beil, bell, full of large eels. The chief rivers are, Abhan-mhor, Moirna-mhor, Slondrai-machrei, and Jorfa; the two last remarkable for the abundance of salmon.

The quadrupeds are very few; only otters, wild-cats, shrew-mice, rabbits, and bats: the stags, which used to abound, are now reduced to about a dozen. The birds are eagles, hooded crows, wild pigeons, storks, black game, grouse, ptarmigans, daws, green plovers, and curlews. Mr. Stuart, in ascending Goatfield, found the secondary feather of an eagle, white, with a brown spot at the base, which seemed to belong to some unknown species. It may be remarked, that the partridge at present inhabits this island; a proof of the advancement of agriculture.

The climate is very severe: for, besides the violence of wind, the cold is very rigorous; and snow lay here in the valleys for 13 weeks of the last winter. In summer the air is remarkably salubrious; and many invalids resort here on that account, and to drink the whey of goats milk.

The produce of the island is oats; of which about 5000 bolls, each equal to nine Winchester bushels, are sown: 500 of beans, a few peas, and above 1000 bolls of potatoes, are annually set: notwithstanding this, 500 bolls of oat-meal are annually imported, to subsist the natives.

The live stock in 1778 was 3183 milch-cows; 2000 cattle, from one to three years old; 1058 horses; 1500 sheep; and 500 goats: many of the two last are killed at Michaelmas, and dried for winter-provision, or sold at Greenock. The cattle are sold from 40 to 50s. per head, which brings into the island about 1200l. per annum: I think that the sale of horses also brings in about 300l. Hogs were introduced here only two years ago. The herring fishery round the island brings in 300l. the sale of herring nets 100l. and that of thread about 300l. for a good deal of flax is sown here. These are the exports of the island; but the money that goes out for mere necessities is a melancholy drawback.

The women manufacture the wool for the clothing of their families; they set the potatoes, and dress and spin the flax. They make butter for exportation, and cheese for their own use.

The inhabitants in general are sober, religious, and industrious: great part of the summer is employed in getting peat for fuel, the only kind in use here; or in building or repairing their houses, for the badness of their materials requires annual repairs: before and after harvest they are busied in the herring-fishery, and during winter the men make their herring-nets; while the women are employed in spinning their linen and woollen yarn. The light they often use is that of lamps. From the beginning of February to the end of May, if the weather permits, they are engaged in labouring their ground, and in autumn they burn a great quantity of fern to make kelp.

ARRAN, a mixture of green islands and rugged rocks, which border the west side of Gallway, a county of Connaught, in Ireland. This part, running out in form of a peninsula, is indented with several little bays or creeks, which the Arran isles cover. Among these four of them, called South Arran, form a barony, mentioned in romance as the islands of the living. The largest of them is called Kyleneoy, the next to that Kyltronon, and the third Shire. In 1661 these were first erected into an earldom, in favour of Richard, second son of James duke of Ormond; which title became lately extinct in Charles Butler, brother to the exiled duke, and who was chancellor of the university of Oxford.

ARRAN, the same with Arraw, (which see) a town of Bern, in Switzerland.

ARRAS, one of the twelve districts into which Artois, belonging to the government of this last name and Picardy, in France, is subdivided. Its capital is ARRAS, by Ptolemy called Origiacum, and by Cæsar Atribatum, the principal city then of the Atrabatæ. It is situated on the river Scarpe. This ancient and large city is divided into the old and new. The latter is called the town; and both it and the old city are surrounded with ancient walls, where are still several round towers in the antique manner. In 1477 Lewis XI of France took it, and in 1493 the emperor Maximilian recovered it. Afterwards, in 1640, the French marshals, Caune, Chatillon, and Milleray, laid siege to and carried this place, after defeating the cardinal Infanta, who came to its relief. The Spaniards sat before it in 1654, but were beat off with considerable loss. Before Arras came into the hands of the French, over one of the gates of the city was this inscription, Quand les Francois prendront Arras, les fous mangeront les chats, i. e. When the French shall take Arras, the mice shall eat the cats. But when the French took it, a man of wit said, the inscription might stand, if, by erasing one letter, prendront were changed to renderont, which signifies, shall restore it.

Arras has since been very strongly and regularly fortified by the celebrated engineer M. Vauban, in which he has shewn some works of his own invention. It has walls, ditches, and a little valley, through which runs the small river Crinchon; and these divide it into two parts, as has been already mentioned. It is a considerable place, and has also a citadel, which, though not very large, is reckoned one of the strongest in the kingdom, being an oblong pentagon, which marshal de Vauban repaired. It is something higher towards the country, where the ditch is dry, than towards the town. And the greatest part of the ground about Arras is so low that it may be laid under water.

The bishop of Arras is suffragan to the archbishop of Cambray, and he is both spiritual and temporal lord of the city: he has a diocese of 400 parishes, an annual revenue of 22,000 livres, and he is taxed 4000 florins to the court of Rome. He is also president in the assembly of the provincial states, which is holden here; to which lies an appeal from all inferior courts. An appeal also lies from it to the parliament of Paris. The cathedral, dedicated to the Virgin Mary, is a fine structure, and in it they keep some famous reliques. The abbey of St. Vast has a very fine church belonging to it. Besides, here are 11 parish-churches, a seminary, a Jesuits college, and several convents. This town has fair and broad streets, and is inhabited by wealthy traders and artificers. They have manufactories of sail-cloth and tapestry-hangings, especially the latter, which, from that art being first invented in this city, take their name from it. Though they are indeed beautiful, they fall short of those made at Paris, Brussels, or Antwerp. Here the bailiwick or district and forest courts are kept. It lies 12 miles S. W. of Douay, in lat. 50, 20, N. Long. 2, 5, E.

ARRAS, anciently Araxes, a river of Asiatic Turkey, which rises in the province of Georgia; and, after running S. E. joins the Cur, or Cyrus, whose united stream discharges itself into the Caspian sea, between the provinces of Shirvan and Aderbeizian in Persia. Lat. 15, 17. Long. 2, 51.

ARRAYOLOS, a little town of Villa Viciosa, a subdivision of the province of Alentejo, in Portugal. It contains 200 inhabitants, and has a district of four parishes.

ARRE (le Mont), a chain of mountains so called, which extends itself quite through Upper Brittany, a subdivision of the government of this last name in France.

ARREIGADA, a small place belonging to the jurisdiction of Pinhel, a subdivision of Beira province, in Portugal. It contains 330 inhabitants, and has a district of one parish.

ARREU, a small town belonging to the valley of Aure, a subdivision of Upper Armagnac, in Gascony, and government of this last name, and of Guyenne, in France.

ARRO, a river in Herefordshire, which runs into the Lug, near Lemster.

ARROE, in Latin Arroa, and Arria, an island belonging to the jurisdiction of Norburg, and duchy of Sleswick, in Denmark. It is situated about half a mile from Funen, and two miles and a half from Aisen to the north-east. It is three miles long, and between half a mile and three quarters of a mile broad. Formerly much wood grew upon it; but it has been almost entirely destroyed, and the soil turned to arable land. Here is no large game, but hares and wild-fowl in abundance, particularly several sorts of peculiar birds. It has two pretty good roads or sea-havens, namely, in the large bay or belt, on both sides of which stood a castle before them, and close by the little town of Arroeskioping, where the harbour is covered by a small island called Deveroe, directly opposite to it. The inhabitants are partly peasants, and partly seafaring people and sailors. Herbs and garden vegetables are cultivated here in abundance, especially white cabbage, chives, and Danish kunimel, or cummin seed. Duke John the younger left this island to his son Christian; but upon his dying soon after without issue, it came to his brother Frederick, who sold the middle part of the island to his brother Philip of Glucksburg. The remainder devolved to the Plon branch of the same house, and from them it came to the king of Denmark, who in the year 1749 also bought the Glucksburg share of the island: and consequently he possesses now the whole of it. It contains the bailiwick of Grafenstein, as it is called, consisting of the two estates of Wuderup and Grafenstein. Lat. N. 55, 20. Long. E. 9, 40.

ARROESKIOPING, which though of no considerable extent, yet is a level place, with a parish-church, and a convenient haven, also five parishes; among which Marstal resembles a village. In ecclesiastical matters the island is subject to the diocese of Funen; but in temporals, to the duchy of Sleswick; and, by virtue of a royal ordinance made in 1730, is governed by the same laws with it.

ARROIS, the principal castle, says Collier, in the isle of Mull, one of the Hebrides, in Scotland.

ARROJO, DE ST. SERVAN, a town of Spain, in Estramadura. W. Long. 5, 20. N. Lat. 38, 40.

ARRON, and ARROU, two of the many rivers in the government of Nivernois, a province of France.

ARRONCHES. See ARONCHES.

ARROW, a river in Worcestershire and Warwickshire, which runs into the Avon, near Bilford Grange.

ARRUDA, a town belonging to the jurisdiction of Torres Vedras, in Portuguese Estramadura. It contains 920 inhabitants; and to its district belongs one parish.

ARSAMAS, a town of the Russian empire, in the territory of Morduates, seated on the river Mokeha reca, on the road to Astracan, 300 miles S. by E. of Moscow, and 500 N. by W. of Astracan. It was here general Doldiruki punished the rebellious Cossacks.

ARSCHOT, or ARSCOT, in Latin Ariscotium, or Arschotium, a fortified town of Mechlin, belonging to Brabant in the Austrian Netherlands.

A R

It is situated on the river Demer, and was an ancient lordship, which was erected into a duchy by the emperor Charles V. in the year 1583, in behalf of Philip duke of Croy. At present it is possessed by a branch of the house of Ligne, and belongs to the Duke of Aremberg. It has but one parish-church, which is also collegiate. Its chapter consists of a provost, a dean, who is rector of the parish, a chanter, and twelve canons. Here are three convents of monks, and a beguinage founded in the year 1259. The district of Arschot includes seven-teen villages, besides the baronies of Rotzelaer, Heverle and Bierbeeck. It lies 14 miles E. of Mechlin, and 8 miles N. of Lovain. Lat. 51, 20, N. Long. 5, 4, E.

ARSENARIA, an ancient town on the western banks of the Cartennus, in Numidia, where, according to Pliny, a Latin colony was planted, under some of the first Roman emperors. It is probable the modern Arzew.

ARSINOE, a city of old of Cyprus, situated on the N. side of that island, and was so called from Arsinoe, a queen of Egypt; Cyprus having been long subject to the kings of that country.

ARSINOE, a considerable city of Cyrenaica, took its name (after that kingdom was subjected to Egypt) from the wife of Ptolemy Philadelphus, to whom the Egyptians, as Callimachus tells us, paid divine honours, equalling her to Venus. The ancient name of this city, according to Strabo, Pliny, Ptolemy, Stephanus, &c. was Teuchira, or Tauchira. Ferrarius gives it the name of Sues, but the Turks call it Barraru.

ARSIPORE, in the province of Oriza, belonging to the southern part of Indostan or Mogul, in the East Indies, Asia. It is the residence of the Rajah of a little province bearing its name, to the N. of the dominions of Jagarynat. It has a fine river, which invites strangers to resort to it, for cotton-cloth and rice which this country yields very plentifully.

ARSKOG, a large forest of Medelpadia, one of the subdivisions of Nordland, a district of Sweden.

ARSTA, a considerable seat in Sudermanland, a subdivision of Sweden Proper; near which is a harbour on the Baltic, together with two mineral springs, which run into a pit lying below them, and are conveyed by a canal 100 paces long into a low place, where the water both winter and summer incessantly spouts aloft. Dahlberg's Suecia has a view of the castle.

ARTA, (see LARTA) a town of Epirus, in European Turkey, on a bay of the same name. It belongs to the Venetians. Lat. 39, 5, N. Long. 22, 5, E.

ARTABRUM CELTICUM, now Cape Finister (quasi Finis Terræ).

A R

ARTACENE, a province of Assyria. It is supposed to have derived its name from the city of Arec, or Erec, (Gen. x. 10.). This is the opinion both of Scaliger and Casaubon. But if so, from whence soever it hath had its name, it cannot be that identical Erec in the text, since it is evident that city was in Shinaar.

ARTAGERA, a city of Armenia, where the emperor Caius received the wound of which he died.

ARTAJONA, a small place of Estella, one of the jurisdictions belonging to the kingdom of Navarre, in Spain. It stands on a hill, in a country abounding with wine.

ARTAXATA, the metropolis of all Armenia, and from its foundation the residence of all the Armenian kings. This city, as Strabo informs us, was built upon a plain which Hannibal gave to king Artaxas, or Artaxias, who made it the capital of Armenia. It was situated on an elbow of the Araxes, which forms a kind of a peninsula, and surrounds the town like a wall, except on the side of the isthmus; but the isthmus was secured by a rampart and a broad ditch. This is the account which Strabo gives of this strong town. But Cornelius Nepos, in his life of Hannibal, does not mention his journey into Armenia: he only says, that after the defeat of Antiochus he withdrew first to Crete, and from thence to Bithynia, where he died. Plutarch however seems to confirm what Strabo advances, saying, that Hannibal, after the overthrow of Antiochus by Scipio Asiaticus, fled into Armenia, where he assisted king Artaxas with his advice, and persuaded him to build the city of Artaxata in a very advantageous situation. Lucullus, after having defeated the Armenians under the command of their king Tigranes, in two battles, would not venture, notwithstanding the enemies were not able to keep the field, to lay siege to Artaxata, which he looked upon as impregnable. But Pompey, who succeeded him in the command of the army, pressed Tigranes so hard, that he was obliged to deliver up his capital without striking a blow. Pompey spared both the city and inhabitants; but, in Nero's reign, Corbulo, commander in chief of the Roman forces in the east having forced Tiridates to yield up Artaxata, levelled it with the ground. Tiridates having thus lost his metropolis, and with it his kingdom, went to Rome to throw himself at Nero's feet; who not only restored him the diadem, but also gave him leave to take workmen with him to assist in rebuilding Artaxata, which by way of acknowledgement he called Neronia from the name of his benefactor. The ruins of this city, according to the tradition of Armenians, are still to be seen at a place called Ardachat. The inhabitants of this place, says Char-din, call the town Ardachat from the name of Artaxias, whom in the east they call Ardechier. There are some remains of a stately palace, which the Armenians take to be the palace of Tiridates, who reigned in the time of Constantine the Great. One front of this building is but half ruined; a great many pillars of black marble, and of an extraordinary size, are still standing, and many other fine antiquities, which the inhabitants call Taet-Tardat, i. e. the throne of Tiridates. Tavernier also mentions the ruins of Artaxata, between Erivan and mount Ararat, but does not specify them. See NACKSIVAN. And for another Artaxata see ATROPATIA.

ARTEMUS, anciently Artemesium, a promontory of Valencia, in Spain. It is also called Cabo St. Martin, and likewise Punta del Emperador.

ARTERN, a small town in the county of Mansfield, Germany, having a castle, and some salt-works, and is the seat of a Déanry.

ARTH, a river in Cardiganshire, which runs into the Irish Channel at Aberwyth.

ARTHUR's Chair or Seat, a high and craggy rock in the royal park of Holy-rood-house, near Edinburgh, in Scotland. It is about half a mile to the top.

ARTHUR's Oven, as it is vulgarly called, and by some Julius's Host-court, is an ancient monument, at a place called Kipps, near the town of Linlithgow, in Scotland. It resembles an ancient altar, and consists of large unpolished stones, so placed that they seem to lean one upon another.

ARTHUR's Round Table, the name commonly given to a noted cave of Lhanfannan, in Denbighshire, in Wales, made in the side of a rock; where are 24 seats, much frequented, particularly by shepherds, who tend their flocks.

ARTOIS (county of), in Latin Artesia, or Adartesia, was anciently one of the 17 provinces of the Netherlands; but now belongs entirely to France, and accordingly is in the government of Picardy, and that bearing its own name. It is bounded to the S. and W. by Picardy, to the N. by Flanders, and to the E. by Hainault. It is 26 French leagues in length, and about half that number in breadth. It is one of the most pleasant, and best provinces in the whole kingdom, very fruitful in grain; besides which, it trades in flax, hops, wool, and oil pressed from cabbage and turnip seed; and has also linen manufactories at Bethune, Aire, St. Venant, La Gorgue, Bapaume, and their neighbourhood.

This country and its capital, Arras, derive their names from the ancient Atrebatas, a nation of Gallia Belgica, famous in Cæsar's time, but the limits now are very different from what they were then. Atrebatas was in time corrupted into Ardertes or Adratas, from which last were derived

Artois and Arras. It was for a long time part of Western Flanders. In the year 1180 it came to king Philip Augustus, as a portion with his wife Isabel, of Hainault, cousin to Philip of Alsace, earl of Flanders. In 1236 Lewis VIII. made it an earldom in favour of his brother Robert. Margaret of Flanders brought it to her husband Philip the Bald of Burgundy, whose male-heirs possessed it till the time of duke Charles, after whose death king Lewis XI. made himself master of this country, notwithstanding the opposition made to it by Mary, Charles's daughter. But as she was married to the archduke Philip of Austria, king Charles VIII. was obliged to promise, by the treaty of Senlis, in 1493, to yield it as a French fief to the earldoms of Burgundy and Artois; which accordingly happened. The house of Austria, and afterwards that of Spain, continued in possession of it till the reign of Lewis XIII. of France, who took Arras in 1640. The Spaniards besieged it in the year 1654; but were obliged to raise the siege. By the treaty of the Pyrennees in 1659, Philip IV. king of Spain yielded to the French the cities and bailiwicks of Arras, Hesden, Bapaume, Lillers, Lens, Teroune, Pas, and the county of St. Paul: and his son, Charles II. gave up the rest of Artois to the French, by the treaty of Nimeguen: all which cessions were afterwards confirmed by the treaties of Ryfwick and Utrecht.

At present this county, together with Picardy, is under a general-governor, and has a general-lieutenant and two deputy governors, one of which last is appointed for Arras and Baupame, and the other for Aire and St. Omer. But besides these, here are likewise seven particular governors. In 1530 the emperor Charles V. erected a provincial council, which in civil matters is subject to the parliament of Paris, and has 12 jurisdictions under it. The collecting of the royal revenues is granted to the states, which are called together by public summons, and particular lettres de cachet, directed to each member, without which none is admitted; and this is previously registered by the secretary of the states, before the assembly is opened. These states consist of the clergy, to which belong the bishops of Arras and St. Omer, a great number of abbots and deputies from each chapter; also of the nobility, who are about 70 in number; and lastly of the burghers, who are composed of the counsellors of Arras, and deputies of magistrates from the eight best towns in the country. The free gift, granted by this assembly, for which they principally meet, is settled, and it commonly amounts to 400,000 livres: but the charges of forage is more or less, according to the number of gentlemen or cavalry in the country. No toll is levied here.

The 12 jurisdictions of Artois, according to Busching are these; namely, the bailiwicks of Arras, Bapaume, Bapaume, Avesnes, and Hesden, the earldom of St. Paul, the bailiwick of Aubigny, the advocateship of Bethune, the bailiwicks of Lillers and Aire, the regalities of Terouenne or Terouane, with the bailiwick of St. Omer. The Geographical System adds Lens as a thirteenth.

Besides finding the money above-mentioned, which the province is obliged to pay, by virtue of the king's demands, all affairs of a public or private nature, are treated in these assemblies, which generally hold a fortnight or three weeks. Those who have suffered by fire, or other accident, come to petition the states for exemption from their taxes; and they that farm the revenue make remonstrances in order to be indemnified, when the income does not answer the sum they engaged to pay. The revenue of the states arises from the duty laid upon cattle, and all sorts of liquor, as beer, wine, and brandy. The extraordinary funds are levied by a general tax laid upon all real estates; namely, arable lands, pastures, woods, houses in town and country; and this is called the hundredth penny; which, when fully paid, amounts to 215,000 livres per annum. This tax increases according to the necessity the states are under of raising more money: so that the hundredth penny has been paid twice, thrice, and even six times in a year; with this difference, however, that the houses and lands which the clergy and nobility themselves occupy or cultivate, pay this hundredth penny only once a year; whereas they are obliged to pay it every time this tax is repeated, for all the lands which they farm out to others.

The principal rivers of Artois are the Scarpe, Aa, and Canche. See PICARDY.

ARTONNE, a small town of Lower Auvergne, a subdivision of the government bearing this last name, in France: it has a chapter. Not far from this place, near the village of St. Myon, are two mineral springs.

ARTRO, a river in Merionethshire, which runs into the Llabbeder, at Llanbeder.

ARTZ, a district of Kallundborg, one of the bailiwicks belonging to Seeland, in Denmark. It has nine churches under its jurisdiction.

ARU, a city and kingdom of Asia, according to Collier. It is situated in the island of Sumatra, and the town lies on the straits of Malacca, directly opposite to the city of this last name.

ARVA, in Latin Arvensis comitatus, in Hungarian Arva Varmegue, a country belonging to the circle on this side the Danube, in Lower Hungary, according to Busching: but the Geographical System, and our maps place it in Upper Hungary. It lies between the confines of Silesia and the Carpathian mountains, extending itself as far as Poland. It is inhabited by Bohemian Slavi and Poles. It has a castle of the same name, called also Orawa which is situated on a high hill; and is subject to several lords of the Erloich family, descended from count Thurzo. The country of Arva is about 24 miles from east to west, and 12, where broadest, from south to north. See ARVE.

ARUBA, or ORUBA, an island, near the coast of Venezuela, a province of the Terra-Firma, in South-America. It belongs to the Dutch, and is situated about seven or eight leagues to the westward of Curacao. It is one of the Little Antilles, 14 leagues to the west of Curacao. It is uninhabited, and produces little besides corn and wood. From this island and Banaire the Dutch fetch provisions in sloops, for maintaining their garrisons and negroes at Curacao. Lat. 12, 30, N. Long. 69, 30, W.

ARVE, or ARVA, a river of Savoy, in Upper Italy; it rises in Faucigny, out of an inaccessible mountain, where rock-crystal is formed, and which is covered with perpetual snow. It is much more rapid than the Rhone, and loses itself in this last river, not far from the city of Geneva, at a place called La Queue d'Arva. Upon a thaw of the snow, or falling of great rains, it swells so of a sudden, according to Collier, that it makes the Rhone remount towards the lake, as may be seen from the mills turning that way. A little before the St. Bartholomew massacre at Paris, in 1572, such an inundation of the Arve happened, as never was known within the memory of man. Its sands yield some grains of gold; at gathering of which, some, who understand the picking of them, get above a crown a day.

ARVERT, a town of some note, in the territory of Brouageais, belonging to the government of Aunis, in France. It is situated on a peninsula.

ARUN, a river in Suffex, which runs into the British channel, at Hampton.

ARUNDEL, in Latin Aruntia, an old borough and market town in Suffex, 55 miles S. W. from London. It stands near the mouth of the river Arun, which is noted for its excellent mullets. It is governed by a mayor, chosen annually, a steward, twelve burgeses, and the other usual offices in corporations. It had once a good harbour, which admitted vessels of 100 tons; but it was choaked up and ruined by a sand beach thrown into it by the sea, though this misfortune has been in part repaired by a pier. It has four fairs, on May 14, August 21, September 25, December 17.

Arundel is a borough, mentioned so long ago as king Alfred's will: the manor of which has constantly gone with the castle; and, by act of parliament in the reign of king Henry VI. it was declared, that all who should be possessed of the castle and honour of Arundel, were, and should thereby be, earls of it, without any other creation, the only privilege of the kind in all England. The same king king, and his council afterwards, adjudged the precedence of the earl of Arundel to the earl of Devon. This castle, both from its structure and situation, has probably been one of the strongest in England. It stands on a hill, and commands an extensive prospect. Much of the ancient building is mouldered into ruins; but there are still the vestiges of a very large and elegant banquetting-hall, and the gateway is in tolerable preservation. The chapel within the castle is kept in good repair, and has service performed regularly in it; where is an elegant altar-piece.

Here is a manufacture of hop-bagging. The famous Arundelian marbles were purchased in Asia by Sir William Petty, for Thomas, earl of Arundel and Surrey, and shew several particulars relating to the history and chronology of Greece. The town has sent members to parliament ever since 30 Edward I. and had anciently a collegiate church, and a priory of Benedictines. In the grand rebellion Arundel-castle being possessed by the Parliament's forces, was, after three days siege, taken for the king by lord Hopton, but retaken by Sir William Waller. The town is delightfully situated on the declivity of a hill, with a wooden-bridge over the Arun. The navigation of the river up to its bridge having been interrupted by the above-mentioned beach, an act of parliament passed in the year 1733 for repairing the harbour, by cutting a channel through the beach and old piers, and for erecting new piers, locks, &c. One considerable advantage to the country from this river is the shipping off great quantities of large timber, which is carried up the Thames to Woolwich and Deptford, and up the Medway to Chatham; also westward to Portsmouth, and even to Plymouth; and indeed to all the king's yards. The timber shipped off here is reckoned the best and largest which is brought by sea from any part of England: also great quantities of knee-timber are had from hence. In the church, which is now parochial, are four old and stately monuments of the earls of Arundel. A court-leet of the lord of the manor is held here every three weeks, in which the mayor is judge, who appoints the officers for collecting the package, stallage, &c. also ale-conners, flesh-tasters, &c. and no sheriff or bailiff can execute a writ within the borough without his leave, he having the authority of a justice of peace, though he seldom acts in that capacity. Arundel sends two members to parliament, and lies 10 miles east of Chichester. Lat. 50, 45. N. Long. 0, 30.

ARUNDEL, a township in the north division of New-England, called New-Hampshire; situated on the sea-coast, and having the point of land Cape Porpus within its district on the east, and Biddleford township on the north-east, with Wells-town township south-west.

ARWIDSJAUR. See ARWIDSJEAF.

ARZBURG, a market-town in the principality of Culmbach-Bareith, having a prefecture.

ARZIGNAN, a well-inhabited place, in the delightful valley of Drestina, belonging to Il Vicentino, a territory in the republic of Venice, and Upper division of Italy.

ARZILLA, anciently Zilia, a port-town of Habat, belonging to Fez, in Africa, and 11 leagues from Gibraltar straits. It has had many masters, the last of which were the Portuguese, who abandoned it to the Infidels, in whose possession it still continues. It is situated 15 miles south of Tangier. Lat. 35, 40. N. Long. 5, 40. W.

ARZINA RECA, a river of Lapland, between Cola to the west, and the entrance of the White-sea to the east. The country about which being utterly desolate, Sir Hugh Willoughby and all his ship's company perished here through hunger and cold in the year 1553, after he had first passed the north cape. Next year his ship, says Hackluyt, was found, and a written relation of his voyage.

ARZOLI, a town in the Campania di Roma, and Ecclesiastical State, in the middle division of Italy. It is situated on an eminence, between the river Teverone and the confines of the Abruzzo, 6 miles east of Tivoli.

ARZANGARO, a jurisdiction belonging to the diocese of Cusco, in the audience of Lima, and viceroyalty of Peru, in South-America. It lies about 50 leagues south of Cusco, and is every where cold, and proper only for feeding of cattle, in which it carries on a profitable trade. In the north-east parts, bordering on Carabaya, are some silver mines, but a few of them only worked. Some of those lands produce plenty of such roots and grains as naturally grow in a cold air, as papas, quinoas, and canaguas; of the two last chicha is made in the same manner as from maize. At present this jurisdiction belongs to the audience of Charcas.

ASAPH, (St.) an episcopal city of Flintshire, in North Wales. It is called in British Lhan Elwy, as being situated at the confluence of the river Elwy with the Clwyd; and had its English name from Asaph, a very devout man, and favourite of one Kentigern, bishop of Glasgow, who erected a bishop's see here about the year 560, and at the same time instituted a monastery composed of 663 friars; of which, on his return to Scotland, he left Asaph governor; he also resigned his cathedral to him, being conspicuous for piety and learning. The town, though in the pleasant and rich vale of Clwyd, is a poor ill-built place, whose bishop has under its jurisdiction only parts of the counties of Flint, Denbigh, Montgomery, Merioneth, and Salop. It has but one archdeaconry, which is united to the bishopric (the revenue of which last, Eton says, is only 741. sterling), for the better support of it. This town is not remarkable for its newness, nor the church for its elegant structure. Here is a bridge over each of the rivers, which meet here. It lies 20 miles north-west of Chester, and upwards of 200 in the same direction from London. Lat. 53. 11. N. Long. 5. 35. W.

ASARO, an earldom of Val di Noto, a subdivision of the island and kingdom of Sicily, in Lower Italy.

ASAY, or AZAY, with the addition of Rideau, a little town belonging to the government of Touraine, in France. It is situated on the Indre.

ASCALON, in Palestine (or the country of the Philistines) a great and noble sea-port, by ancient accounts 16, by modern 12 miles to the north of Gaza, and known to us all by the name it bears in scripture, and in the writings of the ancient Greeks and Romans, by whom it was had in religious veneration. Nor do we find any considerable variation from this name, except that the Greeks sometimes lengthened it into Ascalonion. This city, (as also Gaza) is reckoned into the lot or tribe of Judah, and was taken by them, but not held. Its situation cannot be disputed, since it may be said to stand at this day, and has been often visited. From Josephus we understand this city to have stood in a spacious plain, and in his days extremely well fortified. Though we have placed this city on the brink of the sea, and made it a sea-port of itself, yet there is a majuma given to this as well as to Gaza (See GAZA); which, whence it was necessary, cannot be precisely said. It may, perhaps, have been a distinct part of the city next to the seaside; or perhaps Ascalon was not quite so close thereto but it might require the convenience of a more immediate port-town to intervene: or the harbour of Ascalon might have been rendered unfit for the reception of shipping, as was the case of Gaza; whence a necessity sprung up of seeking some place near, and of erecting a town there. But we pass these conjectures. Ascalon was famous among the ancients on many accounts. It was the birth-place of Sennacherib, the Assyrian empress; and is noted for the place which originally produced the kind of onion called shalot, which is supposed from thence to have derived its name. It may seem at first sight to be a very oblique derivation; but then the Latin of this plant is Ascalonia, whence the French have their echalote, which we have curtailed into shalot. It is famed also for its wines, and very remarkable for its great flight of pigeons, as it is for cypresses, and the extraordinary wells attributed to Abraham and Isaac. This city, besides the temple of Dereto, had a temple of Apollo, wherein Herod, the father of Antipater and grandfather of Herod the Great (who, from his being born in this city, was called Herod the Ascalonite) served as priest. It had in the first times of Christianity an episcopal see; and, in the course of the holy wars, it was beautified with a new wall and many fair buildings by our king Richard I. But it is now dwindled to almost nothing. The Turks call it Scalano; and it is of no note, except for a Turkish garrison kept in it.

ASCANJA, ASCANIAN Lake, and ASCANIUS River. See PHRYGIA.

ASCANIA, a very ancient castle of Germany, which formerly gave title to the princes of Anhalt, and was the capital of the county; about half a league from Asbenseben, which rose out of its ruins.

ASCENSION, an island, according to Hackluyt, in the bay of St. Laurence, North-America, about 50 leagues from Cape Breton to the north-west, and 15 from the continent to the north-east. The middle of it lies in lat. 49. N. It is a goodly champain country, its bottom being white rocks and alabaster. On the coast abound all such trees as are in Nova Scotia, and it has many wild beasts. He takes this island to be the same with Nantifotec.

ASCENSION-ISLAND, a barren island on the coast of Africa; lying in W. Long. 17. 20. S. Lat. 7. 5. — The following account is given of it by Mr. Forster: "This island was first discovered in 1501 by Joao de Nova Galego, a Portuguese navigator, who named it Ilha de Nossa Senhora de Conceição. The same admiral, on his return to Portugal in 1502, discovered the island of St. Helena, which obtained that name from the day of discovery. Ascension was seen a second time by Alfonso d'Albuquerque, on his voyage to India in 1503, and and then received the name it now bears; but was even at that time in the same desolate condition as at present. We sent several parties on shore, who passed the night on the watch for turtles, which came to lay their eggs on the sandy shores. The dreariness of this island surpassed all the horrors of Easter-island and Terra del Fuego, even without the assistance of snow. It was a ruinous heap of rocks, many of which, as far as we could discern from the ship, seemed to be totally changed by the fire of a volcano. Nearly in the center of the island rises a broad white mountain of great height, on which we discerned some verdure by the help of our glasses, whence it has obtained the name of Green Mountain.

"We landed early in the morning among some rocks, the surf being always immensely high on the great beach, which consists of minute shell-sand, chiefly of a snowy white, very deep, dry, and intolerable to the eyes when the sun shines. We ascended among heaps of black cavernous stone, which perfectly resembles the most common lavas of Vesuvius and Iceland, and of which the broken pieces looked as if they had been accumulated by art. This

The lava currents cooling very suddenly, may easily be imagined to produce such an effect. Having ascended about 12 or 15 yards perpendicular, we found ourselves on a great level plain, of 6 or 8 miles in circuit; in the different corners of which we observed a large hill of an exact conical shape, and of a redish colour, standing perfectly insulated. Part of the plain between these conic hills was covered with great numbers of smaller hillocks, consisting of the same wild and ragged lava as that near the sea, and ringing like glass when two pieces are knocked together. The ground between the heaps of lava was covered with a black earth, on which we walked very firmly; but when these heaps did not appear, the whole was a red earth, which was so loose, and in such dry minute particles, that the wind raised clouds of dust upon it. The conic hills consisted of a very different sort of lava, which was red, soft, and crumbling into earth. One of these hills stands directly in front of the bay, and has a wooden cross on its summit, from whence the bay is said to take its name. Its sides are very steep; but a path near three quarters of a mile long winds round it to the summit. After examining this remarkable country a little longer, we concluded, with a great degree of probability on our side, that the plain on which we stood was once the crater or seat of a volcano, by the accumulation of whose cinders and pumice-stones the conic hills had been gradually formed: that the currents of lava which we now saw divided into many heaps, had perhaps been gradually buried in fresh cinders and ashes; and the waters coming down from the interior mountain in the rainy season had smoothened every thing in their way, and filled up by degrees the cavity of the crater. The rocky black lava was the residence of numberless men-of-war birds and boobies, which sat on their eggs, and suffered us to come close to them.

"About eight in the evening, it being then quite dark, a small vessel came into the bay, and anchored directly within us. Captain Cook having hailed her repeatedly, received in answer, that she was the Lucretia, a New-York sloop, which had been at Sierra Leon, and was now come to catch turtles, in order to sell them at the windward islands of the West Indies. A lieutenant was sent on board, who learned from the master, that he had taken our ship to be a French Indiaman, and was very desirous of trading with English India-ships, in which he was disappointed by the company's regulations, who gave orders that no more of their ships should touch here, on account of the contraband trade carried on with the Americans. He dined with our officers the next day, but on the 21st at day-break left the island. On the 30th in the morning, we landed a second time; and, crossing the plain, arrived at a prodigious lava-current, intersected by many channels from 6 to 8 yards deep, which bore strong marks of being worn by vast torrents of water, but were at present perfectly dry, the sun being in the northern hemisphere. In these gullies we found a small quantity of soil consisting of a black volcanic earth, mixed with some whitish particles gritty to the touch. Here we saw some small bunches of purslane, and a species of grass (panicum sanguineum) which found sufficient nutriment in the dry soil. Having at last, with great fatigue, climbed over this extensive and tremendous current of lava, which was much more solid than the heaps nearer to the sea, we came to the foot of the Green Mountain, which even from the ships place in the bay we had plainly distinguished to be of a different nature from all the rest of the country. Those parts of the lava which surrounded it were covered with a prodigious quantity of purslane, and a kind of new fern (lonchites Adscensionis), where several flocks of wild goats were feeding. The great mountain is divided in its extremities by various clefts, into several bodies; but in the centre they all run together, and form one broad mass of great height. The whole appears to consist of a gritty tophaceous lime-stone, which has never been attacked by the volcano, but probably existed prior to its eruption; its sides are covered with a kind of grass, peculiar to the island, which Linnæus has named aristida Adscensionis. We likewise observed several flocks of goats feeding on it; but they were all excessively shy, and ran with surprising velocity along tremendous precipices, where it was impossible to follow them. The master of the New-York sloop acquainted us, that there is a spring of water on one part of this mountain, which falls down a great precipice, and is afterwards absorbed in the land. I am almost persuaded, that, with a little trouble, Ascension might shortly be made fit for the residence of men. The introduction of furze (ulex Europæus), and of a few other plants which thrive best in a parched soil, and are not likely to be attacked by rats or goats, would soon have the same effect as at St. Helena. The moisture attracted from the atmosphere by the high mountains in the center of the island, would then no longer be evaporated by the violent action of the sun, but collect into rivulets, and gradually supply the whole island. A sod of grasses would every where cover the surface of the ground, and annually increase the stratum of mould, till it could be planted with more useful vegetables.

"We returned gradually to Cross-bay, in the heat of noon, over the plain; having a space of more than 5 miles to traverse, where the sun burnt and blistered our faces and necks, and heated the soil to such a degree, that our feet were likewise extremely sore. About 3 o'clock we arrived at the water's side; and after bathing in a small cove among among a few rocks, we made the signal for a boat, and were taken on board. The next forenoon we made another small excursion, in company with captain Cook, towards the Green Mountain; but we were all of us so much fatigued, that we could not reach it. We made no new observations in the course of this day, the nature of the island being dreary beyond description in its outskirts."

ASCH, a lordship lying between the Capitanate of Hoff, in the principality of Culmbach, and the bailiwick of Wunfiedel and territory of Egar, in Bohemia, and the circle of Voigtland, in Saxony. It belongs to baron Zedwitz, and contains a market-town of the same name, and about 20 villages.

ASCHACH, a district of the bishopric of Wurzburg, in which is a market-town of the same name, having a citadel.

ASCHAFFENBURG, in Latin Aschaffenburgum, or Aschiburgum, a fortified town and castle in the Lower Rhine, and electorate of Mentz, in Germany. It is situated on the east bank of the Mayne, and the Achaff, or little river which empties itself into the former. It is walled, and has nothing very remarkable in it, except its castle and pretty chapel belonging to it, and a fine bridge of nine arches. The castle is a square building, of red stone, flanked by 3 large towers, with a platform in the middle: its church, dedicated to St. Peter, is very large, and adorned with some excellent sculptures. In 1292 a council was held here, for regulating ecclesiastical discipline, and the reformation of the clergy. The town stands in a fine sporting country, about a league from the entrance into the black forest; and was once an imperial free city, though now subject to the elector of Mentz. It is divided into the upper and lower town. In that prince's palace here it was that his Britannic majesty took up his quarters, during the stay of his army in these parts the night before the battle of Dettingen, in the year 1743; when, being attacked by the French next day, who crossed the Mayne, they were repulsed; and the king continued his march to Hanau. Near it is a pleasant vale, planted with vines and tobacco, besides some corn, the river Mayne running along one side of it. Aschaffenburg lies 18 miles E. from Frankfort, and 30 from Mentz, in lat. 30, 15, N. Long. 9, E.

ASCHE, or ASSCHE, a small, but free, town of Brabant, in the Austrian Netherlands. It is situated about 8 miles from Brussels towards the N. W. and 15 from Mechlin towards the S. W. In its district are 8 villages.

ASCHER, a jurisdiction belonging to Aggers district, a subdivision of the diocese of Christiana or Aggerhaus, in Norway.

ASCHERADE, a parish of Seelburg territory, a subdivision of Semigalia, in the duchy of Courland. In it is an old castle of the same name, and situated on the river Duna.

ASCHERUDE, or ASCHERODE, a place of Livonia, in the general government of Riga, now subject to Russia, with a demolished castle of the same name. It was taken in 1577 by the czar Iwan Basilides, who committed the most unheard-of cruelties upon the inhabitants.

ASCHERLEBEN, a small city belonging to the principality of Anhalt and circle of Upper Saxony, in Germany. It is situated on the Wiper, between Halberstadt and Mansfield: but it has been almost ruined in the wars of Germany.

ASCOLI fur Tronti, to distinguish it from the following, anciently Asculum Picenum, as being the capital of Picenum, and a Roman colony (nobilissima), as Pliny calls it, a city in the marquisate of Ancona, and ecclesiastical state, in the middle division of Italy. It is situated on an eminence between the rivers Tronto and Castellano, on the confines of the Further Abruzzo. At present it is divided into 4 parts; hath still two old castles, a vast many old towers, six bridges, and nine gates, besides other more modern fortifications; with 48 churches and convents. It is well inhabited, and the see of a bishop, who is immediately subject to the pope. It was anciently the seat of the Bellum Sociale under Popedius, which shook the Roman republic. It lies 40 miles S. of Ancona, in lat. 42, 50, N. Long. 15, 5, E.

ASCOLI di Satriano, anciently Asculum, a small episcopal city of the Capitanate, belonging to the kingdom of Naples, in Lower Italy, and subject to the see of Benevento. It is an inland place, at the foot of the Appenine mountains. In 1399 the old town was entirely destroyed by an earthquake, and in 1410 this new one built not far from its ruins. It has the title of a principality, which is in the house of Leiva. It lies 30 miles W. of Manfredonia, in lat. 41, 15, N. Long. 16, 30, E.

ASELE, or Angermanlands-Lapmark, a subdivision of Lapland, in Sweden. It is situated on the Angermanland river, and is bounded on the E. by Angermanland; on the N. by Umea Lapmark; on the W. by the mountains; and on the S. by Jamtland; and is upwards of 30 miles long. In the reign of king Charles XI. namely, in 1673, a beginning was made towards the better peopling of this country. The considerable parish of the same name, which lies in it, is between 8 and 9 miles long. Its south part is not inhabited by Laps, but by peasants, who settled themselves there, and have been since annexed to the Wustney colonies, of which there are 25 in number; but Gassele and Hellan are the oldest. The least part of this country is profitable, but of the most valuable yet even the least part is cultivated. The largest largest tax a peasant pays here is 21 dollars copper money; but very few of them pay so much: most of them give no more than 3 dollars, in consideration of which each possesses a district of between 1 mile and a half, and two miles, or he may even take as much land as he pleases. In this parish no other seed is sown than barley; and, by reason of the very frequent miscarriage of the crops, corn is very dear; wherefore the inhabitants mix their barley-meal with the dried and internal coloured rind of pine-trees, but for the most part with bran or chaff; and thus they make bread of it. Their principal income consists of the produce of their cattle and their fishery; which last article almost never fails them. It is worth observing that the seed sown near the colony of Hellan is at no time killed by the frost, though hereabouts are several morasses; but, on the other hand, this often happens at Gassele, and at Noren still oftener; though both these, and especially Gassele, are equally surrounded by the river as Hellan is. Among other inconveniencies with which the people in this country are infested in summer, is a sort of stinging fly, against which the inhabitants can no otherwise defend themselves in clear and calm weather, than by smearing their faces over with a salve or ointment made of tar, and a very fetid kind of grease. In their houses or huts they are pestered with smoke. By order of queen Christina the church of Asele was built of wood, in the year 1648; but so wretchedly, that it looks more like a barn than any thing else. With regard to the large extent of this parish, and the long way which the Laps have to the church, divine service is performed only every other Sunday; at which time the congregation assemble on Friday evening, the Laps continuing till Saturday evening in their huts near the church, and the peasants in the houses built by them at the end of it. The Laps, who inhabit the mountains come generally every high festival to church. In the year 1730 a school has been erected among them, in which are 6 Lap children, together with their school-master, who are annually maintained by the crown. At the yearly fair, which is kept every Christmas-eve near the church of Asele, the Laps sell live rein-deer, also rein-deer hides and flesh, birds, white fish, furs, &c. But the Lap-boors sell butter, cheese, dried fish, birds, and some furs.

ASGAR, a province of Fez, in Africa, towards its western coast, joining to the province of Hasbat. This is the richest part of all Africa for corn, cattle, wool, hay, and butter. Its principal cities are Arasch and Alcasar-quiver.

ASH, a village of Kent, not far from Canterbury; with two fairs, on March 25 and September 29.

ASHBOURN, or ASBORN, in Wirksworth hundred, in the S. W. part of the Peak of Derbyshire, a market-town of no great trade; but noted for the considerable quantities of cheese it sends up and down the Trent. It borders on Staffordshire, and lies east of the river Dove, 10 miles from Derby, 9 from Utoxeter, and 108 from London. Its market is on Saturday, and it has a fair on the 13th of February for horses of all sorts, horned cattle, and cheese: also April 3, May 21, and July 5, for horses, horned cattle, and wool; October 20, November 29, for black, heavy, and other horses, with horned cattle.

ASHBRITTLE, a village in Somersetshire, 5 miles W. of Willington; with a fair, on February 25, for cattle.

ASHBURN, a river in Suffex; wherein is both its fountain and its mouth. See SUSSEX.

ASHBURTON, a borough and market-town of Tinglebridge hundred, 10 miles N. of Totness, 22 S. W. from Exeter, and 196 W. from London. It is one of the 4 stanneries, and is noted for its excellent mines of copper and tin, also for a manufacture of serge. Its market is on Tuesday; and its fairs on the first Thursday in March, first Thursday in June, August 10, and November 11, for cattle. Ashburton, whose principal trade is in the woollen manufacture, is a great thoroughfare on the London road. It lies among hills, about half way between Exeter and Plymouth. The town is governed by a portreve, annually chosen at the court of the lord of the manor. It has only one good, but pretty long street, and a handsome church, in the form of a cathedral, with a tower 91 feet high, which has a leaden spire. In the church is a large chancel, with stalls, as in collegiate churches. It sends two members to Parliament. It lies but a little way in from the forest of Dartmore. Lat. 50, 30, N. Long. 4, 15, W.

ASHBURY, a place to the westward of Whitehorse vale, in Berkshire; betwixt which and Wantage is a very large camp on the brow of a hill: it has a single ditch, and is of a quadrangular form, which shews it to be a Roman work. The rectory of Ashbury is in the gift of the bishop of Bath and Wells; others say in that of the king or the lord-keeper.

ASHBY de la Zouch, a very considerable market town in Leicestershire; so called from the Zouches, its lords, is situated between Preston park and the great park, on the skirts of Derbyshire; about 100 miles from London, and 15 N. W. from Leicester. It has a large handsome church, near which stand the ruins of the earl of Huntingdon's castle, destroyed in 1648. There is a free-school here, with a good stipend, endowed by the earl of Huntingdon, to whom the manor belongs. This town is noted for its large manufacture of hats, in which some hundreds are employed. The market is on Saturday; and there are held four fairs, on Easter-Tuesday

A S

Tuesday and Whit-Tuesday, for horses, cows, and sheep; St. Bartholomew, on the 24th of August, and St. Simon and Jude, on the 28th of October, for fine young horses, of the largest and best breed in England, and cows. The ale here is excellent, and no ways inferior to that of Burton; and the fine coal-pits of Cole-Orton are within a mile of it; which, Mr. Burton says, burned for several years together in king Henry VIII.'s time, and could not be extinguished till the matter which fed the fire was quite consumed. By the ruins of the earl of Huntingdon's castle here, it seems to have been one of the principal in England; and king James I. with all his court, lodged with the then earl for several days together, and the dinner was all the time of his stay served up by 30 poor knights in gold chains and velvet gowns. It lies on the skirts of Derbyshire. Here the earl of Stamford has a good old hunting-seat, called Bradgate, and a fine park at Grooby. The vicarage of Ashby de la Zouch is in the gift of the earl of Huntingdon. Here also is a noted mineral spring, called Griffydham. Lat. 52, 40. N. Long. 1, 25. W.

ASHDOD, or Azotus, a city of the Philistines, lay about 12 miles north easterly of Ascalon. It was of extraordinary fame among the ancients. It had an inland situation, and is said to have been built by one who fled from the Red-sea, who called it after his wife, whose name was Aza. But this seems, at least, to be a mistake. We hear of none that fled from the Red-sea but the Edomites; and that they, under some chief, may have repaired and fortified this place is probable enough. But that they imposed this name [Azatus] on it, we (says a learned critic) cannot allow; it being very evidently a corruption of the Hebrew name Ashdod, which was in use long before the Edomites were driven out of their country. But, to continue what we find concerning this city, it stood in a champaign country which produced great plenty of corn. It held out the longest siege recorded in history, if it be true that Psammeticus laboured 29 years in the reduction of it. Here stood the temple of Dagon, and here was he peculiarly worshipped. He seems to have been the most grand, the most ancient, and most favourite god they had: to which may be added, that he subsisted, perhaps, the longest of any that did not straggle out of the country (as we are not sure he did); seeing that we read in I. Maccabees x. 14. that Jonathan burnt his temple, &c. To this god they attributed the invention of bread-corn, or of agriculture, as his very name imports, the word Dagon signifying bread-corn.

This Ashdod of the Old Testament is called Azotus in the New, as well as in the Maccabees, as above quoted. It lies (says Wells) near the shore between Gaza and Joppa. In the times that Christianity flourished in these parts it was made an episcopal see, and continued a fair village till the days of St. Jerom.

A S

ASHFORD, or ESHTISFORD, i. e. a ford over a rivulet at the head of the Stour. It is a well-built and populous market-town of Chart hundred, in the south-east parts of Kent, 12 miles south-west from Canterbury, and 57 S. E. from London, on the road to Hithe. It lies on the river Esh, is governed by a mayor; has a large church, formerly collegiate: from it is a road to Canterbury, and is noted for a monument of a countess of Athol, erected there 400 years ago. Its market is on Saturday, and every Tuesday fortnight; and has two fairs, on May 6 and August 29, for horses, cattle, and pedlary-wares. They hold pleas for any thing not exceeding 20 marks, and have a free grammar-school. Its vicarage is in the gift of the dean and chapter of Rochester. Lat. 51, 15. N. Long. 45. E.

ASHFORD, a town in the county of Windham, in Connecticut, New-England.

ASHGROVE, an island on the north-side of Cork harbour, Ireland; very fertile, and about 6 miles in circumference. The land is every where high and steep, and all round it a great depth of water. The principal place here is Cove, built on the side of a hill, which is only inhabited by fishermen and a few custom-house officers. There are however some good houses; and a decent parish-church.

ASHILL, a village of Somersetshire, 5 miles east of Taunton, with two fairs, on Easter-Wednesday and the first Wednesday after September 8.

ASHINGTON, a village of Suffex, 10 miles south of Horsham; with one fair on July 10.

ASHOVER, a village in Derbyshire, 6 miles south of Chesterfield; with two fairs, on April 25 and October 15.

ASHTON UNDER-LINE, a village in Lancashire 6 miles E. of Manchester; with two fairs on August 5 and December 3.

ASHRIDGE, an ancient mansion-house, finely situated, with a fine park, in the parish of Gaden, Buckinghamshire; and not far from Aldbury, in Hertfordshire. It belongs to the Duke of Bridgewater. This was formerly a royal-house of pleasure, and where king Edward I. held a parliament in the 19th year of his reign.

ASHTAROTH-KERNAIN, Karnaim, or Carnaim, a city of the Rephaims (says Dr. Wells), was in all likelihood the same with Ashtaroth, mentioned Joshua xiii. 12. as one of the capital cities of Og, king of Bashan; and again, verse 31, as given by Moses to the half-tribe of Manasseh. The word Karnaim denotes in the Hebrew tongue two-horned, whence some suppose this city to have been so called, as standing upon two hills, or built so as to resemble resemble two horns: but it seems more probable, that as Ashtaroth [or Ashtaré] was an idol much worshipped in those times and parts, (as appears from Judges ii. 13, and I. Kings xi. 5,) and that by the said name was denoted the moon, so by Carnaim is denoted the usual way of picturing the moon with two horns. And it is very probable, that from the worship paid there to this idol the place came to be denoted by the name of Ashtaroth-Carnaim, or simply Carnaim, as I. Maccabees xii. 21, 26. And, agreeably hereto, Jerom tells us, it was called Carnea in his time, and was a considerable town, lying 6 miles from Adra or Edrew, and that there was shewn the house where Job dwelt. But as to the name of this city, Dr. Patrick observes, it may be as well supposed that it was thus denominated from its being built in the shape of a half-moon.

ASHWELL, a village of Hartfordshire, not far from Coldecot, on the head of the Rhee, and near the borders of Cambridgeshire; which breaks out of a rock from several springs, with such force as to form a stream, which is remarkably clear, but so cold as to gripe horses not used to drink of it. The water bubbles out here in such abundance, and in just such a bottom under a hill, as the Isis or Thames does in Gloucestershire. Doomsday-book mentions this village as a borough, having 14 burgesses and a market: and anciently it had also four fairs. At half a mile's distance S. of this source of the Rhee, is a spot of ground taken in by a vallum, and generally thought to be one of the Castra Exploratorum of the Romans. It is called Arbury-banks. But though Camden takes this to be a Roman village, and some of their coins have been found here, yet it wants several particulars to constitute it a Roman castrum. The vicarage of Ashwell is in the gift of the bishop of London. Ashwell-field, in the neighbourhood, affords a stone-quarry, out of which most of the churches on this side and the adjacent part of Bedfordshire have been built. The church of Ashwell has a handsome chancel, three large aisles, a lofty tower at its west end, with a ring of six bells, and a chapel on the N. side of the chancel.

ASIA, one of the four general quarters into which the terraqueous globe is commonly divided; and as it exceeds Europe and Africa in the extent of its territories, it is also superior to them in the serenity of its air, the fertility of its soil, the deliciousness of its fruits, the fragrance and balsamic qualities of its plants, spices, and gums; the salubrity of its drugs; the quantity, variety, beauty, and value of its gems; the richness of its metals, and the fineness of its silks and cottons. It was in Asia, according to the sacred records, that the All-wise Creator planted the garden of Eden, in which he formed the first man and first woman, from whom the race of mankind was to spring. Asia became again the nursery of the world after the deluge; whence the descendants of Noah dispersed their various colonies into all the other parts of the globe. It was in Asia that God placed his once-favourite people the Hebrews, whom he enlightened by revelations delivered by the prophets, and to whom he gave the oracles of truth. It was here that the great and merciful work of our redemption was accomplished by his divine son; and it was from hence that the light of his glorious Gospel was carried with amazing rapidity into all known nations by his disciples and followers. Here the first Christian churches were founded, and the Christian faith miraculously propagated and watered with the blood of innumerable martyrs. It was in Asia that the first edifices were reared, and the first empires founded, while the other parts of the globe were inhabited only by wild animals. On all these accounts, this quarter claims a superiority over the rest; but it must be owned that a great change hath happened in that part of it called Turkey, which hath lost much of its ancient splendour, and from the most populous and best cultivated spot in Asia is become a wild uncultivated desert. The other parts of Asia continue much in their former condition, the soil being as remarkable for its fertility as most of the inhabitants for their indolence, effeminacy, and luxury. This effeminacy is chiefly owing to the warmth of the climate, though in some measure heightened by custom and education; and the symptoms of it are more or less visible as the several nations are seated nearer to or farther from the north. Hence the Tartars, who live near the same latitude with us, are as brave, hardy, strong, and vigorous as any European nation. What is wanting in the robust frame of their bodies among the Chinese, Mogul-Indians, and all the inhabitants of the more southern regions, is in a great measure made up to them by the vivacity of their minds, and ingenuity in various kinds of workmanship, which our most skilful mechanics have in vain endeavoured to imitate.

This vast extent of territory was successively governed in ancient times by the Assyrians, the Medes, the Persians, and the Greeks; but the immense regions of India and China were little known to Alexander or the conquerors of the ancient world. Upon the decline of these empires great part of Asia submitted to the Roman arms; and afterwards, in the middle ages, the successors of Mahomet, or, as they were usually called, Saracens, founded in Asia, in Africa, and in Europe, a more extensive empire than that of Cyrus, Alexander, or even the Roman when in its height of power. The Saracen greatness ended with the death of Tamerlane; and the Turks, conquerors on every side, took possession of the middle region of Asia, which they still enjoy. Besides the countries possessed by the Turks and Russians, Asia contains at present three powerful empires, the Chinese, the Mogul, and the Persian, upon which the lesser kingdoms and sovereignties of Asia generally depend. The prevailing form of government in this division of the globe is absolute monarchy. If any of them can be said to enjoy some share of liberty, it is the wandering tribes, as the Tartars and Arabs. Many of the Asiatic nations, when the Dutch first came among them, could not conceive how it was possible for any people to live under any other form of government than that of a despotic monarchy. Turkey, Arabia, Persia, part of Tartary, and part of India profess Mahometism. The Persian and Indian Mahometans are of the sect of Hali, and the others that of Omar; but both own Mahomet for their lawgiver, and the Koran for their rule of faith and life. In the other parts of Tartary, India, China, Japan, and the Asiatic islands, they are generally heathens and idolators. Jews are to be found every where in Asia. Christianity, though planted here with wonderful rapidity by the apostles and primitive fathers, suffered an almost total eclipse by the conquests of the Saracens, and afterwards of the Turks. Incredible indeed have been the hazards, perils, and sufferings of popish missionaries, to propagate their doctrines in the most distant regions, and among the grossest idolators; but their labours have hitherto failed of success, owing, in a great measure, to the avarice and profligacy of the Europeans, who resort thither in search of wealth and dominion.

The principal languages spoken in Asia are the modern Greek, the Turkish, the Russian, the Tartarian, the Persian, the Arabic, the Malayan, the Chinese, and the Japanese. The European languages are also spoken upon the coasts of India and China.

The continent of Asia is situated between 25 and 180 degrees of east longitude, and between the equator and 80 degrees of north latitude. It is about 4740 miles in length, from the Dardanel on the west to the eastern shore of Tartary; and about 4380 miles in breadth, from the most southern part of Malacca to the most northern cape of Nova Zembla. It is bounded by the Frozen Ocean on the north; on the west it is separated from Africa by the Red Sea, and from Europe by the Levant or Mediterranean, the Archipelago, the Hellespont, the sea of Marmora, the Bosphorus, the Black Sea, the river Don, and a line drawn from it to the river Tobol, and from thence to the river Oby, which falls into the Frozen Ocean. On the east it is bounded by the Pacific Ocean, or South Sea, which separates it from America; and on the south by the Indian Ocean; so that it is almost surrounded by the sea. The principal regions which divide this country are as follow.

ASIA MINOR, corruptly Natolia, a province of Asiatic Turkey. See ANATOLIA, and ASIA, in the last article.

A S

ASITIO. See ASSISIO.

ASINARA, a small island, situated near, and to the W. of that of Sardinia, in the upper division of Italy. It is now called Zanara, and anciently Hercules's island. It stretches northward; and is 28 miles in circuit, belonging to the town of Saffari, from which it is 15 miles to the N. It has a good castle, and near this island the Genoese were defeated by the Aragonians, in a sea-fight, anno 1409.

ASINDUM, or MEDINA SIDONIA, a town of Andalusia, in Spain. It gives title of duke to the family of the Gufmans. It stands upon a hill between Cadiz and Munda, about 17 miles S. of Seville.

ASKEATON, or ASKREATON, a little town belonging to the county of Limerick and province of Munster, in Ireland. It lies on the Shannon, and sends two members to the Irish parliament.

ASKERSUND, an inland-town of East Nerike, in the province of this last name, belonging to Sweden Proper. It is small, and situated on the most northern extremity of the Wetter-lake, near the mountains of Leerbeck and Snaflung. It has a haven, and drives a good trade in corn, nails, and tobacco. It holds the 60th place in the order of the general diet.

AS-KLOSTER, anciently a convent of North Holland, in the province of the latter name, belonging to South Gothland, in Sweden. It was founded in the year 1165. But at present it is a considerable seat belonging to a gentleman.

ASKREATON. See ASKEATON.

ASKRIG, an inconsiderable market-town in the North Riding of Yorkshire. It lies about 175 miles from London, has a market on Thursdays; and two fairs, May 11, and first Thursday in June.

ASLING, or JESSENIZE, a market-town near the river Sau, in the duchy of Carniola, belonging to the feigniory of Weissenfels. Here is dug a fine marble, and in the neighbourhood are the batteries of Sava, or the Sau, with the lead furnaces, in which iron and steel are smelted and worked.

ASLO. See OPSLO.

ASMER, or ADSMERE, the principal town of a province of the same name in India, on this side of the Ganges, in Asia. Some make Bando the capital; but both seem to be different names for the same province and town. According to our maps it is situated at the source of the Padder. Thevenot says, that Asmer is now only of a moderate size; though by the ruins of several palaces, and 16 reservoirs of water, it appears to have been formerly much larger. Its gates are of a remarkable height and structure, and the houses are of stone. It has beautiful mosques, and a mausoleum, in which several of their kings are buried. Near this is a large tower 170 steps high, and decorated with fine gates and windows. The town, adds Thevenot, is situated at the foot of an inaccessible and high hill, on which stands a castle, like that of Dover in England. The town is fortified with towers, and surrounded with walls between 6 and 7 leagues in circuit, and a fosse. Up the hill to the castle is a winding road about a league in length. In Asmer, among others, is the tomb of a Mahometan saint, called Cogeamundi, richly adorned, illuminated with lamps, and resorted to by pilgrims from all parts, particularly by such as want children. King Eckbar made a pilgrimage to it on foot from Agra, which is a distance of about 200 miles. He, it is said, ordered a stone to be fixed at every mile's end to rest on; and that, having obtained children by means of this piece of devotion, he built a stately palace at Sicare, which he called Fettiopore.

On the road between Agra and Asmer, says Ogilby, are inns, at every 25 miles, kept by women, to whom travellers pay three-pence a meal both for man and horse; and that at every 10 miles are handsome houses built by Eckbar for his women, whilst he made the above-mentioned pilgrimage. In a spacious palace here, the mogul often resides, and near it is a curious grotto cut out of the rock. This town lies between the river Indus and the province of Delli.

ASMIND, or rather ASMIND, an old and celebrated convent of Skivehuus district, belonging to the bishopric of Wiburg in North Jutland, Denmark. It is situated directly opposite to the town of Wiburg, on the further side of Asmind-lake. In the year 1164 it was founded for Augustine monks; but at present it is a royal fief.

ASOLA, or AZOLA, a town in the Bresciano, a territory belonging to the republic of Venice, in Upper Italy. It is situated on the river Chiese, and was anciently a fortified place.

ASOLO, a castle or seat in the territory of Treviso, and marquise of Trevigiana, belonging to the republic of Venice, in Upper Italy.

AZOPH, AZOF, or Asow, with Woronez, is one of the governments in European Russia. Of the same name is its capital; or, as the Turks pronounce it, Azac or Adzack; which many soon after so corrupted, as to write it Osow, then Kafak and Kafawa. The name of Asow seems to have been given this town from the Polowtzi prince Asup, or Agjup, or some such word in that country language; for, in the 11th and 12th century, this town and country were in the possession of the Polowtzi; but about that period the place was destroyed by the Russians. However, from that time, these last retained the name of Azow.

About the beginning of the 13th century the Genoese became masters of this town, and called it Tana; from them it appears to have been taken afterwards afterwards by the Tartars, who being a powerful people in these parts, an Afow coin is still extant, on which is to be seen the name of the chan Tactamys. From the Genoese the town came under the dominion of the Turks; when it lost its former profitable trade, which had been considerable, and was reduced to a village. In the year 1637 the Cossacs took it, and in 1641 they defended it against the Turks; but these blew it up and burnt it in the following year. Upon this the Turks rebuilt the place, and in 1672 they strongly fortified it; at which Russia took umbrage. The late czar Peter the Great marched, in the year 1695, with a great army to besiege Afoph; but having no fleet at that time to prevent the Turks from throwing fresh supplies continually into the town by sea, he was obliged to turn the siege into a blockade; yet he took the two strong towers before the town. But having employed Venetians and others to build him vessels at Veronis, and finding these in a condition to fall down the river Don, he went the next year a second time against Afoph, and behaved very bravely on board his own fleet: for having by stratagem drawn the Turks a little up the river, who came by the way of the Black Sea with supplies of men and provisions for the town, he fell upon them, took and sunk several of their vessels; and, upon their making a second attempt, he beat them back over the sand-bar, which lies near Afoph. So that the enemy being disappointed of the relief they expected, and every way distressed by the vigorous attacks of the Russians, were obliged to surrender, and march out of the place without their arms. The czar caused it to be better fortified after the modern taste, with counterscarps, covert-ways, half-moons, &c. But as his principal design in taking this place was to open a passage for trade into the Black sea, and thence to Constantinople and the Mediterranean, his next care was to make a convenient harbour. At the mouth of the river Miens (where the Turkish ships used to anchor) some leagues westward from Azoph, having 15 or 16 feet at low-water, and a cape with 12 feet water, also a hard gravelly bottom, he built a fortress with five bastions, and a city which he called Petrarchina Tuba. But in the year 1711 Afoph was ceded to the Turks by the peace of Prutsh. The Russians indeed took it again in the year 1736, and put it in a good condition of defence; but by the treaty of Belgrade in 1739 they were again obliged to demolish its fortifications entirely. Afoph is situated on the S. shore of the river Don, the ancient Tanais, near its mouth, and a little E. of the Paulus Mæotis, or sea of Afoph, on the frontiers of Russia, towards Turkey, the place being still subject to the former. Lat. 47, 15, N. Long. 44 E.

ASPA, a town of Parthia, (Ptolemy); now Isfahan, (Hollstenius). In Ptolemy the latitude seems to agree, being 33; but whether the longitude does, is a question. E. Long. 51. Lat. 32, 30.

ASPE, a small place of Valencia, a province of Spain. Besides this, Busching has the valley of Aipe, belonging to the provincial bailiwick of Oleron, belonging to the principality of Bearn, in the government of that name, and Navarre, in France. Its principal place is Acous. In this valley are several cold mineral-springs, among which is that of Escot.

ASPENAS, a considerable seat of Westmanland jurisdiction, belonging to Uplandia, a province of Sweden Proper.

ASPENDUS, an inland-town of Pamphylia, a subdivision of Caramania, in Asia Minor, belonging to Asiatic Turkey. It was the capital of the province under the Romans; being situated partly on a high rock, and partly at the foot of it, and crossed by the river Eurymedon, or, according to others, the Cataractus.

ASPEREN, a small walled-town of Holland, one of the Seven United Provinces. It is situated two miles above Hoekelen. It belongs to the family of the Boetselaars, and is noted for giving birth to several eminent divines.

ASPEROSA, a town of Turkey in Europe; it is a bishop's see, situated on the coast of the Archipelago. E. long. 25, 20. N. lat. 40, 58.

ASPEYTIA, a small town of Guipuzcoa, a subdivision of Biscay, in Spain, situated on the river Viola, in a delightful valley; near which lie the districts Loyola and Onis, that belonged to St. Ignatius, founder of the order of Jesuits. Lat. 43, 20, N. Long. 2, 22, W.

ASPHALTITES, or Dead Sea. See DEAD SEA.

ASPREMONT. See APRIMONT.

ASPRES LES VAYNES, a little town of Gapençois, a subdivision of the Upper Delphinat, in the government of Dauphine, in France. It is situated between high mountains.

ASPRONISI, anciently Therasia, an island in the harbour near Apanormia, or now Megali Cammini, on the island of Santorin, in the Mediterranean. It has the name of Aspronisi from the white colour of its earth: it rose out of the sea in the first century after the birth of Christ.

ASSANCALA, a strong town in Armenia, near the river Arras, in the road between Erzerum and Erivan, and noted for its hot baths. It stands on a high hill; the walls are built in a spiral line all round the rock, and strengthened with strong towers. The ditches are about two fathoms over, cut out of hard rock. Long. 41, 30, E. Lat. 39, 46, N.

ASSANCHIFF, a town of Asia, in Diarbekir, on the Tigris. Long. 42, 30, E. Lat. 37, 20, N.

ASSASSINS, a tribe or clan in Syria, called also Ismaelians and Batanists. These people probably owed their origin to the Karmatians, a famous he-retical sect among the Mahometans, who settled in Persia about the year 1090, whence, in process of time, they sent a colony into Syria, where they became possessed of a considerable tract of land among the mountains of Lebanon, extending itself from the neighbourhood of Antioch to Damascus.

The first chief and legislator of this remarkable tribe, appears to have been Hassan Sabah, a subtle impostor, who, by his artifices, made fanatical and implicit slaves of his subjects. Their religion was compounded of that of the Magi, the Jews, the Christians, and the Mahometans: but the capital article of their creed was to believe that the Holy Ghost resided in their chief; that his orders proceeded from God himself, and were real declarations of his divine pleasure. To this monarch the orientals gave the name of Scheik: but he is better known in Europe by the name of the Old Man of the Mountain. His dignity, instead of being hereditary, was confirmed by election: where merit, that is, a superior multiplicity and enormity of crimes, was the most effectual recommendation to a majority of suffrages.

This chief, from his exalted residence on the summit of mount Lebanon, like a vindictive deity, with the thunderbolt in his hand, sent inevitable death to all quarters of the world; so that from one end of the earth to the other, Khalifs, Emperors, Sultans, Kings, Princes, Christians, Mahometans, and Jews, every nation and people, execrated and dreaded his sanguinary power, from the strokes of which there was no security. At the least suggestion or whisper that he had threatened the death of any potentate, all immediately doubled their guards, and took every other precaution in their power. It is known, that Philip Augustus, king of France, on a premature advice that the Scheik intended to have him assassinated, instituted a new body-guard of men, distinguished for their activity and courage, called Sergens d'Armes, with brass clubs, bows and arrows; and he himself never appeared without a club, fortified either with iron or gold. Most sovereigns paid secretly a pension to the Scheik, however scandalous and derogatory it might be to the luster of majesty, for the safety of their persons. The Knights-templars alone dared to defy his secret machinations and open force. Indeed they were a permanent dispersed body, not to be cut off by massacres or assassinations.

This barbarous prince was furnished with resources unknown to all other monarchs, even to the most absolute despotic tyrant. His subjects would prostrate themselves at the foot of his throne, requesting to die by his hand or order, as a favour by which they were sure of passing into paradise. On them if danger made any impression, it was an emulation to press forward; and if taken in any enterprise, they went to the place of execution with a magnimity unknown to others. Henry, count of Champagne, who married Isabella, daughter of Amaury king of Jerusalem, passing over part of the territory of the Assassins in his way to Syria, and talking highly of his power, their chief came to meet him, "Are your subjects (said the old man of the mountain) as ready in their submission as mine?" and, without staying for an answer, made a sign with his hand, when ten young men in white, who were standing on an adjacent tower, instantly threw themselves down. On another occasion, sultan Malek-Shah summoning the Scheik to submit himself to his government, and threatening him with the power of his arms, should he hesitate to comply; the latter, very composedly turning himself towards his guards, said to one of them, "Draw your dagger, and plunge it into your breast;" and to another, "Throw yourself headlong from yonder rock." His orders were no sooner uttered, than they were joyfully obeyed: and all the answer he deigned to give the sultan's envoy was, "Away to thy master, and let him know I have many thousand subjects of the same disposition." Men so ready to destroy themselves were equally alert and resolute in being the ministers of death to others. At the command of their sovereign they made no difficulty of stabbing any prince, even on his throne; and being well versed in the different dialects, they conformed to the dress and even the external religion of the country, that they might with less difficulty strike the fatal blow required by their chief. With the Saracens they were Mahometans; with the Franks, Christians; in one place they joined with the Mamaluks; in another, with the ecclesiastics or religious; and under this disguise seized the first opportunity of executing their sanguinary commission. Of this we meet with an instance in the history of Saladin, while he was besieging Mambidge, the celebrated hieropolis of antiquity. Being one day with a few attendants, and they at some distance, reconnoitring the place for the better disposition of the attack, a man rushed on him with a dagger in his hand, and wounded him in the head; but the sultan, as he was endeavouring to repeat his stroke, wrested the dagger from him, and, after receiving several wounds, laid him dead at his feet. Before the sultan had well recovered himself, a second encountered him to finish the treachery of the former; but he met with the same fate: he was succeeded with equal fury by a third, who also fell by the hand of that magnanimous prince, whom he was sent to assassinate. And it was observed, that these wretches dealt about their fruitless blows as they lay in the agonies of death. With such rapidity was this transacted, that it was over before Saladin's guards could come to his assistance. He retired to his tent, and in great perturbation throwing himself on his sofa, ordered his servants to take take a strict view of his household, and to cashier all suspected persons; at the same time asking with great eagerness, "Of whom have I deserved such treacherous usage?" But it afterwards appeared, that these villains had been sent by the old man of the mountain; of whom the vizir Kamschlegin had purchased the murder of Saladin, to free himself from so great a warrior, whom he could not meet in the field. To animate them in their frantic obedience, the Scheik, before their departure on such attempts, used to give them a small foretaste of some of the delights which he assured them would be their recompence in paradise. Delicious soporific drinks were given them; and, while they lay asleep, they were carried into beautiful gardens, where every allurement invited their senses to the most exquisite gratifications. From these seats of voluptuousness, inflamed with liquor and enthusiastic views of perpetual enjoyments, they sallied forth to perform assassinations of the blackest dye.

This people once had, or at least they feigned to have, an intention of embracing the Christian religion. They reigned a long time in Persia, and on mount Lebanon. Hulaku, a khan of the mogul Tartars, in the year 655 of the hegira, or 1254 of the Christian æra, entered their country and dispossessed them of several places; but it was not till the year 1272 that they were totally conquered. This achievement was owing to the conduct and intrepidity of the Egyptian forces, sent against them by the sultan Bibaris. It has, however, been thought that the Druses, who still reside among the eminences of mount Lebanon, and whose religion and customs are so little known, are a remnant of those barbarians.

ASSEBURG, (New) a bailiwick formed out of a manor in the county of Mansfield, belonging to the family of Busch, of whom king Frederick William bought it, and gave it to prince Augustus Ferdinand. The castle stands on a hill, not far from Mansfield, but is fallen to decay; for which reason the seat of the bailiwick has been removed to the village of Mollendorf, or Muhlendorf.

ASSEEN, a place 15 miles from the city of Gomrom, or Bender Abasi, in Faristan, a province of Persia, from which fresh water is fetched by land on camels' backs for people of quality; the water of Naban, which is three miles off, not being accounted wholesome.

ASSEM, an island near the Cape of Good Hope, five leagues S. by W. from Saldania-bay, and 11 leagues N. W. by N. from the entrance of the bay at the Cape. The isle of Assem is much lower land than isle Robben, which is near it; it shews breakers, which run out near half a league into the sea: the anchorage is on the side next the main land.

ASSEN, a small city belonging to the county of Drent, towards the north of the province of Over-Issel, in the United Provinces. It has a court of judicature.

ASSENHEIM, a small town in the principality of Solms, having a castle situated at the conflux of the Nidda and Welter; which belongs to Solms Rondleheim, and was fitted up elegantly for a residence in 1696. Some parts of the town belong to Hanau and Isenburg-Wachtersbach.

ASSENS, a district belonging to the diocese of Funen, in Denmark. It contains Boog-territory, to which belong 21 country-parishes, and 10 gentlemen's seats. It takes its name from ASSENS, or ASSNES, i. e. holy promontory; in Latin Assenum, or Asnesum, a town on the Little Belt, and south-west coast of Funen-island, opposite to Hadersleben, in the duchy of Sleswick. It was anciently a flourishing place. In the war of 1535 its walls were levelled, and the town plundered; but in 1628 it was surrounded a-new with a rampart and fosse, of which not a vestige is now to be seen. The houses here are for the most part mean buildings. The large church of Assens is said to have been erected in 1486, and the following years. Before the reformation here was a large Franciscan convent. The harbour indeed is but indifferent, yet from hence are exported great quantities of grain and other country commodities. The usual ferry over the Little Belt from this place towards Harøesundsforge, in the bailiwick of Hadersleben, is about two miles.

In 1535 king Christian III. or his army, commanded by John Rautzaw, says the Geographical System, defeated that commanded by Christopher, earl of Oldenburg, together with all his dependents, and killed Gustavus Troll, archbishop of Upsal. Afterwards Rautzaw levelled this town with the ground. It lies about 11 miles from Odensee to the south.

ASSEM. See AZEM.

ASSENIPOLIS, or ASSIBOUERS, a lake, from which the natives of Canada say the river of St. Lawrence rises.

ASSERIGE, a small place of the Further Abruzzo, in the kingdom of Naples and lower division of Italy.

ASSHAFFENBURG, (see ASCHAFFENBURG) anciently known by the name of Assiburgium, lies on the Mayne, and Aschaff, a little river which empties itself into the former, in the county of Hanau, in Germany.

ASSIENTO-LATACUNGA, the first jurisdiction to the southward of that of Quito. The word Assiento implies a place less than a town, but larger than a village. It is situated in a wide plain, having on the east-side the eastern cordillera of the Andes, and at a small distance from its foot stands Latacunga. On its west-side is a river, which, though sometimes fordable, upon any increase of the waters, must be passed over the bridge. This Affiento is large and regular, the streets broad and straight, the houses of stone, arched, and well-contrived; but, on account of the dangerous consequences so often resulting from earthquakes, without any stories in them: this precaution was occasioned by a dreadful destruction of all the buildings, June 20, 1698. This shock was general over all Quito. Out of 600 stone-houses, the number of which Affiento then consisted, only a part of one, and the church of the Jesuits, were left standing; and even these were so much damaged that there was a necessity for pulling them down. But the greatest misfortune was, that most of the inhabitants were buried under the ruins, the earthquake beginning at one in the morning, the shocks of which continued at short intervals the greatest part of the day. The stone of which the houses and churches are built is a sort of pumice or spongy stone, ejected from volcanoes, inexhaustible quarries of it being found in the neighbourhood. This stone is so light that it will float in water, and, on account of their porosity, the lime cements the different pieces very closely: so that now the houses can support themselves much better than before the earthquake. Lat. 0, 55, 14, S. Long. 78, 15, W.

ASSINCEIRO, a mean place belonging to Thomar, a district of Portuguese Estremadura. It contains 500 inhabitants.

ASSINIPOILS, a band of Indians, inhabiting the borders of Lake Winnepeek, N. America, and are a revolted tribe of the Naudowessies; having separated themselves from their countrymen, on account of some real or imaginary grievances, (the Indians in general being very tenacious of their liberty) and fought for freedom at the expence of their ease; as the land they now inhabit being farther north, and not so fertile as those they left. See NAUDOWESSIES.

ASSINOIS, a savage nation of Indians, inhabiting the forests of Canada.

ASSIZE, ASSISI, or ASSISIO, anciently Affium, or town of Ombria, situated in the duchy of Spoleto, and middle division of Italy; it is the birth-place of St. Francis, and a bishopric under the holy see. This city is mentioned by Ptolemy and Procopius, &c. It has its name either from Mount Asius, now Asi, or from the river of the same Latin name, now Chiasco, near which it lies. This place has been so often ruined, that it is now in a mean condition, though it hath still a good citadel, and much resorted to by pilgrims. The cathedral consists of three churches, built one over another; in the lowermost of which the above-mentioned St. Francis, founder of the Franciscan order, is buried, as also St. Clara, a Franciscan nun, both which are said to be very prolific in miracles. The city is supplied with water by a noble fountain, which pours it out at 20 different pipes; a very beautiful piece of art in that kind. Affisio stands on a hill about 12 miles E. of Perugia, 24 N. W. of Spoleto, and 80 N. of Rome. Lat. 43, 10, N. Long. 13, 35, E.

ASSO, a fortress on the island of Cephalonia, in that anciently called the Ionian sea, in European Turkey. It belongs to the Venetians, and was erected in 1595 on a pretty high hill, surrounded with the sea and with steep rocks.

ASSOS, or ASSUM, mentioned also by St. Luke in Acts xx. a city on the S. coast of Phrygia Minor, in Asiatic Turkey, on a bay of the Aegean sea. It is a district of Troas. Formerly it was a good sea-port, strong by nature and art: and Pliny tells us, that in its neighbourhood was found the stone called Sarcophagus, which consumed the bodies buried in it; which notion might probably arise from its being used for coffins. It is situated 12 miles S. E. of Troas, or Alexandria. Lat. 38, 30, N. Long. 27, 30, E.

ASSOUAN, or ASSOAN, a poor little town of Upper Egypt, in Africa, with a barrack for some Janizaries who guard this country under a Turkish Aga. A little way from it are the ruins of the ancient Siene, directly under the tropic of Cancer. Its fortress is now surrounded with only two or three slight walls: the rest, which stretches westward, is a granite rock, covered with ruins of unburnt bricks, and supposed to be the Assonan of the middle ages. Between the hill and river is a building, which, from what is left of it, may be supposed to be the observatory mentioned by Pliny, and built over the wall, with two openings a-top, growing narrower upwards for making observations, especially on the vertical sun when in the summer tropic. All the neighbouring country eastward, and even the bed and islands of the Nile, are red granite, stiled anciently the Thebaic stone. Here are abundance of columns, &c. of the same stone lying about; the quarries of which are not deep below the surface, and they still shew the manner in which these huge stones were dug, by cutting channels round and under them with the chisel, and forcing them up by bearers.

ASSUMAR, a small place belonging to the district of Portalegre, a subdivision of the province of Alentejo, in Portugal. It contains 600 inhabitants.

ASSUMPTION, the metropolis of Paraguay, or La Plata, in South America. It is situated near the mouth of the river La Plata, and remarkable for its healthy and convenient situation, as well as for the number of its inhabitants; having about 400, descended from some of the best families of Spain, and several thousand Mestizos and Mulattoes. The territory around it is extremely fertile, producing producing great plenty and variety of fruits, both those natural to the country and such as have been transplanted from Spain. The air is so temperate, that the trees are clothed with perpetual verdure. Here also are very rich pastures, in which are bred vast herds of cattle. Assumption is situated on the shore of the river Paraguay, opposite to Buenos Ayres, which lies 170 miles S. of it, and subject to Spain. Lat. 25, 20, S. Long. 54, 20, W.

ASSYN, or ASSINT, a district in the shire of Ross, on the W. side of it, and N. of Lochbroom, a part of the northern highlands in Scotland. It is a mountainous tract, abounding with deer and cattle, but little or no corn. Here resides a laird of the name of Mackenzie, who takes the title of Assint, and to whom most of this tract belongs, being a descendant from the family of Seaforth. On the coast of the Deucalionian sea are promontories, in which are huge rocks of marble, particularly one running N. W. in our maps called Row Stour Assint. This country is contiguous to Strathnaver; in its mountains the river Ockell rises, which runs into the frith of Tayne, or Dornoch. Its ancient inhabitants were the Creones or Cerones. It has an inland lake called Loch-Assyn, or, as our maps have it, Loch-lambach.

ASSYRIA PROPRIA, the country now called Curdistan, in Asiatic Turkey. See BABYLONIA and DIARBEKER. It lies on the E. side of the river Tigris, between Armenia on the N. and Babylon on the S. It had its name from Ashur, the son of Shem, who first planted it, Gen. x. It was divided into ten provinces, the principal of which were, Nineveh, Ctesiphon, Arbela, and Larissa. Dio of Halicarnassus says, that the ancient empire of Assyria was at first but of a small extent. Its true limits, according to Ptolemy, were as follows. It was bounded by part of Armenia and the mountains of Niphas on the N. Mesopotamia, or the Tigris, which divided it from that, on the W. Susiana on the S. and part of Media, with the mountains Choatres and Zagrus on the E. He also divides this empire into six regions; namely, Arapachite, on the frontiers of Armenia; Adiabene, contiguous to Arapachite; Arbelide on the E. Chalachene or Calacine, above Adiabene; Apollionate below it; and Sitacene below Susiana; all which provinces, except the first, were sufficiently known to other ancient geographers, though that only is mentioned by Ptolemy.

Assyria, in its largest extent, anciently comprehended those provinces of Turkey, in Asia and Persia, which now bear the names of Curdistan, Diarbec, and Iracarabick. Its limits consequently were, Armenia to the N. Media and Persia towards the E. Arabia and the Euphrates to the S. which last divides it from Syria; and Asia Minor to the W. This is one of the empires we have the earliest knowledge of, and lasted 1200 (some say 1600) years from Nimrod the first sovereign, to Sardanapalus the last, having had several other kingdoms and provinces under its dominion besides those already mentioned.

ASTA, which Pliny honours with the title of Regia, was about 16 miles distance from Cadiz in Spain, according to Antoninus's Itinerary, and situated on the ocean. This city is mentioned by Pomponius Mela, and also by Ptolemy. Martin de Roa is of opinion that it stood where the present city of Xeres della Frontera stands; but others pretend to discover its ruins between Xeres and Tribuxena.

ASTABAT, a town of Armenia, in Asia; situated near the river Arras, 12 miles south of Nakhivan. The land about it is excellent, and produces very good wine. There is a root peculiar to this country called ropas, which runs in the ground like liquorice, and serves for dying red. It is very much used all over the Indies, and for it they have a great trade. Long. 46, 30, E. Lat. 39, 0, N.

ASTACUS. See BITHYNIA.

ASTAPA, a city of Spain, in the time of Scipio and Aldrubal in subjection to or in alliance with the Carthaginians; the men of which city, when the Roman army appeared before it, proved themselves so obstinately devoted to the interest of Carthage, that they sallied out in good order to attack the Romans, and all died fighting, except the 50 who had been left in the city to guard their effects, their wives and children, whom they had brought into the market-place, designing to destroy them all with fire and sword in case the Romans should prevail. This trust they discharged upon the first news of the defeat of their countrymen, setting fire to a great pile, on the top of which they had placed the women, children, and most valuable moveables; this done, they threw themselves also, every man, into the flames, leaving the Romans masters of but an empty city.

ASRARA, a considerable town of Ghilan and Tabristan, provinces of Persia. It is situated on the banks of the Caspian sea, about 98 miles from Rescht, towards the north-west according to De L'Isle's map, and mentioned only by Martiniere.

ASTARAC (county of) a subdivision of Lower Armagnac, in the Government of Guyenne and Gascony, in France. It is a fruitful and well-inhabited country belonging to the ducal house of Roquelaure.

ASTCHIKOUNIPI, a vast lake in New Britain; abounding in whales, and supposed to communicate with the Northern sea.

ASTEPHAN, or VICUS STEPHANI, a village of Phrygia Major, in Asiatic Turkey, about 26 miles from Sinope.

ASTERRACAT, ASTRABAD, or ESTARABAD, a province of Persia; situated in its north-west part, having Corasan on the east; part of Tartary on the north; the Caspian sea on the west, and also a little on the north; Tabristan on the west; and a branch of mount Taurus, with the desert of Segestan on the south. It is a mountainous country, and, except near the banks of the rivers Margab and Arias, which run through it, the soil is sandy and barren: but there it is a champaign land, pleasant and fruitful, producing grapes of an uncommon magnitude. The inhabitants are a mixture of Persians and Tartars. Its capital is the following, namely, ASTRABAD, a large city in the bay of the same name, which lies on the S. E. and by E. corner of the Caspian sea. There is at the entrance into the city several pyramids of human heads, placed in the walls with cement, the faces forward, of thousands that have been executed for murder, treason, &c. Here are made a great many brown druggets, and other light stuffs. It lies 200 miles N. of Ispahan, the capital of Persia. Lat. 37, 36, N. Long. 54, 20, E.

ASTRABAD-BAY lies in the south-east corner of the Caspian sea, near the last-mentioned city.

ASTI (county or earldom of), a subdivision of Piemont, in the upper part of Italy: In Italian it is called Contado d'Asti, in Latin Comitatus Astensis. Ptolemy places it in the Liguria of Cisalpine Gaul. It was anciently a part of the duchy of Milan, and at present contains the county of Asti Proper, and the marquisate of Ceva. The emperor Charles V. having taken it from the French in 1529, gave it two years afterwards to the duke of Savoy, who is still in possession of it. Asti is bounded on the west by Piemont, and on all other sides by the duchy of Montferrat.

ASTI, ASTA, and by the French ASTE, the capital of the last-mentioned county, and of the same name. It was anciently a Roman colony, situated not far from the river Tanaro, in a pleasant fruitful valley, producing plenty of corn, vines, fruits, &c. particularly a fine sort of melon, highly valued. Asti is a large place, and in it are still some strong, but old works, with narrow streets, but several stately and genteel houses. It was once the seat of a considerable republic; but fell afterwards into the hands of the counts of Milan, and became part of that duchy, till, after various revolutions, it was given, as hinted above, with its territory, to Charles III. duke of Savoy. In 1746 it was taken from the French by the Sardinians. Asti consists of the city, the borough, the citadel, the fort and castle of St. Peter, which are all of considerable importance to its owner. Around it is a peculiar territory, to which belong the little places Camerano, Monvasio, and Bagnasco. Asti is the see of a bishop, under the metropolitan of Milan, and lies 15 miles south-west of Cassel. Lat. 44, 40, N. Long. 8, 15, E.

ASTON, a village of Berkshire, not far from Wallingford. It is famous for a great battle fought here in the year 871, between the Danes and Saxons, in which the latter were totally defeated by Ethelred and his brother Alfred.

ASTORGA, a city of Leon, a province of Spain. It was anciently called Colonia Asturica Augustana. It is situated in a delightful plain, on the little river Astura or Torto, is well fortified both by nature and art, but neither large nor populous. Its bishop is suffragan to the metropolitan of Santiago; his diocese contains 913 parishes, according to Moll, with an annual revenue of 10,000 ducats. The cathedral has 14 dignitaries, 50 canons, and 10 minors. It was anciently the capital of Asturias: at present it is the principal place of a marquisate: which title king Henry IV. conferred in 1465 on don Alvaro Pedro Osorio, earl of Trassamara and Villalobos. It was taken by the Moors, and mostly destroyed; but retaken and rebuilt by king Alphonso, who also built its cathedral, one of the most ancient in Spain. But it was again destroyed, and afterwards rebuilt by Ordonno I. king of Aragon, in the year 851. It lies 30 miles S. W. of Leon. Lat. 42, 20, N. Long. 6, 20, W.

ASTRACHAN, or ASTRACAN, a government of Asiatic Russia, called, according to Busching, in their language Astrachanskaja Gubernija. It comprehends the ancient Tartar kingdom of Astrachan, which was conquered by the czar Juan Basilowitz, in the year 1554, and includes the north and part of the west side of the Caspian sea. It is bounded on the north by Bulgaria and Baskiria; on the south by the Caspian sea; on the west by the Volga, which parts it from the Nagayan Tartars and Don Cossacks; and on the east by the chain of hills which divide it from Great Tartary: so that this is the most eastern province in Europe, being parted from Asia on the east by the mountains, and the south by the Caspian sea. It reaches from Lat. 46 deg. to 52 min. N. and from Long. 45 deg. to 55 min. E. and beyond. The heat of the sun here in summer is so great, that, according to Mr. Lerch's observation at Astrachan, the liquor in Fahrenheit's thermometer rises above the 100th degree, to the 130th and a half; though Boerhaave, in his Elementa Chæmiæ, thinks that a man cannot bear a heat which exceeds the 90th deg. of this thermometer; but all creatures that he knows of have soon died in it. Besides, the heat in September and October, says Olearius, exceeds that which is felt in Germany in the height of the harvest-season: the winter is only of two months continuance; but so very severe, that the Volga is all that time frozen over hard enough to bear sledges. The

The land here would be very fertile, were it well cultivated. But the Tartars are utter strangers to agriculture, and even averse to it; they living in tents, and shifting from place to place, as fancy or convenience leads them.

The vast desert, or waste wilderness, of this country is very much noted; and has neither water nor pasture in it. Towards the coasts of the Caspian sea the soil is sandy. According to Moll, there is a prodigious heath on the west side of the Volga, extending 70 German leagues; and another on the south, of about 80 more. In the parts adjacent to the town of Astracan are small lakes, or pits of water, in which salt is to be met with in such quantity that it partly settles and crystallizes like ice on the surface, so that one may without any danger travel upon it; but it partly gathers itself on the bottom of the pits like rock-crystal. This salt yields an agreeable perfume, not unlike that of a violet; and the Russians, who make a considerable traffic in this article, have it carried and laid in huge heaps on the banks of the Volga, where it lies ready for shipping off. See more concerning this under the city of

ASTRACAN, the metropolis of the kingdom of Astracan, in the island of Dongoli, or Dolgoi, near Tartary; which is formed by the Volga on its eastern shore. Lat. 47, N. within 20 leagues of the Caspian sea, and in Long. 52, E. It derives its names from Hahdgie Tarkin, a Tartar prince, by whom it was founded, and was for many ages subject to these people; but was in 1554 taken by Juan Basilowitz, czar of Muscovy, as has been mentioned. About a century after it was wrested from the czars by the Tartars, and again rescued in 1668. The city contains about 70,000 inhabitants, among whom are many Armenians (Busching says only 40 families, who reside here for the sake of trade) and Tartars of various denominations, with some Persians and Indians. It is in circumference no more than 3 miles within the walls, but including the suburbs 5. It is surrounded by a brick-wall in a ruinous condition, being built about 200 years. In the citadel here is usually kept by the czar 6 regiments in garrison, making a body of 3000 men; and in the adjacent plain are erected several batteries to prevent the approach of an enemy, as Nadir Schah had given some alarms on this side. The houses are mostly of wood. The higher part of the city commands a prospect of the Volga, which spreads itself near 3 miles. The city is surrounded by gardens and vineyards, and all kinds of vegetables abound here as in England, except potatoes, cauliflowers, and artichokes; and their orchards furnish them with plenty of apples, pears, &c. The water-melons are excellent, called by the Russians arboose, and reckoned the best in all the empire: but the wine is indifferent, though Busch-ing says, that the vine-stocks planted here thrive pretty well. They collect near Astracan annually some millions of pounds of salt, which is of great use to their fisheries, which are very extensive down the Volga to the sea. They sell the salt at 3 copecks a pound in Astracan; but in Russia from 15 to 18, about a farthing a pound. The principal fish are sturgeon, starlet, beluga, and assotra. The revenue of Astracan to the crown of Russia is computed at 160,000 rubles, or 33,500l. sterling, which principally arises from fish and salt. The first establisher of these fisheries was Tikon Demedeff, a carrier, who settled there about a century ago. His whole stock for some time consisted but of two horses; but, in a short time, through his industry, he became the greatest merchant in the city; but the crown has engrossed both the fisheries and salt-works. The country here, from July to October, is infested with locusts.

The Indian Pagans have a small temple here, and worship a wooden pagod; but the Tartars are so averse to idolatry that they will not carry what has the image of any thing on it into their churches. The Pagan priests use beads, incense, prostrations, and offerings.

For several miles round this city are settlements of a very civil and industrious people, of the race of Crime Tartars, who are tributary to the Russians. They have a singular custom: when a daughter grows marriageable, they cover her tent with white linen, and put a painted cloth on the top; they place a painted waggon near the tent, which is her wedding-portion; and they give her usually to the man who makes the father the greatest present.

Astracan is the residence of the governor, and the see of a bishop. Among the Russian churches the cathedral is the newest and most considerable. The Lutherans have also a church here, and the Armenians one. The trade in Astracan has always been very extensive, as the people from upwards of 30 different nations resort thither upon that account. It is a good sea-port, where the merchants embark for Persia; and it lies 80 miles N. of the Caspian sea, and 800 S. W. of Moscow.

ASTROP-WELLS, a place near Banbury, in Oxfordshire; famous for mineral waters.

ASTURA, an inconsiderable place of the Campania di Roma, a province belonging to the Ecclesiastical State, in the middle division of Italy. It has a harbour and strong tower, situated on the sea. It is memorable for being the place where the celebrated Cicero lost his life by the hands of that miscreant soldier Popilius (whom the orator had before by his pleadings saved from the gallows) through the instigation of the more infamous Marc Antony. And in this place also the unfortunate prince Conradine, who was the last heir of the Hohenstauffen-house, was taken prisoner in the year 1268. Here the Paludi Pontini, i. e. Pontine marshes, begin, extending themselves along the sea as far as Terracina, and run up in land a great way. This tract was anciently called Palus Pomptius, or Campus Pomptinus; and though at that time it was well known for its insalubrious air, yet it contained 23 cities and towns; whilst, on the contrary, it has at present only some little mean places.

ASTURIA, an ancient kingdom of Spain, subdued by Augustus, emperor of Rome. The inhabitants of this country, along with those of Cantabria, asserted their liberty long after the rest of Spain had received the Roman yoke. So great was their desire of liberty, that, after being closely shut up by the Roman army, they endured the most terrible calamities of famine, even to the devouring of one another, rather than submit to the enemy. At length, however, the Asturians were for surrendering; but the Cantabrians opposed this measure, maintaining that they ought all to die sword in hand like brave men. Upon this the two nations quarrelled, notwithstanding their desperate situation; and a battle ensuing, 10,000 of the Asturians were driven to the intrenchments of the Romans, whom they begged in the most moving manner to receive them on any terms they pleased. But Tiberius, the emperor's son-in-law, refusing to admit them into the camp, some of these unhappy people put an end to their lives, by falling upon their own swords; others lighting great fires threw themselves into them, while some poisoned themselves by drinking the juice of a venomous herb.

The campaign being put an end to by winter, the next year the Asturians summoned all their strength and resolution against the Romans; but, notwithstanding their utmost efforts of valour and despair, they were entirely defeated in a most bloody battle, which lasted two days, and for that time entirely subdued. A few years afterwards they rebelled, in conjunction with the Cantabrians, but were soon reduced by the Romans, who massacred most of the young men that were capable of bearing arms. This did not prevent them from revolting anew in a short time afterwards; but without success, being obliged to submit to the Roman power, till the subversion of that empire by the Goths.

ASTURIAS, anciently the kingdom of Asturia, but now a principality of modern Spain, is divided into two parts; namely, Asturia d'Oviedo, and Asturia de Santillana; and is bounded on the west by Galicia, on the north by the sea, on the east by Biscay, and on the south by Old Castile and Leon, which are separated from it by a ridge of mountains, called the Asturian mountains. Pelajo, or Pelagus, bravely repulsed here the general of the Saracens, with his Moorish forces, after they had over-run the rest of Spain, and obliged these invaders to let his Asturians enjoy their liberty unmolested; for which the latter made him their prince; and that dignity descended to his successors. To the eldest son of Spain, ever since the year 1388, this principality has given title, when it was first conferred on Henry, son of king John I. upon his marrying Catherine, daughter to John of Gaunt, duke of Lancaster; and, in imitation of the English monarchs, who give the title of prince of Wales to their eldest sons.

The greatest extent of Asturias, from south to north, is about 13 miles, and from west to east 27. The air is pretty good. The country is uneven, and hollow or cavernous. All the above-mentioned Asturian mountains are covered with forests, upon which account the province is but thinly peopled. However, the soil produces a pretty deal of grain, plenty of fruits, and excellent wines. The horses of this country have of old been very famous, and much prized for their goodness and speed. The nobility value themselves upon their descent from the old Goths, and the purity of their blood, from any admixture of the Jewish and Moorish with it. For, after the unfortunate battle which the Goths, under king Roderick, fought with the Moors near Xeres, the above-mentioned prince, Pelajo, attended by a number of Gothish gentry, withdrew into the Asturian mountains; but finding that he could not face the enemy in the open field, he betook himself with a thousand brave Goths into a large cavern of these mountains, called Aufena, from which he sallied out upon any incursion made by the Moors, and put them to flight. Afterwards there was built in this place a convent, called Santa Maria de Cuadonga; which name the cavern itself also bears. This retreat and gallant defence of the Goths is, to this very day, so famous in Spain that all the inhabitants of these mountains are looked upon as true Goths, and enjoy particular privileges; and though they be only peasants, who come in numbers out of Spain into other countries, and in the quality of servants, they take it as an affront to be called any other than Godes, both great and small giving themselves the title of illustrious Gode, or illustrious mountaineer; and, notwithstanding their poverty, they look upon it as a disgrace to mix with noble and rich families of any other pedigree. They are likewise so much respected, that other families give a great deal of money in order to have alliances by marriage with them.

ASZOD, the most remarkable of 53 bourgs or villages, belonging to Vatz district, and united counties of Pesth, Pilis, and Solth, in the circle on this side the Danube, in Lower Hungary. It was anciently called Osthmach, and looks like a town. It belongs to a Podmanizky.

ATACAMA, in the province of Los Charcas, Peru; lies in S. Lat. 22, 30, forty leagues up the country. Its port is Cobija, known by this land-mark, that from Morro Moreno, or the brown head-land, which is 10 leagues to west, the mountain goes on rising till it comes directly over the creek where the port is, and from thence it begins to lower a little; so that the same is the highest part of the coast, though but little. The French, who have anchored in this port, say it is only a little creek, the third-part of a league in depth, where there is little shelter against the S. and S. W. winds. The village of Cobija consists of about 50 houses of Indians, which are made of seals-skins. The soil being barren, they generally live upon fish, and some Indian wheat and papas, brought from Atacama to exchange for fish. There is but one little rivulet of brackish water, and all the trees are, four palm and two fig; which may serve for a land-mark. There is no grass at all for cattle, so that they are obliged to send their few sheep to a break on top of the mountain, where they find some few sprigs to subsist on. This port, so destitute, has never been frequented by any but French; who, to draw the merchants to them, have sought the nearest places to the mines, the most remote from the king's officers, to facilitate the trade, and the transporting of plate and commodities. This port is the nearest to Lipas, where are silver mines, and to Potofi, which is nevertheless above 100 leagues distant, through a desert country. The desert of Atacama lies between that town and Capiapo, in Chili. The whole country is so hideous and desert, that mules starve for want of grass and water. In 80 leagues length is but one river, which runs but from sun-rising till it sets. The reason may be, that the sun melts the snow, but it freezes again at night. Here are the dreadful mountains that divide Chili from Peru, where the cold is sometimes so excessive that men are frozen to death, though beyond these mountains the country is very temperate.

ATACAMES, a government belonging to Quito, in South-America. It is situated west of the western cordillera of the Andes, and borders upon the corregimientos of Quito, and the town of San Miguel de Ibarra, northward on the department of Barbacoas, in Popayan. To the west it has the South-sea, and southward it joins the territory of Guayaquil. Thus it extends along the coast from the island of Tumaco and the house of Hufmal, which lie in Lat. one and a half N. to the bay of Caracas and the Balsamo mountains, in 34. S. It has a harbour of the same name.

The country of this jurisdiction lay a long time uncultivated; and if not wholly, at least the greatest part of it, unknown. The Indian inhabitants, though Christians by profession, remain in a savageness natural to men who are out of the way of intercourse with the rest of mankind to civilize them.

Though the country of Atacames lay thus neglected for some years, yet the importance of making settlements here, and cultivating the ground, for facilitating the commerce betwixt the provinces of Quito and Terra Firma, was not unknown, as by this means an end would be put to the inconveniences of carrying it on by the way of Guayaquil, which was a great circuit; and, by this settlement in Atacames, the way has been made much shorter for the commerce betwixt Terra Firma and Quito, which now conveniently supplies it with provisions of all kinds, and receives European goods in return.

The towns within the government of Atacames are at present but small and poor, amounting to the number of 20; of these five are on the coasts, and the rest inland. The inhabitants of the first five (among which the town bearing the same name is one) are Spaniards, Mestizos, Negroes, and Casts; which last are a species originated from the other three. Those of the other towns are in general Indians. The spiritual concerns are lodged in 11 priests, who continually reside in the great towns, and occasionally visit the others where there are chapels of ease.

The temperature of the air in Atacames is like that of Guayaquil, producing the same kinds of vegetables, grain, and fruit, though some of these to a much greater perfection; for, by lying higher, it is not subject to inundations: and thus the cocoa here having all the moisture that plant delights in, without being drowned; is much superior to any other in magnitude, oiliness, and delicacy of flavour. It produces also, in great abundance, vanillas, achote, sarsaparilla, and indigo; likewise a deal of wax; and the forests are so thick set with large and lofty tees, of an infinite variety of species, as to be impenetrable.

ATACHTAK, a great promontory, stretching from the continent of America, N. E. of Alakfu, one of the islands of the Northern Archipelago, in the Eastern Ocean. But there is no other proof of there being such a place as this, but the bare mention the natives of Alakfu made of it to the Russians in 1760; but it does not seem at all improbable, as the natives of Alakfu have several articles which are not found on the island, and which are found on the continent.

ATEGUA, a city situated about 16 miles from Corduba, in Spain; which, in the wars between Cæsar and Pompey in that country, being made a place of arms by the latter, Cæsar invested the said city. Dreadful as it is to any place to be made the seat of war! The besieged defended themselves with incredible bravery; but being at length reduced to the utmost extremity, the garrison, which consisted mostly of Romans, resolved to cut the throats of all the inhabitants, set fire to the city, and attempt, by a general sally, to force the enemy's lines, and retire to Cneius Pompey's camp, which was then in sight of the city. The cruel massacre, &c. was put in execution; but the bloody garrison, after having attempted in vain to make their way through Cæsar's camp, were driven back into the town with great slaughter. At length L. Minucius Flaccus, who commanded in the city, surrendered the place upon honourable terms, and put Cæsar in possession of the few magazines which the flames had spared.

ATENA, a town of Italy, in the kingdom of Naples, near the river Negro, 22 miles north of Policastro, and 12 miles north-west of Marisco. Long. 15, 38, E. Lat. 40, 28, N.

ATEY, a small place belonging to the district of Guimaraens, a subdivision of the province of Entre Duoro e Minho, in Portugal. It contains one parish.

ATH, or, as the Flemish spell it, AETH, in Latin Athum, a small, but fine, rich, and well-fortified town of Hainault, in the Austrian Netherlands, and is situated on the river Dender. It is a place of good trade for linen, which is manufactured here. It has a college of secular priests, who teach polite literature, and several convents of monks and nuns, with an abbey of the latter, who are of the Cistercian order.

In 1667 the place was taken by the French, and Vauban fortified it. By the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle, the following year, it was ceded to them; but, by the peace of Nimeguen, in 1678, it was restored to the Spaniards. Marshal de Catinat besieged it again in 1697, when count de Rœux capitulated upon honourable terms, after 13 days open trenches: but, by the treaty of Ryfwick, the same year, it was given again to the Spaniards. Upon the death of Charles II. of Spain, in 1700, the French seized it again; but the allies under field-marshal D'Owerkerke investing it in September 1706, count de St. Pierre, the governor, was obliged to surrender prisoner of war, with his whole garrison. The Dutch kept it till 1716, when it was given to the troops of the house of Austria, who are still in possession of it. It lies 12 miles N. W. of Mons, in Lat. 50, 45, N. Long. 3, 40, E.

ATHBOY, or ABOY, a populous borough-town of East-Meath, a county belonging to the province of Leinster, in Ireland. It has the privilege of a market, and sends two members to the Irish parliament.

ATHDORA, according to Busching, but the Geographical System calls it Adare, and our maps Adair, is a little town in the county of Limerick and province of Munster, in Ireland. Formerly it was fortified. It is situated on the river Mage, a little above its influx into the Shannon.

ATHELNEY, formerly ÆTHELING, i. e. an island of nobles. It is a river-isle, of Somersetshire, formed at the junction of the Parret with the Thone. It is remarkable in antiquity as the hiding-place of the Saxon king Alfred, with a few of his nobles, when the Danes had over-run all the country to the forest of Sherwood. The neighbouring lakes and marshes indeed rendered it inaccessible, the firm ground there not exceeding two acres in breadth: and on this he afterwards built a monastery of Benedictines, in memory of his retirement; the foundations of which were discovered in 1674 by some labourers, who, among other remains, met with the bases of church-pillars, and one grave near 8 feet long, with human bones proportionable to that dimension. Alfred and his nobles having nothing to subsist on here, but what they took by fishing and fowling, discovered the lonely cottage of a poor swine-herd, by whom his majesty, then unknown, was entertained with such mean fare as he and his wife could procure him: for which hospitality the king procured him learning, and made him bishop of Winchester. Bishop Godwin, in his Lives of the Bishops, informs us, that the swine-herd and his wife began to be tired of Alfred, he not being handy enough; so that having been once set to watch some cakes, that were baking before the fire, he let them burn; for which negligence his dame sharply reproved him.

A few years ago was found near this place, a sort of picture or medal of St. Cuthbert, with a Saxon inscription, importing, that it was made by king Alfred's order: and as its form shewed that it hung upon a string, it is conjectured, that he wore it as an amulet, or at least in veneration of that saint, who, it is reported, according to the superstition of those times, appeared to him in his troubles, assuring him of his future victories over the Danes: accordingly the first which he gained was at Edin-don, in Wilts, where he took their king, and made him a Christian.

ATHENE, a small place of the Hither Principate, in the kingdom of Naples, and lower division of Italy. It has the title of a principality.

ATHENOPOLIS, a town of the Massilienses, an ancient nation of Gaul. It is conjectured by Harduin to be the same with Telo Martius, now Toulon; by others to be the same with Antipolis or Antibes.

ATHENREE, commonly so called for ATE-RITH, an ancient borough in the county of Gall-way, and province of Connaught, in Ireland. It was once walled, but now decayed, and thinly peopled: and here the Pedicant Friars had a church, containing several monuments of the bishops of Kilmacough, and others. It gives the title of baron to the descendant from the Birminghams, and has barracks for three companies of foot. It sends two members to the Irish parliament, and lies 10 miles E. of Gallway, in lat. 53. 14, N. Long. 8. 50, W.

ATHENS, in Latin Athenæ, still retains its ancient name. It belongs to Achaia, now Livadia, one of the provinces of Turkey in Europe. By modern geographers it is most corruptly called in their maps Saithenes, Setines, or Satines. This city is situated almost in the middle of a large plain; the deficiency of which in fertility, is compensated by its salubrity and beauty. It is about 25 miles distant from Thebes to the S. E. 28 from Negropont to the S. 35 from the isthmus of Corinth to the E. and about as many S. W. from Cape Raphti, the most eastern land of Achaia. It is still the capital of Attica, and it has been from time immemorial; and it is so much celebrated in antiquity, that some account of the history of that city will here be no doubt acceptable. The fame of Athens is so great, that few cities in the world can pretend to equal her, much less dispute precedence with her. For whether you consider her antiquity, the valour, power, and learning of her inhabitants, or any other quality that may render any place more illustrious and renowned in the world, she still seems triumphant; neither has any city had a larger share in good and bad fortune than Athens. Her people owned no original but the earth they inhabited, and scarce allowed the sun to have an earlier date than they; nor would they acknowledge to have received their name from any but their principal goddess Minerva, whom they called Athæna. They planted several colonies, to which they gave names and laws; and Meursius reckons to the number of 40. But the less credulous among them, and the most judicious historians, agree, that Cecrops being the first who reduced the inhabitants of Attica, the offspring of the Carians and Aonians, under political government, did at the same time advance himself to be their king. His dominions comprehended all within the mountains of Gerania, Oenoe, Parnes, and Lycabætus; that is, from the isthmus of Corinth to Oropus, now Ropo, or Oropo, near the river Afopus, which falls into the straits of Negropont, about 10 miles S. from a city of that name. And he chose this rock which was situated in a large plain, and near the middle of the country, as the most convenient place for building the metropolis of this kingdom, calling it and the whole territory by his own name Cecropia; having been called before his time Attica, and also Ionia, from Ion, the son of Xanthus. This is supposed to have happened not long after Deucalion's flood, 830 years before the building of Rome, and about 1580 years before the Christian æra; to which the time since elapsed being added, viz. 1782, it will be 3362 years since Athens was first built.

Cecrops divided his kingdom into 12 principal cities; and was the author of many excellent laws and constitutions, especially with regard to marriage; for which reason they represented him like Janus with two faces, and but one head, denoting that the union between man and wife was such, that they constituted only one being with different aspects. Each of these 12 cities had courts of judicature and magistrates of their own; and were so little subject to their princes, that they seldom or never consulted them, except in cases of some imminent and public danger.

Athens continued a monarchy about 550 years, till the death of Codrus the 17th king, who, for the safety of his country, and in obedience to the oracle, devoted himself.

For 600 years after, the Athenians were governed by magistrates called Archoates: these were at first appointed for life, then changed every ten years, and afterwards annually. Under these they very valiantly defended their liberty and their borders for the space of 534 years, till the tyrant Pisistratus seized on the government. But after 40 years his family was banished by Calisthenes Alcmaeonides, who became Archon. After this they had war with the Persians; and routed the numerous armies of Darius and Xerxes, and that with inconsiderable numbers, numbers, under the conduct of Miltiades and Themistocles, at land, in their victory of Marathon, obtained against a million of men, of which not 50,000 escaped; and by sea in the fight at Salamis against Xerxes' fleet. But in their wars with the Lacedæmonians, these took Athens, and imposed 30 tyrants as governors over the people. Thrasybulus however soon delivered them from this disgraceful condition; and at last, by the help of the Thebans under Epaminondas, they so subdued the Lacedæmonians, at the battle of Leuctra, that they could never recover themselves again: so that the Athenians became masters of the Ægean sea, and the greatest part of the isles in it; going on conquerors even to the borders of Egypt, and had 1000 cities under them. They held the sovereignty of Greece for 70 years; but kept it no longer, because the Lacedæmonians and Thebans stirred up factions in Greece against them; at which time, however, the Eleutherians voluntarily joined themselves to the Athenians. But at length a general peace was concluded: after which the Athenians soon began to slight the virtue of their ancestors, and gave themselves over to luxury and idleness. This degenerate disposition soon gave the Macedonians an opportunity of advancing their monarchy over all Greece; a scheme projected by Philip of Macedon, and perfected by his son Alexander the Great. Philip broke their power at sea, and took from them the Ægean islands, as did Alexander what they still possessed on the continent, and even restrained them from speaking at their public meetings. After his death they in vain attempted to recover their liberty,

Of the history of Athens, from the reign of Philip of Macedon and his son Alexander to the present time, the following elegant abridgement is given from Dr. Chandler: "On the death of Alexander the Athenians revolted, but were defeated by Antipater, who garrisoned Munychia. They rebelled again, but the garrison and oligarchy were reinstated. Demetrius the Phalerean, who was made governor, beautified the city, and they erected to him 360 statues; which on his expulsion they demolished, except one in the Acropolis. Demetrius Poliorcetes withdrew the garrison and restored the democracy; when they deified him, and lodged him in the Opisthodomos, or back of the Parthenon, as a guest to be entertained by their goddess Minerva. Afterwards they decreed that the Piræus, with Munychia, should be at his disposal, and he took the museum. They expelled his garrison, and he was persuaded by Craterus a philosopher to leave them free. Antigonus Gonatas, the next king, maintained a garrison in Athens; but on the death of his son Demetrius the people, with the assistance of Aratus, regained their liberty, and the Piræus, Munychia, Salamis, and Sunium, on paying a sum of money.

"Philip, son of Demetrius, encamping near the city, destroying and burning the sepulchres and temples in the villages, and laying their territory waste, the Athenians were reduced to solicit protection from the Romans, and to receive a garrison, which remained until the war with Mithridates king of Pontus, when the tyrant Aristion made them revolt.

"Archelaus, the Athenian general, unable to withstand the Roman fury, relinquished the long walls, and retreated into the Piræus and Munychia. Sylla laid siege to the Piræus, and to the city, in which Aristion commanded. He was informed that some persons had been overheard talking in the Ceramicus, and blaming Aristion for his neglect of the avenues about the Heptachalcos, where the wall was accessible. Sylla resolved to storm there, and about midnight entered the town at the gate called Dipylon or the Piræan, having levelled all obstacles in the way between it and the gate of the Piræus. Aristion fled to the Acropolis, but was compelled to surrender by the want of water; when he was dragged from the temple of Minerva, and put to death. Sylla burned the Piræus and Munychia, and defaced the city and suburbs, not sparing even the sepulchres.

"In the civil war the Athenians took the side of Pompey. Cæsar generously refused to punish the city, which afterwards caressed his murderers. They next joined Antony, who gave them Ægina and Cea, with other islands. Augustus was unkind to them; and they revolted four years before he died. Under Tiberius the city was declining, but free, and regarded as an ally of the Romans. The high privilege of having a lictor to precede the magistrates was conferred on it by Germanicus; but he was censured as treating with too much condescension a mixture of nations, instead of genuine Athenians, which race was then considered as extinct. The emperor Vespasian reduced Achaia to a province, paying tribute and governed by a proconsul. Nerva was more propitious to the Athenians; and Pliny, under Trajan his successor, exhorts Maximus to be mindful whither he was sent, to rule genuine Greece, a state composed of free cities. 'You will revere the gods and heroes their founders; you will respect their pristine glory, and even their age; you will honour them for the famous deeds which are truly, nay, for those which are fabulously, recorded of them. Remember it is Athens you approach.' This city was now entirely dependent on Rome, and was reduced to sell Delos, and the islands in its possession.

"Hadrian, who was at once emperor and an archon of Athens, gave the city laws, compiled from Draco,

A T

Draco, Solon, and the codes of other legislators, and displayed his affection for it by unbounded liberality. Athens re-flourished, and its beauty was renewed. Antoninus Pius, who succeeded, and Antoninus the philosopher, were both benefactors. The barbarians, in the reign of Valerian, besieging Thessalonica, all Greece was terrified, and the Athenians restored their city-wall, which had been dismantled by Sylla, and afterwards neglected.

"Under the next emperor, who was the archon Gallienus, Athens was besieged; the archontic office ceased, and the strategus or general, who had before acted as overseer of the agora or market, then became the supreme magistrate. Under Claudius, his successor, the city was taken, but soon recovered. It is related that Constantine, when emperor, gloried in the title of general of Athens, and rejoiced exceedingly on obtaining from the people the honour of a statue with an inscription, which he acknowledged by a yearly gratuity of many bushels of grain. He conferred on the governor of Attica and Athens the title of grand duke. That office was at first annual, but afterwards hereditary. His son Constans bestowed several islands on the city, to supply it with corn.

"In the time of Theodosius the First, 380 years after Christ, the Goths laid waste to Thessaly and Epirus; but Theodore, general of the Achæans, by his prudent conduct preserved the cities of Greece from pillage, and the inhabitants from being led into captivity. A statue of marble was erected to him at Athens, by order of the city, and afterwards one of brass, by command of the emperor, as appears from an inscription in a church dedicated to a saint of the same name, not far from the French convent. It is on a round pedestal, which supports a flat stone, serving for the holy table. Eudocia, the wife of Theodosius the Second, was an Athenian.

"The fatal period now approached, and Athens was about to experience a conqueror more savage even than Sylla. This was Alaric king of the Goths, who, under the emperors Arcadius and Honorius, over-ran Greece and Italy, sacking, pillaging, and destroying. Then the Peloponnesian towns were overturned, Arcadia and Lacedæmon were laid waste, and two seas by the isthmus were burnished by the flames of Corinth, and the Athenian matrons were dragged in chains by barbarians. The invaluable treasures of antiquity, it is related, were removed; the stately and magnificent structures converted into piles of ruin; and Athens was stripped of every thing splendid or remarkable. Synesius, a writer of that age, compares the city to a victim, of which the body had been consumed, and the hide only remained.

"After this event, Athens became an unimportant place, and as obscure as it once had been famous. We read that the cities of Hellas were put into a state of defence by Justinian, who repaired the walls, which at Corinth had been subverted by an earthquake, and at Athens and in Bœotia were impaired by age; and here we take a long farewell of this city. A chasm of near 700 years ensues in its history, except that, about the year 1130, it furnished Roger, the first king of Sicily, with a number of artificers, whom he settled at Palermo, where they introduced the culture of silk, which then passed into Italy. The worms had been brought from India to Constantinople in the reign of Justinian.

"Athens, as it were, re-emerges from oblivion in the 13th century, under Baldwin, but besieged by a general of Theodorus Lascaris, the Greek emperor. It was taken in 1427 by sultan Morat. Boniface, marquis of Montferrat, possessed it with a garrison; after whom it was governed by Delves, of the house of Arragon. On his death it was seized, with Macedonia, Thessaly, Bœotia, Phocis, and the Peloponnesus, by Bajazet: and then, with the island Zante, by the Spaniards of Catalonia, in the reign of the Greek emperor Andronicus Palæologus the elder. These were dispossessed by Reinecius Acciaioli, a Florentine; who, leaving no legitimate male issue, bequeathed it to the state of Venice. His natural son, Antony, to whom he had given Thebes with Bœotia, expelled the Venetians. He was succeeded in the dukedom by his kinsman Nerius, who was displaced by his own brother, named Antony, but recovered the government when he died. Nerius, leaving only an infant son, was succeeded by his wife. She was ejected by Mahomet on a complaint from Francus, son of the second Antony, who confined her at Megara and made away with her; but, her son accusing him to Mahomet the Second, the Turkish army under Omar advanced, and he surrendered the citadel in 1455; the Latins refusing to succour him unless the Athenians would embrace their religious tenets. Mahomet, it is related, when he had finished the war with the despot of the Morea, four years after, surveyed the city and Aeropolis with admiration. The janizaries informed him of a conspiracy; and Francus Acciaioli, who remained lord of Bœotia, was put to death. In 1464 the Venetians landed at the Piræus, surprised the city, and carried off their plunder and captives to Eubœa.

"It is remarkable, that after these events Athens was again in a manner forgotten. So lately as about the middle of the 16th century, the city was commonly believed to have been utterly destroyed, and not to exist, except a few huts of poor fishermen. Crusius, a learned and inquisitive German, procured more authentic information from his Greek correspondents residing in Turkey, which he published in 1584, to awaken curiosity.

riosity and to promote farther discoveries. One of these letters is from a native of Nauplia, a town near Argos in the Morea. This writer says, that he had been often at Athens, and that it still contained many things worthy to be seen, some of which he enumerates, and then subjoins, "But why do I dwell on this place? It is as the skin of an animal, which has been long dead."

It now remains to give some idea of the character, government, and religion of this once so famous people.

The Athenians, says Plutarch, are very subject to violent anger; but they are soon pacified. They are likewise easily impressed with humanity and compassion. That this was their temper, is proved by many historical examples. We shall produce a few: the sentence of death pronounced against the inhabitants of Mytelene, and revoked the next day: the condemnation of Socrates, and that of the 10 chiefs, each followed by quick repentance and most pungent grief.

The minds of the same people, adds Plutarch, are not formed for laborious researches. They seize a subject, as it were by intuition; they have not patience and phlegm enough to examine it gradually and minutely. This part of their character may seem surprising and incredible. Artisans, and other people of their rank, are in general slow of comprehension. But the Athenians of every degree were endowed with an inconceivable vivacity, penetration, and delicacy of taste. Even the Athenian soldiers could repeat the fine passages of the tragedies of Euripides. Those artisans and those soldiers assisted at public debates, were bred to political affairs, and were equally acute in apprehension and in judgement. We may infer the understanding of the hearers of Demosthenes from the genius of his orations, which were laconic and poignant.

As their inclination, continues Plutarch, leads them to assist and support people of low condition, they like discourse seasoned with pleasantry, and productive of mirth. The Athenians patronize people of low degree; because from them their liberty is in no danger, and because such patronage tends to support a democratical constitution. They love pleasantry; which turn of mind proves that they are a humane social people, who have a taste for raillery and wit, and are not soured with that reserve which marks the despot and the slave.

They take pleasure in hearing themselves praised; but they can likewise patiently bear raillery and censure. We know with what art and success Aristophanes and Demosthenes applied their praise and their irony to the Athenian people. When the republic enjoyed peace, says the same Plutarch in another place, it encouraged the adulation of its orators: but when it had important affairs to discuss, when the state was in danger, it became serious; and preferred, to its eloquent sycophants, the honest orators who opposed its follies and its vices; such ingenious and bold patriots as a Pericles, a Phocian, and a Demosthenes.

The Athenians, continues Plutarch, often make their governors tremble, and shew great humanity to their enemies. They were very attentive to the information and instruction of those citizens who were most eminent for their policy and eloquence; but they were on their guard against the superiority of their talents, they often checked their boldness, and repressed their exuberant reputation and glory. That this was their temper, we are convinced by the ostracism; which was established to restrain the ambition of those who had great talents and influence, and which spared neither the greatest nor the best men. The detestation of tyranny and of tyrants, which was inherent in the Athenians, rendered them extremely jealous of their privileges, and made them zealous and active in defence of their liberty, whenever they thought it was violated by men in power.

As to their enemies, they did not treat them with rigour. They did not abuse victory by a brutal inhumanity to the vanquished. The act of amnesty, which they passed after the usurpation of the 30 tyrants, proves that they could easily forgive injuries. It was this mildness, this humanity of disposition, which made the Athenians so attentive to the rules of politeness and decorum. In their war with Philip, having seized one of his couriers, they read all the letters he bore, except one from Olympias to her husband, which they sent back unopened. Such was their veneration of love and conjugal secrecy; those sacred rights which no enmity, no hostility, warrants us to violate!

The taste of the Athenians for all the arts and sciences is too well known to need a particular relation. The views of conquest cherished by a small republic, were extensive and astonishing; but this people, so great, so ambitious in their projects, were, in other respects, of a different character. In the expences of the table, in dress, in furniture, in houses, in short, in private life, they were frugal, simple, modest, poor; but sumptuous and magnificent whenever the honour of the state was concerned. Their conquests, their victories, their riches, their connections with the inhabitants of Asia Minor, never reduced them to luxury, to riot, to pomp, to profusion. Xenophon remarks, that a citizen was not distinguished from a slave by his dress. The wealthiest citizen, the most renowned general, was not ashamed to go himself to market.

We shall finish this picture of the Athenians by the addition of one object more, to which every one will admit they have a right; an object which was prominent and striking in all their actions and in all their enterprizes: we mean their ardent love of liberty. This was their predominant quality; the main spring of their government. From the beginning of the Persian war they sacrificed every thing to the liberty of Greece. They left, without hesitation, their cities, their houses, to fight at sea the common enemy, from whom they were in danger of servitude. What a glorious day was it for Athens, when all her allies, growing flexible to the advantageous offers which were made to them by the king of Persia, she replied by Aristides, to the ambassadors of that monarch, "That it was impossible for all the gold in the world to tempt the republic of Athens: to prevail with her to sell her liberty, and that of Greece." It was by these generous sentiments that the Athenians not only became the bulwark of Greece, but likewise guarded the rest of Europe from a Persian invasion. These great qualities were blended with great failings, seemingly incompatible with patriotism. For the Athenians, notwithstanding their tenacious jealousy of the rights of their country, were a volatile, inconsistent, capricious people.

There never was a people more attentive to the worship of the gods than the Athenians. The worship of their principal deities was diffused over all Greece, and even beyond its limits. Each temple had its particular religious rites: the pomp, the ceremonies, the duration, and the succession of the solemn feasts, were all appointed by fixed rules. The worship paid to each divinity, whether public or private, was founded on traditions, or on laws constantly obeyed. The feast of Bacchus, the Panathenæa, the feast of the mysteries of Eleusis, were celebrated according to established rules, most of which were as ancient as the feasts themselves. The old customs, of which the priests were the guardians, were observed in the temples. It is probable that the priests were consulted on affairs in which the worship of a deity was interested, and that their answer was decisive. We are certain that the Eumolpidæ had this authority. They were the interpreters of the ancient laws on which the worship of Ceres was founded, its magnificence, and its mode—laws which were not written, as Lycias informs us, but were perpetuated by a constant observation. The abuses which had gradually crept into the celebration of those feasts, had given rise to several new regulations; to that of the orator Lycurgus, for example, and to the law of Solon, which enjoined the senate to repair to Eleusis on the second day of the feast: but neither these nor the other particular regulations which we find in Samuel Petit's Collection of Attic Laws, could make a religious code. There was no general system which comprehended all the branches of their religion, which, by combining all its articles, might regulate their belief and conduct, and direct the judges in their decisions.

Crimes against religion were only punished as they affected the state; and consequently they were tried by the magistrates. Mere raillery, though somewhat profane, was thought productive of no worse consequence than offending the ministers of the gods. The Athenians acknowledged no other religion than the hereditary public worship; no other gods than those they had received from their ancestors; no other ceremonies than those which had been established by the laws of the state, and practised by their country from time immemorial. They were only solicitous to preserve this worship, which was closely interwoven with their government, and made a part of its policy. They were likewise attentive to the ceremonial pomp: because order, the regular vigour of legislation, depends greatly on the awe impressed by externals. But as to the inconsistent and monstrous romance of fables, foreign opinions, popular traditions, and poetical fictions, which formed a religion quite different from that of the state, in it they were very little interested, and allowed every one to think of it as he pleased. This explanation will reconcile a seeming contradiction in the conduct of the Athenians, who gave great licence to their poets, and severely punished the citizens who were guilty of impiety. Aristophanes, who made as free with the gods as with the great, was applauded by the Athenians. They condemned Socrates to death, who revered the deity, but disapproved the public manner of worshipping him. The life of Æschylus was in danger from a suspicion that he had revealed some of the secrets of Eleusis in one of his pieces. The wit of Aristophanes' drama was unpunished.

The priests were not confined to the care of the altars; they who were vested with the sacerdotal dignity, which was only incompatible with professions merely useful and lucrative, might likewise hold the most important offices of the commonwealth. This we could prove by a great number of examples; we shall cite that of Xenophon, the illustrious historian and philosopher: he was likewise a famous general, and he was a priest. He was performing the sacerdotal function when he received the news of his son's death, who was killed at the battle of Mantinea. The sacred ministry was not only compatible with civil offices, but likewise with the profession of arms. The priest and the soldier were often blended. Callias, the priest of Ceres, fought at Platæa. This custom was not peculiar to the Athenians. The Lacedæmonians, after the battle which we have just mentioned, made three graves for their slain; one for the priests, one for the other Spartans, and one for the Helots.

As every mean employment was incompatible with the sacerdotal dignity, the priests had a revenue fixed to their office. We know that a part of the victims was their right, and that apartments were assigned them near the temples. But, beside these advantages, they had a salary proportioned to the dignity of their functions and to the rank of the deities whom they served. Their salary was probably paid from the revenue of the temples. Those revenues, which kept the temples in repair, and defrayed the sacrificial expences, were very considerable. They were of many different kinds. A great part of the sacred revenues arose from fines, which individuals were condemned to pay for various offences; fines, of which the tenth part was appropriated to Minerva Polias, and the sixth to the other gods and to the heroes whose names their tribes bore. Besides, if the Prytanes did not hold the assemblies conformably with the laws, they were obliged to pay a fine of 1000 drachms to the goddess. If the Proedri, i. e. the senators whose office it was to lay before the assembly the matters on which they were to deliberate, did not discharge that duty according to the rules prescribed to them, they were likewise condemned to pay a fine, which, as the former, was applied to the use of Minerva. By these fines her temple must have been greatly enriched.

Besides this revenue, which was the common property of the gods, and which varied according to the number and degrees of the misdemeanors, the temples had their permanent revenues: we mean the produce of the lands which were consecrated to the deities. We do not here allude to the lands consecrated to the gods, which were never to be cultivated; such as the territory of Cirrha, prescribed by a solemn decree of the Amphictyons; the land betwixt Megara and Attica, which was consecrated to the goddesses of Eleusis, and many others. We would speak only of those which were cultivated, the fruits of which enriched the temples. There were likewise lands belonging to the state, the produce of which was destined to defray the expence of the sacrifices which were offered in the name of the republic. There were likewise first-fruits which the public officers levied on all lands, for the use of the gods. All these emoluments made a part of the revenue of the temples. The gods, beside the revenues immediately appertaining to their temples, had certain rights which were granted them by particular compact. The Lepreatæ, for instance, were obliged to pay every year a talent to Olympian Jupiter, on account of a treaty of alliance which they made with the Eleans in one of their wars. The inhabitants of Epidaurus, to obtain leave from the Athenians to cut down olive-trees for statues, which the Pythian priestess had commanded them to make, engaged to send deputies every year to Athens, to offer sacrifices in their name to Minerva and to Neptune. But this prerogative was rather honorary than lucrative.

The 10th part of the spoils taken in war was likewise the property of Minerva. Sacred vessels were bought with the effects of the 30 tyrants. In short, the gods were profited by almost every public accident. But what contributed most to enrich the famous temples of Greece, was the money which was constantly brought to them by individuals, in consequence of vows they had made, or to pay for sacrifices which were offered in their names. The credulity of the people was an inexhaustible fund. That credulity enriched the temples of Delphi and Eleusis, and supported the magnificence of Delphi. And those immense treasures, which were the fruit of superstition, were often a prey to avarice. These revenues were not deposited with the priests; nor did they expend them. A moderate salary was all their gain; and to offer sacrifices to the deities whose ministers they were, was all their employment.

It is very probable that all the sacred revenues were paid into the hands of officers who were appointed to receive them, and who were to give an account of the discharge of their trust. Nay we cannot doubt of this, after reading a passage in Aristotle, who, speaking of the officers of the temples, expressly mentions those who were entrusted with the money appertaining to the gods. Citizens, without doubt, of approved integrity, were chosen to this office; and their duty must have been, to keep the temples in repair and order, and to disburse and keep an account of the ordinary sacred expences. As to the solemn feasts, which were incredibly magnificent, such as the feast of Bacchus, and the Panathenæa, they were celebrated at the expence of the Choregus; i. e. of the chief of the choir of each tribe: for each tribe had its poet and its musicians, who sung, emulating each other, hymns in honour of the deity. The richest citizens were appointed chiefs of the different choirs; and as their office was very expensive, to indemnify them in some degree, the Choregus of the victorious tribe had the privilege of engraving his name on the tripod which that tribe suspended to the roof of the temple. This office, though ruinous, was eagerly solicited; and naturally, in a republican state. It led to honours, like the Curule dignity at Rome; and it greatly tended to ingratiate its possessor with a people who were more affected with pleasures than with essential services, and who, consequently, would more highly esteem a profuse Choregus than a victorious general.

With regard to the fines, which were in the whole, or in part, the property of Minerva and of the other deities, there were at Athens public treasurers appointed to receive them. They were ten in number, and they were nominated by lot. They were called Treasurers of the Goddesses, or Receivers of the sacred money. That money they received received in the presence of the senate; and they were empowered to diminish or to annihilate the fine, if they thought it unjust. The statue of Minerva, that of the victories, and the other invaluable pledges of duration of the state, were deposited with them.

The treasury, in which the money consecrated to the gods was kept, was in the citadel, behind the temple of Minerva Polias; and from its situation it was termed Opistodomus. It was surrounded with a double wall. It had but one door, the key of which was kept by the epistates, or chief of the Prytanes: his dignity was very considerable; but it lasted only one day. In this treasury a register was kept, in which were written the names of all those who were indebted to the state: he who owed the smallest fine was not omitted. If the debtors proved insolvent, they were prosecuted with extreme rigour, and often punished with a cruelty which religion could not excuse; though the interest of the gods was the motive, or rather the pretext. The sacred treasurers held a considerable rank among the magistrates, who received the public finances. Of these magistrates there were many kinds, as there were many sorts of revenues.

The Athenian priests did not compose an order distinct and separate from the other orders of the state. They did not form a body united by particular laws, under a chief, whose authority extended to all his inferiors. The dignity of sovereign pontiff was unknown at Athens; and each of the priests served his particular temple, unconnected with his brethren. The temples, indeed, of the principal deities; those of Minerva, for instance, of Neptune, of Ceres, and of Proserpine, had many ministers; and in each of them a chief presided, who had the title of High-priest. The number of subaltern ministers was in proportion to the rank of the deity; but the priests of one temple were altogether a separate society from those of another. Thus at Athens there was a great number of high-priests, because many deities were worshipped there, whose service required many ministers. The power of each priest was confined to his temple; and there was no sovereign pontiff, the minister-general of the gods, and the president at all the feasts.

It naturally follows from this account, that the ministers of the gods at Athens were not judges in matters of religion. They were neither authorised to take cognisance of crimes committed against the deity, nor to punish them. Their function was to offer sacrifices to the gods, and to intreat their acceptance of the adorations of the people. But the punishment of impiety, of sacrilege, of the profanation of mysteries, and of other irreligious crimes, was not entrusted to their zeal.

The priests were not only incapable of avenging crimes against religion by a temporal process; they even could not, without an express order either from the senate or the people, exercise their right of devoting criminals to the infernal gods. It was in consequence of a civil sentence pronounced against Alcibiades, that the Eumolpidae launched their anathema against him. It was in virtue of another decree that they revoked their imprecations, when his countrymen wanted his service, and therefore restored him to their favour.

Religious causes, according to M. de Bougainville, fell under the jurisdiction of the Heliastæ. The government, though often altered, continued pretty much on the plan established by Solon.

The people of Athens were freemen, sojourners, or slaves. The citizens, called in Greek Politai, were very numerous; but, what may seem strange, were as many in the time of Cecrops as in the most flourishing state of the common-wealth, hardly ever exceeding 20,000. It was Solon who decreed that none should be accounted free, but such as were Athenians both by father and mother. After his time it fell into desuetude, till revived by Pericles, and again at his instance repealed. After the expulsion of the 30 tyrants, Solon's law was restored. A person born of a stranger was stiled Nothos, a bastard; whereas the son of a free woman was called Cnesios, i. e. legitimate. There was in Cynosarges a court of judicature, to which causes of illegitimacy properly belonged; and the utmost care was taken to prevent any from being inrolled Athenian citizens, who had not a clear title thereto. The citizens were divided by Cecrops into four tribes: the first called Cecropes, from Cecrops; the second, Atochton, from a king of that name; the third Actai, from Acteus another king of Athens, or rather from Acte, which signifies a shore; the fourth, Puralia: these names were altered by Cranaus, and again by Erichonius. In the reign of Erichonius they were again changed; the soldiers were called Oplitai, the craftsmen Ergatai, the farmers Georgoi, the graziers and shepherds Aigicorai: in this state they were when Solon settled the common-wealth, and appointed the senate to be composed of 400, one hundred out of each tribe. Clisthenes increased the number of the tribes to 10; and made the senate consist of 500, taking 50 out of each tribe. In succeeding times two other tribes were added: each tribe was subdivided into its Demoi, or wards; and with respect to these it was that Solon instituted the public feasts before-mentioned, at which sometimes the whole tribe assembled, sometimes several wards, and sometimes only the inhabitants of one ward.

The second sort of inhabitants we mentioned were called Metoicoi, i. e. sojourners; these were persons who lived always at Athens, yet were not admitted free denizens; as for such as did not constantly reside in Athens, they were stiled Xenoi, i. e. strangers. The sojourners were obliged to choose out of the citizens protectors, who were filed Patrons: they paid services to the state, and besides these an annual tribute of 12 drachms for every man and six for every woman; but such as had sons, and paid for them, were exempted. If people fell to poverty and were not able to pay the tribute, they were seized by the tax-masters, and actually sold for slaves; which, as Diogenes Laertius tells us, was the fate of Xenocrates the philosopher. The sojourners in Attica were under the same law as those in Athens. As to servants they were freemen, who through indigency were driven to receive wages, and while they were in this state had no vote in the assembly. As to slaves, they were absolutely the property of their masters, and as such were used as they thought fit: they were forbidden to wear clothes, or to cut their hair like their masters; and, which is indeed amazing, Solon prohibited them to love boys, as if that had been honourable: they were likewise debarred from anointing or perfuming themselves, and from worshipping certain deities: they were not allowed to be called by honourable names; and in most other respects were used like dogs. They stigmatized them at their pleasure; that is, branded them with letters in the forehead and elsewhere. However, Theseus's temple was allowed them as a sanctuary, whither, if they were exceedingly ill used, they might fly, and thereby oblige their owners to let them be transferred to another master. In this, and many other respects, the Athenian slaves were in a much better condition than those throughout the rest of Greece: they were permitted to get estates for themselves, giving a small premium to their masters, who were obliged to make them free, if they could pay their ransom; they likewise obtained the same favour from the kindness of their masters, or for having rendered military services to the state. When they were made free they were obliged to choose patrons; and had likewise the privilege of choosing a curator, who, in case their patrons injured them, was bound to defend them.

The general assembly of the people, which Solon made the dernier resort, was called the Ecclesia; and consisted of all the freemen of Athens, excepting such as were atimoi, or infamous. The meetings of these assemblies were either ordinary or extraordinary. The ordinary were such as were appointed by law, the extraordinary such as necessity required. Of the first there were four in 35 days. In the first assembly they approved or rejected magistrates, heard proposals for the public good, and certain causes. In the second they received petitions, and heard every man's judgment on the matters that were before them. In the third they gave audience to foreign ambassadors. The fourth was employed altogether in affairs relating to the gods and their worship. The extraordinary meetings were appointed by the magistrates when occasion required, whereas to the ordinary assemblies the people came of their own accord. The first were held either in the market-place, in the Pnyx, a place near the citadel, or in the theatre of Bacchus; as to the latter, the magistrates who appointed the extraordinary meetings appointed also the place where they should be held. If any sudden tempest arose, or any earthquake happened, or any sign notoriously inauspicious appeared, the assembly immediately adjourned, to prevent the people from apprehending unhappy consequences from their deliberations. But if the weather was fair and serene, and nothing happened out of the ordinary course of things, they proceeded to purify the place where the assembly was held, which was done by sprinkling it round with the blood of young pigs; then the crier made a solemn prayer for the prosperity of the republic, and that Heaven would bestow a happy issue on their counsels and undertakings; he then pronounced a bitter execration against any who should in that assembly propound what might be disadvantageous to the state. These ceremonies being over they proceeded to business.

There were several magistrates who had the overseeing and regulating these assemblies. These were, first, the Epistate, or president of the assembly, who was chosen by lot out of the Proedri: his office was to give the signal for the people's voting. Next to him were the Prytanes, i. e. a committee of the senate, who of course were present on this occasion; by their order a programme, or scheme of the business to be proposed at the assembly, was previously set up in some public place, that every man might know what business to apply his thoughts to. The Proedri were nine in number, appointed by lot out of all the tribes to which the Prytanes did not belong: They had the right of proposing to the people what they were to deliberate upon, and their office ended with the assembly; there sat with them assessors, who were to take care that nothing they proposed was detrimental to the commonwealth. The first step to business was the crier's reading the decree of the senate whereon the assembly was to deliberate: when he had finished this he made proclamation in these words; "Who of the men above fifty will make an oration?" When the old men had done speaking, the crier made proclamation again that any Athenian might then offer his sentiments whom the law allowed so to do; that is, all such as were above 30 years old, and were not infamous. If such a one rose up to speak, the Prytanes interposed, and bid him be silent; and if he did not obey them, the lictors pulled him down by force. When the debates were over, the president permitted the people to vote; which they did by casting first beans, but in after-times pebbles, into certain vessels: these were counted, and then it was declared that the decree of the senate was either rejected or approved; after which the Prytanes dismissed the assembly.

The senate was instituted by Solon to prevent the dangerous consequences of leaving the supreme power in the people. At the time of his institution it was to consist of 400, 100 out of each tribe; it was increased to 500 when the tribes were augmented to 10; and when they came to 12 it was also swelled to 600. They were elected by lots after this manner: at a day appointed, towards the close of the year, the president of each tribe gave in a list of such persons belonging thereto as were fit for and desired to appear for this dignity: these names were engraven on tablets of brass, and a number of beans equal to the number of the amount of them, among which were 100 white ones, put into a vessel; and then the names of the candidates and the beans were drawn one by one, and such as were drawn by the white beans were received into the senate. After the senate was elected they proceeded to appoint the officers who were to preside in the senate: these were the Prytanes before-mentioned, and they were elected thus: the names of the 10 tribes were thrown into one vessel, and 9 black beans and a white one into another vessel. Then the names of the tribes were drawn with the beans. The tribe to which the white bean answered presided first, and the rest according to the order in which they were drawn.

The Prytanes, while the senate consisted of 500, were 50 in number. For the farther avoiding of confusion therefore, 10 of these presided a week, during which space they were called Proedri, and out of these an Epistate or president was chosen, whose office lasted but one day, and by law no man could hold it more than once: the reason of this was, that he had in his custody the public seal, the keys of the citadel, and the charge of the exchequer. The reader must distinguish between the Epistates and Proedri last mentioned, and those spoken of in the former paragraph; because, though their titles were the same, their offices were perfectly distinct. The senate assembled by direction of the Prytanes once every day, excepting festivals, and sometimes oftener, in the senate-house, which was thence called Prytaneum.

When a member of the senate made a motion for a new law, it was immediately engraven on tablets, that the members when they came next might be prepared to speak to it. At the subsequent assembly the Epistates opened the matter, after which every senator that pleased delivered his sentiments; then any of the Prytanes drew up the decree and repeated it aloud: after which they proceeded to vote, and if there was a majority of white beans, then it became psephisma, and was afterwards propounded to the people: if they approved it it became a law, otherwise it was of no force longer than the senate who decreed it subsisted. The power of the senate was very great; for they took the account of the magistrates at the expiration of their offices; they directed the provisions made for poor citizens out of the public treasure; they had the superintendancy of public prisons, and a power of punishing such as committed acts morally evil, though not prohibited by any law; they had the care likewise of the fleet; and besides all these they had many other branches of authority, which it is not necessary for us to mention. Before they took their seats they were constrained to undergo a very strict examination, wherein the whole course of their lives was inquired into; and if the least slur on their reputation appeared, they were set aside. When this examination was over they took an oath, whereby they bound themselves to promote in all their councils the public good, to advise nothing contrary to the laws, and to execute their functions exactly. The highest fine the senate could impose was 500 drachms: if they thought the offender deserved a heavier mulct, they then transmitted the cause to the Themothetæ, who punished them as they thought fit. The senators, when their year was out, gave an account of their management to the people: but that they might have the less to do, they always punished such of their number as they found had offended by expulsion; and in this they were mighty exact. Yet an expelled senator was notwithstanding eligible to any other office, the most trivial omission being sufficient to occasion a dismission from the senatorial dignity; and therefore, when the tribes chose their senators, they also chose a certain number of subsidiaries, out of which, when a senator was expelled, another was substituted in his place. Each senator was allowed a drachm every day: for it was a constant rule with the Athenians, that the public ought to pay for every man's time; and therefore such of the poor Athenians as thought fit to demand it had three oboli for going to the assembly. If during their administration any ships of war were built, the senators had crowns decreed them; but if not, they were forbid to sue for them.

Next to the senate was the court of Areopagus, for a description of which see the conclusion of this article.

The chief magistrates of Athens were Archons, and inferior to them there were many others; of whom it will be necessary to mention some. In the first place they had Nomophylaces, who were also styled the eleven, because they were so many in number, one chosen out of each tribe, and a clerk or secretary who made up the eleventh. Their duty it was to look to the execution of the laws; they had authority to seize robbers and other capital pital offenders; and if they confessed to put them to death. Dr. Potter thinks they resembled our sheriffs. The Phylarchi were the presidents of the Athenian tribes; but in time this became a military title. The Philobasileus was an officer in each tribe, who did the same things within his jurisdiction as the Basileus did with respect to the state. The Demarchi were the principal magistrates in wards. The Lexarchi were six in number, and were bound to take care that the people came duly to the assemblies; in their custody was the public register of the citizens names. They had under them Toxotæ, who were lictors or bailiffs; they were sometimes 1000 in number: these men were necessary; but, like most of their sort, were in a manner infamous, as may be gathered from the comedies of Aristophanes; they were generally Scythians, raw-boned brawny fellows, ready to execute any thing they were commanded. The Nomothetæ were 1000 in number; their business was to watch over and inspect into the laws. There were two sorts of orators in the service of the state. Some were appointed to defend an old law when a motion was made to repeal it: these had their fee from the state; but the same man was incapable of being elected twice. Besides these, there were 10 settled orators, called Rhetores, elected by lot: their business was to plead public causes in the senate-house. For this they had their stated fees; and with respect to their qualifications the law runs thus: "Let no one be a public orator who hath struck his parents, denied them maintenance, or shut them out of his doors; who hath refused to serve in the army; who hath thrown away his shield: who hath been addicted to lewd women, notoriously effeminate, or has run out his patrimony. If any man who has been guilty of these crimes dare to deliver an oration, let him be brought to trial on the spot. Let an orator have children lawfully begotten, and an estate within Attica; if in his oration he talks impertinently, makes idle repetitions, affects an unbecoming raillery, digresses from the point in question, or, after the assembly is over, abuses the president, let the Proedri fine him 50 drachmæ; and if that is not thought enough, let him be brought before the next assembly and fined again."

We shall conclude this draught of the Athenian government with an account of their courts of justice, which, exclusive of the Areopagus, were 10 in number; 4 had cognizance of criminal, and 6 of civil causes. These 10 courts were numbered with the 10 first letters of the alphabet, and were thence stiled Alpha, Beta, Gamma, &c. When an Athenian was at leisure to hear causes, he wrote his own name, that of his father, and the ward to which he belonged, upon a tablet; this he presented to the Themiothetæ, who returned it again to him with another tablet, with the letter which fell to his lot;

then he went to the crier of the court, who presented him a sceptre and gave him admission. When the causes were over, every judge went and delivered his sceptre to the Prytanes, and received a stated fee for every cause that was tried. But as this was intended only to compensate their loss of time, so that there might be no appearance of covetousness, a man was forbid to sit in two courts on the same day. The first criminal court after the Areopagus was that of the Ephetæ. It consisted of 51 members, all upwards of 51 years old. Draco gave it a very extensive jurisdiction; but Solon took away from them the power of judging in any other causes than those of manslaughter, accidental killing, and lying in wait to destroy: the Basileus entered all causes in this court. The second criminal court was called Delphinium, because it was held in the temple of Apollo Delphinus; it had cognizance of such murders as were confessed by the criminal, but at the same time justified under some pretence or other. The Prytaneum was the third criminal court. It held plea of such cases where death ensued from inanimate things: causes were heard here with the same solemnity as in other courts; and, on judgment given, the thing, whatever it was, that had occasioned the death of a man, was thrown out of the territory of Athens. The last criminal court was stiled Phreatum. It sat in a place not far from the sea-shore; and such persons were brought before this court as had committed murders in their own country and fled to Attica: the proceedings of this court were so severe, that they did not permit the criminal to come on shore, but obliged him to plead his cause in his vessel; and if he was found guilty, he was committed to the mercy of the winds and seas.

Of the judicatures for hearing civil causes the first was the Parabaston; so called, as some think, because in it no matter could be heard if the cause of action was above one drachm. The Cainon, or new court, was the second tribunal. The third was stiled the court of Lycus, because it assembled in a temple dedicated to that hero, whose statue, represented with the face of a wolf, was set up in all courts of justice. The Trigonon was so called because it was triangular in its form. The court Metidius derived its appellation from the architect who built it. The sixth and last court was called Heliæa; it was by far the greatest, and is generally conceived to have derived its name from the judges sitting in the open air exposed to the sun. All the Athenians who were free citizens were allowed by law to sit in these courts as judges; but before they took their seats were sworn by Apollo Patrius, Ceres, and Jupiter the king, that they would decide all things righteously and according to law, where there was any law to guide them, and by the rules of natural equity where there was none. The Heliæstic Helæstic court consisted at least of 50, but its usual number was 500 judges: when causes of very great consequence were to be tried, 1000 sat therein; and now and then the judges were increased to 1500 and even to 2000. There were many inferior courts in Athens for the decision of trivial causes; but of these there is no necessity of speaking, since we design no more than a succinct view of the Athenian republic, as it was settled by, and in consequence of, Solon's laws.

In the reign of Erichthonius it lost the name of Cecropia, and acquired that of Athens, on what account is not certain; the most probable is, that it was so named in respect of the goddess Minerva, whom the Greeks call Athene, who was also esteemed its protectress. This old city was seated on the top of a rock, in the midst of a large and pleasant plain, which, as the number of inhabitants increased, became full of buildings, which induced the distinction of Acro and Catapolis, i. e. of the upper and lower city. The extent of the citadel was 60 stadia; it was surrounded by olive trees, and fortified, as some say, with a strong pallisade; in succeeding times it was encompassed with a strong wall, in which there were nine gates, one very large one, and the rest small. The inside of the citadel was adorned with innumerable edifices: the most remarkable of which were, 1. The magnificent temple of Minerva, stiled Parthenion, because that goddess was a virgin. The Persians destroyed it; but it was re-built with still greater splendour by the famous Pericles, all of the finest marble, with such skill and strength that, in spite of the rage of time and barbarous nations, it remains perhaps the first antiquity in the world, and stands a witness to the truth of what ancient writers have recorded of the prodigious magnificence of Athens in her flourishing state. 2. The temple of Neptune and of Minerva; for it was divided into two parts: one sacred to the god, in which was the salt fountain, said to have sprung upon the stroke of his trident; the other to the goddess, protectress of Athens, wherein was the sacred olive which she produced, and her image which fell down from heaven in the reign of Erichthonius. At the back of Minerva's temple was the public treasury, which was burnt to the ground through the knavery of the treasurers, who, having misapplied the revenues of the state, took this short method of making up accounts. The lower city comprehended all the buildings surrounding the citadel, the fort Munychia, and the havens Phalerum and Piræus, the latter of which was joined to the city by walls five miles in length; that on the north was built by Pericles, but that on the south by Themistocles; but by degrees the turrets, which were at first erected on these walls, were turned into dwelling-houses for the accommodation of the Athenians, whose large city was now become too small for them. The city, or rather the lower city, had 13 great gates, with the names of which it is not necessary to trouble the reader. Among the principal edifices which adorned it, we may reckon: 1. The temple of Theseus, erected by Conon, near its center. Adjacent thereto the young people performed their exercises. It was also a sanctuary for distressed persons, slaves or free. 2. The Olympian temple, erected in honour of Jupiter, the honour of Athens, and of all Greece. The foundation of it was laid by Pisistratus: it was carried on but slowly in succeeding times, 700 years elapsing before it was finished, which happened under the reign of Adrian, who was particularly kind to Athens: this was the first building in which the Athenians beheld pillars. 3. The pantheon, dedicated to all the gods; a most noble structure, supported by 120 marble pillars, and having over its great gate two horses, carved by Praxiteles: it is yet remaining, as we shall have occasion to shew hereafter when we come to speak of the present state of this famous city. In several parts of it were staoi or porticos, wherein people walked in rainy weather, and from whence a sect of philosophers were denominated Stoics, because their master, Zeno, taught in those porticos.

There were at Athens two places called Ceramicus, from Ceramus, the son of Bacchus and Ariadne; one, within the city, containing a multitude of buildings of all sorts; the other in the suburbs, in which was the academy, and other edifices. The Gymnasia of Athens were many; but the most remarkable were the Lyceum, Academia, and Cynosarges. The Lyceum stood on the banks of Ilissus; some say it was built by Pisistratus, others by Pericles, others by Lycurgus. Here Aristotle taught philosophy, instructing such as came to hear him as they walked; whence his disciples are generally thought to derive the name of Peripatetics. The Ceramicus without the city was the distance of six stadia from its walls. The Academy made part thereof; as to the name of which there is some dispute. Some affirm, that it was so called from Academus, an ancient hero, who, when Helen was stolen by Theseus, discovered the place where she lay hid to Castor and Pollux: for which reason the Lacedemonians, when they invaded Attica, always spared this place. Dicaearchus writes, that Castor and Pollux had two Arcadians in their army, the one named Echedemus, the other Marothus; from the former of these, he says, this place took its name, and that the borough of Marathon was so called from the other. It was a marshy unwholesome place, till Cimon was at great pains to have it drained; and then it became extremely pleasant and delightful, being adorned with shady walks, where Plato read his lectures, and from thence his scholars were stiled academics. The Cynosarges

Cynofarges was a place in the suburbs, not far from the Lyceum: it was famous on many accounts; but particularly for a noble gymnasium erected there, appointed for the special use of such as were Athenians only by one side. In after times Themistocles derived to himself ill-will, by carrying many of the nobility to exercise with him here; because, being but of the half-blood, he could exercise no where else but in this gymnasium. Antisthenes instituted a sect of philosophers, who, from the name of this district, as many think, were stiled Cynics.

The havens of Athens were three. First, the Piræus, which was distant about 35 or 40 stadia from the city, till joined thereto by the long walls before-mentioned, after which it became the principal harbour of the city. It had three docks, Cantharos, Aphrodisium, and Zea: the first was so called from an ancient hero, the second from the goddess Venus, who had there two temples, and the third from bread-corn. There were in this port 5 porticos, which joining together formed one great one, called thence Macra Stoa, or the grand portico. There were likewise two great markets, or fora; one near the long portico, the other near the city. The second port was Munichia, a promontory not far distant from Piræus; a place very strong by nature, and afterwards rendered far stronger by art. It was of this that Epimenides said, if the Athenians foresaw what mischief it would one day produce to them, they would eat it away with their teeth. The third was Phalerum, distant from the city, according to Thucydides, 35 stadia, but, according to Pausanias, only 20. This was the most ancient harbour of Athens, as Piræus was the most capacious.

Of this city, as it stands at present, we have the following account. "It is now called Athini; and is not inconsiderable either in extent or the number of inhabitants. It enjoys a fine temperature, and a serene sky. The air is clear and wholesome, though not so delicately soft as in Ionia. The town stands beneath the Acropolis, or citadel; not encompassing the rock, as formerly, but spreading into the plain, chiefly on the west and north-west. Corsairs infesting it, the avenues were secured, and in 1676 the gates were regularly shut after sun-set. It is now open again; but several of the gateways remain, and a guard of Turks patrols at midnight. Some masses of brick-work, standing separate without the town, belonged perhaps to the ancient wall, of which other traces also appear. The houses are mostly mean, and straggling; many with large areas or courts before them. In the lanes, the high walls on each side, which are commonly white-washed, reflect strongly the heat of the sun. The streets are very irregular: and anciently were neither uniform nor handsome. They have water conveyed in channels from mount Hymettus, and in the bazar or market-place is a large fountain. The Turks have several mosques and public baths. The Greeks have convents for men and women; with many churches, in which service is regularly performed; and besides these, they have numerous oratories or chapels, some in ruins or consisting of bare walls, frequented only on the anniversaries of the saints to whom they are dedicated. A portrait of the owner on a board is placed in them on that occasion, and removed when the solemnity of the day is over.

"The city of Cecrops is now a fortress with a thick irregular wall, standing on the brink of precipices, and inclosing a large area about twice as long as broad. Some portions of the ancient wall may be discovered on the outside, particularly at the two extreme angles; and in many places it is patched with pieces of columns, and with marbles taken from the ruins. A considerable sum, had been recently expended on the side next Hymettus, which was finished before 1760. The scaffolding had been removed to the end toward Pentele; but money was wanting, and the workmen were withdrawn. The garrison consists of a few Turks, who reside there with their families, and are called by the Greeks Castriani, or the soldiers of the castle. The rock is lofty, abrupt, and inaccessible, except the front, which is toward the Piræus; and on that quarter is a mountainous ridge, within cannon-shot. It is destitute of water fit for drinking; and supplies are daily carried up in earthen jars, on horses and asses, from one of the conduits in the town.

"The Acropolis furnished a very ample field to the ancient virtuosi. It was filled with monuments of Athenian glory, and exhibited an amazing display of beauty, of opulence, and of art; each contending, as it were, for the superiority. It appeared as one entire offering to the deity, surpassing in excellence, and astonishing in richness. Heliodorus, named Periegetes the guide, had employed on it 15 books. The curiosities of various kinds, with the pictures, statues, and pieces of sculpture, were so many and so remarkable, as to supply Polemo Periegetes with matter for 4 volumes; and Strabo affirms, that as many would be required in treating of other portions of Athens and of Attica. In particular, the number of statues was prodigious. Tiberius Nero, who was fond of images, plundered the Acropolis, as well as Delphi and Olympia; yet Athens, and each of these places, had not fewer than 3000 remaining in the time of Pliny. Even Pausanias seems here to be distressed by the multiplicity of his subject. But this banquet, as it were, of the senses has long been withdrawn; and is now become like the tale of a vision. The spectator views with concern the marble ruins intermixed with mean flat-roofed cottages, and extant amid rubbish; the sad memorials of a nobler people; people; which, however, as visible from the sea, should have introduced modern Athens to more early notice. They who reported it was only a small village, must, it has been surmised, have beheld the Acropolis through the wrong end of their telescopes.

"The Acropolis has now, as formerly, only one entrance, which fronts the Piræus. The ascent is by traverses and rude fortifications furnished with cannon, but without carriages, and neglected. By the second gate is the station of the guard, who sits cross-legged under cover, much at his ease, smoking his pipe, or drinking coffee, with his companions about him in like attitudes. Over this gateway is an inscription in large characters on a stone turned upside down, and black from the fires made below. It records a present of a pair of gates.

"Going farther up, you come to the ruins of the Propylea, an edifice which graced the entrance into the citadel. This was one of the structures of Pericles, who began it when Euthymenes was archon, 435 years before Christ. It was completed in 5 years, at the expence of 2012 talents. It was of marble, of the Doric order, and had five doors to afford an easy passage to the multitudes which resorted on business or devotion to the Acropolis. While this fabric was building, the architect Mnesicles, whose activity equalled his skill, was hurt by a fall, and the physicians despaired of his life; but Minerva, who was propitious to the undertaking, appeared, it was said, to Pericles, and prescribed a remedy, by which he was speedily and easily cured. It was a plant or herb growing round about the Acropolis, and called afterwards Parthenium. The right wing of the Propylea was a temple of Victory. They related that Ægeus had stood there viewing the sea, and anxious for the return of his son Theseus, who was gone to Crete with the tributary children to be delivered to the Minotaur. The vessel which carried them had black sails suiting the occasion of its voyage; and it was agreed, that, if Theseus overcame the enemy, their colour should be changed to white. The neglect of this signal was fatal to Ægeus, who, on seeing the sails unaltered, threw himself down headlong from the rock, and perished. The idol was named Victory without Wings; it was said, because the news of the success of Theseus did not arrive, but with the conqueror; it had a pomegranate in the right hand, and an helmet in the left. As the statue was without pinions, it was hoped the goddess would remain for ever on the spot.

On the left wing of the Propylea, and fronting the temple of Victory, was a building decorated with paintings by Polygnotus, of which an account is given by Pausanias. This edifice, as well as the temple, was of the Doric order, the columns fluted, and without bases. Both contributed alike to the uniformity and grandeur of the design; and the whole fabric, when finished, was deemed equally magnificent and ornamental. The interval between Pericles and Pausanias consists of several centuries. The Propylea remained entire in the time of this topographer, and, as will be shewn, continued nearly so to a much later period. It had then a roof of white marble, which was unsurpassed either in the size of the stones, or in the beauty of their arrangement; and before each wing was an equestrian statue.

"The Propylea have ceased to be the entrance of the Acropolis. The passage, which was between the columns in the center, is walled up almost to their capitals, and above is a battery of cannon. The way now winds before the front of the ancient structure; and, turning to the left hand among rubbish and mean walls, you come to the back part, and to the five door-ways. The soil without is risen higher than the top of the two smaller. There, under the vault and cannon, lies an heap of large stones, the ruin of the roof.

"The temple of Victory, standing on an abrupt rock, has its back and one side unencumbered with the modern ramparts. The columns in the front being walled up, you enter it by a breach in the side, within the Propylea. It was used by the Turks as a magazine for powder, until about the year 1656: when a sudden explosion, occasioned by lightning, carried away the roof, with a house erected on it, belonging to the officer who commanded in the Acropolis, whose family, except a girl, perished. The women of the Aga continued to inhabit in this quarter, but it is now abandoned and in ruins.

"The cell of the temple of Victory, which is of white marble, very thick, and strongly cemented, sufficiently witnesses the great violence it has undergone; the stones in many places being disjointed, as it were, and forced from their original position. Two of these making an acute angle, the exterior edges touching without a crevice; and the light abroad being much stronger than in the room, which has a modern roof, and is dark; the portion in contact becoming pellucid, had illumined the vacant space with a dim colour resembling that of amber. We were desired to examine this extraordinary appearance, which the Greeks regarded as a standing miracle, and which the Turks who could not confute them, beheld with equal astonishment. We found in the gape some coals, which had been brought on a bit of earthen ware for the purpose of burning incense, as we supposed, and also a piece of wax-taper, which probably had been lighted in honour of the saint and author of the wonder; but our Swiss unfortunately carrying his own candle too far in, the smoke blackened the marble, and destroyed the phenomenon.

" The building opposite to the temple has served as a foundation for a square lofty tower of ordinary masonry. The columns of the front are walled up, and the entrance is by a low iron-gate in the side. It is now used as a place of confinement for delinquents; but in 1676 was a powder-magazine. In the wall of a rampart near it are some fragments of exquisite sculpture, representing the Athenians fighting with the Amazons. These belong to the freeze, which was then standing. In the second century, when Pausanias lived, much of the painting was impaired by age, but some remained, and the subjects were chiefly taken from the Trojan story. The traces are since vanished.

" The pediment of the temple of Victory, with that of the opposite wing, is described as remaining in 1676; but on each building a square tower had been erected. One of the steps in the front of the Propylea was entire, with the four columns, their entablature and the pediment. The portico, to which the five door-ways belonged, consisted of a large square room, roofed with slabs of marble, which were laid on two great marble beams, and sustained by four beautiful columns. These were Ionic, the proportions of this order best suiting that purpose, as taller than the Doric; the reason it was likewise preferred in the pronaos of the temple of Victory. The roof of the Propylea, after standing above 2000 years, was probably destroyed, with all the pediments, by the Venetians, in 1687, when they battered the castle in front, firing red-hot bullets, and took it; but were compelled to resign it again to the Turks in the following year. The exterior walls, and in particular a side of the temple of Victory, retain many marks of their hostilities.

" The chief ornament of the Acropolis was the Parthenon or great temple of Minerva, a most superb and magnificent fabric. The Persians had burned the edifice which before occupied the site, and was called Hecatompedon, from its being 100 feet square. The zeal of Pericles and of all the Athenians was exerted in providing a far more ample and glorious residence for their favourite goddess. The architects were Callicrates and Ictinus; and a treatise on the building was written by the latter and Carpiion. It was of white marble, of the Doric order, the columns fluted and without bases, the number in front eight, and adorned with admirable sculpture. The story of the birth of Minerva was carved in the front pediment; and in the back her contest with Neptune for the country. The beasts of burden which had conveyed up the materials were regarded as sacred, and recompensed with pastures; and one, which had voluntarily headed the train, was maintained during life, without labour, at the public expence.

" The statue of Minerva, made for this temple by Phidias, was of ivory, 26 cubits or 39 feet high. It was decked with pure gold to the amount of 44 talents, so disposed by the advice of Pericles as to be taken off and weighed, if required. The goddess was represented standing, with her vestment reaching to her feet. Her helmet had a sphinx for the crest, and on the sides were griffins. The head of Medusa was on her breast-plate. In one hand she held her spear, and in the other supported an image of Victory about 4 cubits high. The battle of the Centaurs and Lapithæ was carved on her sandals; and on her shield, which lay at her feet, the war of the gods and giants, and the battle of the Athenians and Amazons. By her spear was a serpent, in allusion to the story of Erichthonius; and on the pedestal the birth of Pandora. The sphinx, the victory, and serpent, were accounted eminently wonderful. This image was placed in the temple the first year of the 87th Olympiad, in which the Peloponnesian war began. The gold was stripped off by the tyrant Lachares, when Demetrius Poliorcetes compelled him to fly. The same plunderer plucked down the golden shields in the Acropolis, and carried away the golden victories, with the precious vessels and ornaments provided for the Panathenæan festival.

" The Parthenon remained entire for many ages after it was deprived of the goddess. The Christians converted it into a church, and the Mahometans into a mosque. It is mentioned in the letters of Crusius, and misnamed the pantheon, and the temple of the unknown God. The Venetians under Koninfsmark, when they besieged the Acropolis in 1687, threw a bomb which demolished the roof, and, setting fire to some powder, did much damage to the fabric. The floor, which is indented, still witnesses the place of its fall. This was the sad forerunner of farther destruction; the Turks breaking the stones, and applying them to the building of a new mosque, which stands within the ruin, or to the repairing of their houses and the walls of the fortrefs. The vast pile of ponderous materials, which lay ready, is greatly diminished; and the whole structure will gradually be consumed and disappear.

The temple of Minerva in 1676 was, as Wheeler and Spon assert, the finest mosque in the world, without comparison. The Greeks had adapted the fabric to their ceremonial, by constructing at one end a semi-circular recess for the holy tables, with a window: for before it was enlightened only by the door, obscurity being preferred under the heathen ritual, except on festivals, when it yielded to splendid illuminations; the reason, it has been surmised, why temples are commonly found simple and unadorned on the insides. In the wall beneath the the window were inserted two pieces of the stone called phengites, a species of marble discovered in Cappadocia in the time of Nero, and so transparent, that he erected with it a temple to Fortune, which was luminous within when the door was shut. These pieces were perforated, and the light which entered was tinged with a reddish or yellowish hue. The picture of the Panagia, or Virgin Mary, in Mosaic, on the ceiling of the recess, remained; with two jasper columns belonging to the screen, which had separated that part from the nave; and within, a canopy supported by four pillars of porphyry, with Corinthian capitals of white marble, under which the table had been placed; and behind it, beneath the window, a marble chair for the archbishop; and also a pulpit, standing on four small pillars in the middle aisle. The Turks had white-washed the walls, to obliterate the portraits of saints, and the other paintings, with which the Greeks decorate their places of worship; and had erected a pulpit on the right hand for their imam or reader. The roof was disposed in square compartments, the stones massive, and some had fallen in. It had been sustained in the pronaos by six columns; but the place of one was then supplied by a large pile of rude masonry, the Turks not having been able to fill up the gap more worthily. The roof of the naos was supported by colonnades ranging with the door, and on each side; consisting of 22 pillars below, and of 23 above. The odd one was over the entrance, which by that disposition was left wide and unembarrassed. In the portico were suspended a few lamps, to be used in the mosque at the seasons when the Musselmans assemble before day-break, or to be lighted up round the minaret, as is the custom during their Ramazan or Lent.

"It is not easy to conceive a more striking object than the Parthenon, though now a mere ruin. The columns within the naos have all been removed: but on the floor may be seen the circles which directed the workmen in placing them; and at the farther end is a groove across it, as for one of the partitions of the cell. The recess erected by the Christians is demolished; and from the rubbish of the ceiling the Turkish boys collect bits of the Mosaic, of different colours, which composed the picture. We were told at Smyrna, that this substance had taken a polish, and been set in buckles. This cell is about half demolished; and in the columns which surrounded it is a large gap near the middle. On the walls are some traces of the paintings. Before the portico is a reservoir sunk in the rock, to supply the Turks with water for the purifications customary on entering their mosques. In it, on the left hand, is the rubbish of the pile erected to supply the place of a column; and on the right a stair-case, which leads out on the architrave, and has a marble or two with inscriptions, but worn so as not to be legible. It belonged to the minaret, which has been destroyed.

"The travellers, to whom we are indebted for an account of the mosque, have likewise given a description of the sculpture then remaining in the front. In the middle of the pediment was seen a bearded Jupiter, with a majestic countenance, standing, and naked; the right arm broken. The thunder-bolt, it has been supposed, was placed in that hand, and the eagle between his feet. On his right was a figure, it is conjectured, of Victory, clothed to the mid-leg; the head and arms gone. This was leading on the horses of a car, in which Minerva sat, young and unarmed; her head-dress, instead of a helmet, resembling that of a Venus. The generous ardour and lively spirit visible in this pair of celestial steeds, was such as bespoke the hand of a master bold and delicate, of a Phidias or Praxiteles. Behind Minerva was a female figure, without a head, sitting, with an infant in her lap; and in this angle of the pediment was the emperor Hadrian, with his arm round Sabina, both reclining, and seeming to regard Minerva with pleasure. On the left side of Jupiter were five or six other trunks to complete the assembly of deities, into which he received her. These figures were all wonderfully carved, and appeared as big as life. Hadrian and his consort, it is likely, were complimented by the Athenians with places among the marble gods in the pediment, as benefactors. Both of them may be considered as intruders on the original company; and possibly their heads were placed on trunks, which before had other owners. They still possess their corner, and are easy to be recognized, though not unimpaired. The rest of the statues are defaced, removed, or fallen. Morosini was ambitious to enrich Venice with the spoils of Athens; and, by an attempt to take down the principal group, hastened their ruin. In the other pediment is a head or two of sea-horses, finely executed, with some mutilated figures; and on the architrave beneath them are marks of the fixtures of votive offerings, perhaps of the golden shields, or of festoons suspended on solemn occasions, when the temple was dressed out to receive the votaries of the goddesses.

"Neptune and Minerva, once rival deities, were joint and amicable tenants of the Erechtheum, in which was an altar of oblivion. The building was double, a partition-wall dividing it into two temples, which fronted different ways. One was the temple of Neptune Erechtheus, the other of Minerva Polias. The latter was entered by a square portico connected with a marble screen, which fronts towards the Propylea. The door of the cell was on the left-hand, and at the farther end of the passage was a door leading down into the Prandeseum, which was contiguous.

"Before the temple of Neptune Erechtheus was an altar of Jupiter the Supreme, on which no living thing was sacrificed, but they offered cakes without wine. Within it was the altar of Neptune and Erechtheus; and two, belonging to Vulcan, and a hero named Butes, who had transmitted the priesthood to his posterity, which were called Butadæ. On the walls were paintings of the illustrious family, from which the priestesses of Minerva Polias was also taken. It was asserted, that Neptune had ordained the well of salt-water, and the figure of a trident in the rock, to be memorials of his contending for the country. The former, Pausanias remarks, was no great wonder, for other wells of a similar nature were found inland; but this, when the south wind blew, afforded the sound of waves.

"The temple of Minerva Polias was dedicated by all Attica, and possessed the most ancient statue of the goddess. The demi, or towns, had other deities, but their zeal for her suffered no diminution. The image, which they placed in the Acropolis, then the city, was in after ages not only reputed consummately holy, but believed to have fallen down from heaven in the reign of Erichthonius. It was guarded by a large serpent, which was regularly served with offerings of honied cakes for his food. This divine reptile was of great sagacity, and attained to an extraordinary age. He wisely withdrew from the temple, when in danger from the Medes; and it is said, was living in the second century. Before this statue was an owl, and a golden lamp: This continued burning day and night. It was contrived by a curious artist, named Callimachus, and did not require to be replenished with oil oftener than once a-year. A brazen palm-tree, reaching to the roof, received its smoke. Aristion had let the holy flame expire, while Sylla besieged him, and was abhorred for his impiety. The original olive-tree, said to have been produced by Minerva, was kept in this temple. When the Medes set fire to the Acropolis, it was consumed; but, they asserted, on the following day was found to have shot up again as much as a cubit. It grew low and crooked, but was esteemed very holy. The priestesses of Minerva was not allowed to eat of the new cheese of Attica; and, among her perquisites, was a measure of wheat, and one of barley, for every birth and burial. This temple was again burned when Callias was archon, 24 years after the death of Pericles. Near it was the tomb of Cecrops, and within it Erechtheus was buried.

"The ruin of the Erechtheum is of white marble; the architectural ornaments of very exquisite workmanship, and uncommonly curious. The columns of the front of the temple of Neptune are standing with the architrave; and also the screen and portico of Minerva Polias, with a portion of the cell retaining traces of the partition-wall. The order is

Ionic. An edifice revered by ancient Attica, as holy in the highest degree, was, in 1676, the dwelling of a Turkish family, and is now deserted and neglected; but many ponderous stones and much rubbish must be removed before the well and trident would appear. The former, at least, might probably be discovered. The portico is used as a powder-magazine; but we obtained permission to dig and to examine the outside. The door-way of the vestibule is walled up, and the soil risen nearly to the top of the door-way of the Prandroseum. By the portico is a battery commanding the town, from which ascends an amusing hum. The Turks fire from it, to give notice of the commencement of Ramazan, or of their Lent, and of bairam or the holy-days, and on other public occasions.

"The Prandroseum is a small but very particular building, of which no satisfactory idea can be communicated by description. The entablature is supported by women called Caryatides. Their story is thus related: The Greeks, victorious in the Persian war, jointly destroyed Carya, a city of the Peloponnesus, which had favoured the common enemy. They cut off the males, and carried into captivity the women, whom they compelled to retain their former-dress and ornaments, though in a state of servitude. The architects of those times, to perpetuate the memory of their punishment, represented them, as in this instance, each with a burden on her head, one hand uplifted to it, and the other hanging down by her side. The images were in number six, all looking toward the Parthenon. The four in front, with that next to the Propylea remain, but mutilated, and their faces besmeared with paint. The soil is risen almost to the top of the basement on which they are placed. This temple was open or latticed between the statues; and in it also was a stunted olive-tree, with an altar of Jupiter Herceus standing under it. The Propylea are nearly in a line with the space dividing it from the Parthenon; which disposition, besides its other effects, occasioned the front and flank of the latter edifice to be seen at once by those who approached it from the entrance of the Acropolis.

"The ruin of the temple of Jupiter Olympius consists of prodigious columns, tall and beautiful, of the Corinthian order, fluted; some single, some supporting their architraves; with a few massive marbles beneath; the remnant of a vast heap, which only many ages could have consumed and reduced into so scanty a compass. The columns are of very extraordinary dimensions, being about six feet in diameter, and near sixty in height. The number without the cell was 116 or 120. Seventeen were standing in 1676: but a few years before 1765 one was overturned with much difficulty, and applied to the building a new mosque in the bazar or market-market-place. This violence was avenged by the bathaw of Negropont, who made it a pretext for extorting from the vauwode or governor 15 purses; the pillar being, he alledged, the property of their master, the Grand Signior. It was an angular column, and of consequence in determining the dimensions of the fabric. We regretted that the fall of this mighty mass had not been postponed until we came, as it would have afforded an opportunity of inspecting and measuring some members which we found far too lofty to be attempted. On a piece of the architrave, supported by a couple of columns, are two parallel walls, of modern masonry, arched about the middle, and again near the top. You are told it has been the habitation of a hermit, doubtless of a Strylites; but of whatever building it has been part, and for whatever purpose designed, it must have been erected thus high in air, while the immense ruin of this huge structure was yet scarcely diminished, and the heap inclined so as to render it accessible. It was remarked, that two stones of a step in the front had coalesced at the extremity, so that no juncture could be perceived; and the like was discovered also in a step of the parthenon. In both instances it may be attributed to a concretory fluid, which pervades the marble in the quarry. Some portion remaining in the pieces, when taken green as it were, and placed in mutual contact, it exsued and united them by a process similar to that in a bone of an animal when broken and properly set.

" Besides the more stable antiquities, many detached pieces are found in the town, by the fountains, in the streets, the walls, the houses, and churches. Among these are fragments of sculpture; a marble chair or two, which probably belonged to the Gymnasia or theatres; a sun-dial at the catholicon or cathedral, inscribed with the name of the maker, and, at the archiepiscopal house, close by, a very curious vessel of marble, used as a cistern to receive water, but once serving, it is likely, as a public standard or measure. Many columns occur, with some maimed statues; and pedestals, several with inscriptions, and almost buried in earth. A custom has prevailed, as at Chios, of fixing in the wall, over the gateways and doors of the houses, carved stones, most of which exhibit the funeral supper. In the courts of the houses lie many round stelæ, or pillars, once placed on the graves of the Athenians; and a great number are still to be seen applied to the same use in the Turkish burying-grounds before the Acropolis. These generally have concise inscriptions, containing the name of the person, and of the town and tribe to which the deceased belonged. Demetrius, the Phalerean, who endeavoured to restrain sepulchral luxury, enacted, that no person should have more than one, and that the height should not exceed three cubits.

VOL. I.—No. 16.

Another species, which resembles our modern head-stones, is sometimes adorned with sculpture, and has an epitaph in verse. We saw a few mutilated Hermæ. These were busts on long quadrangular bases, the heads frequently of brass, invented by the Athenians. At first they were made to represent only Hermes or Mercury, and designed as guardians of the sepulchres in which they were lodged; but afterwards the houses, streets, and porticos of Athens, were adorned with them, and rendered venerable by a multitude of portraits of illustrious men and women, of heroes and of gods: and, it is related, Hipparchus, son of Pisistratus, erected them in the demi or borough-towns, and by the road side, inscribed with moral apothegms in elegiac verse; thus making them vehicles of instruction." Thus far is extracted from Mr. Chandler's Travels.

As the Areopagus has been so repeatedly mentioned, we cannot but presume to think a particular description of so considerable a court at Athens will be a necessary appendage to that article, and, notwithstanding its length, be acceptable.

Plutarch attributes the establishment of the Areopagus to Solon. Other authors think differently; and with good reason: for it appears undeniable, that this tribunal was instituted before Solon. But the best authorities allow him the honour of its restoration. The city of Athens, governed till this time by tribunals of a circumscribed jurisdiction, which were multiplied by the most trifling accidents and circumstances, took no fixed political or civil form, however closely united the members of those tribunals were by their general views towards the public good and by the common love of their country. As each of those tribunals could only act in proportion to the power delegated to it, it was impossible that so many different and unequal impressions should give to the great machine of the state that uniform and regular movement which, by an impulse always the same, would keep each part in the situation it should maintain with relation to the whole.

To effect this universal and harmonious power, it was necessary to unite the different channels of public authority, which, by being too much distributed, lost its force. This authority Solon collected, and placed it all in the court of Areopagus, which consequently became the main spring of the government. The judges of this court, who, under Draco, decided only in cases of murder, now took cognizance of crimes of every kind; and the same tribunal which inflicted capital punishment on murder, poisoning, burning of houses, theft, &c. struck at the roots of those crimes, by arraigning idleness, luxury, and debauchery.

The judges of the Areopagus, says that author, were more industrious to prevent crimes, by representing them in an odious light, than to establish modes of punishment. It was their opinion, that the enemies of the state were the instruments destined by the gods to punish the wicked; but that it was their province to correct and reform public and private manners. They were vigilantly attentive to the conduct of all the citizens, but particularly to that of the youth. They well knew that the impetuosity of juvenile passion gave the most violent shocks to health and growing virtue; that it was the duty of inspectors of education to soften the austerity of moral discipline with innocent pleasure; and that no recreations were more eligible than bodily exercises, which enable a young man to give a good education its full play, which improve health, give a pleasurable and agreeable vivacity, and even fortify the mind. The fortunes of the Athenians were too unequal to admit the same mode of education; and therefore the youth were trained in a manner suitable to the rank and circumstances of their respective families. Those of the inferior classes were taught agriculture and commerce; from this principle, that idleness is followed by indigence, and that indigence excites to the most daring and atrocious crimes. Having thus endeavoured, by wise precautions, to preclude the entrance of moral evil, they thought they had little to fear.

Exercises of the body, such as horsemanship and hunting, were objects of education to the youth of liberal fortune. In this sage distribution, their great aim was to prevent the poor from committing crimes, and to facilitate to the rich the acquisition of virtue. Not satisfied with having established good laws, they were extremely careful to see that they were observed. With this view, they had divided the city into quarters and the country into cantons. Thus every thing passed under their eyes; nothing escaped them; they were acquainted with the private conduct of every citizen. Those who had been guilty of any irregularity were cited before the magistrates, and were reprehended, or punished in proportion to their misdemeanour.

These same Areopagites obliged the rich to relieve the poor. They repressed the intemperance of the youth by a severe discipline. Corruption in magistrates was suppressed by the punishments denounced against it; and the old men, at the sight of the employments of the young, felt themselves animated with a degree of juvenile vigour and activity.

Religion came likewise under the cognizance of the Areopagites. Plato durst never, as we are told by Justin Martyr, divulge his private opinion concerning the Deity. He had learned from the Egyptians the doctrine of Moses. It appeared to him the best, and he embraced it with ardour. But his dread of the Areopagites, who were attached to the prevailing system, would not permit him even to name the author of sentiments which opposed the common tradition.

The public edifices, the cleanness of the streets, the pay of the soldiers, the distribution of the public money; in a word, whatever interested the republic, was under the direction of the Areopagus. The people themselves, jealous as they were of their power, did nothing without consulting this assembly, and suffered it without a murmur to amend their precipitate decrees. Yet this authority, however great it may seem, was subject to the laws; by them rewards and punishments were determined; and those respectable judges gave an account of their trust to public censors, who were placed betwixt them and the people, to prevent the aristocracy from growing too powerful.

The most important qualifications were required in those who entered into the Areopagus. Solon made a law, by which they who had not been archons for a year should not be admitted members of the Areopagus. To give more force to his law, he subjected himself to it, and was only admitted on that title; this was but the first step; those annual magistrates, after having given law to the republic, were interrogated on their administration. If their conduct was found irreproachable, they were admitted Areopagites with eulogium; but the smallest misconduct excluded them from that honour for ever. What administration was not to be expected from a tribunal so well composed! What veneration was not due to men of such rare talents and virtue! Such respect was paid them, that people presumed not to laugh in their presence; and so well-established was their reputation for equity, that those whom they condemned, or dismissed without granting their petition, never complained that they had been unjustly treated.

The edifice of the Areopagus was extremely simple; and its roof, which at first was of the most common materials, remained in that state till the time of Augustus. This we learn from Vitruvius. Orestes was the first who thought of embellishing it. He raised in it an altar to Minerva. He likewise adorned it with two seats of solid silver; on one of which the accuser sat, and the accused on the other. The one seat was consecrated to Injury, and the other to Impudence. This religious sketch was brought to perfection by Epimenides, who erected altars to these allegorical deities, and soon after a temple, which Cicero mentions in his second book of laws. This temple corresponded with that which Orestes had built to the Furies, who brought him to Athens, and procured him the protection of Minerva. Epimenides dedicated it a second time to the Furies, or severe Goddesses, as they were termed by the Athenians. A man was thought thought lost without resource, and a victim to every human ill, if he enforced a perjury by invoking the sacred name of those tremendous divinities.

Those who employed their thoughts in solving the mysteries of Paganism imagined that the Eumenides had their temple so near the court Areopagus that they might enlighten the judges by their inspiration, and, by their continual assistance prevent them from committing those errors to which human weakness is liable. To propitiate those terrible deities, and to procure their favour for the Areopagus, they were worshipped with great punctuality and devotion, and the senate itself appointed their priests. Demosthenes had been nominated to preside over their sacrifices; and he thought it very extraordinary that he, to whom the republic had confided so important an office, should be publicly impeached.

It was natural to associate with the Eumenides the other deities who shared with them the sovereign empire over the dead. Epimenides placed in their temples the statues of Pluto, of Mercury, and of Tellus. They were all, according to Pausanias, of an agreeable form. Each of them was placed upon an altar, on which the citizens, or strangers, who had been acquitted by the Areopagus, made their grateful offerings.

But it was not to gratitude alone that these several deities owed all the incense that smoked upon their altars. They who had been accused before the senate, harrassed with superstition, and uncertain how these deities would be affected towards them, were lavish of sacrifices to obtain their clemency, by which they hoped their judges would likewise be influenced.

The tomb of Cædipus was another of the ornaments of the Areopagus. It was in the outward court of the Areopagus, where a barge was likewise placed, which made a part of the pomp at the public games.

Whatever homage and implicit obedience the court of Areopagus might derive from all this religious parade, the public good was always dearer to them than any lower advantages they might have drawn from the altars and temples with which they were surrounded.

The senate assembled in a hall built on the summit of a hill, which was ascended with difficulty by the old men bent with age. However, as for some time they only assembled on the three last days of each month, they bore with patience this inconvenient situation. But public affairs multiplied to such a degree that they were obliged to add to the three former sittings a fourth, which was held on the seventh day of the month, and which was soon succeeded by an assembly every day. Their meetings were so regular that they were not interrupted by the most solemn festivals, till Cephisodorus was archon, who, in the third year of the 105th Olympiad, made a decree, which obliged the Areopagites to celebrate, after the example of the other courts, the Apaturian feasts, which lasted five days. This assiduous and painful exercise of their office made the Areopagites feel all the inconvenience of the situation of their tribunal, and determined them to remove it to a part of the city called the Royal Portico. It was a square, exposed to all the inclemencies of the weather. When the judges, who assembled there in profound silence, had taken their places, they were inclosed by a thread, or rather a cord, drawn around them.

They held their assemblies in the night, that their attention to public affairs might not be diverted by external objects; and (adds Lucian) that they might only be influenced by the arguments, and not by the presence and action, of the speakers. This circumstance explains a passage in Athenæus, who tells us, that none knew the numbers nor faces of the Areopagites. The custom of administering justice in the open air was not peculiar to them. It was followed by all the other tribunals, when they tried for murder; for two reasons: 1st, That the judges, the sworn protectors of innocence, might not be hurt by being under cover with criminals, whose hands were polluted with blood. 2dly, That the accuser and the accused might not be under the same roof.

When all the members of the senate were convened, a herald enjoined silence, and ordered the people to retire. As soon as they had departed, the assembly proceeded to business; and as they deemed the least preference a flagrant injustice, the causes which they were to determine were drawn by a kind of lottery; and the same chance which brought them up, distributed them to different numbers of judges, small or great, according to the importance of the several causes. In early times, the parties themselves stated their cause in a simple manner. The eloquence of advocates was thought a dangerous talent, fit only to varnish crimes. But afterwards the Areopagus, on this point, relaxed from their severity; at first the accused, and soon after the accusers, were permitted to engage those to make the attack and the defence whose profession it was to exert the art of speaking for others, with accuracy and elegance.

Sextus Empericus seems not to have sufficiently distinguished times, where he says, that the court of Areopagus did not suffer those who were to be tried at their bar to avail themselves of the abilities of others. What undoubtedly led him into that mistake, was, an inviolable custom of that tribunal, which prohibited, in pleadings, all that warm and picturesque oratory which seduces the judgement and inflames the passions. When the suffrages were collected, collected, each person gave his in silence. They voted with a small flint, which they held betwixt the thumb and the two next fingers, and which they put into one of the two urns that stood in a corner of the hall. One stood before the other. The first was called the urn of death; the second, the urn of compassion. That of death was brass, and was termed proper; that of compassion was of wood, and was termed improper. The judges commonly brought their flint to the assembly, and put it into the urn; but, that all the suffrages might be collected, the herald took the two urns, and presented them, one after another, to every senator, commanding him, in the name of the republic, no longer to defer his acquittal, or condemnation.

For this method of giving sentence, the 30 tyrants, to make themselves masters of the decisions of the Areopagus, substituted another, by means of which they knew exactly the opinion of each of the judges; for they obliged them to bring their flints publicly, and lay them upon two tables placed before them, the situation of which was quite opposite to that of the urns; for the first of those tables was that of life, and the second that of death. The first substances with which they gave their suffrages were not small pieces of the bones of a hog, as some authors assert, but sea-shells, for which pieces of brass of the same form, termed Spondyla, were afterwards substituted. The substances with which they voted were distinguished by their form and colour. Those which condemned were black, and perforated in the middle; the others were white, and not perforated. The precaution of piercing the black ones tends to prove, what we have already observed, that the court of Areopagus sat in the night: for what end did it serve to pierce the black shells, or flints, if the judges could have seen them from the white ones, and consequently have distinguished their colours by the assistance of the light? But as they passed sentence in the dark, it is evident that a difference besides that of colour was necessary to know the black ones from the white. The judges were likewise permitted to multiply at pleasure the distinctions between signs, which essentially distinguished the fates of men.

After the suffrages were collected, they were taken out of the two urns, and put into a third vase of brass. They were then counted; and as the number of white or of black flints was higher or inferior, one of the judges drew with his nail a shorter or a longer line, on a tablet, with a waxen surface, on which the result of each cause was marked. The short line expressed acquittal; the long, condemnation.

With regard to the emoluments of the judges, they were as moderate as those of the advocates. The length of the process did not enhance its expence; and when the decision of a cause was postponed till the next day, the committee were only paid an obolus on that day. Hence Mercury, in Lucian, is surprised that such sensible old men as the senators of Areopagus were, should sell at so low a price the trouble of ascending so high. As to the number of the judges which composed the Areopagus, some authors, attentive only to a part of Solon's regulations, by which he enacted, that for the future, none but the nine archons should be admitted members of the Areopagus, have imagined that this tribunal was filled anew every year, and that it never consisted of more than nine magistrates. This opinion, and some others, are refuted by the circumstantial account which Diogenes Laertius gives us of the condemnation of Socrates. This great man had wished to substitute a rational hypothesis for the fabulous and extravagant system of religion which prevailed in his time. His project, however laudable, appeared impious in the eye of superstition. Information was laid against him before the Areopagus, and he had as many accusers as fellow-citizens. After the charges and the answers were heard, they proceeded to suffrages; the opinions were divided, but not equally, for the number of those who condemned him exceeded by 281 the number of those who declared him innocent. He made an ironical reply to this iniquitous sentence, by telling his judges, that he took it for granted, they would admit him to a maintenance in the Prytanæum. On this sarcasm, 80 of those who had voted in his favour forsook him, went over to the opposite party, and condemned him to die. Here then we have 361 judges who condemn; to whom if we add those who persist in acquitting him, the number must be very considerable.

Of all the judgments of the Areopagus, the most famous one, excepting that of Mars, was the sentence which they passed on Orestes. His trial, which happened under Demophon XII. king of Athens, in 375 of the Attic æra, owed all its fame to a remarkable circumstance, that gave rise to a custom which was observed ever afterwards. Orestes had killed his mother: he was accused before the Areopagus, and cited to appear in that court. He would have lost his life in consequence of the equal division of the votes had not Minerva, moved with his misfortunes, declared herself for those who had absolved him, and joined her suffrage to theirs. Thus Orestes was saved. In veneration to this miracle, the Areopagites, whenever the suffrages were equally divided, decided in favour of the accused, by granting him what they termed the shell of Minerva. Cephalus and Dedalus were condemned by the Areopagus long before the time of Orestes.

We find in ancient authors some decisions of this tribunal, which bear the strongest marks of justice, though though their objects are not interesting. We shall here quote an anecdote from Aulus Gellius, and Valerius Maximus, of a woman who was accused of having poisoned her husband and her son. She was taken and brought before Dolabella, who was then pro-consul of Asia. She was no sooner in his presence than she owned the fact; and added, that she had very good reasons for putting her husband and her son to death.—"I had (said she), to my first husband, a son, whom I tenderly loved, and whose virtues rendered him worthy of my affection. My second husband, and the son whom I bore to him, murdered my favourite child. I thought it would have been unjust to have suffered those two monsters of barbarity to live. If you think, Sir, that I have committed a crime, it is your province to punish it: I certainly shall never repent of it." This affair embarrassed Dolabella. She was afterwards sent to the Areopagus; and that court, when they had examined her a long time, ordered her and her accuser to appear before them again 100 years after, from the first day of her trial.

We must not, however, suppose, that the Areopagus always preserved its old reputation; for such is the constitution of human affairs, that perfection, with regard to them, is a violent, and consequently a transitory, state. Pericles, who lived about 100 years after Solon, to flatter the people, and win them to his party, used his utmost efforts to weaken the authority of the Areopagus, which was then disliked by the multitude. He took from it the cognizance of many affairs which had before come under its jurisdiction; and, to forward his design of humbling it, employed the eloquence of Ephialtes, whose talents were formidable, and who was an avowed enemy to the great men of Athens.

The Areopagus itself seemed to second the endeavours of a man who projected its ruin, and by its misconduct hastened its fall. The old rules of the court, by which none were admitted its members but those whose unexceptionable conduct would support its majesty, seemed too severe. They grew less delicate in their choice; and, presuming that the faults with which they dispensed would soon be reformed in the society of so many good examples, vice imperceptibly crept among them: corruption, at first secret and timid, grew insensibly open and daring, and made such progress, that the most shameful crimes were soon exhibited on the stage. So much had the Athenian senate degenerated in the days of Mocrates, about 340 years before the Christian era.

Before this tribunal St. Paul was called to give an account of his doctrine, and converted Dionysius, one of their number.

The end of this court of judicature is as obscure as its origin, which was derived from very remote antiquity. It existed, with the other magistracies, in the time of Pausanias, i. e. in the second century. The term of its subsequent duration is not ascertained; but a writer, who lived under the emperor Theodosius the elder and younger, in the fifth century, mentions it as extinct.

ATHERDEE, one of the four baronies, into which the county of Louth is subdivided. This last Camden describes, as does Busching, under the province of Ulster; but others in Leinster, in Ireland.

ATHERDEE, or ARDEE, a small town in the last mentioned barony of the same name. It has a harbour for boats, was seized by the Popish rebels in 1641, and was part of the unfortunate king James II.'s quarters in 1689. It has the right of a market, and sends two members to the Irish parliament.

ATHERLEY, or ADDERLEY, in Shropshire, near Newport; which has a fair on June 29.

ATHERSTON, in Warwickshire, near the river Anker, in the road between London and Derby. Here is a free-school, and a market on Tuesday.

ATHERSTON, or ATHERTON, a market-town on the Stour, in Warwickshire. It has a charity-school, where 20 girls are taught reading, sewing, knitting, and spinning both linen and jersey. Its most considerable fair is on September 19, and the greatest in England for cheese, when the factors buy up vast quantities for Stourbridge fair, also for horses and cows; the other fairs are April 7, for horses, cows, and sheep; July 18, a holiday fair only; and December 4, for horses and fat horned-cattle. At Atherston was formerly an Augustine monastery; and near it is a pretty little seat, called Mereval, belonging to Mr. Stratford: it stands on the edge of a steep hill, commanding a very pleasant prospect for several miles. In the gardens are a vast number of fine oaks, lately valued at upwards of 3000l. The town lies 10 miles N. of Coventry, and upwards of 100 N. W. of London, in Lat. 52, 40, N. Long. 1, 30, E.

ATHLONE, one of the six baronies into which the county of Roscommon, in the province of Connaught, in Ireland, is subdivided. The principal town of the same name in these parts stands on both sides of the Shannon, with a castle, garrison, and fair stone-bridge: the first was built by order of queen Elizabeth for awing, if not suppressing, the rebels. It is a place of considerable strength, being reckoned the key of Connaught, and stands on the very confines of Westmeath, in Leinster. The west-side of the Shannon is called the Irish town, then the best fortified; but its main strength consisted in its castles: and its east-side the English town. In 1690 king William's troops attacked it without success; but next year took it by storm in less than an hour, when our grenadiers, marching up to their breasts in water, beat the enemy from their their posts, and put all that made resistance to the sword; on which occasion they killed 1000 Irish and French, and took 500 prisoners. General Ginkle, for his valour at this siege, and good conduct in the reduction of the rest of the country, was created by king William Earl of Athlone. This action, next to that of the Boyne, was the greatest performed in that war. The town has the right of holding a market, and lies 60 miles W. of Dublin, and 14 from Roscommon. It is also the see of a bishop. Lat. 53, 20, N. Long. 8, 5, W.

ATHOL, in Latin Atholia, the most northern subdivision of Perthshire in Scotland, and also a part of the North Highlands. It is bounded by Badenoch on the N. Lochaber on the W. Mar and Gowry on the E. and S. E. Strathern and Perth Proper on the S. with Broadalbin on the S. W. Its extent from N. W. to S. E. where longest, is 43 miles, and 31 where broadest. The country is very hilly and mountainous: but being watered by the Tay, and many other large rivers and pleasant streams which fall into it, here are several fruitful valleys interspersed among the hills. But these are principally, if not entirely, for pasture, and covered with woods, as some of the hills are. Here are several villages, but no towns of note. The most noted place is Blair castle, on the river Tilt, belonging to the duke of Athol, who derives his title from this district, and lives here with great magnificence.

Part of the famous road made in Scotland by the King's forces under the late general Wade goes through Athol, from Badenoch to Perth, mostly in a spiral direction, in order to avoid the steep grounds; the old road for travellers being over a vast tract of mountainous and heathy ground, called Minigag, with not a house above a single shealing or herd-hut to be seen in it for upwards of 24 Scottish miles, till one comes to Blair of Athol, where, not far from the castle, is the change-house or inn, for travellers.

ATHOS, a celebrated mountain of Chalcidia in Macedonia, situated E. long. 26, 20. N. lat. 40, 10. The ancients entertained extravagant notions concerning its height. Mela affirmed it to be so high as to reach above the clouds; and Martianus Capellinus, that it was 6 miles high. It was a received opinion, that the summit of mount Athos was above the middle region of the air, and that it never rained there: because the ashes left on the altars erected near its summit were always found as they were left, dry and unscattered. But if on many accounts it was famous among the ancients, it is no less so among the moderns. The Greeks, struck with its singular situation and the venerable appearance of its towering ascent, erected so many churches, monasteries, hermitages, &c. upon it, that it became in a manner inhabited by devotees, and from thence received the name of the Holy Mountain; which name it still retains, though many of those consecrated works are now decayed. According to the accounts of modern travellers, this mountain advances into the Archipelago, being joined to the continent by an isthmus about half a league in breadth. It is about 30 miles in circumference, and 2 in perpendicular height. It may be travelled over in about three days, and may be seen 90 miles off. There is a fine prospect from the top, but, like all other high mountains, the cold on its summit is excessive. It abounds with many different kinds of plants and trees, particularly the pine and fir. In the valleys grows a plant called Elegia, whose branches serve to make pens for writing. In short, this mountain is said to be adorned with variety of herbage and evergreens, a multitude of springs and streams, and woods growing near the shore, so as to be one of the most agreeable places in the world.

It is now inhabited by Caloyers, a sort of Greek monks, of the order of St. Basil, who never marry; though others of that church do. They abstain from flesh, and fare very hardly, their ordinary meal being olives pickled when they are ripe. They are about 6000 in all, and inhabit several parts of the mountain, on which are 24 large old monasteries, surrounded with high walls for a defence against banditti. They are so respected, that the Turks themselves will often send them alms. These monks are not idle like others; but labour with the axe, spade, and sickle, dressing themselves like hermits. Formerly they had fine Greek manuscripts; but are now become so illiterate that they can scarce read or write.

Through this mountain, or rather through the isthmus behind it, Xerxes king of Persia is said to have cut a passage for his fleet when about to invade Greece. In this work he spent three whole years, and employed in it all the forces on board the fleet. He is also said, before the work was begun, to have written the following insolent and ridiculous letter to the mountain: "Athos, thou proud and aspiring mountain, that liftest up thy head to the very skies, I advise thee not to be so audacious as to put rocks and stones, that cannot be cut, in the way of my workmen. If thou makest that opposition, I will cut thee entirely down, and throw thee headlong into the sea." The directors of this enterprise are said to have been Bubaris, the son of Megabyzus, and Artacheus, the son of Arbeus, both Persians; but, as no traces of such a great work remain, the truth of the whole relation has justly been called in question.

ATHY, or Aroy, a neat little town belonging to the county of Kildare, and province of Leinster, in Ireland. It is situated on the Barrow, over which is a fair stone-bridge. It was attacked by by the rebels in 1643, and most part of it burnt. Here are barracks for a troop of horse. It lies 10 miles from Kildare, and sends two members to parliament. Lat. 53, 5, N. Long. 7, 5, W.

ATIENCA, a small town of Old Castile in Spain: it is situated on a mountain of the same name with it. Here are salt-springs, also corn and pasture for cattle.

ATIGNY. See ATTIGNY.

ATLANTIS, ATALANTIS, or ATLANTICA, an island mentioned by Plato, and some others of the ancients, concerning the real existence of which many disputes have been raised. Homer, Horace, and the other poets, make two Atlantias, calling them Hesperides, and Elysian fields, making them the habitations of the blessed. The most distinct account of this island we have in Plato's Timæus, of which Mr. Chambers gives the following abridgement. "The Atlantis was a large island in the western ocean, situated before or opposite to the straits of Gades. Out of this island there was an easy passage into some others, which lay near a large continent exceeding in bigness all Europe and Asia. Neptune settled in this island (from whose son Atlas its name was derived), and divided it among his ten sons. To the youngest fell the extremity of the island called Gadir; which, in the language of the country, signifies fertile, or abundant in sheep. The descendants of Neptune reigned here from father to son for a great number of generations in the order of primogeniture, during the space of 9000 years. They also possessed several other islands; and, passing into Europe and Africa, subdued all Lybia as far as Egypt, and all Europe to Asia Minor. At length the island sunk under water; and for a long time afterwards the sea thereabouts was full of rocks and shelves."

Many of the moderns, also, are of opinion that the existence of the Atlantis is not to be looked upon as entirely fabulous. Some take it to have been America; and from thence, as well as from a passage in Seneca's Medea, and some other obscure hints, they imagine that the New World was not unknown to the ancients. But allowing this to be the case, the above-mentioned continent which was said to lie beyond Atlantis would seem rather to have been the continent of America than Atlantis itself. The learned Rüdbeck, professor in the university of Upsal, in a work entitled, Atlantica five Manheim, endeavours to prove that Sweden and Norway are the Atlantis of the ancients; but this its situation will by no means allow us to believe. By Kircher it is supposed to have been an island extending from the Canaries quite to the Azores; that it was really swallowed up by the ocean as Plato asserts; and that these small islands are the shattered remains of it which were left standing.

A T

ATLAS, a chain of mountains in Africa, lying between the 20th and 25th degree of N. latitude, and supposed almost to divide the continent from east to west. They are said to have derived their name from Atlas king of Mauritania, who was a great astronomer. They are greatly celebrated by the ancients on account of their height, inasmuch that the abovementioned king, who is said to have been transformed into a mountain, was feigned to bear up the heavens on his shoulders. We are assured, however, by Dr. Shaw, that the part of this chain of mountains which fell under his observation, could not stand in competition either with the Alps or Appenines. He tells us, that if we conceive a number of hills, usually of the perpendicular height of 400, 500, or 600 yards, with an easy ascent, and several groves of fruit or forest trees, rising up in a succession of ranges above one another, and that if to this prospect we add now and then a rocky precipice, and on the summit of each imagine a miserable mud-walled village, we shall then have a just idea of the mountains of Atlas.

ATLIMSK, a post-station in the circle of Tobolskoi, and province of this last name, in Siberia and Asiatic part of Russia. It is situated on the river Obi.

ATOK. See ATTOCK.

ATONGUIA, a small town of Leira district, belonging to the Portuguese Estremadura. It is situated on the sea, contains 1300 inhabitants, and has a castle by which it is defended.

ATOOR, or ATOUR, one of the two most considerable towns of Marava, a large kingdom tributary to that of Madura, in the peninsula of India within the Ganges, in Asia. Here the Jesuits built a church, which stands near the capital of Madura. The only drink here, they say, is pond-water, and bitter vegetables the only food, except rice boiled in water. Fruit is very scarce. Their greatest trade is in fish, which they carry up the country to exchange for rice and other provisions, of which the fishing-coast is quite destitute; the whole coast, for about 12 leagues from Cape Comorin on the N. W. to Calimere point on the S. E. being covered with a sort of bramble, and dry burning sand, except a forest of 5 or 6 leagues in length, infested by tigers.

ATRA, (mentioned under the article ARRA) a city of the Arraceni, or Saracens, in Arabia, but the exact situation of it is not determined, at least that we can find. When the emperor Trajan marched into Arabia, and there made war upon the Arraceni, or Hagareni, he laid siege to their city which by Xiphilin is called Atra. It was neither great nor beautiful, says Dion Cassius, but thought to be very rich, by reason the sun was worshipped there, which drew crowds of people thither with rich rich presents from the neighbouring countries. It was situated on the top of a high and steep mountain, well peopled, and surrounded with strong walls. But its chief strength consisted in the barrenness of the neighbouring country, destitute to a great distance of grass, wood, and even of water; so that a great army could not long subsist before it. Hence it was neither taken now by Trajan, nor afterwards by Severus, though they had both made a breach in the wall. Trajan narrowly escaped being killed in one of the attacks. The Romans were moreover infested, in their camp, in a strange manner, by swarms of flies: so that Trajan in the end was obliged to raise the siege and retire.

ATRATO, a considerable river, which runs into the Gulf of Mexico, near Carthage.

ATRE, a river in Cornwall; which runs into the Tamer, near the hill of Bromwelly.

ATRI, anciently ATRIA, ADRIA, or HADRIA, the birth-place of the emperor Adrian, and an ancient colony of Picenum; now a small city of the Further Abruzzo, a province of Naples, in the middle division of Italy. It stands on a hill, 4 miles from the Adriatic sea. It is the see of a bishop immediately dependent on the Pope, and gives the title of a dukedom (according to the Geographical System, a principality) to the house of Aquaviva. It lies 26 miles W. of Aquileia. Lat. 42, 45. N. Long. 13, 28. E.

ATSCHITZKAJA, a fortress in the rough and wild deserts of the Orenburg government, belonging to the Asiatic part of Russia. It has its name from the river on which it is situated.

ATROPATENE, or ATROPATIA MEDIA, one of the two divisions or complicated provinces of Media, was that part which lay between Mount Taurus and the Caspian sea, and is supposed to have been so called from one Atropatus, who being governor of this province in the time of Darius, the last Persian monarch, withstood Alexander the Great; and, upon the downfall of the Persian monarchy, seized on this part of Media, and transmitted it to his posterity, who held it as sovereigns to Strabo's time. This, we are told, was a cold, barren, and inhospitable country, and on that very account allotted by Salmaneser for the abode of many captive Israelites, after the conquest of that kingdom. But Polybius says it was plentifully stored with all sorts of provision. In process of time, however, it became a very considerable kingdom; for Strabo tells us the kings of Atropatene could bring into the field 40,000 foot and 20,000 horse.

ATROPATIA. See ATROPATENE.

ARTZINSK, an ostrog, or palisaded fortress, in the circle of Tomskoi, and Jensei province, of Siberia, in Asiatic Russia.

A T

ATTACAMA. See ATACAMES. The western boundary of the audience of Charcas, and a jurisdiction of the archbishopric of Plata in Peru, in South America. It extends to the South sea. The principal town, bearing the same name with it, is no less than 120 leagues from Plata. Its jurisdiction is of a considerable extent, and a great deal of it very fruitful; but is interspersed with some deserts, particularly towards the S. where it divides the kingdoms of Peru and Chili. On the coast in this province is annually a large fishery of Tolo, a sort of fish common in the South sea, in which a very considerable trade is carried on with the inland provinces, it being there the principal food during Lent, and other days of abstinence.

ATTELLA, a small place of the Basilicate, a province of Naples, in the lower division of Italy. It gives the title of duke.

ATTENCOURT, a village of Vallage, a subdivision of Upper Champagne, in the government of this last name, and Brie, in France. It lies two miles from Vassy; and is worth notice only on account of a mineral spring.

ATTENDORN, a town on the river Bigge, and in which is an observantine cloyster, with an hospital and chorals of St. Nicholas. Near this place, which is in the duchy of Westphalia, is found marble.

ATTICA, a province of Greece, now the duchy of Athens, in European Turkey.

ATTIGNY, in Latin Attiniacum, an old little town of Retelois, a subdivision of Upper Champagne, in the government of this last name, and Brie, in France. It is situated on the river Aine, in a fine country, which is called Valle de Bourg. Caesar built a fort here, and for some centuries past there has been a royal palace at Attigny, where also councils have been held. It lies 20 miles N. E. of Rheims. Lat. 49, 25. N. Long. 4, 40. E.

ATTLEBOROUGH, a large and populous market-town or village of Shoreham hundred in Norfolk. It is situated 10 miles N. of Thetford, and 80 N. E. of London. Its fairs are on April 11, Holy Thursday, and August 15, for cattle and toys. Lat. 52, 30. N. Long. 40. E.

ATTLEBOROUGH, a town of Bristol-county in New-England, North America. It lies N. of Rehoboth, and has grown rich from the increase of its inhabitants.

ATTOCK, or ATTOCH, one of the 9 northern provinces of Indostan in the East-Indies, in Asia. It is situated E. of Hagacan, between Cabul on the N. W. Siba on the S. E. Cachemire on the N. and Penjab on the S. The Sansons map make it about 310 miles from N. E. to S. W. and 185 where broadest from S. to N. But Catron makes it less. Its principal town is of the same name, and situated where the Indus receives the Nilab, though Catron places ATTREBATHI, Ancient Britons, bordering on the Belgæ, and who inhabited what we now call Berkshire. They, as well as the Belgæ, came originally from Belgic Gaul, as we read in Cæsar, and, settling in Britain, retained their ancient names. Their chief city was Calcuæ, as Ptolemy calls it; or Caleva, as named by Antoninus; now Wallingford.

ATURIA, or ATYRIA, though apparently but a small district of Assyria, had its name often extending over the whole, and, according to Bochart, was a name synonymous with it (Assyria) allowing only for the difference of dialect; Aturia being only the Chaldee way of pronouncing what the Hebrews pronounce Assyria, the former changing the Hebrew Sin into the Tau. But Strabo divides Aturia from Arebitis by the river Lycus: whence it is plain it was by the Greeks reckoned as a part only of this country, however the name may have been common to all of it.

ATZBUL, a parish of Sundewit district, in the duchy of Sleswick, Denmark; it belongs to the duke of Augustenburg.

AU, a market-town, castle, and lordship; seated on the small river Abens, in Lower Bavaria.

AVA, an empire of India beyond the Ganges, in Asia. It is bounded by Mogulston on the west, Siam on the south, Tonquin and Cochinchina on the east, and by Thibet and China on the north. Several large rivers run through this country, which annually overflow their banks like the Nile. Here are mines of lead and copper, together with some of gold and silver, besides quantities of the finest oriental rubies, sapphires, emeralds, &c. De L'Isle places it between lat. 15 and 28. The greatest part of it formerly belonged to the king of Pegu, who had 20 other kingdoms in his dominions besides. But that monarchy has been destroyed by 2 potent kings, namely, those of Ava and Siam; the former of which possesses, or feudally commands, all the country now called the kingdom of Ava, as above bounded.

AVA, the metropolis of the kingdom of the same name; situated in E. Long. 96, 30. N. Lat. 21, 0. It is pretty large; the houses built with timber or bamboo canes, with thatched roofs, and floors made of teak plank or split bamboo. The streets are very straight, with rows of trees planted on each side. The king's palace is an exact quadrangle, each side of which is 800 paces, and is surrounded with a brick-wall; but the palace itself is of stone. It has 4 gates; the golden gate, through which all ambassadors enter; the gate of justice, through which the people bring petitions, accusations, or complaints; the gate of grace, through which those pass who have received any favours, or have been acquitted of crimes laid to their charge; and the gate of state, through which his majesty himself passes when he shews himself to the people.

AVA, a province and town of the same name, in the island of Xicoco, one of the three parts of Japan.

AVAL, one of the four bailiwicks of Franche-comte, in the government of this last name, belonging to France. It comprehends the subordinate bailiwicks of Poligny, Salins, Arbois, Pontanlier.

AVALON, or ORGELET, a small town of Auxois, one of the districts of Burgundy, in the government of this last name, belonging to France. It is situated on the river Cousin. It is the principal place for a collection of the tailles, and the capital of the small territory of Avalonnois. It has a particular governor, a bailiwick united with a chancery; a mairie, which has the care of the police; a forest-court, and salt-magazine; likewise a collegiate-church, 2 parish-churches, 5 convents, with a college and hospital. It is naturally strong from its situation, and is also defended by a good castle. Here a small council was held under pope Pascal I. when Louis Debonnaire, king of France, touched with remorse for having put to death his nephew Bernard, king of Italy, and shut up his other nephews in a cloister, did public penance before the bishops and people of France. It lies about 11 miles south-east from Rheims. Lat. 47, 25, N. Long. 3, 50, E.

AVALON, a peninsula at the south-east corner of the island of Newfoundland, which is joined to the island by a narrow neck of land that has Placentia-bay on the south and Trinity-bay on the north. The east part of this peninsula is encompassed by the great bank, and has, besides the two former bays, the bay of Conception on the north, and the bay of St. Mary and Trepassy-bay on the south. It contains several excellent harbours, bays, and capes; among which are St. Mary's, Pine, Race, Ballard, St. Francis, &c.

AVANCAY, a jurisdiction in the diocese of Cusco, and audience of Lima, in Peru, South-America. It begins 4 leagues north-east from Cusco-city, extending above 30. Its air in general is hot; and many parts have large plantations of canes, which yield a very rich sugar. The lands where the air is more temperate abound in wheat, maize, and fruits, part of which are sent to Cusco. In the valley Xaquijaguana, belonging to this province, Pizarro was defeated and taken prisoner by Pedro de la Gasca.

AVANTGARDE, a lordship and old fief of Barrois, not dependent on France, in the district of the same name, and government of Lorrain and Bar. It lies on the Moselle, opposite to Condé.

AVARICUM, an ancient town of the Bituriges, in Gallia Celtica; situated on the rivulet Ava-ra, in a very fertile soil: now Bourges, in Berry. Long. 2, 30, E. Lat. 47, 10, N.

AVAUX LA VILLE, a village and earldom of Remois, in Upper Champagne, belonging to the government of this last name, and Brie, in France. It is situated on the river Aisne.

AVAUX LE CHATEAU, a small place belonging also to the last-mentioned earldom, and on the same river. In this county Charlemagne vanquished the Normans, when most of them were drowned in the river.

AUB, a small town in the bishopric of Wurzburg, and where was formerly a Benedictine provostship belonging to the cloister of St. Burchard, in Wurzburg.

AUBAGNE, in Latin Aubanca, or Albania, a little town of Aix, a provincial district of Lower Provence, belonging to the government of this last name, in France. It has the title of a barony; and is situated near the Mediterranean, 7 miles south-east of Marseilles, and 5 south of Aix. Lat. 43, 15, N. Long. 5, 30, E.

AUBANTON, or AUBENTON, in Latin Aubantonium, or Albantonium, a little town of Tierache, belonging to Upper Picardy, in France. It is situated on the confines of the Netherlands, near the source of the Oyse, between Guise and Mezieres. Here is a salt-granary.

AUBE, one of the principal rivers in the government of Champagne and Brie, in France. It rises on the confines between Burgundy and Champagne, and near Conflans unites its waters with the Seine. The attempts hitherto made for rendering it navigable have proved unsuccessful.

AUBENAS, a small town and barony of Lower Vivarais, belonging to the diocese of Viviers, and government of Languedoc, in France. Here was a Jesuits college.

AUBEROCAE, a town in the Limosin, France; which was besieged in 1344 by Count de L'Isle Jourdain, with 12000 French, who was defeated and obliged to raise the siege by the earl of Derby, with about 5000 English.

AUBETERRE, a little town, and a marquissate of Angomois, in the government of Saintonge, and of that last-mentioned name, in France. Here is an abbey and collegiate church.

AUBIGNY, a bailiwick of Artois, in the government of this last name, and of Picardy, in France. Its chief place, also called Aubigny, is a bourg or large village, which is divided into two parts, namely, Aubigny le Comte and Aubigny le Marche.

AUBIGNY, in Latin Albiniacum, a small town in the territory of Sologne, belonging to Lower Orleans, in the government of that name. It is situated on the river Nerre, in a level and delightful country. It has strong walls, deep ditches, and high counterescarps, with four gates and as many suburbs. In it is a pretty good castle, which, with the town, were given by king Charles VII. to John Stuart, constable of Scotland, as a reward for his services. Others say it was granted by Charles VIII. to Bernard Stuart, captain of his Scottish guards, who was of the family of Lenox in that kingdom. It gives title of duke and peer of France to the duke of Richmond, as descended from the dukes of Portsmouth, Louisa de Querouaille, king Charles II.'s favourite mistress, who was created duchess of Aubigny by the king of France, at the solicitation of that monarch. It gave birth, or at least name, to the famous Madam de Maintenon's father, who was a Protestant of some eminence in literature, and wrote several pieces. Here is only one parish-church, dedicated to St. Martin, and 3 convents. It lies 24 miles north of Bourges. Lat. 47, 3, N. Long. 2, 20, E.

AUBIN (St.) in the Isle of Jersey, is a town of merchants and masters of ships who first settled in that place (otherwise not so proper to build on, because too much streighted between hills and the sea) for the sake of its port, the best and most frequented in the island. It is not half so big a town as St. Hellier; but its houses are every whit as neat, and they are almost all new. Its parish church, called St. Brelande's, is at such a distance, and there is such a bleak hill to pass over to it, that the better sort of the inhabitants have, by a contribution, built a handsome chapel in the town. There is a fort here, with cannon planted on its bastions: and a strong pier has been run out into the sea, like that of Guernsey, which joins to the fort, and renders the harbour safe and quiet; so that no ships can pass within its pier but by its permission, and under its guns. A sixth-rate man of war just floats at a dead neap, and a ship of 200 tons at all times. A vessel of 130 tons may come in at half-flood; but larger ships and men of war must keep without in the road, where is good anchorage. The market is on Mondays.

AUBIN (St.) a small town of Brittany, 12 miles north-east of Rennes; near which a bloody battle was fought in 1486, between the duke of Britany's forces and the French, in which the former were entirely defeated.

AUBOIS, one of the many rivers in the government of Nivernois, in France.

AUBONNE, in Latin Albona, a small town in the canton of Bern, in Switzerland, a very ancient barony, which, among many other masters, gave title to the famous traveller Tavernier, who, being ennobled by his nephew, died very poor; and afterwards to the celebrated French admiral, the marquis du Quesne, who sold it to the canton of Bern for 200,000 livres. They had before been in possession of it once or twice, and always sold it it; but this time they kept it, and improved it into an excellent bailiwick. Long. 5, 54, N. Lat. 48, 30. It is situated near a river of the same name, 7 miles north of the lake of Geneva, upon an eminence which has a gentle declivity, at the foot of which runs the river, with an impetuous torrent. The town is built in the form of an amphitheatre; on the upper part of which stands a very handsome castle with a fine court, and a portico supported by pillars of a single stone each; above there is a covered gallery that runs round the court; and as the castle stands high, there is a most delightful prospect, not only of the town and neighbouring fields, but of the whole lake of Geneva and the land that surrounds it. At Thonon, in Savoy, on the other side of the lake, is a tower covered with tin, which makes a glittering appearance when the sun is in a certain position; and the castle of Aubonne has likewise a tower of the same kind, which at certain hours makes a similar appearance to the Savoyards. The balliage of Aubonne contains several villages, which are mostly at the foot of the mountain Jura. In one part of this mountain there is a very deep cave, wherein those that go down find a natural and perpetual ice-house, or glacierie. Here a great noise is heard, like that of the current of a subterraneous river, probably the source of the Audonne, which seems to rise not far from hence.

AUBUN DU CORMIER (St.) a small town belonging to the bishopric of Rennes, in Upper Brittany, and government of this last name, in France. Near it the Britons, their allies, defeated the army of king Charles VIII. It lies 12 miles N. E. of Rennes. Lat. 48, 15, N. Long. 1, 50, W.

AUBURN, a little place and principal market-town of Ramsbury hundred, in the east part of Wiltshire. It gives name to the neighbouring forest and chase; and is besides noted for the great numbers of rabbits it sends to London.

AUBURY. See ABURY.

AUBUSSON, in Latin Albucium, Aubussonium, or Albua, a small but pretty populous town of the Upper Marche, in the government of this last name, in France. It is situated on the Creuse, in a bottom surrounded with rocks and mountains, near the confines of Auvergne. A manufacture of tapestry here has rendered the place full of inhabitants; and they drive a pretty good trade. It belongs to the duke de la Feuillade, whose surname is d'Aubusson; and of this family was one who was grand master of Malta, and defended Rhodes two months against Mahomet II. obliging him at last to raise the siege. Here is a castleward and a chapter. Lat. 45, 55, N. Long. 2, 15, E.

AUCAUGREL, the capital of the kingdom of Adel, in Africa, seated on a mountain. E. Long. 44, 25, E. Lat. 9, 10, N.

A U

AUCH, AUSCH, or Aux, in Latin Auscii, anciently Elusaberris, or, as it is sometimes written, Climberris, Ellimberris, afterwards Augusta, or Augusta Ausciorum, the capital of Armagnac Proper, and all Gascony; in the government of this last name, and of Guyenne, in France. It stands partly low, and partly on the side of a hill, upon the river Gers. It is divided into the Upper and Lower town; the communication to which is by a stone stair-case of about 200 steps. It is the see of an archbishop, and one of the richest in France, the seat of an intendency, collection of the tailles, bailiwick, country-court, board of the finances, election, and royal jurisdiction. The lordship over the town is divided between the archbishop and the count of Armagnac. The former has 10 suffragans under him, a diocese consisting of 372 parishes, and 277 chapels of ease, a revenue of 90,000 livres, and he is assessed 10,000 florins to the court of Rome. Besides the cathedral, which is a very magnificent structure, said to be founded by Clovis the Great, here is a chapter of 15 dignitaries and 25 canons. Among the latter are 5 honorary ones, of which the king himself is the first, as count of Armagnac; and here also is a priory. Lat. 43, 39, N. Long. 40 min. E.

AUDE, one of the principal rivers of Languedoc in France. It rises in Cerdagne, a county of Roussillon, among the Pyrenean mountains, and running N. by Alet in that county, visits Corsac, and from thence directing its course through Languedoc, falls into the Mediterranean a little to the N. E. of Narbonne.

AUDENARDE. See OUDENARDE.

AUDIERNE, a small sea-port belonging to the bishopric of Quimper, or Cornouaille, in Lower Britany, and government of that name, in France. It is situated on a little bay at the mouth of a rivulet which comes from Pont le Croix. Before the mouth of this river lies a shelve, to the W. of which is 10 fathom water; between that and the land only 6, till one enters into the harbour, where there is but 4 fathom, and at low-tide only 3. It is about 5 leagues from Quimper to the N. E.

AUDLEY-END, Essex, 1 mile S. from Saffron-Walden, and 34 from London; once a royal palace, the largest in England, of which there still remains one large court. It was built out of the ruins of a monastery, by Thomas, lord Audley, who designed it to be a palace for king James I. who made him his lord high treasurer, and created him earl of Suffolk: but, when it was finished with all the grand taste of that time, his majesty said, it might do well enough for a lord treasurer, but it was too much for a king; and therefore he turned it upon the earl's hands, who is said to have had an estate then of 50,000 l. a year. King Charles II. indeed purchased it for a royal palace, as the builder intended tended it, and mortgaged the hearth-tax to James, earl of Suffolk, to answer the purchase; but, upon the Revolution, when the said tax was taken off, and the state not in a condition to spare the purchase-money, king William re-granted the house to the family; upon which, Henry, earl of Suffolk and Bindon, pulled down a great part of it; nevertheless, it is a large and magnificent seat, with a large park behind it, well stocked with deer. In 1764, the ground in the front of the house was elegantly laid out, and a fine stone bridge built over the river made out of a ditch by Sir John Griffin Griffin, the present owner. Fair, August 5.

AUDUS Mountain, in Numidia (or the kingdom of Algiers), the Mons Audus of Ptolemy, or the Mons Aurafius of the middle age, known at present among the Turks by the name Jibbel [i. e. Mount] Aureis, or Evrefs. "We are not (says Dr. Shaw) to leave the mountains of Aureis without observing, that the inhabitants have a quite different mein and aspect from their neighbours. For their complexions are so far from being swarthy, that they are fair and ruddy; and their hair, which among the other Kabyles is of a dark colour, is with them of a deep yellow." These circumstances (notwithstanding they are Mahometans, and speak the common language only of the Kabyles) may induce us to take them, if not for the tribe mentioned by Procopius, yet at least for some remnant or other of the Vandals, who, notwithstanding they were dispossessed in his time of those strong-holds, and dispersed among the African families, might have had several opportunities afterwards of collecting themselves into bodies, and re-instating them. If I am not mistaken in making this mountain the ancient Audus, we may then presume the Misulami were the former inhabitants.

AUDUS (River) was placed by Ptolemy at the bottom of the Sinus Numidicus; no traces of which are now to be seen.

AUDUS (Promontory) also in Numidia.

AUE, a small mine-town on the Mulde, in the circle of Erzgebirg, with a feat and voice at the land-diets. Not far from it is the white earth pit, out of which the earth for the Misnian Porcelain is dug.

AVEIN, a village of Luxembourg, in the Austrian Netherlands, two leagues from Rochefort. It is memorable for a battle fought near it in 1635, in which the French, under the command of Gaspar de Coligny, marshal Chatillon, defeated the Spaniards, commanded by prince Thomas of Savoy, when the latter had 4000 men killed, lost all their baggage, most of their artillery, besides many prisoners, &c.

AVEIRAS DI CIMA, a town of Santareen district, in Portuguese Estremadura, belonging to the counts of Aveiras. In the same district is another small place, called Aveiras Debaixo.

AVEIRO, a middling town in the district of the Montemaur o Velho, belonging to Beira, in Portugal, seated near the head of a small gulf formed by the tide at the mouth of the river Vouga. This river forms a small haven with a bar, over which vessels may pass, that do not draw above 8 or 9 feet water. The city stands in a long plain, well watered, and very fertile. This plain is 9 miles broad, from Porto to Coimbra; and is bounded on the east by a chain of mountains, called Sara d'Alcoba, which reach from the one town to the other. Near this city there is salt made in sufficient quantity to serve two or three provinces. Here is a remarkable nunnery, where none are received but the daughters of the ancient nobility. The inhabitants of Aveiro have the singular privilege, that no stranger whatever can pass a night there without leave of the magistrate. It contains 4000 inhabitants, 4 parish-churches, all which belong to the order of Aviz, has a house of mercy, an hospital, and 6 convents; likewise a tribunal called Alfandega, with a judge, secretaries, and other officers; besides several peculiar privileges of a juridical kind. King John III. raised this town to a duchy. To its jurisdiction belong 7 parishes. Lat. 40, 32, N. Long. 9, 8, W.

AVELLA, a small place of Lavoro, belonging to Naples, in the lower division of Italy.

AVELLAR, a town of Ourem audience, in Portuguese Estremadura.

AVELLINO, in Latin Abellinum, an ancient town of the Hirpini, a small city of the Further Principate of Naples, in Lower Italy. It has the title of a principality, which is in the house of Caraccioli. Its bishop, whose see has since been united to that of Fricono, is under the metropolitan of Benevento; it lies 25 miles E. of Naples city, and was nearly destroyed by an earthquake, Nov. 29, 1732. Lat. 41, 11, N. Long. 15, 20, E.

AVENAY, a little town of Upper Champagne, in the government of this last name, and Brie, in France. It is situated on the Marne; and has a chapter and abbey.

AVENCHES, a bailiwick of the Pais de Vaud, dependent only upon the canton of Bern, in Switzerland. It extends along the lakes of Morat and Neuchâtel.

AVENCHES, or the ancient Aventicum, a town of the last mentioned bailiwick, and was formerly the largest in all Switzerland. Tacitus calls it the capital of the Helvetians; and Ptolemy, the Itinerary, and Cæsar speak of it as a very considerable place. One may judge by the ruins of towers and walls of a large circuit, now called Willisburg, that it had been a fine strong city, though now a mean village. It has a handsome castle, with a church, &c. Near it is a most curious hermitage cut out of a solid rock. Its neighbourhood produces faces plenty of wine and corn; and near the lake of Morat and other parts are rich meadows.

AVENES, a small but strong town in French Flanders, in the county of Hainalt, seated on the river Thiespes. It contains about 2500 inhabitants; but the houses are wretchedly built, and the streets irregular. It was fortified by M. Vauban in a strong regular manner. About this place are a prodigious number of white stones proper for building, and used by sculptors for statues: they are known by the name of Stones of Avenes. E. long. 3, 40. N. lat. 50, 10.

AVENTINE (Mount), in Latin Mons Aventinus, one of the mountains on which Rome stands. It anciently made the 12th ward; extending itself on one side from the Doliolum or Mons Testaceus, to the foot of Porta Capena, now the gate of St. Sebastian. See ROME.

AVERANCE. See AVRANCHES.

AVERBACH, a small town in the circle of Voigtland, the property of the noble of Planitz. It carries on a trade in cloth and iron wares; the former is made here, but the latter in the neighbouring foundries.

AVERNACH, one of the two largest isles situated in the bay near Faaborg, in the diocese of Funen, Denmark. In it is a church.

AVERNO, in Latin Lacus Avernus, a lake of Campania in Italy, near Baiæ, famous among the ancients for its poisonous qualities. The following is the description given of it by Strabo. "Next to Baiæ lies the Lucrine bay, and within it the lake Avernus. It was here that Homer had described Ulysses as conversing with Tiresias's ghost; for here they said was the oracle sacred to the shades, which Ulysses came and consulted concerning his return. The Avernus is a deep darksome lake, with a narrow entry from the outer bay: it is surrounded with steep banks that hang threatening over it; and is only accessible by the narrow passage through which you sail in. These banks were anciently quite overgrown with a wild wood, impenetrable to the human foot. Its gloomy shade impressed an awful superstition upon the minds of the beholders; whence it was reputed the habitation of the Cimmerians who dwelt in perpetual night. Whoever sailed thither, first did sacrifice; and endeavoured to propitiate the infernal powers, with the assistance of some priests who attended upon the place, and directed the mystic performance. Within, a fountain of pure water broke out just over the sea; but nobody ever believed it, stating it to be a vein of the river Styx: somewhere near this fountain was the oracle; and the hot waters frequent in those parts made them think they were branches of the burning Phlegethon." The communication with the Lucrine lake is still to be distinguished, although filled up with earth; the distance between the two is but a few paces. The poisonous effluvia from this lake were said to be so strong, that they proved fatal to birds endeavouring to fly over it; but after grubbing up the wood, and building round it, no noxious effects were felt. Virgil ascribes the poisonous exhalation not to the lake itself, but to the cavern near it, which was called Avernus, or Cave of the Sibyl, and through which the poets feigned a descent to hell. Hence the proper name of the lake is Lacus Avernus, the lake near the cavern, as it is called by some ancient authors. It is now called Averno; it is about 2 miles long, and 1 broad; and so far is it now from having any qualities noxious to birds, that many swim upon it. A little to the W. is the Cave of the Sibyl, but its noxious qualities seem also to be lost. The old walls standing upon it to the E. are supposed to be the ruins of a temple of Apollo, or Pluto; and in a cave to the W. was an oracle, where the Heathens sacrificed to the infernal deities. Nero's projected canal, from this lake to the Tiber, proved abortive, after a vast expence.

AVERSA, anciently Atella, now a little town near Naples, in Lower Italy, having been destroyed by Charles of Anjou, king of Naples, for a rebellion; but it was afterwards rebuilt, and erected into a bishopric. In the neighbouring country are several fine seats, the tract between it and the city of Naples being very delightful, and a perfect level, full of orange plantations. It lies 7 miles S. of Capua, in lat. 41, 15, N. Long. 14, 45, E.

AVES, i. e. Birds-island; so called from the vast number of fowls of different species upon it. This is one of the smaller Caribbees, W. of Santos, in the Atlantic ocean. Its soil is generally sandy, without any springs; but it has many ponds of salt-water. On it are several shrubs, particularly guavas. The coasts abound with tortoises, bonettas or sea parrots, &c. with a variety of shell-fish. Different from this, as distinguished in our maps, is the island of the same name, or rather a cluster of small islands, on the coast of Terra Firma, in South America, belonging to the Dutch, and 80 miles E. of Curassoa.

AVESNES. See AVENES.

AUFKIRCH, a market town on the Wernitz, in the principality of Oettingen, containing one Lutheran church.

AUFRING, a parish of Kalloe bailiwick, and diocese of Aarhus, in North Jutland, in Denmark; remarkable for a very stately marble monument in its church for one of the counts of Scheel.

AUGE, a subdivision of Lower Normandy, in France. In this territory are fine meadows.

AUGNA, a small territory in the district of Inderoen, and bailiwick of Drontheim, in the diocese of this last name, in Norway.

AUGSBURG, or AUSBURG, in Latin Augusta Vindelicorum, from Augustus Cæsar, who planted a Roman colony here among the Vindelici, is now the metropolis of Suabia, Germany, as it was formerly of all the countries beyond the Danube and the Alps. It stands near the confines of Bavaria, at the conflux of the two rivers Lech and Werdach, or Wertach, which fall into the Danube 25 miles below it. It is capital of its bishopric (a suffragan of Mentz), which is separated from Bavaria by the Lech, and borders on the marquisate of Burgaw to N. W. It extends about 60 miles in length, and 10 in breadth, and contains 18 abbeys, 9 nunneries, 9 provostships, and 41 deanries, wherein are 1000 parishes; for which the bishop, who is a Roman Catholic, and has nothing to do with temporals, pays about 100*l.* a year tribute to the Pope. He is elected by the chapter, consisting of persons of quality, who are obliged to make proof of their nobility by 16 descents; and have 40 canonships well endowed. It is one of the biggest and most beautiful cities in Germany, and situated in one of the most beautiful plains that can possibly be seen, remarkable for many battles, and for having been the usual place of rendezvous for the forces of the German emperors, when they were to pass the Alps. This town has been very famous in all ages, and in the 16th was on a par with Antwerp, for trade, when the commodities of Italy were brought this way by land, and conveyed hence to other parts of the empire; but now London and Amsterdam bring those commodities in ships from the Mediterranean. Its trade, therefore, at present, besides the Bank commerce, and the Tirol wines, with which it almost wholly supplies Germany, consists in goldsmiths wares, clocks, and ivory; with which, and all kind of pretty toys, not inferior to those of Nuremberg, it furnishes Germany, Poland, and the N. of Europe. But even in several of those things the English artificers have of late years excelled, and served foreign countries therewith, to the great detriment both of Augsburg and Nuremberg, which had for several centuries been in possession of this trade.

It had the name of Augusta 12 years before the birth of our Saviour, and is the only town, among many, to which it was once common, that has preserved that name, (Augsburgh being as if it were said Augustusburg, or Augustaburg) with so much lustre to this day, though it has not quite the grandeur or number of people it once had; for this city has had misfortunes enough to sink it into oblivion. However, it always recovered them. It was about 550 years a colony of the Romans, or Goths, and was afterwards possessed by the Franks till Charlemagne's time. In 451 it was ravaged by Attila the Hun; and in the reign of the emperor Otho the Great it was plundered and destroyed by rebels. In 1026, Guelph, duke of Bavaria, fell upon the bishop and took the town, which he also razed to the ground. In 1084 Leopold of Austria and Herman duke of Suabia plundered and reduced a part of it to ashes; and 4 years after this, Guelph of Bavaria burnt and destroyed the rest, leaving hardly one stone upon another. It was, however, so far recovered afterwards, that in 1162 the emperor Frederick I. made it an Imperial city; and in 1266 it bought its entire freedom of Conrade duke of Suabia, whose ancestors held it a good while as a fief of the empire. In 1462, 11,000 persons died here of the plague, as did next year one fourth of their neighbours.

In 1518 Luther gave an account of his faith to the diet here, and 12 years after he and Melancthon presented their confession of faith here to the emperor Charles V. from whence the Lutherans are said to be of the Augsburg Confession, though their present system is very different from that confession. In 1535 another plague carried off 13,000 of the inhabitants. It was about 1535 that the Protestants, who were then grown powerful in the empire, seized this city, and the senate embraced the reformation; sent to Luther for ministers, and turned out the Roman bishop and clergy; but Charles V. retaking the city, re-established the latter, who continued in the government till 1552, when the Protestants took it again, and restored what the emperor had destroyed: and, though a peace was at length concluded, at Augsburg, yet violence were soon committed on both sides, till Gustavus Adolphus of Sweden came to their aid in 1632. Which so provoked the Catholic princes, and particularly the duke of Bavaria, that two years after the latter besieged this city, and reduced it to such extremity, that they eat cats, rats, and even human flesh. It was at length settled, by the peace of Westphalia, that the Catholics and Lutherans should tolerate one another; since which time they have equally shared the government of the city. Here have been several Imperial diets and religious transactions, besides the above mentioned; particularly the diet in 1585, by Charles V. when he proposed that formulary called the Interim, for accommodating the disputes betwixt the Papists and Protestants about religion and church government; but it pleased neither side, and did not long subsist. Joseph, king of Hungary, afterwards emperor, was here chosen and crowned king of the Romans in 1689. In 1703 it was terribly ravaged by Maximilian, elector of Bavaria, who, because it received an Imperial garrison, after having demanded and obtained a neutrality, took it, and demolished the fortifications. He found here 130 cannons, and arms for 10,000 men. About a fortnight before the battle of Hochstet, the elector took shelter under the walls of this city, with his own and

The French forces, till marshal Tallard arrived with a reinforcement: but after that battle he was forced to abandon it, and the city sent deputies to the duke of Marlborough to implore his protection. After it was set free, the German diet favoured it with an immunity from their quota to the war, to repair the losses it had sustained from the French and Bavarians: for, it is said, an incredible number of wealthy heads of families died of mere grief to find themselves utterly undone. The magistrates of this city were 60 years ago reckoned to have 300,000 florins of fixed revenue. The Lutherans here, to avoid giving offence, pull off their hats to the company, when they meet a procession with the host, for avoiding hroils. The streets are longer, wider, and more airy, than those of Nuremberg, Wurtzburgh, Bamberg, Frankfort, Mentz, Coblentz, or Cologne, but not by far so well peopled; so that Mr. Blainville says, one may be as a voice crying in the wilderness from one end of the most public street to the other. For it is certain that numbers of the wealthy inhabitants, frightened by the frequent wars of this theatre, have retired farther up into Germany.

The houses are generally of freestone; and though many of the private ones are built only of wood and clay, they are very neat, being plaistered without, and finely painted in fresco. The wine-market street, so called from a store-house of wine in it, is of handsome fabric, graced with two fine fountains. The conduits and fountains are generally adorned with fine figures of brass. Its magnificent town-house is reckoned little inferior to that of Amsterdam in all respects, and in many to exceed it, being built all of free-stone, except the portico, which is of marble. At the top of the front, just above the pediment, a large spread-eagle, cast in brass, and crowned, said to be 2200 weight, and to have cost 15000 German florins, or above 1870l. sterling, holds in its talons a sceptre and globe, that are gilded, as well as its crown. The great portal, which is 20 feet high, and 12 broad, is of a very beautiful reddish marble, and crowned with a large balcony of the same colour, supported by two stately pillars of white marble. Over the gate are two large gryphons of brass, serving for supporters to the city arms, which are all of excellent workmanship, and said to have cost 2000 florins. Most of the rooms are wainscotted and cieled with very fine timber.

In a square, near the town-house, is the fine fountain of Augustus, the most splendid in the city, of admirable workmanship, adorned with statues, &c. &c. The next most beautiful fountain is that of Hercules. But two of the greatest curiosities in mechanism, of the kind, in Europe, are to be seen in this city, viz. 1, the secret gate, which the Germans call Der Einlas, joining to the rampart at the entrance of the city; and, 2, the water-towers, that serve great part of the town with water. The former is what they boast much of, and are fond to shew to strangers. It was contrived to let in passengers, even in time of war, without danger of being surprized by the enemy. It is not easy to describe it, as is confessed by several who have attempted it. The best account we have of it is from Mr. Wright. "To come to it from without, says he, you must pass through two doors by the centry-box; then you come to the first gate, that opens by the machinery; then you go over a bridge of 43 paces, just beyond which is a little iron gate, and a drawbridge, which when let down the iron gate opens of itself, and shuts as the bridge is drawn up again; then the first gate opens, as do after that two more at a few paces distant from each other: as soon as the second opens the first shuts, and so of the rest. There is an iron stay, which suffers the gate to open only so far as to let in only one person at a time. Each gate is governed by two powers, one to unbolt and bolt, and the other to open and shut; and these are managed by an unseen operator in a gallery above; so they seem to open and shut, as it were, by enchantment. The whole machinery is inclosed in a case, so that no more is to be seen of it than an iron wheel with teeth, which is turned round by a winch, so easily that a child may do it." Any that will may go out at the first gate, but none may enter it (in times of disturbance especially) without particular leave of the governor. It is said, this work was performed above 200 years ago by a smith of Tirol, and has continued firm ever since without repair. Mr. Blainville observes, there are three great high gates, covered over with lintels, jambs, &c. with thick plates and bars of iron; and that between the two last of them passengers are detained longer than between the second and first; during which a guard, from the little gallery, examines who they are, and from whence, and whither bound, and makes them pay a small toll. He adds, that the magistrates of Nuremberg, having some years ago obtained leave to send their best engineers, architects, &c. to take a model of this gate, that they might have one like it, the said artists, after taking full time to examine all its parts and dependencies, returned home with report, that, without pulling down the walls, and all the masonry, it was not in the power of Beelzebub himself to find out how it was contrived, or to make one like it in 1000 years. As for the water-towers, they are also very curious, the water being raised by the engines 130 feet. Mr. Wright makes them only three; but Mr. Blainville says there are four, and that they are near the gate called the Red Port, on a branch of the Lech, which runs through the city with such a torrent as drives many mills day and night, that work a number of pumps, which which raise the water, in large leaden pipes, to the highest story of the towers: from one of these the water is sent, by smaller pipes, to all the public fountains; and the three other towers furnish water to 1000 houses in the city, at the rate of about 40 s. a year each; for which it receives 120 pretty large measures of water every hour.

In the Lutherans' library in their college here, among many other curiosities, is a book without a back, which opens at four sides, and contains four different treatises; also a German Bible in folio, the first that was printed at Augsberg, 1499; the Pentateuch in Hebrew, upon skins of parchment sewed together, which, when unrolled, stretch out as long as the gallery. Here is a very remarkable altar of silver, a foot thick, supporting a celestial globe of silver gilt, about 18 inches diameter, and placed on a silver gilt pedestal, within which is a clock with a double bell. Here is no Calvinist church: and as for the Jews, who live in a borough about a league from the town, they are so far from being allowed a place of worship here, that they themselves are not so much as suffered to lie one night in the town; though they are allowed to drive some small traffic here in the day, on paying a florin an hour; so that it seems a wonder how they live, their borough being the very picture of misery. Here are two arsenals well stored with arms, as the public granaries are with corn. In one of the former is an old battering-ram of brass still preserved entire. The soldiers of the garrison live in streets of barracks like the cells of the Carthusians. The French and Bavarians, after the battle of Hochstet, carried off their cannon and best arms. There is a street here where clothes are hung out for sale, even upon Sundays, by reason that the peasants have not time to come and furnish themselves with those wares but upon that day. The fortifications in 1705 were weak and irregular; its chief strength consisting in the sluices on each side the meadows, whereby the low country may be quickly laid under the water of the Lech. On that side of the city where the country so rises that it cannot be drowned, there were 6 large bastions, or rather shapeless high bulwarks, but no manner of outworks. All orders and degrees of persons here are distinguished by their proper dresses. The three kings is an inn here, which is one of the best houses in Germany, and the most superb inn in Europe; and there is a fine hall in it, where the nobility and gentry game, sup, and dance. In the adjacent plain are several hillocks, cast up like those of Salisbury-plain, which Mr. Brevil supposes to be sepulchral monuments of some of the chief persons slain here. The German histories being full of battles fought on this spot. He observed more antiquities here than he had met with in any town except Lyons on this side the Alps. Long. 11, 23, E. Lat. 48, 24.

AUGST, in Latin Augusta, a large village of Viméux, one of the subdivisions, belonging to the government of Picardy and Artois, in France. It is situated on the sea. Of the same name is a village, about two leagues from Basil, in Switzerland, from which this last village had the name of Augusta Rauricorum. Near it are the ruins of an ancient city, which seems to have been of vast extent; and here several pieces of antiquity have been found.

AUGUSTA, a small but well-peopled town of Val di Noto, in the island of Sicily, and lower division of Italy. This place has been newly fortified; and the peninsula, on which it stands, made an island, and joined to the land by a wooden bridge. It is situated on the eastern coast, and on the north-side of the bay bearing its name. The harbour is large and commodious, supposed to be the ancient Xiphonia, 18 miles N. of Syracuse. Lat. 37, 25, N. Long. 15, 40, E.

AUGUSTA, or AUSTA, an island situated in the Adriatic gulph, on the coast of Dalmatia, near Ragousa. It is subject to Venice. Lat. 42, 40, N. Long. 18, 57, E.

AUGUSTA Aufciorum, a town of Aquitania, so named out of compliment to Augustus, being originally called Climberum, which name it afterwards resumed. In the middle age it took the name of the people, Aufci; and is now called Auch, the capital of Gascony. See AUCH.

AUGUSTA Emerita, a town of Lusitania on the river Anas, the capital of the province; a colony of the Emeriti, or such soldiers as had served out their legal time, were men of experience, or had received marks of favour. The colony was founded by Augustus; and is now called Merida, a city of Spain, in Estremadura, on the river Guadiana. See MERIDAN.

AUGUSTA Prætoria, a town and colony of Gallia Cisalpina, and capital of the Salassii; seated at the foot of the Alps Graia on the Duria. Now Aoste, in Piedmont. See AOSTE.

AUGUSTA Sueffonum, a town of Gallia Belgica, on the Axona; so called from Augustus, and with great probability supposed to be the Noviodunum Sueffonum of Cæsar. Now Soissons, on the river Aisne, in the isle of France. See SOISSONS.

AUGUSTA Taurinorum, a town of the Taurini, at the foot of the Alps, where the Duria Minor falls into the Po; now Turin, the capital of Piedmont. See TURIN.

AUGUSTA Treba, a town of the Æqui, near the springs of the river Anio, in Italy; now Trevi, in Umbria, or in the east of the Campagna di Roma. See TREVI.

AUGUSTA

AUGUSTA Trevirorum, a town of the Treviri, a people inhabiting between the Rhine and the Meuse, but especially about the Moselle; now Triers or Treves, in the circle of the Lower Rhine, on the Moselle. See TREVES.

AUGUSTA Vindelicorum, a town of the Licates, on Licus; called by Tacitus a noble colony of Rætia; now Augsburg, capital of Suabia. See AUGSBURG.

AUGUSTA, a fort of Georgia, in North-America. It is situated on the river Savannah, and is a thriving place, to which the traders with the Indians, from South-Carolina and Georgia, resort; and where are warehouses stocked with such goods as the Indians want, whose deer-skins, taken in exchange, are sent 230 miles down the river to the town of Savannah in boats, each carrying about four tons and a half. This fort is a great protection to Carolina and Georgia against any invaders. From it a horse-road is made to the town of Savannah and to the cantons and villages of the Cherokee Indians.

AUGUSTENBURG, a princely seat about half a mile from Sonderburg, a town belonging to the bailiwick of this last name, in the duchy of Sleswic, in Denmark. It stands on the old site of the village of Staffenbul, in the parish of Ketting. It was built about the middle of the last century by duke Ernest Gunther, grandson of duke John the younger, and is a place of some note. Before the castle is a small village, containing about 40 houses, which are mostly inhabited by the officers and servants belonging to the prince's court.

AUGUSTIN (St.) situated (Long. 80, 50, W. Lat. 29, 48, N.) on the eastern coast of the Peninsula of Florida, North-America, about 70 leagues from the mouth of the gulph of Florida, or channel of Bahama, 30 south of the river Alatomaha (or May, as the French call it), and 47 from the town and river of Savannah. The city runs along the shore at the bottom of a pleasant hill, shaded with trees in the form of an oblong square, being divided into four regular streets, which cut each other at right angles. Near a mile to south, by the sea-side, is its church and monastery of Augustinians, and, about a mile farther, there falls into the sea a little river, running from north to west, which, a quarter of a mile from its mouth and the town, hath a wooden bridge. The town is built thickest on the north-side towards the castle, a mile off, called St. John's fort. It stands on the shore at the foot of a hill, and is built of soft stone, with four bastions, a courtine 60 yards long, a parapet 9 feet thick, and a rampart 20 high, casemated underneath for lodging, arched over, and newly made bomb-proof. The castle mounts 50 cannon, 16 brads, and some 24 pounders. A covered way is also lately finished, and the town is intrenched with 10 salient angles,

Vol. I. — No. 17.

each defended with cannon, and the castle is on the west secured by a morass. The port is formed by an island and a long point of land, divided from the continent by a river which falls into the sea two miles above the fort. The island, which is called Eustacia (also Metanzas, or Slaughter, from a horrid slaughter made on it by the Spaniards), is long and narrow, and consists chiefly of sand and bushes. It begins due east of the castle, and extends 10 miles south along the coast, leaving a channel between it and the main land, which at the south end is above a mile over, but not a mile at the north end. The entrance to it from the sea lies between the island and the point of land, and is above a mile and a quarter over. On the continent is a Spanish watch-tower, called Romo. A large sand-bank lies before this mouth of the channel, having two narrow passages through it, one called the north, the other the south channel. In short, the waters here are so shallow (as they are almost every where on the coast of Florida), that no ships of force can come within three leagues of either town or castle; but the garrison is provided with armed row-gallies, which, being under command of the castle guns, are a great defence to the place, as are also the two rivers, as serving to hinder the approach of enemies. Sir Francis Drake attacked this fort in 1586, when the Spaniards fled, &c. But then the town consisted only of timber houses, and the fort was also wooden, and the walls only of trunks of trees set close together. In 1665 it was attacked and plundered by Capt. Davis and his buccaniers, when the fort was an octagon, with a round tower at each angle, in which the soldiers kept guard. It was attacked again in 1702, by the English and Indians of Carolina, under colonel Moor, their governor. He ruined the villages and farms, and besieged the town three months; but, on the approach of some Spanish vessels to its relief, raised the siege with precipitation, and marched back to Charles-town, 300 miles by land, leaving the ship and stores he brought to the enemy. In 1740 general Oglethorp marched to it with a considerable body of English troops, and a much larger of Indians, and took some advanced posts, at the same time that four men of war and transports came from Charles-town with troops to assist the siege. The besiegers landed on the island of Eustacia, from which they bombarded both town and castle; but their artillery being planted at too great a distance to do any material execution by reason of the rivers, morasses, and other obstructions; the Spaniards having retaken one of the advanced forts, called the Negroes Fort, by surprize and storm, after a most obstinate defence; and the bad weather obliging the men of war to return to sea; the siege was raised about the latter end of June; it appearing that 200 seamen, 400 soldiers, and 300 Indians, which was the whole number employed in the expedition, was a force too weak to subdue 1000 Spaniards. This place now belongs to Great-Britain, being ceded at the peace of Paris 1762; since which it has been much improved, and carries on a great trade.

AUGUSTIN's (St.) port and river, on the coast of Labrador, near the straits of Belle-Isle. Here are two islands in the harbour; and about 2 miles S. W. runs a chain of small islands, called St. Augustin's Chain, one of which is a remarkable smooth rock.

AUGUSTODUNUM, the capital of the Ædui, where there was a famous academy or school for the education of youth; now Austun, or Autun, in the duchy of Burgundy, on the Arroux. See AUTUN.

AUGUSTOMAGUS, an ancient town of Gallia Belgica; now Sentis, in the isle of France. Long. 2, 30, E. Lat. 49, 10, N.

AUGUSTOW, a small but strong town of Poland, in the duchy and palatinate of Polakia, seated on a lake. Long. 24, 2, E. Lat. 53, 25, N.

AUGUSTUS (Fort), a small fortress, seated on a plain at the head of Lochness, in Scotland, between the rivers Tarf and Oich; the last is a considerable stream, and has over it a stone bridge of 3 arches. The fort consists of 4 bastions; within is the governor's house, and barracks for 400 men: it was taken by the rebels in 1746, who immediately deserted it, after demolishing what they could. The name of this fort in Erse is Kill-chuimin, or the burial place of the Cummins. It lies on the road to the isle of Sky, which is about 52 miles off; but on the whole way there is not a place fit for the reception of man or horse.

AUGWALDSNAES, a famous promontory and seat, which takes name from it in the island of Karmen, belonging to the diocese of Christianland, in Norway.

AVIGLIANO, a small town of Piedmont, in Italy. Long. 7, 5, E. Lat. 44, 40, N.

AVIGNON, a state, though not belonging to France, but to the Pope, is for the most part surrounded by Provence. This very fine country, especially abounding in vast quantities of corn, wine, and saffron, consists of the territory of Avignon, and earldom of Venaissin, which must not be confounded together. The city and territory of Avignon formerly belonged not only to the counts of Thoulouse, but to those of Provence: but as various altercations arose between these two lords, the inhabitants made themselves independent; and they continued so till the death of the last count of Thoulouse. Johanna, his heiress, and the wife of Alphonfus, count of Poitiers, brought to him, by virtue of this marriage, all the states and rights belonging to her: wherefore, uniting himself with his brother Charles of Anjou, who had married the heiress of Provence, he reduced the inhabitants of Avignon to their obedience in the year 1251. After

A V

Alphonfus's death, his half of Avignon fell to Philip the Bold, which he left to his son Philip the Fair, who in the year 1290 made a present of it to Charles, king of Sicily and count of Provence; so that by virtue of this donation he became sole proprietor of Avignon. In 1348 Johanna, queen of Sicily and countess of Provence, sold the city and its territory to pope Clement VI. for 80,000 florins. But upon any considerable dispute between France and the court of Rome, the former takes possession of the county and city of Avignon, as happened in 1663, 1689, and 1690.

AVIGNON, the capital of the county of the same name, and seated on the banks of the Rhone. It is an archbishop's see; and the residence of several popes at this place for 70 years has rendered it considerable. Its walls are built with free-stone, with several square towers, adorned with pinnacles. The ditches are not large, but are in proportion to the height of the walls, and are in some places full of water. This city belongs to the pope, who sends a vice-legate every three years, who in some sense is the governor. Near the Rhone there is a large rock within the circumference of the walls, upon which is a platform, whence may be had a prospect of the whole city and the places about it. This city is embellished with magnificent churches, a large square, beautiful buildings, and very agreeable gardens. The palace of the vice-legate is composed of several large square towers; and he gives audience in a great hall which is full of fine paintings, as is also the chapel and the apartments. The arsenal is near the palace.

The church of Notre Dame is ancient, but not large, and is one of the best adorned in the city. After having ascended about 50 steps, you come to a very ancient portico, which sustains a great tower; as you enter the church on the left hand you see paintings which equal the finest in Italy. The great altar is very magnificent, and is adorned with a shrine that contains the relics of we know not how many saints. The treasure of the sacrifice is worthy of the curiosity of the traveller. The little palace where the archbishop resides is formed of three bodies of lodgings, accompanied with courts and small pavilions. It overlooks the Rhone, the city, and the fields. These buildings and the mint adorn a large square, which is the common walk of the inhabitants.

In Avignon they reckon 7 gates, 7 palaces, 7 colleges, 7 hospitals, 7 monasteries, 7 nunneries, and 7 popes, who have lived there in 70 years. The church of the Celestines is very magnificent and full of fine monuments, and the rest are not without their curiosities. The university has 4 colleges; and the place where the Jews live is a distinct quarter, from whence the Jews who pay tribute dare not stir out without yellow hats, and the women women must have something yellow about their heads to distinguish them from the Christians. Their number is very considerable in so confined a place, where the only way of enlarging their abodes is by building their houses higher. Their synagogue is so dark that they are obliged to light lamps. However, they are forced to hear a monk preach a sermon every week. There was a stone bridge over the Rhone, which is here very rapid; but the greatest part is carried away, and the vacancy supplied with wood. It had 20 arches, but it was narrow, though above a quarter of a mile long. The curious that travel this way go to see the fountain of Vauclose, where the river Sorgues, which passes through this city, has its source. Below the bridge there is an island where the Sorgues joins the Rhone, in which are several houses of pleasure. Long. 4, 59, E. Lat. 43, 57, N.

AVILA (city of) belonging to Old Castile, in Spain, or AVILA DAL REY, so called on account of the loyalty of its inhabitants to the infant king Alphonso VIII. against his father-in-law, Alphonso VII. This is a pretty old and considerable town; supposed to have been anciently called Abula, Albul, or Albucella. It stands on a mountain between two large hills; is a large place, surrounded with a noble wall, on which are 86 lofty towers and 10 beautiful gates; also within are 17 principal streets. It is well built, has good houses, and the best cloth-manufactures. Here also is made very fine paper; and from hence excellent wool is exported. Its bishop is under the archbishop of Toledo, and has an annual income of 24,000 ducats. Here are 9 parishes, as many monasteries, 7 nunneries, 2 colleges, 9 hospitals, 18 chapels, and a charitable yearly donative of 10,000 ducats, given by the city for maintaining poor orphans and other needy persons. The royal castle stands on a rock, in the highest part of the city, and is provided with a garrison and artillery. In the year 1726 the discarded prime minister, Baron Ripperda, was brought as a prisoner into this place. He was confined here till 1728, when he happily made his escape. At the foot of the castle runs the little river Atayda. The old Roman aqueduct, called Puente Segoviana, is an admirable structure, which is carried from one mountain to another, about the length of 3000 paces; it rests on 76 high arches, and consists of 2 rows, the one above the other. It goes through the suburbs, and conveys the water through the whole city. Here is an university. Lat. 40, 50, N. Long. 5, 20, W.

AVILA, a city, but very much below that title, belonging to the government of Quixos, and province of Quito, in South-America. The number of its inhabitants of both sexes scarcely amounts to 300; its houses are of wood, covered with straw. It has also a priest, whose ecclesiastical jurisdiction comprehends 6 towns, some of them in largeness and number of inhabitants not inferior to the city. Lat. 0, 40, S. Long. 2, 20, nearly E, of Quito.

AVILES, or AVILA, a small place of Asturia d'Oviedo, in the province of Asturias, in Spain. It is a sea-port, near the mouth of the river Nalon, on the bay of Biscay, 8 miles south of Cape de Pinas. Lat. 43, 20, N. Long. 6, 40, W.

AVIMS (the country of the) adjoining to the land of Canaan, and inhabited by a people called Avims, who were dispossessed of this tract by the Philistines.

AVINTES, a small place belonging to Porto district, in the province of Entre Douro e Minho, in Portugal. It contains one parish.

AVIZ, a walled, but now inconsiderable town of Portalegre district, in Alentejo, a province of Portugal, on the river Tagus. It contains only 400 inhabitants; it was once the principal residence of the military knights of Aviz; and here are the ruins of the ancient friary to be seen. Lat. 38, 50, N. Long. 8, 30, W.

AUKBOROUGH, a place near Whitton-brook, in Lincolnshire, having a Roman road, and was by them called Aquis. Their camp here has since been called Countess-clofe. The Roman castle is square, and 300 feet each side, and placed in the north-west angle of Lincolnshire, as a watch-tower over all Nottinghamshire and Yorkshire. The church is of good stone, with a square tower; but the choir is ruinous, and separated by a wooden partition: here are several relics of the deluge, as sea-shells, subterraneous trees, &c.

AUKLAND, or BISHOP-AUKLAND, a pleasant market-town of Durham, 12 miles south-west of the capital of that bishopric, and 254 from London. It is one of the best towns in the county, and has a stone-bridge over the Were. Here is an hospital for 2 men and 2 women. Fairs, Holy Thursday, June 21, and Thursday before Michaelmas-day. Market on Thursday.

AULCESTER, or ALCESTER, an old market-town of Warwickshire. It lies 14 miles S. W. from Warwick, and 105 N. W. west from London. It appears to have been a Roman station from the many gold, brads, and silver coins and medals dug up here. Its weekly market is on Tuesday, for great quantities of corn: its fairs, Tuesday before April 5, May 18, and October 17, for cheese and horses. The Roman-way, called Ickenild-street passes through this town. The lordship of it was in the crown before the Conquest, and it was the residence of some of our kings. Here is a charity-school. Lat. 52, 20, N. Long. 1, 50, W.

AULDBY, a little village of Yorkshire, on the south side of the river Derwent, where, it is said, stood, in the Roman times, a city called Derventis; a company called Derventienfes having been stationed here.

AULENDORF, a market-town with a castle, standing on a hill, in the circle of Suabia, belonging to the counts of Koningsegg-Rothenfels.

AULIS, an ancient sea-port of Attica, now Livadia, a province of European Turkey, on the narrowest part of the straits of Negropont, opposite to the island of this last name. Here the Grecian fleet rendezvoused before they sailed to the siege of Troy.

AULON. See VALONA.

AULOT, a small inconsiderable town of Catalonia in Spain, on the river Fluvia.

AUMA, a small town on a river of the same name, in the circle of Neustadt. It has both seat and voice at the land diets.

AUMARLE. See ALBEMARLE.

AUNAY, a small place of Upper Poitou, in the government of the last name, in France, with the title of an earldom, and where the duke of Guise defeated the Germans who came to the assistance of the Protestants in 1587.

AUNIS, or ABUNIX, in Latin Alnisium, or Almatum, one of the governments of France, situated on the western shore of the Bay of Biscay: on the S. it is bounded by Saintonge, on the W. by Ocrum, and on the N. and E. by Poitou. It is watered by the rivers Charente and Seure; the latter of which rises in Poitou, is navigable near Niort, and afterwards receives the Vendie, which is also navigable. It has good harbours on the coast. The soil of the country is indeed dry; yet it produces good grain, and great quantities of wine. In its swampy parts are also good pastures. Excellent salt is made in the salt-marshes. The country enjoys its own forms of laws, and is subject to the parliament of Paris. The governor has a general-lieutenant and sub-governor under him. It contains the country of Bronageais, Oleron, the isle of Rée, and Aunis Proper. The capital is Rochelle.

AUNOT, or ANNOT, a little town, and the principal place belonging to the viguerie of the same name in Upper Provence, in France.

AVOLA, a marquisate of Val di Noto in Sicily, and lower division of Italy.

AVON, a river which rises in Wiltshire, and passes through Salisbury, a little below which it begins to be navigable. It enters Hampshire at a village called Charford, passes near Fordinbridge, a considerable market town; thence it continues its course to Ringwood, another market town; and at Christchurch, a large and populous borough, near which it receives the Stour, a considerable river from Dorsetshire, and falls into the English Channel. Large ships go up to Christchurch, the mouth of the Avon being there very deep, and the tide rises 7 or 8 feet deep at that town. A few miles above that town, the navigation, by locks and sluices, begins. At Ringwood, the river forms an island, the navigation branch going on one side, and a considerable stream of water on the other.

AVON, a river, (called the West Avon, to distinguish it from another river of the same name, which falls into the Severn near Tewksbury, in Gloucestershire) rises near Tedbury, a market-town in Gloucestershire, and enters Somersetshire near a village called Claverton, about 4 miles from the city of Bath. Near its entrance into this county, it is joined by the Frome, a considerable river, which rises from Gournay-lake, about 6 miles from Wells. Augmented by this stream, it passes by the cities of Bath and Bristol, separating this county from Gloucestershire; and falls into the Severn sea at King-Road, about 9 miles below Bristol.

AVON, a river in Merionethshire, which empties itself into the Irish sea, near Barmouth.

AVON, a river rising in Leicestershire, runs S. W. by Warwick, and, continuing its course in the same direction by Everingham, falls into the Severn at Tewksbury, in Gloucestershire.

AVON, a river of Monmouthshire in Wales, which, after a short course south-eastwards, falls into the Uik, near Caerleon.

AVON, a small river running through Hamiltonpark, about 8 miles to the S. of Glasgow, in Scotland.

AVONA, or AVON-MAGH, an island lying about a mile from the promontory of Kantyr in Argyleshire, in Scotland. It signifies in the Highland language, a good water or harbour, to which the Danes came with their fleets when they were masters of the western isles.

AVOO, a small place of Coimbra district, belonging to the province of Beira, in Portugal; it contains between 4 and 600 inhabitants.

AUPS, or AULPS, in Latin Alpes, a viguerie of Draguignan, a provincial bailiwick belonging to the government of Provence, in France. It has its name from a small town, where is the seat of a royal court, a little bailiwick, and a collection of the farms. It has a collegiate church and two convents.

AURACH, or AURACH, a little town of Wirtemberg, belonging to Suabia, in Germany; and is the residence of the younger branch of the Wirtemberg-family, 15 miles E. of Tübingen. Lat. 48, 25. N. Long. 9, 20. E.

AURANA, LAURANA, or VRANA, one of the most agreeable places in all Dalmatia and Hungarian Illyrium; it stands on a lake of the same name. Here was anciently a rich Benedictine abbey, the revenue of which was, in 1217, given to the Knights Templars, Andrew II. king of Hungary, having founded a commendary in this place; and at that time it was also fortified. The suburbs are large. It was for a long time in the possession of of the Turks, but was taken from them by the Venetians in 1684.

AVRANCHES, ABRICANTÆ, or ABRINÆ, formerly Legedia and Ingena, a mountain-town of Avranchin, and government of Normandy, in France. It is situated on the river See, is the see of a bishop, a viscounty, election, bailiwick, &c. The bishop is under the archbishop of Rouen, has a diocese of 180 parishes, a revenue of 15,000 livres, and pays an assessment of 2500 florins to the court of Rome. Besides the cathedral, here are three parish-churches, a convent, hospital, college, and seminary. At a council held here by order of pope Alexander III. to take information concerning the murderers of Thomas à Becket, archbishop of Canterbury, Henry II. king of England, was obliged to clear himself, by oath, of the accusations laid to his charge. Lat. 48, 4, N. Long. 1, 18, W.

AVRANCHIN, a territory of Lower Normandy, in the government of the latter name, in France. It has corn, fruits, flax, and hemp; but very little pasture. On the coast they make salt.

AURAM, (St.) one of the Aleutian isles. See that article.

AURAY, a port-town of Brittany, in France, 8 miles W. of Vannes. Lat. 47, 40, N. Long. 2, 25, W. The French were defeated here by the Britons in 1363.

AURE, a river of Normandy, in France, which rises in the parish of Parfouru, about 6 leagues from the sea, and unites itself with the Drome, whose source is in the parish of the same name; but it gradually loses itself, and, as is supposed, appears, again at Port en Bessin. Of the same name is another river, which falls into the Eure, in this government.

AURE, a valley of Lower Armagnac, belonging to the government of Guyenne and Gascony, in France.

AURENGABAD, a large city of India, on this side the Ganges, and capital of the province of Bahagat, in the dominions of the Great Mogul. It is furnished with handsome mosques and caravanseras. The buildings are chiefly of free-stone, and pretty high, and the streets are planted on each side with trees. They have large gardens stocked with vines and fruit-trees. The soil about it is fertile, and in its neighbourhood the sheep are remarkably large and strong. E. long. 75, 30. N. lat. 19, 20.

AURESSIEUX, a little town of Savoy Proper, in the upper division of Italy.

AURETTE, a river of Berry, in France, which falls into the Eure.

AURICH, in Latin Auricum, the capital of a little district in the county of Embsen, and circle of Westphalia, in Germany. It was the ancient residence of the prince, and is now the seat of the provincial colleges. The ancient residentiary castle is environed with ramparts and ditches. In the garrison church the Calvinists perform their religious worship. In the town is a Lutheran church, a Latin school, a provincial house, and a public alms house. The magistracy consists of two burgher-masters, two counsellors, and one secretary. The Lutheran religion was received here so early as 1519. It was possessed by the king of Prussia on the death of the late count; but is claimed by his Britannic majesty as elector of Hanover. It lies 12 miles N. E. of the city of Embsen. Lat. 53, 40, N. Long. 6, 50, E.

AURILLAC, in Latin Aureliacum, a town of Upper Auvergne, in the government of the latter name, in France. St. Flour contests the rank of capital with it. It is situated in a valley on the river Jordane; is pretty well built, and populous; it gives the title of count, is the seat of an election, a provincial court, bailiwick, country-district, and marshal's seat. Here is a castle on a high rock, a collegiate-church, which is properly a secularized abbey, whose abbot is lord of the town, and is immediately subject to the pope. Here was a Jesuits college, also an abbey, and four convents; a manufacture of tapestry, both of the low and high warp; also of thread or bone laces. Lat. 44, 55, Long. 2, 32.

AURONZO, a small place of Cadore district, in the marquisate of Trevigiana, a province belonging to Venice, in Upper Italy.

AURORA-ISLAND, an island in the South-Sea, about 12 leagues long, and 5 broad. The middle of it is in 15, 6, S. lat. and 168, 24, E. Long. It is one of the Hebrides.

AURSBERG, a market-town, with a citadel, in the duchy of Carniola, seated on a mountain; and the place from whence the princes and counts of Aursberg derive their descent.

AUSA, a town of Terraconensis, in the middle age called Aufona; now Vich de Ofona, a town of Catalonia in Spain. E. long. 2. N. lat. 41, 50.

AUSBURG. See AUGSBURG.

AUSENA. See ASTURIAS.

AUSING. See AUSTI.

AUSI, an ancient and very savage people of Libya. Herodotus tells us that they were unacquainted with marriage, and had all their women in common. The children were brought up by their mothers till they were able to walk; after which, they were introduced to an assembly of the men, who met every three months; and the man to whom any child first spoke, acknowledged himself its father. They celebrated annually a feast in honour of Minerva, in which the girls divided into two companies, fought with sticks and stones, and those who died of their wounds were concluded not to have been virgins.

AUSONNE. See AUXONNE.

AUSSOW, or AUSSE, a town, with a citadel, seated on a mountain in the circle of Olmutz.

AUST-FERRY, a passage from Aust in Gloucestershire to Beachly in Monmouthshire, where the Severn is broadest, and the bore of the tide formidable. Aust, though a mean place, has a good neat chapel, with a high tower at the W. end decorated with pinnacles.

AUSTLE, (St.) a place in Cornwall, where fairs are held on Good Friday, Whitsun-Thursd., and November 10, for horses, oxen, sheep, cloth, and a few hops.

AUSTRIA, one of the principal provinces of the empire of Germany towards the east; from which situation it takes its name Oost-ryck, in the German language signifying the East Country. It is bounded on the N. by Moravia; on the E. by Hungary; on the S. by Stiria; and on the W. by Bavaria. It is divided into Upper and Lower. Upper Austria is situated on the S. and Lower Austria on the N. side of the Danube. Vienna, the capital, is in the Upper Austria, which contains several other very considerable towns. The country is very fertile, has a great many mines, and produces vast quantities of sulphur.

In the 9th and 10th centuries, Austria was the frontier of the empire against the Barbarians. In 928 the emperor Henry the Fowler, perceiving that it was of great importance to settle some person in Austria who might oppose these incursions, invested Leopold, surnamed the Illustrious, with that country. Otto I. erected Austria into a marquisate in favour of his brother-in-law Leopold, whose descendant Henry II. was created duke of Austria by the emperor Frederic Barbarossa. His posterity becoming extinct in 1240, the states of the country, in order to defend themselves from the incursions of the Bavarians and Hungarians, resolved to put themselves under the protection of Henry, marquis of Misnia; but Othogar II. king of Bohemia, being likewise invited by a party in the duchy, took possession of it, alledging not only the invitation of the states, but also the right of his wife, heiress of Frederick the last duke. The emperor Rodolphus I. pretending a right to this duchy, refused to give Othogar the investiture of it; and afterwards killing him in a battle, procured the right of it to his own family. From this Rodolphus the present house of Austria is descended, which for several centuries past has rendered itself so famous and so powerful, having given 14 emperors to Germany, and 6 kings to Spain.

In 1477, Austria was erected into an archduchy by the emperor Frederic the Pacific, for his son Maximilian, with these privileges: That they shall be judged to have obtained the investiture of the states, if they do not receive it after having demanded it three times; that if they receive it from the emperor, or the imperial ambassadors, they are to be on horseback, clad in a royal mantle, having in their hand a staff of command, and upon their head a ducal crown of two points, and surrounded with a cross like that of the Imperial crown. The archduke is born privy-counsellor to the emperor, and his states cannot be put to the ban of the empire. All attempts against his person are punished as crimes of lese-majesty, in the same manner as those against the king of the Romans, or electors. No one dared to challenge him to single combat. It is in his choice to assist at the assemblies, or to be absent; and he has the privilege of being exempt from contributions and public taxes, excepting 12 soldiers which he is obliged to maintain against the Turk for one month. He has rank immediately after the electors; and exercises justice in his states without appeal, by virtue of a privilege granted by Charles V. His subjects cannot even be summoned out of his province upon account of law-suits, to give witness, or to receive the investiture of fiefs. Any of the lands of the empire may be alienated in his favour, even those that are feudal; and he has a right to create counts, barons, gentlemen, poets, and notaries. In the succession to his states, the right of birth takes place; and, failing males, the females succeed according to the lineal right; and if no heir be found, they may dispose of their lands as they please.

The archduchy of Austria is a plentiful country in corn and pasture, and produces better saffron than what comes from the Indies: but the air, especially in Lower Austria, is insalutary, from noisome vapours, which cause agues. Though here is wine sufficient for consumption and exportation; yet they have other rich wines from Hungary and Italy: so that at Vienna are no less than 30 sorts. They are supplied with most of their beef from Hungary. The hazel-hen, or gallina corylorum, is reckoned a great dainty here. The Danube and other rivers supply them with fish, particularly the schieden or Gesner's silurus, larger than a pike or salmon, and the hansons, something like a sturgeon.

The Austrians are naturally proud and haughty; supposing their nation, as well as their sovereign, to be the first in rank in Christendom. The gentry are are so fond of the title of count, that they solicit it as eagerly as if it was a great estate. In Austria gentlemen are so common, that scarcely any others are to be seen, especially at Vienna. The burghers and commonalty mimic their betters as far as they are able. No nation in the world may be said to be such epicures as this, a great many dishes being served up at table, and those well filled; besides, they have a variety of wines at the same time. The women are rather grand than pretty. In dress they affect finery rather than good taste; and, like all the German women, pretty reserved; and not so fond of gallantry, as of gaming, luxury, and grandeur. They concern themselves no more about household affairs than if they were strangers; they know no books but their prayer-books, are extremely credulous; and give into all the externals of religion. At Vienna the ladies are all so devout, that there are none but what hears at least one mass a day. The women of the second class, including those that have no titles of honour, discover a surprising air of plenty and prosperity in their houses.

Though the Austrians may be looked upon as the very Gascons of Germany; yet they are not so brisk as those of France, but much vainer: they however prove pretty good soldiers. With regard to painting, sculpture, and the curious arts, they are on a much better footing with them than the sciences.

The archduchy of Austria is divided into three governments. 1. That of Lower Austria, under the direction of the emperor and privy-council, the regent-council, and the chancery. 2. Inner Austria, including Stiria, Carinthia, Carniola, &c. the tribunals of which are at Gratz. 3. That of Upper Austria, which includes Tirol, and the hereditary countries in Suabia and Swisserland, &c. the privy-council for which is held at Inspruck.

AUSTERHORN, a place in the eastern quarter of Island, in Norway.

AUSTERLEY (York) West-Riding, on the borders of Nottinghamshire, near Bautre. A navigable canal was made from hence in 1772, whereby a communication is opened with Birmingham, and the collieries at Wednesbury, and through the Severn with Shrewsbury, Gloucester, Bristol, &c. and through the Trent with Gainsborough, Hull, &c. and another branch is extended to Liverpool, through the Mersey.

AUSTI, or AUSIG, in Latin Austa, or Usta, a royal borough on the river Elbe, in the circle of Leutmeritz. The red, sweet, and strong wine, called Podskalsky, is made here. In 1426 the town was so ravaged by the Taborites, as to continue 3 years desolate, and in 1538 it was wholly consumed by fire.

AUTHIE (Le), in Latin Ætilia, a river in the government of Picardy and Artois, belonging to France: it rises on the confines of both provinces, and runs into the sea between the mouths of the Somme and Canche.

AUTOLOLA, metropolis of the ancient Autoles, a tribe of the Getulians.

AUTOMOLÆ, a town of Libya. This city seems to be the Automalax of Ptolemy, which, according to that author, was fortified, and undoubtedly a frontier town of Cyrenaica. Apollodorus and Strabo call it Automala, Diodorus [in his relation of Ophellas's march to join Agathocles against the Carthaginians, &c.] Automolæ, and Stephanus Automalacæ. It was situated, according to Strabo, at the bottom of the Greater Syrtis (now called the gulf of Seedra) at a small distance from the Philænorum aræ, the Carthaginian frontier. None of the ancients, except Diodorus, have told us how far it was from Cyrene, the capital of Cyrenaica. This last author gives us to understand, that it stood on the borders of the Regio Syrtica, which agrees with the site assigned it by Ptolemy and Strabo, and that it was 3000 stadia (or about 375 miles) from Cyrene; which seems greatly to exceed the truth. As Ophellas, governor of Cyrenaica for Alexander, marched with his forces through the abovesaid Regio Syrtica, his army was greatly annoyed by serpents. One remarkable circumstance is to be observed in the short description, &c. which Diodorus Siculus gives us of these serpents, which being here inserted will, we doubt not, make this article of ours very acceptable. He says, they were so exactly of the colour of that barren soil, that the soldiers could not distinguish them from it, and therefore trod upon them without seeing them, and so were stung to death. This certainly is a strong presumptive proof, that their whole substance must in a manner have consisted of that soil, and consequently that they must have fed entirely upon it.

AUTON, a barony of Little Perche, in Lower Orleanois, and government of this last name, in France.

AUTREE GLISE, a village of Brabant, in the Austrian Netherlands, to which the left wing of the French army extended, when the confederates obtained the victory of Ramillies, in 1706. It lies 2 miles N. E. of this last-mentioned place. Lat. 50, 40, N. Long. 4, 50, E.

AUTUN, anciently Augustodunum, and Civitas Æduorum, a city of Autunois, in the government of Burgundy, in France. It is situated on a hill upon the river Aroux, close to three large mountains. It consists of the upper-town, which is covered by mount Cenis, of the castle and lower-town, called Marchand. It is the seat of a chamber ber of tenths, a collection, an upper and lower bailiwick, a chancery, country-court, mayory, forest-court, salt-magazine, marshalsea, &c. Its bishop is a suffragan to the metropolitan of Lyons, is president in the assembly of the provincial states of Burgundy, his diocese consists of 611 parishes and 14 abbeys, with a yearly income of 17,000 livres; but he pays an assessment of 4080 florins to the court of Rome. Here is a cathedral, a collegiate, and 12 parish-churches, with 5 abbeys, 2 seminaries, 2 priories, a Jesuits college, 6 convents, and 2 hospitals. Both in, and especially out of the city, are several antiquities to be seen: as the ruins of 3 temples, an amphitheatre, &c. It lies 32 miles W. of Chalons. Lat. 46, 56, N. Long. 4, 23, E.

AUTUNOIS, the territory to which the above-mentioned city of Autun, in Burgundy, belongs.

AUTZ, a jurisdiction of Tuckum territory, in the duchy of Courland Proper; to it belong Candau probstey or priory, under which are 9 princely, and 14 noble, churches.

AUVEDE LA LESCAUT, a quarter or subdivision of Lille-Castellany, and government of French Flanders.

AUVERGNE, a government in France. This province, which takes its name from the ancient inhabitants Averni, is bounded on the east by Forez, on the north by Bourbonnois, on the west by Limosin, Quercy, and La Marche, and on the south by Rouergne and Sevennes. Its extent from south to north is about 40 French leagues, and from west to east 30. It is divided into Upper and Lower Auvergne: the former lies among the mountains; and to the latter belongs the large valley of Limagne, through which runs the river Allier. Lower Auvergne, of which Clermont is the capital, is a very fruitful and pleasant country, abounding very much with wine, grain, pasture, fruit, and hemp. It is by far warmer, and more delightful and fertile, than the mountainous Upper Auvergne, which is extremely cold, and between 7 and 8 months of the year covered with snow; though here are very good pasture-grounds, well-stocked with cattle. The situation of the mountains causes a great variety and continual shifting of the winds, which blow contrary to one another; for which reason no wind-mills can be erected here. The principal rivers in this province are, the Allier, the Dordogne, and the Alagnon; the latter rises at Cantal, is very rapid, and but little navigable, running into the Allier.

At Pontgibaud is a silver mine, the profits of which do not quit the costs, and therefore it is not worked. The pit-coals at Brassac, and parts adjacent, are profitable. There is no province in France has more mineral springs than this. The highest mountains of Auvergne are the following, namely, Le Pui de Dome; Mons Dominans, which is 810 toises above the surface of the earth; Le Cantal, which is 984 fathoms high; and Le Mont d'Or, whose height amounts to 1030 fathoms. The two last are covered with curious plants. The trade of this country is carried on not only in corn, wine, cattle, cheese, pit-coals, and other productions, but also in manufactures, as all kinds of silk stuffs, cloths, very fine laces, and paper, which last is reckoned the best in all Europe; and some thousands of the inhabitants get their bread in Spain as labourers.

Auvergne is an ancient county or earldom, which was raised to a duchy and peerage in the year 1360. But in 1531 it was again united to the crown, a small part of the old county excepted, which still bears the title of an earldom, and belongs to the ducal house of Bouillon. The whole country is subject to the parliament of Paris; but it has different laws: for in Lower Auvergne prevails a peculiar law of its own; but in Upper Auvergne they follow the Roman or civil law. Here are 5 large districts and 2 country bailiwicks. Under the governor of Auvergne are 2 general-lieutenants, and 2 deputy-governors.

AUXERRE, in Latin Autissiodorum, or Autisiodorum, the capital of Auxerrois, a subdivision of the government of Burgundy, in France. It is situated partly upon a mountain on the Yonne, by means of which river it drives a good trade. It is the principal place of a collection of the aids, the seat of a provincial court, a chamber of tenths, chancery, royal provostship, a mayory, supreme bailiwick, particular district, forest-court, marshalsea, and salt-granary. Its bishop is under the metropolitan of Sens; has a diocese of 238 parishes, a yearly income of 35,000 livres, and he pays an assessment of 4400 florins to the court of Rome. His palace is a fine structure. Besides the cathedral and collegiate church, here are eight parish-churches, five abbeys, a seminary, a fine college, six convents, a commendary of the order of Malta, and two hospitals. It was taken by the English in 1358, who lost it in 1360. It lies 23 miles S. of Sens. Lat. 47, 48, N. Long. 3, 39, E.

AUXERROIS, a subdivision of Burgundy, in France. It is an earldom and bailiwick, which extends from north to south, 9 French leagues, and from east to west about 5. It contains several vineyards.

AUXOIS (Le), in Latin Pagus Alesiensis, a subdivision of Burgundy, in France. It also comprehends a part of Duesmois, and was formerly an earldom.

AUXONNE, or AUSSONNE, the principal place of the county of the same name, and government of Burgundy, in France. It lies on the Soane, over which is a fine bridge between both Burgundies. The town is fortified, has also an old strong castle, castle, is the seat of a collection, salt-house, district, and particular government. Here is only one parish-church, but three convents, and an hospital. It is 7 miles west of Dole. Lat. 47, 15, N. Long. 5, 22, E.

A X

AUXUME, AUXUMIS, or AXOME, formerly the opulent metropolis of Ethiopia, according to Arrian and Nonnosus, in Photius, undoubtedly was the same city as the modern Axuma, or, as the Abassines call it, Afcum. The noble palace, beautiful structures, &c. this city was formerly so famous for, sufficiently appear from the present remains of it. It stands about 45 Portuguese miles from the Red-sea, and 36 miles north-west of the straits of Babelmandel, and in 14, 30, of N. Lat. It looks now like a village, being almost totally ruined, and scarcely affording shelter to 100 inhabitants. Some relate, here may be seen the remains of a magnificent temple, which have supported themselves against the injuries of time. Behind it (which was 110 feet in length, had 2 wings on each side, and a double porch, with an ascent of 12 steps) stand several obelisks of different sizes, and others have been thrown down by the Turks. When the Abassine monarchs were formerly crowned here, they sat on a throne of stone in the inner porch of this temple. The Ethiopians pretend, that this city was the residence of, queen Candace, and even of the famed queen of Sheba.

AUZIA, or AUZZEA, was a city of great antiquity, in Numidia, if, with Menander Ephefus, we suppose it to be the African city of that name, founded by Ithobaal (called in Scripture Eth-baal, and who was the father of Jezebel, the wife of king Ahab), king of Tyre. Tacitus tells us, that it was built in a small plain, surrounded on all sides with barren forests of vast extent. The ruins of this city are called, by the neighbouring Arabs, Sour Gullan, i. e. the Walls of the Antilopes, a great part whereof, flanked at proper distances with little square towers, is still remaining.

AW, or AWON, i. e. a river, running from Lochow, a fresh-water lake of Lorn, in Argyleshire, Scotland; and, after a course of about 6 or 7 miles, enters Lough-Ediff, which falls into the west-sea opposite to Mull, and abounds with salmon.

AWAS, or AHUAS, a large city of Khusestan, a province of Persia. It is situated on the banks of a little river, that falls into the Tigris, a little above its junction with the Euphrates, 68 miles from Suseter, towards the west.

AWERRI, the capital of a kingdom, and independent of the king of Benin Proper, a province of Guiney, in Africa.

AWEYDEN, an estate and seat of count Finckenstein, in the general bailiwick of Sehest, and circle of the latter name, in the kingdom of Prussia.

A X

AWFORD, or ALFORD, in Lincolnshire, a market-town, 5 miles from the sea, and 107 from London. Its market is on Tuesdays; and it has 2 fairs, on Whittsun-Tuesday, and November 8, for cattle and sheep. See ALFORD.

AWLAN, a small imperial town of Germany, in the circle of Suabia, seated on the river Kochen. Long. 11, 15, E. Lat. 48, 52, N.

AWRISH, a river in Durham, which runs into the Tees, at Eggleton.

AWRUD, in Latin Auraria, a well-peopled town of Weissenburg-county, in Transylvania, a part of the kingdom of Hungary. It is the principal among the metal-towns, abounding in mines of gold and silver, and is the seat of the mine-chamber, or chancery.

AX, a river which rises near Chiddington, in Dorsetshire, and enters Devonshire at Ford; and 5 miles below is joined by a pretty large stream at Axminster, falling into the British Channel at Axmouth, 5 miles below Axminster.

AXBRIDGE, a neat market-town in Somersetshire, 8 miles N. W. of Wells, and 120 W. from London. It is situated on the river Axe, and is governed by a mayor, bailiff, recorder, &c. The mayor has 2 maces carried before him; and the town formerly sent members to parliament. It has 2 fairs, March 25, and June 11, for cattle, sheep, toys, and cheese. Teafels are more cultivated hereabouts than in any other part of England. The church is large, and its tower has 2 antique statues; one on the east and the other on the west side; with a ring of 5 bells. Here is an alms-house, endowed. Lat. 51, 30, N. Long. 3, 10, W.

AXE, a river in Somersetshire, which runs into the Severn below Uphill.

AXEL, in Latin Axelum, a small, but strong town of Dutch Flanders. It is the principal place of one of the four manors between those of Asenede and Hulst, containing 12 villages under its jurisdiction, 14 miles north of Ghent. It was taken in 1452 by the duke of Burgundy, and dismantled, and afterwards made a strong fortress. Lat. 51, 30, N. Long. 3, 40, E.

AXEWAL, formerly a strong castle of Scara-borg territory, in West Gothland, Sweden; but now in ruins. Dahlberg has a view of it.

AXHOLM, a river island in the north-west part of Lindsey, a subdivision of Lincolnshire. It is formed by the Trent, the Idle, and the Dun; and situated partly in this county, and partly in Yorkshire. It is 10 miles long and 4 broad; yields alabaster and flax in the middle parts. It is a marshy strip of land; and was anciently a forest, as is evident from the great number of very large oaks, firs, and other trees, found in it, particularly the second fort. When it was first overflowed is not certain; but it must have happened many centuries ago; which is apparent from the depth of the marshes.

AXIM, a small territory on the gold coast, in Africa. The climate here is so excessively moist, that it is proverbially said to rain 11 months and 29 days of the year. This excessive moisture renders it very unhealthy; but it produces great quantities of rice, water-melons, lemons, oranges, &c. Here are also produced vast numbers of black cattle, goats, sheep, tame pigeons, &c. The whole country is filled with beautiful and populous villages; and the intermediate lands well cultivated; besides which the natives are very wealthy, from the constant traffic carried on with them by the Europeans for their gold. The capital, which is also called Axim, by some Achombone, stands under the cannon of the Dutch fort, St. Antonio. Behind, it is secured by a thick wood, that covers over the whole declivity of a neighbouring hill. Between the town and the sea runs an even and spacious shore of beautiful white sand. All the houses are separated by groves of cocoa and other fruit trees, planted in parallel lines, each of an equal width, and forming an elegant vista. The little river Axim crosses the town; and the coast is defended by a number of small pointed rocks, which project from the shore, and render all access to it dangerous. The capital is situated in Long. 24, 0, W. Lat. 5, 0, N. This canton is a kind of republic, the government being divided between the Caboceroes or chief men, and Manaceroes or young men. It must be observed, however, that in their courts there is not even a pretence of justice: whoever makes the most valuable presents to the judges is sure to gain his cause; the judges themselves alledging the gratitude due for the bribes received, as a reason; and if both parties happen to make presents of nearly equal value, they absolutely refuse to give the cause a hearing.

AXIOPOLI, anciently a town situated in that place where the Danube takes the name of Ister, and in the sangiacate of Silistre, belonging to Bulgaria, in Turkish Illyrium: but at present hardly the name of it remains.

AXMINSTER, a market-town and an old place, in Devonshire, on the borders of Somersetshire and Dorsetshire, 146 miles from London, and in the western road to it, and 22 miles east from Exeter. This town has a considerable trade for its kerseys, druggets, and other woollen manufactures. Its market is on Saturday, and its fairs on St. Mark's day, April 25, Wednesday after June 24, and first Wednesday after Sept. 29, for cattle. It stands on the river Axe; and king Athelstan, the Saxon, erected a minster here, for priests to pray for the souls of those buried in King's-field, who had been killed in the bloody battle of Brunaburg, in which he defeated the Danes. It is well supplied with fish from the coast-towns in its neighbourhood. The living is in the gift of the archbishop of York. Lat. 50, 40, N. Long. 3, 15, W.

AXSBERG, a sulphur-mine or factory, about a mile and a quarter from Oerebro, in East Nericia, a province of Sweden Proper. It is considerable for that mineral, and yields great profits. From the gravel dug here is first prepared sulphur, then vitriol, and last of all a red sort of colour.

AXTORN, a village of North Halland and South Gothland, in Sweden, where the battle of Falkenberg was fought in 1565, in which the Danes were defeated by the Swedes.

AXUM. See AUXUME.

AY, in Latin Ageium, a town of Upper Champagne, belonging to the government of this last name and Brie, in France. It is situated on the Marne; and in it is a royal mayory, under the bailiwick of Epernay. Its neighbourhood produces excellent wine. It lies 4 leagues from Rheims to the south, and opposite to Epernay.

AY. See AYTON.

AYAGH, one of the Andreanoffky Ostrova, the islands of St. Andrian. See ANDREANOFFSKY-ISLANDS.

AYAGISH, a burning mountain on the island of Aghunalahka.

AYAMONT, a town of Seville, one of the subdivisions of Andalusia, in Spain. It is situated at the mouth of the Guadiana, and has a commodious harbour. Near it is made good wine, but not strong. It gives the title of marquis to the houses of Zuniga and Guzman; and is 85 miles north-west of Cadiz. Lat. 37, 5, N. Long. 8, 5, W.

AYDON, or HEYDON-BRIDGE, Northumberland, 5 miles west of Hexham. Market on Tuesday, and a fair on July 21 and 3 days after. There is a bridge here over the south Tyne.

AYENNIS, a nation of wild Indians, in Florida.

AYERBANGIE, a town in the Indian island of Sumatra, which lies N. lat. 1. produces gold and pepper, and has a good harbour, which is but little frequented, because the natives will not scruple to murder a stranger, if they can get by it. It lies in a small but deep bay, and has 3 small islands before it, which makes it a most excellent harbour.

AYERVE, anciently Ebellium, a fine village of Aragon, in Spain.

AYETA, a little place of the Hither Calabria, in the kingdom of Naples, and lower division of Italy.

AYLESBURY, a manor-royal, in Buckinghamshire. See AILESURY.

AYLESFORD (Kent) on the river Medway, 4 miles to the north of Maidstone, 6 miles south of Rochester, and 28 from London. The parish is divided by the river. The north part, where the

the church stands, is an ancient demesne, and has a constable of itself. The south part, which contains the manors of Preston and Milhale, was given by king Henry I. to the church of Rochester. Here is an hospital for 6 poor people, each to be allowed 10*l.* a year; also a charity-school, and a fair the 29th of June. Near this place, under the side of a hill, is a heap of stones resembling Stonehenge, on Salisbury-plain. The common people call it Keithcoty-house.

AYLSHAM, a populous and pleasant little town in Norfolk; where a court is kept for the duchy of Lancaster, as belonging to it.

AYMARAES, a jurisdiction in the empire of Peru, in South-America; subject to the bishop of Cusco, 40 leagues south-west of that city. It abounds in sugars, cattle, corn, and mines of gold and silver, which are for the most part neglected, as it is but thinly inhabited.

AYMOUTH, EYMOUTH, or HAYMOUTH, a town of the Merse, in Scotland, with a small harbour, on the German-ocean, 6 miles north of Berwick. It is a good fishing-town; and here is plenty of claret. Lat. 55, 50, N. Long. 1, 50, W. It was fortified anciently to curb the garrison of Berwick.

AYRON, a river in Cardiganshire, which runs into the Irish-sea.

AYTON, a little town of the Merse, or shire of Berwick, in the south division of Scotland. It stands on the bank of the Ay, with a ruinous church, unroofed.

AYX, or AIX, an island of France, at the mouth of the Charente, in the territory and government of Aunis. It lies 11 miles west of Rochfort, in the bay of Biscay, and is about 5 miles in circuit. It was taken by the English in 1757, when it had a fort, 8 mortars, and 30 guns, with a governor and a garrison consisting of 600 men: the works were destroyed and the place pillaged by the English. It produces grapes, which make an indifferent sort of wine; of both which we took all their stock and stripped the priest of the parish. It is thought that if this and the Isle de Madame were properly fortified, they would render Rochfort the most secure sea-port belonging to France.

AZAL, a town of Touraine, in France; seated on the river Indre. Long. 10, 35, E. Lat. 47, 18, N.

AZAMBUJA, a place of Santarem district, in Portuguese Estremadura. It belongs to count Val de Reys.

AZAMBUJEIRA, a place in the last-mentioned district and province.

AZAMOR, once one of the most considerable cities of Ducola, a province of Africa; situated on the gulph of the same name, formed by the mouth of the river of Ommirabi. It was very populous, and had an excellent fishery, when the Portuguese seized upon the place, which, after 5 years possession, they demolished and abandoned in 1513. It stands about 30 leagues south-west of Sallee, and 7 west of Mazagan. Lat. 33, N. Long. 7, 45, W.

AZANIA, that portion of Arcadia which king Arcas (from whom Arcadia had its name) when at his death he divided his kingdom among his sons, gave to Azan, his eldest, who thus called it after his own name.

AZAZENE, a Persian province beyond the Tigris, which was about the year 420 over-run and wasted by Ardaburios, the Roman general, in the reign of Theodosius II. after having gained a complete victory over Narses, whom Vararanes, king of Persia, had sent with a numerous army to oppose him. The battle was fought on the 3d of September, and the news of the victory brought on the 6th of that same month to Constantinople, though 700 miles distant from the nearest borders of Persia, by a famous courier of those times, named Palladius. He travelled with the same surprising expedition to what part soever he was sent; whence of him it was pleasantly said, that he had found means to reduce the Roman empire to a petty state.

AZEM, ASEM, or ACHEM, a kingdom contiguous to that of Ava, in India, beyond the Ganges, in Asia. It is bounded by Independent Tartary and Boutan on the north, by Tipra on the south, by part of China on the east, and by Mogul on the west. It is 90 German leagues from north-east to south-west, and about 40 where broadest. This is one of the best countries in Asia, producing all the necessaries of life, besides mines of gold and silver, steel, lead, iron, the best of gum-lacque, and store of coarse silk, which, though glossy, soon frets. Dogs' flesh is sold in their markets as the greatest dainty. They have very good grapes, of which, when dried, they make aqua vitæ. They make good salt of the green scum on their standing waters, after being dried and burnt, and the ashes boiled. They make another sort from the ashes of the leaves of Adam's fig-tree; and of the same ashes they make a lee, which renders their silk as white as snow; but they have no great plenty of these leaves. The king requires no subsidies; and, though he is the proprietor of the mines, employs none to work in them but slaves: so that the rest of his subjects live at ease, each having 4 wives. Both sexes have generally a good complexion; but those who live in the most southern parts are swarthy, and not so subject to wens in their throats as in the north. They have pendants of gold or silver at their ears. Both sexes wear their hair as long as possible, and are all naked except their pudenda; with a cap on their heads. They wear bracelets, which, when a man dies, are buried with him.

A Z

him. They suffer no gold to be exported; but make it up into ingots, which pass in trade. They have silver pieces of two shillings value; and great quantities of their lacque are exported to China and Japan, for varnishing cabinets, &c. Its capital is Kemmeroose, or Guerguen. It was hardly known before Mirgimola, general of Aurengezebe, conquered it about the middle of the last century. He undertook this expedition with so much the more confidence, as that country had been without any wars for the space of 600 or 700 years, and the people had entirely neglected the use of arms. It was not difficult to conquer such a people; yet tradition attributes to them the invention of gunpowder, which passed from Azem to Pegu, and from Pegu to China, which has given occasion to say, that the Chinese were the authors of that discovery. It is said that in that war Mirgimola made prize of several pieces of cannon, which were all of iron.

AZEITAS, an inconsiderable place in an audience of the same name, in Portuguese Estremadura.

AZEITE, a mean place belonging to Pinhel district, in Beira, a province of Portugal.

AZEKAH, a city mentioned among those of the tribe of Judah, Joshua xv. 35. and near which the confederate kings were destroyed by a shower of hail.

AZMER, a town of the East-Indies, in the dominions of the great mogul, capital of a province of the same name, with a very strong castle. It is pretty large, and is sometimes visited by the mogul himself. It is about 62 leagues distant from Agra. The principal trade of this province is in salt-petre.

AZERE. See PINHEIRO.

AZERGUE, a small river of Lyonnois, a government of France.

AZEVEDO, a small district of Vienna, in the province of Entre Douro e Minho, in Portugal.

AZINCOURT. See AGINCOURT.

AZOPH. See ASOPH.

AZOO, the burying-place of the kings of Assem, in India, beyond the Ganges, in Asia. In the temple, where they are buried with the idol they adored, is store of gold, silver, and other treasure, deposited in the vaults: for though they think that the good have plenty of all necessities in the other world, yet they believe that the wicked suffer hunger and other miseries; for which reason, not having so high an opinion of the sanctity of their monarchs, they bury riches with them, as well as their principal wives, officers, elephants, camels, hounds, &c. which they believe will serve them in the other world. Barbarity is joined to superstition in this funeral solemnity. At the king's death, the woman whom he has loved best, and the principal officers of his household, poison themselves, that they may have the glory of being interred with him, and of serving him in a future state. If a private person, all his friends and relations must assist at his funeral; and every one must throw into the grave the bracelets and other ornaments he wears.

AZORES, islands belonging to Portugal, in the Atlantic ocean, and situated between Africa and America: they are also called Terceiras, and the Flemish isles. They were discovered in 1449. The first name they take from Anser (a goose) on account of the great number of devouring birds like geese, hawks, eagles, and falcons, which were found here upon the first discovery of them; the second from the principal island, which is called Terceira; and the third name from the Flemings, who discovered them much about the same time as the Portuguese did. The whole number of these islands is nine; namely, Santa Maria, S. Miguel, Terceira, S. George, Graciosa, Fayal, Pico, Flores, and Corvo. [See under these articles.] They are sometimes called the Western-islands, as lying west of Europe, between lat. 36 and 40, N. and between long. 25 and 33, W. Besides the abovementioned, are some other smaller islands, particularly one, which Kercher says started out of the sea, in the year 1638, like that of Santorini, in the Archipelago. The Terceira islands are discovered a great way off (Frazier says about 30 leagues) by a high mountain called the Pico, or Peak of Azores. All these islands enjoy a very clear sky and salubrious air; they are extremely fertile in corn, wine, and variety of fruits; and they breed large quantities of cattle. They are exposed to violent earthquakes, as well as the vehement agitation of the waves which surround them, sometimes causing vast damage.

AZOTUS. See ASHDOD.

AZUA, a little town on the south side of the island of St. Domingo, at the bottom of a deep bay, and belongs to the Spaniards.

AZUAGA, a little town of Spanish Estremadura. It has a strong castle, and is a commendary of the order of Santiago.

AZUL, Rio, i. e. the Blue river, in California, in North-America. Father Kaino passed from this country into New Mexico, without crossing any other water than this. Lat. 35, N.

AZURARA, a district of Viseu, belonging to the province of Beira, in Portugal. It comprehends 13 parishes.

BAAL.

B.

B A

BAAL, in the Hebrew tongue, signifies Lord; and hence is the name, generally in scripture, &c. frequently applied to the eastern idols; for instance;

BAAL PEOR, the latter name Peor being thought to be a part of the mountains Abarim, and the former, Baal, being supposed to be an idol in a temple standing on this mountain, and thence called Baal Peor, meaning the idol worshipped on Mount Peor. By partaking of the sacrifices offered to this idol, and worshipping it, the Israelites greatly provoked God, whilst they lay encamped at Shittim, Num. xxv. 1-5.

BAAL-PERAZIM, mentioned II. Sam. v. 20. it is evident from the circumstances of the Sacred History, lay either in the valley of Rephaim (which see,) or near it; and it seems to be the same that is called Mount Perazim, Isa. xxviii. 21.

BAALSHALISHA. In II. Kings, v. 42. we read of a man that came from Baalshalisha, and brought Elisha 20 loaves of barley, wherewith he fed 100 men, so that they left thereof. This place is in the Septuagint version writ Bætharifa, which, Eusebius and Jerom tell us, was a town in the borders of Diospolis, about 15 miles distant from it to the N. in the country of Thamna, whence it appears to have been situated in Mount Ephraim. And this description agrees well enough with what we read of the land of Shalisha (I. Sam. ix. 4). wherein this Baalshalisha probably was situated. For the land of Shalisha probably lay in Ephraim.

BAAR, a landgravate in the S. W. corner of the circle of Suabia, and in which country the Danube takes its rise. It hath several small towns, of which Furstenburg is the principal; also several villages and castles.

BAB. See BABELMANDEL.

BABA, one of the largest lieutenancies of Guayaquil, in South America, reaching to the skirts of the Cordillera, or Anga Marca mountains. It belongs to the jurisdiction of Latacunga. Besides the principal town of the same name, where the corregidor's deputy continually resides, it has other towns annexed to it, so as to be under one priest. Formerly the river Baba, which ran close to this town, by a canal being cut for watering a cocoa-plantation, has ever since inclined more to this last course, than to its original channel, and could not be stopped: so that it now runs some distance from the town. In this district abounds the cocoa-tree, which is generally no less than 18 or 20 feet high.

BABA. See TOMI.

BABADAGI, a town of Bulgaria, in European Turkey, remarkable for the large eagles in its neighbourhood; from which the bowyers throughout Turkey and Tartary are furnished with feathers for their arrows; though only 12 quills, and those from the tail, can be used for this purpose; and they commonly cost a dollar each. It was taken by the Russians in 1771.

BABAHoyo, a village and custom-house, being the landing place in the river of Guayaquil, from that city. Here the merchandizes from Peru, and Terra Firma, and their respective provinces, are landed.

BABASZEK, in Latin Babina, a small town of Altsöhl county, and circle on this side the Danube, in Lower Hungary. It has good arable lands belonging to it, and count Bereny is its proprietor.

BABEL-MANDEL, the Gate of Mourning; a famous strait in the Indian ocean, between the coast of Arabia Felix in Asia, and that of Adel and Zeila in Africa, at the entrance into the Red Sea. By some it is also called the Straits of Moka. It is narrow, and difficult to sail through, on account of the sand-banks. At the mouth of the strait is a small island called also Babel-Mandel, which is little else than a barren rock. Long. 44, 30, E. Lat. 12, 40. N.

BABENHAUSEN, a small town in a district of the same name, in the circle of Hanau Munzenburg. It has a castle, and stands on the river Gernsprinz, and was for some time the residence of the counts of Hanau. Here was a mint which was removed to Hanau. The district lies on the Mayne, and belonged formerly to the counts of Munzenburg, who, becoming extinct in the 13th century, it fell to the lord of Hanau, but now belongs to Hesse Cassel.

BABENTHAL, a village in the priory or probity of Kron-weissenburg, in Lower Alsace, now a government of France.

BABOCSA,

B A

BABOCSA, or BABOTSA, anciently a very strong castle of Simeghi county, belonging to the circle beyond the Danube, in Lower Hungary. It was taken by the Turks in 1555, but the Imperialists retook and demolished it the succeeding year. After three years time it was repaired by order of king Ferdinand, but abandoned in 1566, which the Turks took possession of in 1595; but was again taken from them in the year 1600. At present it has no garrison.

BABOLITZA, CARETHNA, or BABOLIZA, a town of Hungary, or rather Sclavonia, seated near the river Drave, between Posséga and Zygeth.

BABUYANES, Gemelli acquaints us, are little low Philippine islands, beyond Cape Boneador, opposite to New Segovia, at 8 leagues distance from it, and stretching out to the island Formosa and Lequios. In the nearest, which is conquered, are about 500 natives that pay tribute. It produces wax, ebony, botatas, (perhaps potatoes), cocoas, plantans, and other things, for the maintenance of the inhabitants, and of certain creatures called in the country language Babuyes, whence the name of babuyanés was derived.

BABYLON, the capital of the ancient kingdom of Babylonia or Chaldaea, and supposed to have stood in E. long. 42, 53. N. lat. 33, 0. Semiramis is said by some, and Belus by others, to have founded this city. But, by whomsoever it was founded, Nebuchadnezzar was the person who put the last hand to it, and made it one of the wonders of the world. The most famous works in and about it were the walls of the city, the temple of Belus, Nebuchadnezzar's palace, the hanging-gardens, the banks of the river, the artificial lake, and the canals.

The city was furrounded with walls, in thickness 87 feet, in height 350 feet, and in compass 480 furlongs or 60 of our miles. Thus Herodotus, who was himself at Babylon; and though some disagree with him in these dimensions, yet most writers give us the same, or near the same, as he does. Diodorus Siculus diminishes the circumference of these walls very considerably, and takes somewhat from the height of them, as in Herodotus; though he seems to add to their breadth, by saying, that 6 chariots might drive abreast thereon; while the former writes, that one chariot only might turn upon them; but then he places buildings on each side of the top of these walls; which, according to him, were but one story high; which may pretty well reconcile them together in this respect. It is observed, that those who gave the height of these walls but at 50 cubits, speak of them only as they were after the time of Darius Hystaspis, who had caused them to be beaten down to that level. These walls formed an exact square, each side of which was 120 furlongs, or 15 miles, in length; and were all built of large bricks cemented together with bitumen, which in a short time grows harder than the very brick and stone which it cements. The city was encompassed, without the walls, with a vast ditch filled with water, and lined with bricks on both sides; and, as the earth that was dug out of it served to make the bricks, we may judge of the depth and largeness of the ditch from the height and thickness of the walls. In the whole compass of the wall there were 100 gates, that is, 25 on each of the four sides, all made of solid brass. Between every two of these gates, at proper distances, were three towers, and four more at the four corners of this great square, and three between each of these corners and the next gate on either side, and each of these towers was ten feet higher than the walls. But this is to be understood only of those parts of the walls where towers were needful for defence. For some parts of them being upon a morass, and inaccessible by an enemy, there the labour and cost were spared, which, though it must have spoiled the symmetry of the whole, must be allowed to have favoured of good economy; though that is what one would not have expected from a prince who had been so determined, as Nebuchadnezzar must have been, to make the city complete both for strength and beauty. The whole number, then, of these towers amounted to no more than 250; whereas a much greater number would have been necessary to have made the uniformity complete all round. From the 25 gates in each side of this square, there was a straight street, extending to the corresponding gate in the opposite wall; whence the whole number of the streets must have been but 50; but then they were each about 15 miles long, 25 of them crossing the other 25 exactly at right angles. Besides these whole streets, we must reckon four half-streets, which were but rows of houses facing the four inner sides of the walls. These four half-streets were properly the four sides of the city within the walls, and were each of them 200 feet broad, the whole streets being about 150 of the same. By this intersection of the 50 streets, the city was divided into 676 squares, each of four furlongs and an half on each side, or two miles and a quarter in compass. Round these squares on every side towards the streets stood the houses, all of three or four stories in height, and beautified with all manner of ornaments; and the space within each of these squares was all void, and taken up by yards, or gardens, and the like, either for pleasure or convenience.

A branch of the Euphrates divided the city into two, running through the midst of it, from N. to S. over which, in the very middle of the city, was a bridge, a furlong in length, or rather more, and indeed much more, if we hearken to others, who say it was no less than five stades or furlongs in length.

length, though but 30 feet broad, a difference we shall never be able to decide: this bridge, however, is said to have been built with wonderful art, to supply a defect in the bottom of the river, which was all sandy. At each end of this bridge were two palaces; the old palace on the east side, the new one on the west side of the river; the former of which took up four of the squares above-mentioned, and the latter nine. The temple of Belus, which stood next to the old palace, took up another of the same squares.

The whole city stood in a large flat or plain, in a very fat and deep soil; that part or half of it, on the east side of the river, was the old city; and the other on the west was added by Nebuchadnezzar, both being included within the vast square bounded by the walls aforesaid. The form of the whole was seemingly borrowed from Nineveh, which was also 480 furlongs; but, though it was equal in dimensions to this city, it was less with respect to its form, which was a parallelogram, whereas that of Babylon was an exact square. It is supposed, that Nebuchadnezzar, who had destroyed that old seat of the Assyrian empire, proposed that this new one should rather exceed it; and that it was in order to fill it with inhabitants, that he transported such numbers of the captives from other countries hither; though that is what may be disputed, seeing he therein only followed the constant practice of the kings of Assyria, who thought this the most certain means of assuring their conquests either to themselves or their posterity.

But it plainly appears, that it was never wholly inhabited; so that, even in the meridian of its glory, it may be compared with the flower of the field, which flourishes to-day, and to-morrow is no more. It never had time to grow up to what Nebuchadnezzar had visibly intended to have made it; for, Cyrus removing the seat of the empire soon after to Shushan, Babylon fell by degrees to utter decay: yet it must be owned, that no country was better able to support so vast and populous a city, had it been completed up to its first design. But so far was it from being finished according to its original design, that, when Alexander came to Babylon, Quintus Curtius tells us, "No more than 90 furlongs of it were then built;" which can be no otherwise understood than of so much in length; and, if we allow the breadth to be as much as the length (which is the utmost that can be allowed), it will follow, that no more than 8100 square furlongs were then built upon: but the whole space within the walls contained 14,400 square furlongs; and therefore there must have been 6300 square furlongs remaining unbuilt; which, Curtius tells us, were ploughed and sown. And, besides this, the houses were not contiguous, but all built with a void space on each side, between house and house.

The next great work of Nebuchadnezzar was the temple of Belus. The wonderful tower, however, that stood in the middle of it, was not his work, but was built many ages before; that, and the famous tower of Babel, being, as is commonly supposed, one and the same structure. This tower is said to have been composed of 8 pyramidal ones, raised above one another, and by Herodotus said to have been a furlong in height; but as there is an ambiguity in his expression, it has been disputed whether each of the towers was a furlong in length, or the whole of them taken together. On the latter supposition, which is the most probable, this tower must have exceeded the highest of the Egyptian pyramids by 179 feet, though it fell short of its breadth at the basis by 33. The way to go up was by stairs on the outside round it; whence it seems most likely, that the whole ascent was, by the benching in, drawn in a sloping line from the bottom to the top 8 times round it; and that this made the appearance of 8 towers, one above the other. Till the times of Nebuchadnezzar, it is thought, this tower was all the temple of Belus; but as he did by the other ancient buildings of the city, so he did by this, making great additions thereto, by vast edifices erected round it, in a square of 2 furlongs on every side, and just a mile in circumference, which exceeded the square at the temple of Jerusalem by 1800 feet. On the outside of these buildings was a wall, which inclosed the whole; and, in consideration of the regularity wherewith this city was to all appearance marked out, it is supposed, that this wall was equal to the square of the city wherein it stood, and so is concluded to have been two miles and an half in circumference. In this wall were several gates leading into the temple, and all of solid brass; which it is thought may have been made out of the brazen sea, and brazen pillars, and other vessels and ornaments of the kind, which Nebuchadnezzar had transported from Jerusalem; for in this temple he is said to have dedicated his spoils from that of Jerusalem.

In this temple were several images or idols of massy gold, and one of them, said to have been 40 feet in height; the same, as supposed, with that which Nebuchadnezzar consecrated in the plains of Dura. For though this last is said to have been 60 cubits, or 90 feet high, these dimensions appear so incredible, that it has been attempted to reconcile them into one, by supposing, that in the 90 feet the height of the pedestal is included, and that the 40 feet are for the height of the statue without the pedestal; and, being said to have weighed 1000 talents of Babylon, it is thence computed, that it was worth 3 millions and a half of our money. In a word, the whole weight of the statues and decorations, in Diodorus Siculus, amounting to 5000 and odd talents in gold, the whole is estimated at above 21 millions of our money; ney; and a sum about equal to the same, in treasure, utensils, and ornaments, not mentioned, is allowed for.

Next to this temple, on the east side of the river, stood the old palace of the kings of Babylon, being four miles in circumference. Exactly opposite to it, on the other side of the river, was the new palace built by Nebuchadnezzar, 8 miles in circumference, and consequently four times as big as the old one.

But nothing was more wonderful at Babylon than the hanging-gardens, which Nebuchadnezzar made in compliance to his wife Amyte; who, being a Mede, and retaining a strong inclination for the mountains and forests of her own country, was desirous of having something like them at Babylon. They are said to have contained a square of four plethra, or 400 feet, on each side; and to have consisted of terraces one above another, carried up to the height of the wall of the city, the ascent from terrace to terrace being by steps ten feet wide. The whole pile consisted of substantial arches upon arches, and was strengthened by a wall surrounding it on every side, 22 feet thick; and the floors on each of them were laid in this order: first, on the tops of the arches was laid a bed or pavement of stones 16 feet long, and 4 feet broad; over this was a layer of reed mixed with a great quantity of bitumen; and over this two courses of brick, closely cemented together with plaster; and over all these were thick sheets of lead, and on these the earth or mould of the garden. This flooring was designed to retain the moisture of the mould; which was so deep, as to give root to the greatest trees which were planted upon every terrace, together with great variety of other vegetables pleasing to the eye. Upon the uppermost of these terraces was a reservoir, supplied by a certain engine with water from the river, from whence the gardens on the other terraces were supplied.

The other works attributed to Nebuchadnezzar by Berosus and Abydenus, were the banks of the river, the artificial canals, and the great artificial lake said to have been sunk by Semiramis. The canals were cut out on the east side of the Euphrates, to convey the waters of that river, when it overflowed its banks, into the Tigris, before they reached Babylon. The lake was on the west side of Babylon; and, according to the lowest computation, 40 miles square, 160 in compass, and in depth 35 feet, as we read in Herodotus, or 75, as Megasthenes will have it; the former, perhaps, measured from the surface of the sides, and the latter from the tops of the banks that were cast up upon them. This lake was dug to receive the waters of the river, while the banks were building on each side of it. But both the lake, and the canal which led to it, were preserved after that work was completed, being found of great use, not only to prevent all overflowings, but to keep water all the year, as in a common reservoir, to be let out, on proper occasions, by sluices, for the improvement of the land.

The banks were built of brick and bitumen, on both sides of the river, to keep it within its channel; and extended on each side throughout the whole length of the city, and even farther, according to some, who reckon they extended 160 furlongs, or 20 miles; whence it is concluded they must have begun 2 miles and a half above the city, and have been continued an equal distance below it, the length of the city being no more than 15 miles. Within the city they were built from the bottom of the river, and of the same thickness with the walls of the city itself. Opposite to each street, on either side of the river, was a brazen gate in the said wall, with stairs leading down from it to the river; these gates were open by day, and shut by night.

Berosus, Megasthenes, and Abydenus, attribute all these works to Nebuchadnezzar; but Herodotus tells us, the bridge, the banks, and the lake, were the work of a queen after him, called Nitocris, who may have finished what Nebuchadnezzar left imperfect, and thence have had the honour this historian gives her of the whole.

The tower or temple stood till the time of Xerxes. But that prince, on his return from the Grecian expedition, having first plundered it of its immense wealth, demolished the whole, and laid it in ruins. Alexander, on his return to Babylon from his Indian expedition, proposed to rebuild it, and accordingly set 10,000 men at work to clear away the rubbish. But, his death happening soon after, a stop was put to all farther proceedings in that design. After the death of that conqueror, the city of Babylon began to decline apace; which was chiefly owing to the neighbourhood of Seleucia, built by Seleucus Nicator, as is said, out of spite to the Babylonians, and peopled with 500,000 persons drawn from Babylon, which by that means continued declining till the very people of the country were at a loss to tell where it had stood.

Such is the description we have by ancient historians of the grandeur of this city; which, if these accounts are not exaggerated, must have exceeded every piece of human grandeur that hath yet appeared. Many of the moderns, however, are of opinion that these magnificent descriptions are very far from being true; although it is certain that few other arguments can be brought against the reality of them, than that we do not see things of a similar kind executed in our own days. President Goguet, in his arguments against the truth of the foregoing relation, says, "all these works, so marvellous in the judgment of antiquity, appear to me to have been extremely exaggerated by the authors who have spoken of them. How can we conceive, in effect, that the walls of Babylon could have been 318 feet high, high, and 81 in thickness, in a compass of near 10 leagues?" &c. &c. See BABYLONIA.

BABYLON, a town of Egypt, near the eastmost branch of the river Nile, now supposed to be Grand Cairo, or this city to stand near its ruins. Long. 31, 12, E. Lat. 30, 5, N.

BABYLONIA, or CHALDÆA, a kingdom of Asia, and the most ancient in the world, being founded by Nimrod, the grandson of Ham, who also, according to the margin of our Bibles, founded Nineveh, the capital of the kingdom of Assyria. Indeed these two kingdoms seem to have always continued in such a state of friendship that we can scarce help thinking they must have been the same, or perhaps Babylonia was for some time a province of Assyria. Nothing certain is known concerning either of them, except what may be gathered from Scripture. From thence we learn, that in the days of Abraham there was a king of Shinar, called Amraphel, who, under the king of Elam, or Persia, made war upon the Canaanites. From this time we have nothing that can be depended upon till the days of Nabonassar, the first king of Babylon mentioned in Ptolemy's canon. It is plain, indeed, both from Scripture and profane history, that Babylonia subsisted as a distinct kingdom from Assyria even when the latter was in all its glory. The most probable account of the matter is this: The empire of Assyria was founded by Pul, on the ruins of that of Damascus or Syria, in the days of Menahem, king of Judah. This king left two sons, Tiglath-Pileser and Nabonassar. To the former he bequeathed the empire of Assyria, and to the latter that of Babylonia. Tiglath-Pileser resided at Nineveh, the original seat of the Assyrian empire; while Nabonassar, who was the younger brother, held his residence at Babylon. As the two kingdoms were governed by princes of the same family, we may well suppose a perfect harmony to have reigned between them, the younger branch at Babylon acknowledging a kind of subjection to the elder at Nineveh. That the Babylonian empire was of Assyrian origin we are assured by the prophet Isaiah in the following words: "Behold the land of the Chaldeans: this people was not till the Assyrian founded it for them that dwelt in the wilderness; they set up the towers thereof; they built the palace thereof." As to the kingdom of Assyria, the Scripture mentions only 5 kings, viz. Pul, Tiglath-Pileser, Shalmanaser, Sennacherib, and Esarhaddon; whose history, as related by the sacred writers, it is needless to mention particularly here. From the days of Nabonassar to Nabopolassar, that is, from the year before Christ 747 to 626, the kings of Babylon made no figure, and were therefore probably in a state of dependence on the kings of Assyria; but at that time, in the reign of Chyniladan, the Sardanapalus of the Greeks, Nineveh was taken and destroyed by the Medes and Babylonians, and the seat of the empire transferred to Babylon. This Nabopolassar was the father of the famous Nebuchadnezzar, for whose history we must refer to the sacred writers; and from his time to that of the Belshazzar of Daniel, and Nabonadius of other authors, the history of Babylon is little better than a mere blank. Of the reduction of Babylonia by Cyrus, which happened at this time, we have the following account:

War had been begun betwixt the Medes, Persians, and Babylonians, in the reign of Neriglissar, father of Nabonadius, which had been carried on with very bad success on the side of the Babylonians. Cyrus, who commanded the Median and Persian army, having subdued the several nations inhabiting the great continent from the Ægean sea to the Euphrates, bent his march towards Babylon. Nabonadius, hearing of his march, immediately advanced against him with an army. In the engagement which ensued the Babylonians were defeated; and the king, retreating to his metropolis, was blocked up and closely besieged by Cyrus. The reduction of this city was no easy enterprise. The walls were of a prodigious height, the number of men to defend them very great, and the place stored with all sorts of provisions for 20 years. Cyrus, despairing of being able to take such a city by storm, caused a line of circumvallation to be drawn quite round it, with a large and deep ditch; reckoning, that if all communication with the country were cut off, the besieged would be obliged to surrender through famine. That his troops might not be too much fatigued, he divided his army into 12 bodies, appointing each body its month to guard the trenches; but the besieged, looking upon themselves to be out of all danger, by reason of their high walls and magazines, insulted him from the ramparts, and looked upon all the trouble he gave himself as so much unprofitable labour.

After Cyrus had spent two whole years before Babylon, without making any progress in the siege, he at last thought of the following stratagem, which put him in possession of it. He was informed that a great annual solemnity was to be held at Babylon; and that the inhabitants on that occasion were accustomed to spend the whole night in drinking and debauchery. This he therefore thought a proper time for surprising them; and accordingly sent a strong detachment to the head of the canal leading to the great lake, with orders, at a certain time, to break down the great bank which was between the lake and the canal, and to turn the whole current into the lake. At the same time he appointed one body of troops at the place where the river entered the city, and another where it came out; ordering them to march in by the head of the river as soon as they should find it fordable. Towards the evening he opened the head of the trenches on both sides the river above the city, that the water might discharge itself into them; by which means, and the breaking down of the great dam, the river was soon drained. Then the two above-mentioned bodies of troops, according to their orders, entered the channel; the one commanded by Gobryas, and the other by Gadates: and finding the gates all left open, by reason of the disorders of that riotous night, they penetrated into the very heart of the city without opposition; and meeting, according to agreement, at the palace, they surprised the guards, and cut them in pieces. Those who were in the palace opening the gates to know the cause of this confusion, the Persians rushed in, took the palace, and killed the king, who came out to meet them sword in hand. Thus an end was put to the Babylonian empire; and Cyrus took possession of Babylonia for one called in Scripture Darius the Mede, most probably Cyaxares II. uncle to Cyrus. From this time Babylonia never was erected into a distinct kingdom, but hath always followed the fortune of those great conquerors who at different times have appeared in Asia. It is now frequently the object of contention between the Turks and Persians.

The Assyrian and Babylonian history, according to the Greek writers, is so dark and full of fable that we have not thought proper to trouble our readers with it, especially as the whole is contained in the transactions of a few sovereigns, viz. Ninus, Semiramis, Ninyas, and Sardanapalus, rulers of Assyria; and Belshazzar, or Nanybrus, the first king of Babylon. Concerning the nature of the country, manners, customs, &c. of the ancient Babylonians, the following account is collected by M. Sabbathier.

"As all the nations under the dominion of Cyrus, beside the ordinary tributes, were obliged to maintain him and his army, the monarch and his troops were supported by all Asia. The country of Babylon alone was obliged to maintain him 4 months of the year; its fertility, therefore, yielded a third of the produce of Asia. The government of this country, which the Persians term satrapy, was richer and more extensive than any of the rest. It maintained for the king, besides the war-horses, a stud of 800 stallions and 16,000 mares. So great a number of Indian dogs were likewise bred in this province for the king that 4 of its cities kept those animals; and, in return, they were exempted from all taxes and tributes. It rained very seldom in this country, according to Herodotus. The earth was watered by the river, which was here diffused by human industry, as the Nile is over Egypt by nature: for all the country of Babylonia was divided by canals, the greatest of which was navigable, and flowed from south to north, from the Euphrates to the Tigris. In short, it was one of the finest countries for corn in the world; but for producing trees, the fig-tree, the vine, and the olive, it was not famous. It was so luxuriant in grain, that it commonly yielded an hundred times more than what was sown; and in its good years it yielded 300 times more than it received. The leaves of its wheat and barley were 4 inches broad. 'Though I know,' says Herodotus, 'that the millet and the sesame of that country grow to the size of trees, I will not describe them particularly, lest those who have not been in Babylonia should think my account fabulous.'

"They had no oil but what they made from Indian corn. The country abounded with palm-trees, which grew spontaneously; and most of them bore fruit, of which the inhabitants made bread, wine, and honey. They cultivated these trees and their fig-trees in the same manner. Some of them, as of other trees, the Greeks called male ones. They tied the fruit of the male to the trees which bore dates; that the mosquito, leaving the male, might cause the date to ripen, by penetrating it; for without that assistance it came not to maturity. Mosquitos bred in the male palms, as in the wild fig-trees.

"But we must not here omit to give an account of the peculiar and surprising construction of their boats of skins, in which they sailed along the river to Babylon. These boats were invented by the Armenians, whose country lay north from Babylonia. They made them with poles of willow, which they bent, and covered with skins; the bare side of the skins they put outwards; and they made them so tight that they resembled boards. The boats had neither prow nor stern, but were of a round form, like a buckler. They put straw on the bottom. Two men, each with an oar, rowed them down the river, laden with different wares, but chiefly with palm-wine. Of these boats some were very large, and some very small. The largest carried the weight of 500 talents. There was room for an ass in one of their small boats; they put many into a large one. When they had unloaded, after their arrival at Babylon, they sold the poles of their boats, and the straw; and, loading their asses with the skins, returned to Armenia: for they could not sail up the river, its current was so rapid. For this reason they made their boats of skins, instead of wood; and on their return to Armenia with their asses, they applied the skins to their former use.

"As to their dress, they wore a linen shirt, which came down to their feet. Over it they wore a woollen robe; their outer garment was a white vest. Their shoes resembled those of the Thebans. They let their hair grow. On their heads they wore a turban. They rubbed their bodies all over over with fragrant liquors. Each man had a ring on his finger; and an elegant cane in his hand, with an apple at the top, or a rose, a lily, or an eagle, or some other figure: for they were not suffered to use canes without devices.

"With regard to their policy, Herodotus thinks that their best law was one which the Heneti, an Illyrian people, likewise observed in every town and village. When the girls were marriageable, they were ordered to meet in a certain place, where the young men likewise assembled. They were then sold by the public crier; but he first sold the most beautiful one. When he had sold her at an immense price, he put up others to sale, according to their degrees of beauty. The rich Babylonians were emulous to carry off the finest women, who were sold to the highest bidders. But as the young men, who were poor, could not aspire to have the fine women, they were content to take the ugliest with the money which was given them: for when the crier had sold the handsomest, he ordered the ugliest of all the women to be brought, and asked if any one was willing to take her with a small sum of money? Thus she became the wife of him who was most easily satisfied, and thus the finest women were sold; and, from the money which they brought, small fortunes were given to the ugliest, and to those who had any bodily infirmity. A father could not marry his daughter as he pleased; nor was he who bought her allowed to take her home, without giving security that he would marry her. But, after the sale, if the parties were not agreeable to each other, the law enjoined that the purchase-money should be restored. The inhabitants of any of their towns were permitted to buy wives at these auctions. Such were the early customs of the Babylonians.

"But they afterwards made a law, which prohibited the inhabitants of different towns to intermarry, and by which husbands were punished for treating their wives ill. When they had become poor by the ruin of their metropolis, fathers used to prostitute their daughters for gain. There was a sensible custom among the Babylonians, worthy to be related. They brought their sick into the forum, to consult those who passed on their diseases; for they had no physicians. They asked those who approached the sick, if they ever had the same distemper? if they knew any one who had had it? and how it was cured? Hence, in this country, every one who saw a sick person was obliged to go to him, and inquire into his distemper. They embalmed their dead with honey; and their mourning was like that of the Egyptians.

"There were 3 Babylonian tribes, who lived only upon fish, and who prepared them in the following manner: they dried them in the sun, and then beat them in a mortar to a kind of flour, which after they had sifted through linen, they baked it in rolls.

"The Babylonians at first worshipped only the sun and the moon; but they soon multiplied their divinities. They deified Baal, Bel, or Belus, one of their kings, and Merodach-Baladan. They also worshipped Venus, under the name of Mylitta. She and Belus were the principal deities of the Babylonians. They counted their day from sun-rise to sun-rise. They solemnized 5 days of the year with great magnificence, and almost the same ceremonies with which the Romans celebrated their Saturnalia.

"The Babylonians were very much addicted to judicial astrology. Their priests, who openly professed that art, were obliged to commit to writing all the events of the lives of their illustrious men; and on a fancied connection between those events and the motions of the heavenly bodies, the principles of their art were founded. They pretended that some of their books, in which their historical transactions and revolutions were accurately compared with the courses of the stars, were thousands of years old. This assertion of their judicial astrologers we may reasonably dispute; but that their astronomers had made a long series of observations is incontestably true. It is certain that some of those observations were extant in the days of Aristotle, and that they were older than the empire of the Babylonians."

BACA, a small river of Portuguese Estremadura.

BACA, or BAZA, anciently Basti, the capital of the Bastitani, an old and pretty large town of Granada, in Spain. It lies in the valley called Hoya de Baca, on the river Guadalentin, and diocese of Guadix. It is walled, has 4 gates, and an old castle. It contains 3 parishes, one a collegiate, with 5 monasteries, as many nunneries, and an hospital. King Ferdinand took it from the Moors in 1489. Its neighbourhood produces wine, grain, flax, and hemp. It lies 35 miles north-west of Almeria. Lat. 37, 30, N. Long. 3, 6, W.

BACACUM, a town of the Nervii, in Gallia Belgica; now Bavay, in Hainault. Long. 3, 40, E. Lat. 50, 25, N.

BACAIM, a handsome sea-port town of the kingdom of Visapour, on the Malabar coast, in Asia. It is subject to the Portuguese. Long. 73, 10; E. Lat. 19, 0, N.

BACANO, a small place belonging to the province called St. Peter's Patrimony, in the Ecclesiastic State, and middle division of Italy. Here the papal chamber has good sulphur works. It gives its name to a lake, from which the river Varca issues, which was anciently called Cremera, and famous for the defeat of the Roman Fabii, in the 277th year of Rome.

BACAR, or BAKAR, one of the midland provinces of Indostan, in the East-Indies, in Asia. It is is bounded on the N. by Jamba; on the W. by Dehli; on the E. by the Ganges; and on the S. by Sanbal. Its quota of forces is 4000 horse and 8000 foot, with a revenue of 300,000 l. sterling.

BACARA, a castellany, in the government of Metz; the profitable lordship of which belongs to the bishop of this last name, but the sovereignty of it to the duke of Lorraine.

BACARACH, or BACCHARACH, a small town in the bailiwick of the same name, in the palatinate of the Rhine, in Germany, and subject to the elector. It is situated on an ascent near the W. shore of the Rhine. The wine in these parts is excellent. The town is commanded by the castle of Staleck. And on the side of the river next the town is Holy-island, where a toll is exacted. It lies 10 miles E. of Sinneren, and 18 W. from Mentz. Lat. 50, 3. N. Long. 7, 5, E.

BACARDO, a large village of Riviera di Ponente, or the western part of the Genoese dominions on the continent, and upper division of Italy.

BACASERAI, or BASCHASARAY, in Latin Baccasara, the capital of Crim Tartary, in European Turkey, and the seat of the Chan. It stands on the Kabarta, which runs through it. The neighbouring country is pleasant, having gardens, orchards, baths, &c. Here is a mosque, where the Chans are buried. In 1736 the Russians took it from the Turks. It lies 60 miles S. of Precop. Lat. 45, 15, N. Long. 35, 10, E.

BACEM, or BACCIAIM, a port-town of Cambaia, in the Hither Peninsula of India, in Asia, belonging to the Portuguese, in lat. 19, 20, N. Long. 72, 10, E.

BACH, a town of Lower Hungary, in the county of Tolu, seated on the river Danube; formerly a bishop's see.

BACHE, a small river in Montgomeryshire; which runs into the Dungum.

BACHIA. See BATH.

BACHIAN Isle, one of the Molucca or Clove Islands, belonging to the Dutch, in Asia. It lies under the equinoctial, and in long. 125, 5, E.

BACHMUT, a town belonging to a district of the same name, in the government of Woronez and Asof, in European Russia. It stands on the river Bachmut; partly upon an eminence on its western shore, and partly upon a plain on its eastern side: the former is covered by a citadel; and besides, both are fortified. For the defence of the salt-works of this country, the Imperial salt-chamber maintains one battalion of regular infantry, and a company of Cossacs, consisting of 100 men. The parts between Donez, Don, the Palus Mæotis, Mius, and Kalmius, not only surpass all the land of Little Russia in goodness, but have also several signs of ore.

BACKNANG, a town in a delightful valley on the Murr, in the duchy of Wurtemberg, and has a rich cathedral, founded in 1116. The Jesuits possessed this place from 1626 to 1648. Here is a special superintendancy, and the town with the castle of Reichenberg, about 1297, descended to the counts of Wurtemberg from the margrave of Baden. In 1635 and in 1693 it was wholly destroyed by fire.

BACOLA, a town of Bengal, in the Mogul empire and East-Indies, in Asia; which the Sanfons place under the tropic of Cancer. The houses here are neat and high, the streets large, and the people naked, except a linen wrapper about their middle. The women wear silver chains and rings about their necks, legs, and arms; and the poorer sort have them of ivory or copper.

BACSFALVA, a large village of Vaik jurisdiction, in the circle on this side the Danube, in Lower Hungary. Here is a famous Franciscan convent, to which frequent pilgrimages are made.

BACTRIANA, or BACTRIA, a country, once (and now a province) on the N. E. of ancient Persia, lay next to E. from Aria, and may be computed as part of the Corasan (Aria being the other part). The most considerable towns were Bactria, Maracanda, Charracharta. It was in the first ages a kingdom, and a very famous one too, and in later times it boasted 1000 cities. That part of Bactria which was watered by the river Oxus is described by the ancients as a very fruitful country, abounding with pastures, and well stocked with cattle of very large size; but the southern parts were nothing but sandy deserts, without any tract or beaten way, insomuch that travellers used to rest in the daytime, and pursue their journey in the night, guiding themselves by the stars, as on the sea, not without danger of being buried in the sand. The Bactrians in general (consisting of several nations) were reckoned good soldiers, being always at war, either among themselves or the neighbouring nations, and enemies to all manner of luxury. Pliny tells us they used to expose their old people, when they attained to a certain age, to be devoured by fierce mastiffs, which they kept for that purpose, and called sepulchral dogs. He adds that they allowed their daughters to keep company with whom they pleased, and that incontinency was no ways disreputable even to the women. As to government, they were ruled by kings in the earliest ages. Zoroaster is said by Eusebius to have reigned in Bactria. Bactria was subdued, first by the Assyrians, and and afterwards by the Persians under Cyrus the Great. It fell afterwards under the Macedonians, and was held by the successors of Seleucus Nicator till the reign of Antiochus Theos, when Theodotus, from governor of that province, became king. The kings whom we find mentioned as reigning in Bactria in the times of the emperor Adrian, Antoninus Pius, and Valerian, were all of Scythian extraction; but the Scythians were in their turn driven out by the Huns, who reigned in Bactria, as we find in modern historians, in the time of Ladislaus IV. king of Hungary. This Bactria is now part of the present Usbec Tartary, and was the native country of the late famous Kouli Kan, or Shah Nadir.

BACTRUS, one of the ancient names of the river Amou, in Tartary.

BADAGSHAN, a very ancient city of Great Bukharia, in the provinces of Balkh, situated at the foot of those high mountains which separate Iodostan from Great Tartary. The city is exceedingly strong by its situation; and belongs to the chan of Proper Bukharia, who uses it as a kind of state-prison to secure those he is jealous of. The town is not very large, but well built, and very populous. It stands on the north side of the river Amu, about 100 miles from its source, and is a great thoroughfare for the caravans designed for Little Bukharia. The inhabitants are enriched by mines of gold, silver, and rubies, which are in the neighbourhood; and those who live at the foot of the mountains gather a great quantity of gold and silver dust, brought down in the spring by torrents occasioned by the melting of the snow on the top.

BADAJOS, a city, and the capital of Spanish Estremadura, and a frontier-town against Portugal. It stands upon an eminence, on the S. side of the Guadiana; and is divided into the Upper and Lower town. It is not a large place; but has good houses, pretty broad streets, fine churches, some convents, and an extensive college. The bishop, who has a yearly income of 16,000 ducats, is a suffragan to the archbishop of Santiago. Its fortifications are antique: but it has some modern out-works, a castle fortified in the modern taste, called St. Michael; and on the farther side of the river the castle of St. Christoval, which particularly covers the old Roman stone-bridge over the river, that is 700 paces long, 14 broad, and is quite straight. In the time of the Romans this town was called Colonia Pacensis, and Pax Julia, or Pax Augusta, which last name the Moors corrupted into Bax Augos, out of which was at last formed Badajos. In the years 1658 and 1705 it was unsuccessfully besieged by the Portuguese: in the latter siege they were in conjunction with some of the confederates. The neighbouring country is extremely fruitful, and its flocks of sheep yield very fine wool. It lies 12 miles E. of Elvas, BADANETHA, according to Pliny, was the chief city of the ancient Thamydeni, who inhabited part of the coast of the Arabian Gulph; and Golius believes them to have inhabited a good part at least of the province of Hejaz, and particularly that district wherein Hagr or Al Hejr (the Egra or Agra of Stephanus and Ptolemy) was situated; which shews them to have been nearly related to the Saracens.

BADDLESMORE, a village in Kent, 8 miles W. of Canterbury, with a fair on September 6, for linen and toys.

BADELONA, or BADALÓN, a small town of Catalonia in Spain, with a fortress, on the Mediterranean. It lies 10 miles E. of Barcelona, where king Charles II. and lord Peterborough landed, when, in the year 1704, they laid siege to the last mentioned city. Lat. 41, 12, N. Long. 2, 20, E.

BADELUNDSÄHS, a long and narrow strip of sand, about half a mile from Westeråhs, a town of Westmannia, in Sweden Proper; upon which the Danes were defeated in the year 1521.

BADEN, a marquissate belonging to the circle of Suabia, in Germany. It is divided between two princes of the same family; namely, Baden and Durlach. The former, who is also called Baden-hochberg, or Baden-baden, is Roman Catholic; and the latter, Baden-durlach, is Lutheran. This country, one of the finest in Germany, extends along the eastern banks of the Rhine, between the Brisgaw and the duchy of Wirtemberg, opposite to Alsace, with the Palatinate on the north, the Black-forest on the east, Alsace on the west, and Swisserland on the south; to which it passes on a little below Philippsburgh on the north in a narrow tract, except where it is separated by the Brisgaw. It is near 60 miles long and 20 broad; and is very populous, abounding in corn and wine, but especially hemp, which they sell to the Dutch and Flemings.

Here are several free-stone quarries, and marble of all colours: and in Sponheim they have agate, which is polished and exported. It is besides full of villages and fine gardens. They have several woods of chesnut, where are large herds of swine. The Rhine, Entz, Wurb, Phints, &c. yield plenty of fish, as the chaces and parks do of venison and fowl. But the most considerable gain of the inhabitants arises from their baths and mineral springs, from which the principal towns take their names. The people, who are good soldiers, are greatly civilized, from the resort of strangers to their baths. By the treaty of Munster, the two branches act by turns in the general diet of the empire and circle of Suabia.

The estates of Baden-baden are, 1. the Upper Marquissate, containing the baronies of Baden, Beinheim, Bühl, Gravenstein, Ettlingen, Sultzberg, Stollhofen, Radstadt, and Molberg; 2. part of the county of Eberstein; 3. half of the county of Sponheim; 4. the lordship of Usenbers; 5. nine towns in Bohemia, which came to them by marriage; 6. the county of Guntzberg, betwixt Ulm and Augsburg, and the fort of Keil: the two last of which were given by the emperor to prince Lewis of Baden, as a reward for his great services; but by the treaty of Baden, in 1714, the latter of these places was restored to the emperor. The Margrave however enjoys the profitable part of its sovereignty.

The estates of Baden-dourlach, nearly equal to the former, are, 1. the Lower Marquisate of Baden, containing the towns of Dourlach, Pfortzeim, Gorbach, &c. 2. the marquisate of Hochberg; 3. the landgraviate of Saufenberg; 4. the lordship of Roetelen, Baden-weiler, and Muhlberg.

The two princes are absolute, and lay taxes even without assembling the states. The prince of Dourlach has always some forces on foot: and the revenues of both, being almost equal, may amount to about 80,000*l.* each per annum.

The marquisate of Baden-baden lies on the Rhine, S. W. from that of Baden-dourlach, and comprehends 6 bailiwicks, but is not so large as the other. Its principal place is BADEN, in Latin Bada, and anciently Thermæ Inferiores, to distinguish it from Baden in Switzerland. It is famous for its baths, the number of which is reckoned to be about 300. They pass through salt, allum, and brimstone; and are reckoned specific in the cramp or gout; for which, and other nervous disorders, they are much frequented. The town stands upon hills, on a rocky ground. The prince has a palace here, with a well-fortified castle on a rising-ground. It lies 20 miles N. of Strasburg. Lat. 48, 40, N. Long. 4, 8, E.

BADEN, in Latin Aquæ Pannoniæ, or Thermæ Austriacæ, a place belonging to the circle of Austria, in Germany, much resorted to for its natural baths. It is a neat, little, walled town, on a plain, at the foot of a ridge of hills, which are the excursions of Mount Cenius. Within the town are 2 baths, 5 without the walls, and 2 beyond the rivulet Swechet: but none of these baths are so hot as the King's or Queen's baths, in Somersetshire. They are recommended by the German physicians for the head-ach, maladies in the eyes and ears: and, if drank in time, for the gout, dropsy, and other chronic distempers. The best bathing-times are reckoned in June, July, August, and September. It lies 15 miles S. of Vienna, and is subject to the house of Austria. Lat. 48, 20, N. Long. 16, 20, E.

BADEN (the district of), in Switzerland, has 3 cities, Baden, Keisers-Stoul, and Klingnaw, besides a town that passes for a city, namely, Zurzach. It is one of the finest countries in Switzerland, and is watered with 3 navigable rivers, the Limmet, Rufs, and Are. The land is fertile in corn and fruit, and there are places on the sides of the Limmet, which produce wine. It maintains a communication between the cantons of Zurich and Bern, being seated between their north extremities. It extends on one side to the Are, as far as the place where it falls into the Rhine, and on the other side beyond the Rhine, where there are some villages which depend thereon. Most of the inhabitants are Papists. By the treaty of peace, at the conclusion of the war which broke out in 1712, between the Protestant and Popish cantons, this country was yielded to the Protestant cantons of Zurich and Bern. Before, it was the property of the eight old cantons; however, as the canton of Glaris had taken no part in this war, by the consent of both parties its right was still continued.

BADEN, the capital of the above district, is an agreeable city, moderately large, seated on the side of the Limmet, in a plain flanked by two high hills, between which the river runs. This city owes its rise to its baths, which were famous before the Christian æra. Several monuments of antiquity have been found here from time to time, particularly in 1420. When they were opening the large spring of the baths, they found statues of several heathen gods, made of alabaster; Roman coins made of bronze, of Augustus, Vespasian, Decius, &c. and several medals of the Roman emperors, of gold, silver, copper, and bronze. There are 2 churches in Baden; one of which is collegiate, and makes a good appearance; the other is a monastery of the Capuchins, near the town-house. This last building serves not only for the assemblies of their own council; but also for those of the cantons. The diet assembles there in a handsome room made for that purpose; the deputies of Zurich sit at the bottom behind a table, as the most honourable place; the ambassadors of foreign powers are seated on one side to the right, and the deputies of the other cantons are ranged on each side the room. The bailiff of Baden resides in a castle at the end of a handsome wooden bridge, which is covered in. Before this castle there is a stone pillar, erected in honour of the emperor Trajan, who paved a road in this country 85 Italian miles in length. The inhabitants are rigid Roman-catholics, and formerly behaved in a most insolent manner to the Protestants; but they are now obliged by their masters to be more submissive. The baths, which are on each side the river, are a quarter of a league from the city. Joining to the small baths there is a village, and to the large a town which may pass for a second Baden. It is seated on a hill, whose ascent is steep. There the baths are brought into inns and private houses, by means of pipes, which are about 60 in all. There are also public baths in the middle of the town, from a spring spring which rises in the street, where the poor bathe gratis, but they are exposed quite naked to all that pass by. All the baths are hot, and one to so great a degree as to scald the hand; and they are impregnated with a great deal of sulphur, with some allum and nitre. They are useful for drinking as well as bathing; and are said to cure all diseases from a cold cause, head-achs, vertigos, &c. They strengthen the senses; cure diseases of the breast and bowels, asthma, and obstructions. They are peculiarly excellent for women's diseases. Long. 7, 25, E. Lat. 47, 40, N.

BADENOCH, in Latin Badenacha, a large district of the North Highlands, belonging to the shire of Inverness, in Scotland. It is bounded by the east on the north, by Murray on the east, by Athol on the south, and by Lochaber on the west. Its length 49 miles, and its breadth 22. In it is no place of consequence, except the village near the fort; which last was taken and demolished by the rebels in the year 1745. This is a cold, and mostly mountainous country, and the soil not very fertile. It abounds with deer and other game. Badenoch is almost divided into two parts by the river Spey, which is here a considerable water; though its source in one of the mountains of Athol is very small, and comes tumbling down in silver threads from the steep brow of a mountain.

BADENWELLER, the chief town of the lower marquisate of Baden, in Suabia, in Germany, lying S. of the Brisgaw. It has several hot baths; but they are not reckoned to be of such virtue as those of the city of Baden. The waters are both drunk and bathed in. It is situated about a league from the Rhine, 15 miles from Basil on the S. and the same from Brisac on the N. in lat. 47, 40, N. Long. 7, 30, E.

BADIA, an ancient town of Bætica, on the Anas; now supposed to be Badajoz, on the Guadiana.

BADIS, a fortress of Livonia; now subject to Russia. Busching calls it Padis, and says it was anciently a castle and convent; but at present is only a gentleman's seat. It lies 25 miles W. of Revel. Lat. 50, 15, N. Long. 23, 10, E.

BADLESMERE, a village, 8 miles from Canterbury; with a fair on September 9.

BADMINGTON, a village in Wiltshire, where are nine caves ranged in a row, but of different dimensions; the least of them 4 feet wide, some 9 or 10 long; two long stones being set up for the sides, and the top being covered with broad stones. Spears, pieces of armour, &c. have been frequently dug out of these caves, which gives ground to suppose that they were the tombs of some ancient warriors, Romans, Saxons, or Danes.

BADMINTON, a place in Gloucestershire, noted for cylindrical and spherical stones, almost as large as cannon balls, found in its fields. At Badminton Magna is a noble seat of the duke of Beaufort, the completest in the kingdom. There is also a charity school.

BADSTED, a considerable fishing place in Schonen, on a bay of the N. Sea, where a market is kept; it has the appearance of a small city, and formerly had the privileges of one.

BÆTICA, (now ANDALUSIA) the second province of ancient Hispania Ulterior, or Further Spain, was so called from the river Bætis, since Tartessus, and now, in Arabic, Guadalquivir, or the Great River.

BÆTIS. See BÆTICA and BOETIS. Strabo says, that this river Bætis, which runs through Bætica, formerly emptied itself into the sea, at two different places; but one of them has been since stopped up.

BÆTULA, or BETULO, anciently a town near the present Barcelona, in Catalonia, Spain, memorable for the silver-mines near it, which vastly supplied Asdrubal with treasure before his march towards the Pyrennees, in order to besiege Placentia, &c. This mine was said to be so very rich, that the Carthaginians (when they had possession of it) extracted out of it every day 25,000 drachms (about 3,125 ounces) of silver. Polybius tells us, that Aletes, the discoverer of it, was deified by the ancient Spaniards after his death, for the service he thereby did his country. Aristotle and Posidonius intimate that Spain, in the most early ages, abounded with silver; inasmuch, that the Phœnicians exported vast quantities of that metal from thence, which they purchased for oil and other trifles; nay, the first author assures us, the Phœnicians, by this means, had not only immense quantities of plate, but that even the very anchors of their ships were made of silver.

BÆTURIA. See BÆTICA.

BAEZA, anciently Vatia, a city of Jaen, a subdivision of Andalusia, in Spain. It is a pretty considerable town, situated on a hill upon the Guadalquivir; and it has a small university, which was founded in the year 1533, with the see of a bishop. It lies 40 miles N. E. of Granada, in Lat. 37, 40, N. Long. 3, 15, E.

BAEZA, the capital of the government of Quixos, belonging to Quito and Peru, in South-America; though long the residence of the governors, still remains very small. But now it has declined extremely, consisting only of 8 or 9 thatched houses, with about 20 inhabitants of all ages. It is annexed to the parish of Papallacta, where the priest resides, as does the governor of late at Archidona.

BAFWEN, one of the principal inland lakes of Sudermannia, in Sweden Proper. It contains about 100 islands.

BAFFIN'S Bay, a gulf of North-America, communicating with Davis's straits. It lies to the north north of this last, and of North Main, or James's island. It takes its name from one Baffin, an Englishman, who discovered it in the year 1622, as he was attempting a north-west passage into the Pacific or great South Sea. It runs from Cape Farewell, in West Greenland. At the extremity of it, which is beyond Lat. 78, N. is Sir Thomas Smith's bay, the furthest part hitherto known, where are the largest whales. The whole extends from between the parallels of Lat. 60, and nearly 80, N.

BAFFO, a considerable town in the island of Cyprus, with a fort built near ancient Paphos, of which there remain considerable ruins, particularly some broken columns, which probably belonged to the temple of Venus. Long. 32, 30, E. Lat. 34, 50, N.

BAGA, anciently Bergusia, a small place of Catalonia, in Spain. It is situated between high mountains, on the river Llobregat.

BAGADAMER, or BAGAMEDRI, a province of the kingdom of Abyssinia, in Africa. It is said to receive its name from the great number of sheep bred in it; Meder signifying land or earth, and Bag a sheep. Its length is estimated about 60 leagues, and its breadth 20: but formerly it was much more extensive; several of its provinces having been dismembered from it, and joined to that of Tigre. A great part of it, especially towards the east, is inhabited by wandering Gallas and Caffres.

BAGBOR WEST, a village in Somersetshire, 6 miles N. of Taunton; with a fair on May 12, for cattle of all sorts.

BAGDAD, a celebrated city of Asia, in Irak Arabi, seated on the eastern banks of the Tigris, in Long. 43, 52, E. Lat. 33, 21, N. By many authors this city is very improperly called Babylon. The latter stood on the Euphrates, at a considerable distance.

This city, for many years the capital of the Saracen empire, was founded by the caliph Al Mansur, the second of the house of Al Abbas; after an attempt by the Rawandians to assassinate him.

The reasons assigned by the Arabian historians for building the city of Bagdad are, that the above-mentioned attempt to assassinate the caliph had disgusted him at his Arabian subjects in general, and that the spot where Bagdad stood was at a considerable distance from the city of Cufa particularly; the inhabitants of which were remarkable for their treachery and inconstancy, of which Al Mansur himself had felt several instances. Besides, the people of Irak, who had always continued faithful to him, represented, that by building his capital near the confluence of the Euphrates and Tigris, it would be in a great measure secured from the insults and attacks of those who should have an inclination to dispute the Caliphate with him; and that by being situated as it were in the middle of the tract comprehending the districts of Basrah, Cufa, Wafet, Mawfel and Swada, at no great distance from those cities, it would be plentifully supplied with provisions by means of the aforesaid rivers.

Concerning the origin of the name Bagdad, there are various accounts, which, being equally uncertain and trifling, merit no attention. The first city that went by this name was situated on the western bank of the Tigris, whence Al Mansur dispatched his son Al Mohdi, with a body of Moslem troops, to the opposite bank. Here the young prince took post, and fortified the place on which he had encamped with a wall, in order to cover his troops, as well as the workmen employed by his father on the other side of the river, from the incursions of the Persians, who seemed to have taken umbrage at the erection of a new metropolis so near the frontiers of their dominions. Hence that part of the city soon afterwards built on the eastern banks of the Tigris, received the name of the Camp, or Fortrefs, of Al Mohdi. The caliph had a superb and magnificent palace both in the eastern and western parts of the town. The eastern palace was surrounded on the land-side by a semicircular wall that had 6 gates; the principal of which seems to have been called the gate of prefects, whose entrance was generally kissed by the princes and ambassadors that came to the caliph's court. The western part of the city was entirely round, with the caliph's palace in the center, and having the great mosque annexed to it. The eastern part consisted of an interior and exterior town, each of which was surrounded by a wall. For some time the building of the city went but slowly on, owing to a scarcity of materials for building; for which reason the caliph was sometimes inclined to remove the materials of Al Madayen, the ancient metropolis of the Persian empire. But, upon trial, he found the stones to be of such an immense size, that the removal of them to Bagdad would be attended with great difficulty and expence; besides, he considered that it would be a reflection upon himself to have it said that he could not finish his metropolis without destroying such a pile of building as perhaps could not be paralleled in the whole world; for which reasons he at length gave over his design, and erected the city of Bagdad most probably out of the ruins of the ancient cities of Seleucia and Ctesiphon, putting an end to his undertaking in the 149th year of the Hegira, or 4 years after the city was begun.

In the 170th year of the Hegira the celebrated caliph Harun Alrashid ascended the throne. This was one of the best and wisest princes that ever sat on the throne of Bagdad. He was also extremely fortunate in all his undertakings, though he did not much extend his dominions by conquest. In his his time the Moslem empire may be said to have been in its most flourishing state, though, by the independency of the Moslems in Spain, who had formerly set up a caliph of the house of Ommiyah, his territories were not quite so extensive as those of some of his predecessors. He possessed the provinces of Syria, Palestine, Arabia, Persia, Armenia, Natolia, Media or Aderbijan, Babylonia, Assyria, Sindia, Sijistan, Khorasan, Tabrestan, Jorjan, Zablestan or Sablestan, Mawaralnahr or Great Bukharia, Egypt, Libya, Mauritania, &c. so that his empire was by far the most powerful of any in the world, and extended farther than the Roman empire had ever done.

In the 186th year of the Hegira, beginning Jan. 10, 802, the caliph divided the government of his extensive dominions among his 3 sons in the following manner: To Al Amin, the eldest, he assigned the provinces of Syria, Irak, the 3 Arabias, Mesopotamia, Assyria, Media, Palestine, Egypt, and all that part of Africa extending from the confines of Egypt and Ethiopia to the Straits of Gibraltar, with the dignity of Caliph; to Al Mamun, the second, he assigned Persia, Kerman, the Indies, Khorasan, Tabrestan, Cablestan, and Zablestan, together with the vast province of Mawaralnahr; and to his third son, Al Kasem, he gave Armenia, Natolia, Jorjan, Georgia, Circassia, and all the Moslem territories bordering upon the Euxine sea. As to the order of succession, Al Amin was to ascend the throne immediately after his father's decease; after him Al Mamun; and then Al Kasem, whom he had surnamed Al Mutaman. Al Mamun conspired against Al Amin; and, besieging him in Bagdad, destroyed great part of the city before he took it.

In the 276th year of the Hegira, beginning September 3, 878, there were 4 independent powers in the Moslem dominions, besides the house of Ommiyah, in Spain, viz. the African Moslems or Aglabites, who had for a long time acted independently; Ahmed in Syria and Egypt; Al Leit in Khorasan; and Al Habib in Arabia and Irak.

In the 295th year of the Hegira, after a reign of about 6 years and a half, died Al Mostafi, the last of the caliphs who made any figure by their warlike exploits. His successors, Al Moktader, Al Kaher, and Al Radi, were so distressed by the Karmatians and numberless usurpers who were every day starting up, that by the 325th year of the Hegira they had nothing left but the city of Bagdad. In the 324th year of the Hegira, commencing November 30, 935, the Caliph Al Radi, finding himself distressed on all sides by usurpers, and having a vizir of no capacity, instituted a new office superior to that of vizir, which he intitled Emir Al Omra, or Commandant of Commandants. This great officer was trusted with the management of all military affairs, and had the entire management of the finances in a much more absolute and unlimited manner than any of the caliph's vizirs ever had. Nay, he officiated for the caliph in the great mosque at Bagdad, and had his name mentioned in the public prayers throughout the kingdom. In short, the caliph was so much under the power of this officer, that he could not apply a single dinar to his own use without the leave of the emir Al Omra. In the year 325 the Moslem empire, once so great and powerful, was shared among the following usurpers:

The cities of Waset, Basra, and Cufa, with the rest of the Arabian Irak, were considered as the property of the emir Al Omra, though they had been in the beginning of the year seized upon by a rebel called Al Baridi, who could not be driven out of them. The country of Fars, Farfestan, or Persia properly so called, was possessed by Amado'ddwala Ali Ebn Buiya, who resided in the city of Shiraz. Part of the tract denominated Al Jebel, together with Persian Irak, which is the mountainous part of Persia and the country of the ancient Parthians, obeyed Rucno'ddawlaw, the brother of Amado'ddwala, who resided at Isfahan. The other part of that country was possessed by Washmakin the Deylamite. Diyar Rabia, Diyar Becr, Diyar Modar, and the city of Al Mawfel, or Mosul, acknowledged for their sovereign a race of princes called Hamdanites. Egypt and Syria no longer obeyed the caliphs, but Mahomet Ebn Taj, who had formerly been appointed governor of these provinces. Africa and Spain had long been independent. Sicily and Crete were governed by princes of their own. The provinces of Khorasan and Mawaralnahr were under the dominion of Al Nasr Ebn Ahmed, of the dynasty of the Sammanians. The provinces of Tabrestan, Jorjan, or Georgiana, and Mazanderan, had kings of the first dynasty of the Deylamites. The province of Kerman was occupied by Abu Ali Mahomet Ebn Eyliya Al Sammani, who had made himself master of it a short time before. And, lastly, the provinces of Yamama and Bahrein, including the district of Hajr were in the possession of Abu Thaher the Karmatian.

Thus the Caliphs were deprived of all their dominions, and reduced to the rank of sovereign pontiffs; in which light, though they continued for some time to be regarded by the neighbouring princes, yet their power never arrived to any height. In this low state the caliphs continued till the year of the Hegira 656, commencing January 8th, 1258. This year was rendered remarkable by the taking of Bagdad by Hulaku the Mogul or Tartar; who likewise abolished the caliphate, putting the reigning caliph, Al Mostafem Billah, to a most cruel death. These diabolical conquerors, after they had taken the city, massacred, according to custom, a vast number of the inhabitants; and, after they had plundered it, set it on fire. The spoil they took from thence was prodigiously great, Bagdad being then looked upon as the first city in the world.

Bagdad remained in the hands of the Tartars or Moguls to the year of the Hegira 795, of Christ 1392, when it was taken by Tamerlane from Sultan Ahmed Ebn Weis; who being incapable of making head against Tamerlane's numerous forces, found himself obliged to send all his baggage over the Tigris, and abandon his capital to the conqueror. He was, however, hotly pursued by his enemy's detachments to the plain of Karbella, where several skirmishes happened, and a considerable number of men were lost on both sides. Notwithstanding this disaster, he found means to escape the fury of his pursuers, took refuge in the territories of the Greek emperor, and afterwards repossessed himself of the city of Bagdad. There he remained till the year of the Hegira 803, when the city was taken a second time by Tamerlane; who nevertheless restored it to him, and he continued sovereign of the place till driven from thence by Miran Shah. Still, however, he found means to return; but in the 815th year of the Hegira was finally expelled by Kara Yusef the Turkman. The descendants of Kara Yusef continued masters of Bagdad till the year of the Hegira 875, of Christ 1470, when they were driven out by Ufun Cassun. The family of this prince continued till the year of the Hegira 914, of our Lord 1508, when Shah Ishmael, surnamed Sufi or Sofi, the first prince of the royal family reigning in Iran or Persia, till the dethroning of the late Shah Hosein, made himself master of it. From that time to this Bagdad has continued to be a bone of contention between the Turks and Persians. It was taken by Soliman, surnamed the Magnificent, and retaken by Shah Abbas the Great, king of Persia: but being at last besieged by Amurath or Morad IV. with a formidable army, it was finally obliged to surrender to him in the year 1638; since which time the Persians have never been able to make themselves masters of it for any length of time.

It is now two miles long, one broad, and five in circumference. The walls are built with brick, covered with earth, and strengthened with large towers like bastions. The ditches are broad, and 5 or 6 fathom deep. There are 4 gates, 3 on the land side, and one towards the river, which is passed over by a bridge of boats, that are placed at the distance of a boat's length from each other; the number of them is about 40. The castle is within the city, near one of the gates, on the N. side of the town, and is built with fine white free-stone, but now looks as if it were covered with earth. It is seated partly upon the river, and is surrounded by a single wall. It has likewise small towers, on which cannon are placed. The ditch is narrow, and about two or three fathom deep. On the W. side of the river is an open town, which may be entered at any time of the night as well as in the day. This is called by some the suburbs of Bagdad; the houses of which are miserably built, as are also those in the city itself, for they are but one story high, and generally raised with earth. All the buildings that are good are owing to the Persians. Some of the mosques are tolerably handsome, with large domes, covered with painted tiles; and there are bazars in the streets, covered on the top, which are full of shops, where the merchants carry on their trade. There are ten caravanseras, or public inns, only two of which are commodious.

The Turks have a garrison here of 10,000 men, which are doubled in time of war, with about 200 pieces of cannon. There are likewise 12,000 militia; and yet Bagdad would be but thinly peopled if great numbers did not resort thither on account of its trade; for which reason the Armenians and Jews take up near half the city. Some part of the year the air is here intolerably hot; and then the inhabitants lie on the tops of their houses, which are terraced, in the night. The winter is so mild, that the peasants plough the land in December; at which time there are narcissuses, hyacinths, violets, &c. in full flower. There are very few trees or shrubs hereabouts, except liquorice, which is in great plenty. Nor is there cultivated land about Bagdad sufficient to maintain it with provisions; not but that part of Irak Arabi, that lies between the rivers Euphrates and Tigris, formerly called Mesopotamia, is fruitful enough, but it wants a sufficient number of inhabitants; and if it were not for the rivers, by which all sorts of necessaries are brought to their doors, they would often be in a starving condition.

The Mahometan women are very richly dressed, and wear bracelets on their arms, and jewels in their ears. The Arabian women have the partition between their nostrils bored, wherein they wear rings. Not far from this city there are springs of naptha, which they burn there instead of candles. There are three sorts of Christians among the inhabitants; Nestorians, Armenians, and Jacobites. The first have a church; the two last perform their devotion at a chapel about a mile from Bagdad. Besides the Jews that live in the city, there are many that come out of devotion, every year, to visit the tomb of the prophet Ezekiel, which they believe to be about 30 miles from this place. This likewise is in the road for the caravans that come out of Persia in pilgrimage to Mecca.

The place is under the government of a basha, or visier, who hath only 700 soldiers under him, the rest being under their respective agas; but all of them so very licentious, and apt to mutiny, that the officers dare scarcely punish them. This obliges the grand signior to keep a great many Christians in pay for the defence of the town and country about it. They have moreover another sort of cavalry, which they stile Ginguliler, i. e. Men of Courage, which are about 3000, some in Bagdad, and others in the neighbouring towns and villages; and these are likewise commanded by an aga of their own. Another aga is appointed to keep the keys of the city and bridge, who hath 200 janizaries under him. As to the civil government, it is entirely in the hands of a cadi, who acts as judge, president, mufti, &c. and hath a tefterdar, or treasurer, under him, who collects the grand signior's revenue.

In 1773, on the 19th of January, the plague first manifested itself in the suburbs of Bagdad, (near the ruins of the ancient Babylon); and soon after in the city itself. It made such havock in the months of February, March, and April, that of 400,000 inhabitants, only a quarter part were left alive. The inhabitants of the neighbouring towns of Hela, Iman-Aly, Iman-Huffein, and Iman-Moussa, were entirely swept away. Several travellers, who passed by those places in April, found all the houses deserted, and nothing but dead carcases left. Some pilgrims from Iman-Aly, and some Jewish families who escaped from Bagdad, carried the contagion to Bassora, at which place, towards the end of March, the Christians and Franks shut themselves up to prevent infection, which the Turks neglecting, 8000 of them perished in one quarter alone of the city, from the 15th to the 25th of April. Of 500 domestics of the governor's, one slave only escaped with life. This city consisted of 100,000 inhabitants, of whom 80,000 perished, 5000 fled to the Persian Gulf, about the same number escaped the infection, and 10,000 arrived at Aleppo. The number of Christians who perished amounted to 374, 74 of which were of the Roman communion; more than 4000 Jews, 3 idolaters, and all the rest were Turks. The heat of the month of May stopped the infection, and the 10th of June Bassora was delivered from it. The bishop of Babylon (whose servants all perishing, was driven forth to seek provisions), the consul of France, two ecclesiastics, and one Carmelite, died in the first-mentioned place; and in Bagdad the sieur Perault, agent to the India company, and two Carmelite missionaries. A Catholic Armenian priest, who practised physic, escaped the infection, though he attended on the sick the whole time. The several tribes of Arabians, who encamp on the borders of the river Chatel Arabe, as far as the sea, and to the port of the Gulf, likewise suffered prodigiously. Kerim Khan, regent of Persia, having placed a line of troops on the frontiers of that kingdom, preserved that country from the infection.

BAGEMDER, or BAGAMEDRI, a kingdom of Abissinia, in Africa. It lies S. and S. W. of Tigra, having that of Angot on the E. that of Amhara on the S. and those of Goyama and Dambea on the W. Its greatest extent is from E. to W. and in some parts very rocky and mountainous, especially towards the E. where live a part of the Agamerians, as also of the Caffres, a people wandering through most of Africa.

BAGEMDER, the capital of the preceding, is seated in a delightful plain on the banks of the river Bachilo, and bears the title of a royal town; because the viceroy of Tigra receives a fresh crown there, additional to that he had before; but is in all other respects inconsiderable.

BAGLIO, a small place of the Basilicate, a province of Naples, in the Lower Division of Italy. This is the seat of the provincial court.

BAGNAGAR, the capital of Golconda, in the Hither Peninsula of India, in Asia, formerly the residence of the kings of Golconda; but both it and the whole province is subject to the mogul. It is situated on the Nerva, with a bridge over it, and in a plain surrounded with hillocks, at a little distance, which renders the air healthy. The English and Dutch have factories here only for the sake of the diamonds. The city and suburbs are upwards of three miles (Thevenot says seven) in length. Here are abundance of European jewellers, as also Jews, Armenians, and Greeks, the most expert cutters of diamonds, and best judges of their worth. In this city is a magnificent reservoir, with fountains, round which is a colonade supported by arches, affording an agreeable coolness in the hottest season. It lies 220 miles N. W. of Fort St. George, and as many E. of Goa. Lat. 16, 30, N. Long. 77, 30, E.

BAGNAIA, a beautiful seat belonging to the ducal house of Lantin. It is situated two miles from Viterbo, a city of St. Peter's patrimony, and Ecclesiastical State, in the Middle Division of Italy.

BAGNIALUK, or BANIALUCKA, in Latin Banialucum, a good fortress of Bosnia, in Turkish Illyrium, in Europe. It is situated near the confines of Dalmatia, and a lake of the same name, upon the river Cettina. It is the residence of the beglerbeg, and the principal place of a sangiac, containing all the western part of Bosnia; and has a good citadel. The Turks took it in 1527; and near it a battle was fought between them and the Germans, who were besieging it in the year 1737. It lies 60 miles from Spalato to the N. E. Lat. 44, 10, N. Long. 18, 15, E.

BAGNARA, or BAGORARA, a small place of the Further Calabria, in Naples, and Lower Division of Italy. It gives title of duke to the house of Ruffo.

BAGNAREA, in Latin Balmeoregium, a small and ill-peopled town of Orvietano, in the Ecclesiastical astical State, in Italy. It is the see of a bishop, and lies between Orvietato on the N. and Montefiascone on the S. about 6 miles from each.

BAGNASCO, a small place of Asti, in the principality of Piemont, and upper division of Italy: but under a distinct jurisdiction.

BAGNERES, a town of Bigorre, in Gascony, and government of this last name and Guyenne, in France; in Latin Vicus Aquensis, or Aquæ Bigerronum. It is situated in the valley of Campan, on the river Adour; and famous for its mineral springs, which were known to the Romans. Salaignac has given a description of them. Here are cold as well as warm mineral waters; and they are resorted to in spring and autumn. Bagneres lies four leagues above Tarbe.

BAGNI, a duchy of Val di Mazara, in the kingdom of Sicily, and lower division of Italy.

BAGNOLAS, anciently Aquæ Votonis; a small place of Catalonia, in Spain.

BAGNOLO, a small place of Cremasco, a province belonging to Venice, in the upper division of Italy.

BAGNOLO, a small place of the Further Principate, belonging to the kingdom of Naples, in Lower Italy.

BAGNOLS, or BAIGNOLS, a small town, belonging to the diocese of Uzes, in Lower Languedoc, and government of this last name, in France. It stands on a rock, close by the river Cese; and the prince of Conti is proprietor of it. Here is a priory, and convent.

BAGORARA. See BAGNARA.

BAGRADA, BAGRADAS, or BAGRADA, once the most famous river of Africa Propria, on the banks of which Regulus, in the first Punic war, killed with his battering engines a serpent 120 feet long, whose skin and jaw-bones were preserved in Rome till the Numantine war. This river now is no more than a large pond, or anti-harbour, to Porto Farina.

BAGSHOT, formerly Holy Hull, and the lordship of our kings, who had a house here, with a park. It is a place in Surrey, extending from Egham to Farnham for near 18 miles, and noted for good inns in the road between Staines and Hartley-row. Bagshot-heath is a barren desert for many miles, with nothing but furze and whorts upon it; yet in some inclosures lately made, it produces good corn and grass, and plantations of trees. The soil is capable of improvement. It is to be observed, that though the Bagshot mutton be so much valued, it is called so as being only killed by the butchers there; and the sheep are fed upon Hampshire-downs. On its borders are several elegant seats of noblemen, &c.

BAGYON, in Latin Bagyona, a considerable town of Aranes jurisdiction, in that called the Sicilian territory; belonging to Transylvania, in the kingdom of Hungary. It is situated close by the river Maros.

BAHAMA-ISLANDS, called also the Lucaya Islands, the easternmost of all the Antilles or Caribbees, lying in the Atlantic ocean, stretching from N. E. to S. W. between the 21st and 28th deg. of N. Lat. and between 72 and 81 degrees of W. Long. They are very numerous; but only 12 are particularly noticed by geographers, because the dangers attending the navigation among them are so great that many of them have scarce ever been visited by Europeans.

It was upon one of these to which he gave the name of St. Salvadore, that Columbus first landed, when he discovered America. Banzoni, one of the first navigators, says, that the sailor, who on this occasion first discovered land, and called out that he saw a fire, was denied the reward promised to the first discoverer, under a pretence that the same had been discovered by Columbus two hours before; and that for this reason the sailor afterwards went into Africa, and turned Mahometan.

Columbus, perceiving that this island was but small, and the inhabitants poor, immediately set sail in quest of richer countries, and the Bahama-islands were afterwards totally neglected by the Spaniards. In 1667, one captain Sayle, an Englishman, was forced upon the island of St. Salvadore, now Providence, by stress of weather: and, upon his return to England, made so favourable a report of the Bahama islands in general to his employers, the proprietors of Carolina, that 6 of them obtained a grant for the island of Providence, and the Bahama islands in general, between the Latitudes of 22 and 27 degrees. The names of their first proprietors were, George duke of Albemarle, William Lord Craven, Sir George Carteret, John Lord Berkeley, Anthony Lord Ashley, and Sir Peter Colliton. But though this was the first legal settlement that had been made of these islands, they had long before (particularly the island of Providence) been a shelter for pirates, and other disorderly people, who lived either by plundering the wrecks of ships, or supplying with spirits, &c. the ships that happened to touch there.

In 1672, captain Sayle paid another visit to Providence island; and on his return made the government so sensible of the advantages that would accrue to England from the possession of the Bahama-islands in general, that they resolved to send thither a governor and some settlers; and the first governor sent thither was one Mr. Chillingworth, a gentleman of capacity and character. By this time the natives of the Bahamas had been either butchered or carried off by the Spaniards or pirates; and Mr. Chillingworth, on his arrival, found he had a very unruly set of men to deal with. England was at that that time over-run with dissolute people of both sexes; who, embracing the encouragement given by government, shipped themselves off for Providence in great numbers; and these meeting with the pirates and coasters already settled there, the whole formed so ungovernable a colony, that Mr. Chillingworth, in endeavouring to reclaim them, was himself forced off to Jamaica, and an unrestrained anarchy ensued among the settlers. These disorders continued for some years; neither the government nor the proprietors thinking it worth while to be at the expence of checking them. At last one Mr. Clarke accepted of a proprietary commission to be governor; but the Spaniards, who had all along fomented the disorders, no sooner understood that the English intended to resettle the island, than they invaded it, destroyed all the stock, and burnt the houses of the inhabitants. It is even said, that, having carried off the governor in chains, they afterwards cruelly put him to death.

After this depopulation, the island of Providence, and all the other Bahamas, were abandoned; the English removing to Carolina and other American settlements. At the time this disaster happened, the principal town of the island, since called Nassau, consisted of 150 houses. The vast consequence of the situation of these islands, however, especially in time of war, prompted a great number of people to come thither again, both from England and the continent of America. By the year 1690, New Providence became so populous that the proprietors thought fit to appoint one Cadwallader Jones to be their governor; and he accordingly arrived there on the 19th of June that year.

According to all accounts, this governor Jones was of a very rough arbitrary disposition; and as the people he was sent to govern retained pretty much the spirit of their predecessors, it was no wonder that there were frequent quarrels between them. At last Jones, being impeached of high treason by one Bulkley, was thrown into prison, where he lay for some time; but afterwards was released, and Bulkley imprisoned. However, the proprietors finding it would be highly improper to continue Jones in his government, removed him, and appointed one Trott to succeed him. Under governor Trott the town of Nassau recovered its former size; its houses amounting to 160; and having a fort for its protection, on which were mounted 28 guns, besides demiculverins.

In 1697 the proprietors, with the consent of king William, appointed Nicholas Webb, esq. to the government of the Bahama islands; and, in this gentleman's time, New Providence enjoyed a state of tolerable tranquility, and was reckoned to contain about 400 negroes. One Mr. Lightfoot, who was afterwards governor, endeavoured to set up a sugar-work on New Providence, for which the soil was extremely proper: but the means taken by a good governor for the improvement of this perverse colony, proved the very means of weakening it: for the pirates, finding now no longer any harbour in the Bahama-islands, no longer spent their money there; and the inhabitants being at the same time restrained from the cruel practice of plundering wrecks, grew poor and discontented. Perpetual altercations now happening between them and their governors, their differences were by the lords proprietors generally referred to the government of South-Carolina; which equally discontented the governor and people, both complaining that they were treated only as a dependent province of that colony.

In this untoward situation matters continued till the year 1700, when one Elias Hasket was promoted to the government of the Bahama-islands. But he was scarcely settled when the inhabitants put him in irons, and sent him off the island, choosing by their own authority Ellis Lightfoot, esq. to succeed him. On this occasion the proprietors shewed no resentment, and Lightfoot remained in possession of the government till 1703. At that time the dissensions which prevailed at New Providence, encouraged the French and Spaniards to make a descent upon it from Petit Guaves. The island was then completely ruined; the town of Nassau was burnt, the fort dismantled, its guns nailed up, and the governor, with half the negroes, carried off. As to the white inhabitants, their enemies took very little concern about them, and they retired to the woods till the danger was over. Returning from thence, and finding the island entirely ruined, they found means to remove themselves to other settlements. So little care did the proprietors take all this time of the affairs of New Providence that they did not even know the catastrophe that had befallen them; nay, they even named one Birch to supersede Lightfoot; but when he came thither he found the island entirely abandoned, so he was obliged to return.

After this the Bahama-islands became once more the residence of pirates and free-booters of all kinds, and of all nations, especially the English and Irish, who committed more depredations on the British trade than both the French and Spaniards. At last, upon an address of the House of Lords, king George I. gave orders for fortifying and settling the island of Providence, and expelling these robbers. The plan was committed to captain Woods Rogers, a celebrated navigator; who, in the year 1718, failed as governor of Providence, with a force sufficient to reduce the pirates. Before his arrival, governor Bennet, of Bermudas, had sent a sloop to Providence, requiring the pirates to surrender themselves, by which they were entitled to a late proclamation of pardon. About 150 of the pirates, among whom were several of their captains, gladly accepted of this summons, and surrendered themselves. Upon the arrival of captain Rogers at this island, in 1718, he found about 300 men capable of bearing arms; many of whom had been pirates themselves, and none of them under any apprehensions from that wicked fraternity; but all of them determined in the most resolute manner to defend themselves against the French and Spaniards; which, by the assistance of 100 regulars the captain had brought with him, they were very soon enabled to do.

The first measure of Rogers's government was to read his Majesty's commission to himself in presence of all the inhabitants of the island; after which he admitted to the benefit of the proclamation about 200 of the remaining pirates that surrendered themselves. In settling his council, he nominated 6 adventurers who attended him from England; and had the good fortune to meet also with 6 inhabitants of the island, who pretended they had never been pirates, upon which he admitted them likewise. He himself had been appointed captain of the independent company that came with him from England; and the judge of the admiralty, the collector of customs, the chief justice, the secretary, the register, the provost-marshal, and officers, had all their commissions from England. Under his government the colony throve so well, that in a short time the number of white people amounted to 1500; and so sensible was government of his services, that when he returned to England in 1721 to solicit some supplies, he received a new commission as governor, and had a salary of 400*l.* a-year settled upon him. Captain Rogers indeed had interested himself so much in the affairs of his colony, that he greatly hurt his own circumstances; for the Spaniards having twice attacked the Bahama-islands with 2000 men, Mr. Rogers defeated them without having any support from the other colonies, except what he engaged on his own personal credit. He died within two or three years after his return to his government; and since that time nothing remarkable has happened to these islands, only that the colonies on them have still continued to thrive.

The number of the Bahama-islands is very considerable, and amounts to several hundreds, which hardly emerge out of an immense sea-bank; but, excepting about 15, are in general very low and narrow; and others, for the most part, are only small rocks, or little spots of land, even with the water's edge. The principal, which has given its name to the whole Archipelago, is Great Bahama, in the Northern bank, called the Little Bank of Bahama, whose situation is E. and W. and about 20 leagues from the coast of Florida. At a little distance to the east is Lucayoneque, of near the same size, whose situation is N. and S. To the north of both is that of Lucayo, which has only half their dimensions, but whose name has been given to the whole range: its situation is E. and W.

A channel of 8 or 10 leagues separates the Little Bank from the Great Bank of Bahama, in which is the island of Providence, with the great island of Alabaster, or Eleuthera, which has Harbour Island on the North cape. The isles of Andros are on the S. W. of Providence, which take up a space 30 leagues long, and 5 broad. Towards the S. E. are Stocking, Exuma, and Yuma or Long Island. The isle of Guanahani, the first land discovered in America by Columbus, now called Cat's-island, lies E. of the Great Bank, and separates from it by Exuma sound.

The climate of these islands is very temperate, the land in general fruitful, and the air very healthy. Their greatest disadvantage is the want of water, and being situated amongst innumerable shoals and rocks, in a tempestuous sea full of currents, that renders them inaccessible to great ships. There are only three that are inhabited, Providence, Eleuthera, and Harbour Island. On the coast is found ambergris, and the inhabitants catch great quantities of green turtle. These islands also produce a great variety of dying-woods, lignum-vitæ, and mahogany. The exports in 1769 amounted to above 6000*l.* and, in 1770, there were entered inwards 81 sloops or ships, and 84 cleared outwards. Between Long Island and St. Domingo are sprinkled many uninhabited islands.

In these islands are 2 parishes, viz. 1. Parish of of Christ-Church, comprehending the island of New Providence, in which is the town of Nassau, the capital, and the only port of entry, except at Turks Islands. 2. St. John's parish, comprehending Harbour Island and Eleuthera.

The number of inhabitants are computed as follows: in New-Providence about 600 whites, 300 negroes, mulattoes, &c. free, and about 1300 ditto slaves. In Harbour Island, 340 whites, 130 negroes, mulattoes, &c. Eleuthera, 460 whites, 230 negroes, mulattoes, &c. Cat's-Island, 6 families. Exuma, only 2 families. Turks Islands, about 500 men in the salt-season, but at other times about half that number; the others return to Bermuda.

On the north of Bahama and Lucayonequa, lies the great Bahamian bank of sand, which extends itself northward, up to the 27 deg. or 30 min. and is surrounded with rocks. That which is called the great sandy bank lies on the north of the isle of Cuba, and is terminated by the Long Island on the N. E. by the strait of Exuma, and the island of Cigatco, and on the north by that of Providence; besides this old canal, there is another called the Strait of Bahama, between the coast of Florida and the Lucayonequa. This is one of the most impetuous ruous currents northwards of any in those seas. The Spanish ships are forced to wait an opportunity to pass this strait, which is about 16 leagues in breadth, and its length, from the Cape of Florida, northwards, 45; which shews of what importance the Bahama islands are to England.

BAHAMA, the chief of the Bahama-islands, in the West-Indies, about 20 leagues from the coast of Florida, and about 10 west from the island of Lucayo, from which these islands are also called Lucaya islands. It is about 28 leagues long and 3 broad. It is very fruitful, the air serene, watered with multitudes of springs and brooks. It produced great quantities of sassafras, sarsaparilla, and red-wood, which were all destroyed by the Spaniards. Its chief produce now is Indian wheat, fowls, and a particular kind of rabbits; they have other provisions from Carolina. Their chief commerce is assisting with provisions ships which are driven in here by boisterous winds. This is situated on the sand-bank called the Little Bahama Bank, which extends itself northward 60 miles. The Strait of Bahama, or Gulph of Florida, lies between the coast of Florida and this island. The Spanish ships are obliged to wait an opportunity to pass this Strait from the Havanna homeward; and the strait is 16 leagues broad and 45 long.

BAHAREN, or BAHAREIN, a province in Arabia Felix; is so called from the Arabic, Baharaim, which there signifies 2 seas, viz. of Oman or Arabic, and Fars or Persian Gulph. The description which Abulfeda gives us of this country is as follows: Bahrain, in the country of Naged or Nagd, is very fertile in dates, and extends itself as far as the Persian Gulph. It hath a good many towns and villages belonging to it; but the capital is called Haggia and Hadgra, which is also called Baharain.

BAHAREN-ISLAND, an island in the Persian gulph, under the jurisdiction of Persia, betwixt Bassora and the isle of Geron or Ormus, about 60 leagues from each, near the Arabian coasts, over-against the harbour of Katifa. Long. 50, E. Lat. 26. This island abounds in water; but it is brackish, the best of all being found in ponds or pools in Nanyah, in the midst of the island; next to which that taken out of the sea is most in esteem, which is thus performed: There are several springs of fresh water arising in the bottom of the sea, at 3 fathom and a half deep. Expert divers go early in the morning in boats, about 3 musket-shots from shore, and dive to the bottom of the sea, fill their earthen or leathern vessels with the water that issues from the springs, and so come up again and return to shore: this they do with great dexterity and nimbleness. These springs are supposed to have been formerly on the shore, not far from the sea-side, which since that time have been swallowed up by inundations occasioned by earthquakes. This isle is very fertile, abounding in fruits of all sorts, but especially dates. But all the rice (which together with the dates is the general food of the inhabitants) is from the Indies transported to Ormus, and from thence into this island, which is famous throughout the Indies by reason of the pearl-fishery here, whence the king of Persia draws a vast revenue yearly; which may be gathered from hence, that after this island was fallen into the hands of one Bardadin, he promised to pay a yearly tribute of 40,000 serafs. Besides this, the pearl trade here produced yearly 500,000 ducats in ready money, not to reckon 100,000 ducats more shared between the Persian governor and the other officers. For there was a great resort of merchants from all parts of the world to buy pearls and transport them to the Indies and other countries, the best and most perfect pearls in the world being found near this island of Baharen and the isle of Gionfar or Giolfar, which both in bigness and roundness far exceed those found near the other islands of Latif, Lafen, Barechator, &c. &c. As to this esteemed production of nature, the manner of taking them, &c. may the reader be pleased to accept what follows. Pearl is a hard, white, shining body, usually roundish, found in a shell-fish resembling an oyster, and ranked in the number of gems or precious stones. The formation of them has puzzled both ancient and modern naturalists; and has given occasion to several extravagant hypotheses. Pliny, Solinus, and others of the ancients, supposed them formed of the dew, which (they say) the fish rises every morning to the surface of the water, and opens its shell to imbibe. But this is manifestly false, the pearl-oysters growing fast to the rocks, and never rising to the surface. Others will have pearls to be the eggs of the fishes that produce them; but this does not consist with the phenomena; for they are found through the whole substance of the oyster, in the heart, the coat that covers it, the stomach, and in general in all the fleshy and musculous parts: so that there is no reason at all to think that pearls should be in oysters what eggs and spawn are in fowls and fishes. This indeed may be said, that as in a hen there is a multitude of little eggs in form of seed, some whereof grow and ripen whilst the rest continue nearly in the same state; so in each oyster one pearl is usually found larger than the rest, and which ripens faster than the others; and sometimes this grows so large as to hinder the oyster from shutting, in which cases the fish rots and dies. In the Memoirs of the French Academy, M. Reamur hath a very curious piece on the formation both of shells and pearls; where he observes, that pearls are formed like stones in other animals, as those of the bladder, kidneys, &c. and that they are apparently the effects of a disease in the fish, deriving deriving their origin from a juice extravasated out of some broken vessels, and detained and fixed among the membranes. To evince the possibility of this, he shews that the shells of sea-fishes, as well as those of snails, &c. are wholly formed of a glutinous stony matter oozing out of the body of the animal; and therefore it is no wonder that such animals as have vessels containing a sufficient quantity of stony matter to build and extend a shell should happen to overflow, and burst forth in any cavity of the body, or among the membranes. To confirm this system, he observes that the inner surface of the common pearl muscle is of a mother-of-pearl colour in one part, and reddish in another; and the pearls found in this fish are likewise of two colours, exactly corresponding with those of the shell; which shews, that in the same place wherein the transpiration of a certain juice had formed a coat, or layer of shell, of a certain colour, the vessels which conveyed that juice being broke, a little mass or collection of it is formed; and, hardening, becomes a pearl of the same colour with that part of the shell to which it corresponds. The perfection of pearls, whether round, in form of pearls or olives, or irregular, consists chiefly in the lustre or clearness of the colour, which is called the water. (The size, as well as the water, makes a great difference in the value of pearls. That mentioned by Tavernier, in the hands of an emperor of Persia, in 1633, was bought of an Arab for 32,000 toman; which, at 3l. 9s. the toman, amounts to 110,400l. sterling.) The white ones are most esteemed in Europe; but some of the Indians and Arabs prefer those which border on the yellow. Some are of a lead-colour, other blackish; but all are liable to change in wearing, especially the white ones, which turn yellow in 40 or 50 years time, and are of little value. Pearls have this advantage over precious stones dug out of the rocks, that the latter owe their lustre to the industry of men, but the former are born with that beautiful water which gives them their value: they are found perfectly polished in the abysses of the sea, and nature has put the last hand to them ere they are separated from their mother. It is to be observed, that what we call mother-of-pearl is not the shell of the pearl-oyster, but of another fish of the oyster kind, called Auris Marina, or the Naker. The inside of this shell is very smooth and polished, and of the whiteness and water of pearl itself, together with a delightful mixture of red, blue, and green; and its outside has the same lustre after the first leaves have been cleared off by aqua-fortis and the lapidary's wheel. Wens of pearl are certain excrescences in form of half-pearls, sometimes found in the bottoms of the pearl-shells, which lapidaries have the skill to saw off and join together, and use them in several works of jewelling. As to the fishery on the coasts of this island of Baharen, there are two seasons for it, the first in March and April; the second in August and September: and during these seasons there appear hereabout some hundreds of fishermen's barks. Each of these barks is provided with one or two divers, who perform feats that are almost incredible. When the barks have cast anchor, which they commonly do in about 5 fathom water, the diver binds a heavy stone under his body, which is to serve him as ballast, to prevent his being driven away with the motion of the sea, and to enable him to walk more steadily. Besides this, he ties another stone to one foot, which makes him sink to the bottom in a moment; and he carries down with him a large net in manner of a sack, which is tied to his neck by a cord, whereof one end is tied to the side of the vessel. This sack is for the reception of the oysters gathered from the rocks, and the rope is to pull up the diver when the bag is full, or he wants to take breath. To prevent his hands from being wounded by the rocks or shells, he wears leathern mittens. Thus equipped, he precipitates himself to the bottom, where he makes the best use of his time. When he finds it necessary, he gives the rope a pull, and, holding fast by both hands, the people in the bark draw him up, and unload him of his fish; which are sometimes 500 oysters, sometimes not above 50. The best divers will keep under water for half an hour, and few of them less than a quarter; and this violent exercise they continue many hours without intermission. The water is usually very clear, so that the diver can easily see what he is about: but, to prevent his being seen by ravenous fishes, he sometimes makes the water muddy; notwithstanding which, these divers now and then fall a prey to the monsters of the deep; and of all perils attending them, this is one of the greatest and most usual. The barks unload their oysters on the shore, and lay them in a great number of little pits, dug 4 or 5 feet square, raising heaps of sand over them the height of a man; which at a distance look like an army ranged in battle. In this condition they are left till the rain, wind, and sun have obliged them to open, which soon kills them; the flesh rots and dries, and the pearls, thus disengaged, tumble into the pit upon taking out the oysters. The pits being cleared of the grosser filth, the sand is several times sifted to separate the pearls; but, notwithstanding, they lose many. When the pearls are dried and sifted, they are passed through a sieve according to their sizes, and the smallest are sold for the seed of pearls, and the rest by auction to the highest bidder.

BAHLINGEN, a town in a district of the same name on the small river Eyach, between the upper and lower county of Hohenburg, and the county of Zollern, in the duchy of Wurtemberg. It is the the seat of a special superintendancy, and belonged formerly to the lordship of Schalksburg, whose castle has long since lain in ruins. It was sold with the town in 1403, by count Frederick of Zollern to count Eberhard of Wurtemberg. The town in 1607 and 1724 was nearly destroyed by fire. Near it is a medicinal spring.

BAHN, or BANEN, a small town, containing a provostship, in Hither Pomerania, Prussia. It was built by Barnim I. in 1230; and in 1589 and 1596 the town suffered greatly by fires.

BAHURIM, mentioned in the second Book of Samuel, chap. iii. 16. by which it appears it was near the mount of Olives, within the tribe of Benjamin.

BAHUS, or BORUS, in Latin Præfectura Bahusæ, a subdivision of West Gothland, in Sweden. It takes its name from a castle so called, and is derived from the Norwegian word bay, i. e. large; and bus, that is, a house. It is also called Wike. It has the West sea on one side, but is bounded on the other by West Gothic Thalland or Dal: it begins near Swinesund, and extends itself as far as Gotha-elbe. It is about 21 miles long, and between 3 and 4 broad. The country in general is level and fruitful. It has fine corn-fields, meadows, forest, inland lakes, and fresh-water streams. Among the rocks on the coast are salt-works, where salt is made from the sea-water. Near Uddewalla is a very high mountain, mostly consisting of a sort of mussel-shells, which are burnt to a lime. In many places one meets with large caverns in the mountains, which look like chambers, and are called mountain or giant caves. Here are several lakes and rivers; among the latter is Gotha-elv, which divides itself into two branches, the western belonging to this prefecture and Quistrom: both these have a salmon-fishery. The inhabitants subsist by agriculture and breeding of cattle; but especially by their fisheries. They also trade in beams, masts, deal-boards, tar, lime, cattle, tallow, hides, and all kinds of fish.

This country in ancient times belonged to Sweden, to which it was also ceded by Denmark, by the peace of Roschild, concluded in the year 1658: for which reason it is here inserted, though it be reckoned a part of Norway. Its clergy are in the bishopric of Gottenburg. It is subdivided into the S. part, called Binnenland, which consists of four inland districts; and into the N. part, properly stiled Wike; and this again into Sunnar and Nor-wike, consisting in general of nine inland districts.

The castle of Bahus, from which the whole prefecture is called, lies close before the town of the same name, in Latin Bahusium. It is a well-built and excellent fortress, standing on a rock, which is surrounded by the Gotha-elbe; and within it is a fine spring. In 1448, king Christian I. built both the walls and houses of stone, which before had been only of wood. By the above-mentioned treaty of Roschild, it was surrendered to the Swedes. In 1678, the Danes attempted to take it, but without success. It lies near the Skagerack, 20 miles N. W. from Gottenburg. And Dahlberg has a view of it in his Suecia. Lat. 58, 20, N. Long. 11, 10, E.

BAJA, BAYJAH, or BEGIA, a town of the kingdom of Tunis in Africa, supposed to be the ancient Vacca of Salust, and Oppidum Vaggense of Pliny. It was formerly, and still continues to be, a place of great trade, and the chief market of the kingdom for corn, of which the adjacent territories produce such abundance that they can supply more than the whole kingdom with it; and the Tunefians say, that if there was in the kingdom such another town as this for plenty of corn, it would become as cheap as sand. Here is also a great annual fair, to which the most distant Arabian tribes resort with their families and flocks. Notwithstanding all this, however, the inhabitants are very poor, and great part of the land about the town remains uncultivated, through the cruel exactions of the government, and the frequent incursions of the Arabs, who are very powerful in these parts. The town stands on the declivity of a hill on the road to Constantina, about 10 leagues from the northern coast, and 36 south-west from Tunis; and hath the convenience of being well watered. On the highest part is a citadel that commands the whole place, but is now of no great strength. The walls were raised out of the ruins of the ancient Vacca, and have some ancient inscriptions.

BAJA, a well-inhabited town belonging to the county of Bats, in the circle on this side the Danube, and Lower Hungary. It is situated on the Danube, in a fruitful country, and the barons of Vajay are proprietors of it, 45 miles N. W. of Esseck. Lat. 46, 40, N. Long. 19, 50, E. Of the same name is also a town in Walachia, on this side the Aluta, belonging to Turkey in Europe. See BAIÆ.

BAJADOR, a cape on the W. coast of Africa, to the southward of the Canaries. Lat. 27, 10, N. Long. 15, 10, W.

BALÆ, or BAJA, a town of Terra de Lavoro, on the coast, 12 miles W. of Naples, in Lower Italy. It was famous for its hot-baths, and where persons of quality among the Romans had seats, to which they resorted in the cold months, and in spring. Near it was the delightful bay of the same name, in form of a crescent, where ships might ride in safety. And in its neighbourhood are the ruins of the palaces said to have belonged to Cæsar, Pompey, Cicero, &c. also Nero's elegant palace, &c. About a mile from Baiæ is the little spot called the

Elyfian

B A

Elysian field; but at present it has little to recommend it. Lat. 41, 6, N. Long. 14, 45, E.

BAIBY-BURG, a large town of Westmannia, in Sweden Proper. It is encompassed with a wall, and is situated on the river Kila, and opposite to Gulbo-burg.

BAIGORRE, a district of Lower Navarre, in the government of this last name and Bern, in France.

BAIKAL, an inland lake of Asiatic Russia, which the people dwelling about it call the Holy sea, lying between 52 and 53 degrees N. lat. It is said to be 500 wersts in length from W. to E. but from N. to S. in a direct line between 20 and 30 in breadth, and in some parts only 15 wersts. It is encompassed all round with high mountains. It begins to freeze towards Christmas, and the frost goes off again towards the first day of May. When it is froze over, people travel on it in the road to China. From this time to September it is said that a ship seldom comes to any misfortune upon it: but in the month of September the winds are said to be violent; whereby many unfortunate accidents are occasioned; against which, however, the inhabitants fancy that they are secure, from their calling the lake a sea. In the parts about the river Bargufin it throws up vast quantities of bitumen, or mountain tar, as it is called, which the inhabitants burn in lamps. Round it also are sulphureous springs. Its very sweet water appears green at a distance, and it is so clear that one may see several fathoms depth into it. Here are found great numbers of large sturgeon and pikes; also black sea-dogs, but none speckled. In it are likewise several islands: and round the lake not only fables, but civets, are to be met with.

BAILLEUL, a town of France, in the earldom of Flanders, formerly very strong, but now without any fortifications. It has been several times burnt by accident, and contains now only about 500 houses. E. long. 2, 55. N. lat. 40, 35.

BAIMOTZ, a district of Neutra county, in the circle on this side the Danube, and Lower Hungary. It contains 91 large villages or boroughs: also the castle of BAIMOTZ, which is a castle charmingly situated upon a mountain. Near it is a middling town of the same name, upon the river Nitra, and in it is a priory of the order of St. Anthony: and here is also a well-ordered warm-bath.

BAINS, (Le fort de), a fortress belonging to the bailiwick of Perpignan and county of Roussillon, in the government of the latter name, in France. It is situated upon a mountain, at the foot of which runs the Tec, and consists principally of four regular bastions. In 1670, Lewis XIV. caused these to be built. Under it lies the small village of Bains, which takes its name from the good warm baths that are in it.

BAKA-BANYA, PUGGANS, or BUKANETZ, a royal free mine-town of Bath district and county of Hont, in the circle on this side the Danube, of Lower Hungary. It had formerly gold and silver mines; but at present it subsists by husbandry. In the year 1664 it was plundered and burnt down by the Turks.

BAKAN, a large and handsome town of Asia in the East Indies, in the kingdom of Ava. E. long. 98, 0. N. lat. 19, 35.

BAKAR, a kingdom in India, the chief city of which is called Bikaner. Ganges borders it on the E. and the province of Delli W.

BAKAR (Baumgarten tells us) is a very spacious plain in Syria, but abounding with such high hills as seem to be made with hands, on which are castles seated. The story goes, that here Noah built his ark; and they shew the place where (as they pretend) he was buried, being upon a hill, and of very curious workmanship. Travelling over this plain towards the E. one may see a great many monuments of antiquity, among which one stone of prodigious magnitude, resembling for bigness a tower or hill; near to which are three pillars, not unlike those in St. Mark's Place, in Venice. Not far from hence is the castle Baldach, whence they say was Baldach the Shuite, of whom we read in the book of Job. The rows of pillars in this castle are admirable, being stones of a huge bigness. The building was high and stately, but mostly gone to ruin; yet even what is left shews it was great and noble.

BAKEWELL, the best town of the N. W. side of the Peak of Derbyshire. It is situated on the banks of the Wey, near its junction with the Derwent. From certain altars dug up near Haddon-house, it is supposed to have been a Roman town. Though large, it contains only one parish, but has seven chapels of ease, and is exempt from episcopal jurisdiction. Its fairs are on Easter-Monday, Whitfun-Monday, August 13, Monday after October 10, and Monday after November 22, for cattle and horses.

BAKMONOSTRA, or BANOSTRA, anciently the seat of the bishop of Sirmi, in the bannat of Slavonia, and kingdom of the latter name, in Hungarian Illyria; but at present are hardly any remains of its former magnificence to be seen.

BAKOW, or BRATZKOW, a town of Walachia, on the further side of the river Aluta, in European Turkey. It stands in a pleasant and fruitful country. Here a bishop resides.

BATSCHISARAI, a town situated on the peninsula of Crim Tartary, in European Turkey, and close by the sea. It is the residence of the chan, and an open town, between two mountains, which serve serve it instead of walls. The inhabitants are Tartars, Armenians, Greeks, and Jews; the houses are here the best in all the country. The chan's palace is a large, irregular, but commodious structure. In the year 1736 the town was taken by the Russians.

BAKU, a town situated on the W. part of Schirwan, a province of Persia in Asia, upon the Caspian sea; to which last it sometimes gives its name. It is fortified, and has a good harbour. The Russians took it during the late troubles, and Shah Nadir yielded it to them.

BALA, a town of Merionethshire, in North-Wales, with a market on Saturdays, and two fairs on May 14, and July 20, for sheep, horned cattle and horses. It consists of only a single street, and is seated on a flat near Pemble-meer, by the Welch called Lhin Tegid, which is four miles in length, and three in breadth, and abounds with a fish called a guinard, resembling a salmon in shape, and its taste is like a trout. The river Dee runs through this lake, and is noted for salmon. It is 36 miles S. W. by W. of Holywell, and 184 N. W. of London. Long. 3, 35, E. Lat. 52, 45, N.

BALACHNA, a circle of the Nischneinowgorod government in European Russia. To it belongs a town of the same name, which is very long, but meanly built, on the Wolga. It is famous for its rich salt-springs, from which upwards of 50 salt pans or pits may be constantly fed and employed.

BALAGANSKOL, an ostrog or palisaded place in the circle of Irkutsk, and province of the latter name, in Siberia, Asiatic Russia. It is situated on the Angora, is of an earlier date and more considerable than Irkutsk, but has only two pieces of brass cannon for its defence. Contiguous to it are about 60 houses, mostly good ones, inhabited by some trading people, who are well to live.

BALAGATE, a province of the mogul empire, and the largest of the three that compose the kingdom of Dekkan. It has Kandish and Barar to the N. Tellinga to the E. Baglana with part of Guzerat to the W. and Viliapur to the S. It is a fruitful and pleasant country, abounding with cotton and sugar. Here they have sheep without horns; but so strong, that when bridled and saddled they will carry boys of ten years of age. Its present capital is Aurenghabad, but formerly was Dowlet Abad; and from the latter the whole province is sometimes called Dowlet-Abad.

BALAGATE-MOUNTAINS, a chain of mountains, which divides the coast of Malabar from that of Coromandel, running almost the whole length of the peninsula on this side the Ganges. Some parts of them are covered with fine red earth, which is blown by the strong west winds as far as the island of Ceylon; and when the rays of the sun are reflected from these mountains, they seem to be all on fire. They make surprising alterations in the seasons; for, on the north-side of cape Comorin, it is winter in May, June, July, August, and September, in which months it is summer on the south-side of the cape; on one side there are continual tempests, thunder and lightning, while the other enjoys a constant serenity. When black clouds are gathered about the mountains, they are followed by sudden rain, which causes the overflowing of the rivers, and choaks them up with sand, inasmuch that they are unnavigable for some time afterwards. The buildings and clothes of the inhabitants are scarce sufficient to defend them from the weather. They live upon rice, milk, roots, and herbs, with very little meat: they have likewise a sort of small arrac, but are never given to drunkenness; nor do they import foreign vices, for they never travel abroad.

BALAGNA, or BALANIA, the most fruitful district of all Corsica; it lies in the N. E. part of the island, and in Upper Italy. It can bring 4000 men into the field: and comprehends the following small districts; namely, Ostricone, Aregno, Guisfani, Andre, Olmi, and Pino. In it is the town of Calvi.

BALAGNIA, a town in the province of Little Novogorod, in Russia, on the Wolga, 50 miles N. of Nise. Long. 45, 5, E. Lat. 50, 36, N.

BALAGUER, formerly Ballegorium and Balaguerium, a walled town of Catalonia, in Spain. It is situated on the river Segre, with a stone-bridge over it, at the foot of a high mountain, and in a very fruitful country. It contains 800 families, has one parish, three monasteries, and a nunnery; and was taken, in 1411, by Ferdinand of Aragon, after a long siege. It lies 15 miles N. E. of Lerida. Lat. 41, 30, N. Long. 0, 1, E.

BALAKLAWA, a fortress and harbour near a cape on the S. W. side of the peninsula of Crim Tartary, in European Turkey. It belongs to the Ottoman Porte.

BALALCAZAR, a town of Spanish Estremadura, on the confines of Andalusia.

BALAMBUAN, or PADAMBUAN, a strong town of Asia, in the Indies, on the east end of the island of Java, and capital of a territory of the same name. Long. 115, 30, E. Lat. 7, 50, S.

BALANTES, a negro nation of Melli, a province of Negro-land, in Africa. Their country is 10 or 12 leagues in length. They have no correspondence with the other negroes their neighbours, nor intermarry with them: and though they sometimes go into their neighbours country, yet they suffer none to come into theirs. They form a kind of common-wealth, governed by a council of the oldest men in each district. They are very courageous, and great robbers, but are not slaves to one another. Their weapons are hassagays, arrows, and sabres. In their attack on the Portuguese barks, barks, when they succeed, they kill all the whites without mercy, and the negroes they sell or exchange for oxen. The Portuguese, being induced (from the general opinion of gold mines being in the country) to attempt the conquest of it, accordingly landed there in July 1695: but it being then the rainy season, the Balantes attacked them so briskly that the Portuguese were entirely routed, and obliged to retire, leaving most of their allied negroes, and the best part of their arms and ammunition, behind them.

BALARUC, a large village or burgh, on Lake Thau, in the diocese of Montpellier, in Lower Languedoc, and government of that name, in France. In its neighbourhood are warm baths, in the water of which is little or no sulphur, as Astruc affirms, but it contains some salt. It is lighter than the common drinking-water in the place; and is not so hot as to boil eggs: yet when these are put into a dry vessel, and hung over it, they are hatched in about the same number of days as when placed under a hen. The water laded out of the springs retains its heat at least for 8 hours, is longer in boiling upon the fire than common water, and does not make such a strong ebullition. Hence it is evident, that its heat does not arise from a subterraneous fire, but from an intestine fermentation of its particles. This water is used for drinking and bathing, with very salutary effects.

BALASFALVA, or BLASENDORF, a large burgh of Walachia, in the county of Weissenburgh, a subdivision of Transylvania, in the kingdom of Hungary. Here the bishop of Walachia resides.

BALASORE, or BELLESORE, formerly Ballapur, a place of Bengal, on the N. W. part of the bay of this name in the East-Indies, in Asia; subject to the Great Mogul, where European ships, bound from Bengal and the Ganges, take in a pilot. It lies 180 miles S. W. of Huegley; and the English, Dutch, and French, have their respective factories here, which indeed were the capital ones before the navigation of the Huegley river was improved; but now of little account. The town is 4 miles from sea by land, but 20 by its river. The neighbouring country is admirably fruitful, producing rice, wheat, doll, callavances, several sorts of pulse, annis, cummin, coriander, and caraway seeds, tobacco, butter, oil, and bees wax. Their manufactures are of cotton, and of the herba, which is the rind of a tree. Here are rich Moors, Banians, and Gentiles. The town trades pretty much with the Maldivé islands; which having no rice or other grain of their own, are supplied with what they want; and, in return, they bring cowries and cayar for the service of the shipping: these ride 3 leagues from the town in a road secured by cape Palmeiras from the south wind. At the mouth of the river is a dangerous bar, about 12 leagues to the north of Cunnaca river. Betwixt these two rivers is one continued sandy bay, to which vast numbers of sea-tortoises resort; and here are shoals of a very delicious fish called Pamplee, sold for 2d. a hundred; two of which are sufficient for a moderate stomach. Lat. 21, 30, N. Long. 85, 15, E.

BALASA-GYARMATH, a mean town of Kekko district, and county of Neograd, in the circle on this side of the Danube, in Lower Hungary.

BALATON, or PLATTEN-SEE, anciently Vocea, an inland lake belonging to the county of Simmeghi, in the circle on the other side of the Danube, in Lower Hungary. It abounds with fish, is 12 miles long, and from 2 to 5 broad. It is planted round with fine vines; and here also are otters and beavers to be met with. The river Sarwiza issues from this lake, and falls into the Danube, over-against Bathmonster.

BALAYAN, a province of the island of Manilla, in the East-Indies, belonging to the Spaniards. It lies next to the city of Manilla, and extends along the coast on the east side of the island, a little beyond the bay of Batangas. There were formerly gold mines in it, but they have been long since abandoned. It is inhabited by about 2500 tributary Indians, and abounds in cotton, rice, and palm-trees. The province is well cultivated; and the Spaniards, generally speaking, have country-houses in it.

BALBASTRO, or BARBASTRO, in Latin Barbastro, a city of Aragon, in Spain; by the Goths called Bigastro, and in the Toledo acts Bistargo. It is a walled town, has strong towers, and is situated on the little river Vero; which, not far from hence, falls into the Cinca, and has a stately bridge over the river. It has a cathedral, 4 monasteries, a nunnery, an hospital, and 18 chapels. Its bishop is a suffragan to the metropolitan of Saragossa, and has an income of 8000 ducats per annum. It lies 50 miles N. E. of Saragossa.

BALBEC. See HELIOPOLIS.

BALBRON, a small town in the bailiwick of Westhofen, and lordship of Lichtenberg and Ochsenstein, in Lower Alsace: through it runs the river Mosig.

BALCH, or BALKH, a province of Great Bukharia, in Asia, about 360 miles long and 250 broad; situated to the south of the province of Samarkand, and to the east of Bukharia Proper. It is the least of the 3 provinces that make up what is called Great Bukharia; but being extremely fertile and well-cultivated, the prince draws a great revenue from it. The country particularly abounds with silk, of which the inhabitants make pretty manufactures. The Uzbecks subject to the chan of Balkh are the most civilized of all the Tartars inhabiting Great Bukharia, owing probably to their commerce with the Persians: they are likewife more industrious and more honest than the rest; but in other respects have the same customs with the rest of the Tartars. The province is subdivided into several counties; the most remarkable of which are Khotlan, or Katlan, Tokharestan, and Badagshan. Its chief cities are Balch or Balk, Farjiah, Talkhan, Badagshan, and Anderab.

wife

BALK, the capital of the above-mentioned province; situated on the frontiers of Persia. Long. 65° 20', E. Lat. 37°, 0', N. It is probably the ancient Bactra, capital of the kingdom of Bactria; and is said by the Persians to have been founded by Kay-umaraz, the first king of Persia, because he met his brother upon the spot where it stood, after he had been lost for a long time; balkhiden, or balghiden, in the Persian language signifying to receive and embrace a friend. The first kings of Persia who resided in the province of Media or Aderbijan, considered this city as one of their principal frontiers on the side of Scythia. In the 27th year of the Hegira, of Christ 647, Balk was reduced by the Arabs, under the command of Abdallah Ebn Amer. It continued subject to Arab princes till the year of the Hegira 432, of Christ 1041; when it was reduced by Togrol Beg, the Tangrolipix of the Greeks, and prince of the Seljukian dynasty. It was taken by Jenghiz Khan, A. D. 1221; who, with his usual and unparalleled cruelty, caused all the inhabitants to be brought without the walls and massacred without mercy. In 1369 sultan Hosein, the last of the race of Jenghiz Khan, was driven from Balk by Tamerlane, whose successors were driven out by the Usbecks in the 15th century. It was afterwards redeemed by Shah Ismael Sufi; but finally wrested out of his hands by the Uzbek Tartars, between whom and the Persians it is the occasion of almost continual wars. It was, not long since, the residence of a chan of Tartars. It is the most considerable city possessed in these parts by the Mahometan Tartars; is large, well-built, and populous, the houses consisting for the most part of stone or brick. The fortifications consist of bulwarks of earth, fenced without with a strong wall, high enough to cover the soldiers employed in defence of those fortifications. As this place is the resort of all the business transacted between the Indies and Great Bukharia, trade flourishes extremely at Balk; especially as it has a fine river passing through its suburbs, which is of vast service to the town. This river falls into the Amu, in N. Lat. 38°, 30', upon the confines of Great Bukharia and Kowarazm. The chan's palace, or castle, is a large edifice, built after the oriental manner; and consists almost entirely of marble, of which there are fine quarries in the neighbourhood. The chan of Balk, however, was obliged in 1739 to submit to the Persians under Khouli Kan; but, since that time, has most probably regained his independency.

VOL. I.—No. 19.

B A

BALDIVIA, or VALDIVIA, a sea-port town of Chili, in America, belonging to the Spaniards. It is situated between the rivers Callaculles and Portero, where they fall into the South-sea. Long. 80°, 5', W. Lat. 40°, 5', S. It was built in 1551 by the Spanish general Baldivia, from whom it takes its name. We may judge of its importance from the sum granted annually by the king for maintaining the garrison and keeping the fortifications in repair, being no less than 300,000 pieces of eight. It is defended by 4 strong castles, mounting 100 pieces of fine brass cannon. Notwithstanding which, however, as the garrison is composed mostly of transported criminals, on whom no dependance can be placed, and generally ill supplied with ammunition, &c. it could make but a poor defence. In 1643 it was easily taken by the Dutch, who would probably have maintained their conquest against all the power of the Spanish viceroy, had they not been obliged to relinquish it through sickness and famine. The inhabitants of Baldivia amount to about 2000. The trade is less considerable than formerly, because the gold mines in the neighbourhood are shut up; yet several large ships are employed in the trade between this port and that of Lima, which consists of gold, corn, hides, and salt provisions, which are exchanged for slaves, sugar, chocolate, and European commodities and manufactures.

BALDO (Monte), one of the mountains of the Veronese; a province belonging to the republic of Venice, in Upper Italy. It is particularly remarkable for its excellent plants.

BALDOCK, a large market-town in the hundred of Broadwater, in Hartfordshire. It lies on the Ikening-street, which here looks only like a field-way. Here are many maltsters. The church is large and handsome, with 3 chancels; the two outward ones are rather chapels. It has a fair tower, in which is a ring of 6 bells. Its weekly market, considerable both for corn and malt, is on Thursday: its fairs are on Wednesday after St. Matthias, Feb. 24, the last Thursday in May, August 6, October 2, and December 11. It lies 38 miles north from London, and 4 east of Hitchin. Lat. 51° 55' min. N. Long. 15° W.

BALDON, a territorial jurisdiction of Semigallia, in the duchy of Courland, in which is Baldonen, a village, with a church in it.

BALDOTZ, a large village or bourg, in the territory of count Csasky, belonging to the circle on this side the Theiss, in Upper Hungary. It lies not far from Ziporhauz, where is a hot bath and a mineral spring.

BALDREU, a small district of Vianna, in the province of Entre Douro e Minho, in Portugal.

BALE. See BASIL.

BALEARES, islands in the Mediterranean: the principal of which, with the circumjacent smaller isles,

isles, were anciently subdivided into the Balearic and Pythufian. The Balears or Balearic isles were Mallorca, Mayorca or Majorca, and Minorca, with some other smaller ones. The Romans called them Balears, and the Greeks Balarides; which name some derive from the Greek, but others from the Phœnician language: however both derivations signify the same thing, namely, the isles of the Slingers; the inhabitants being very expert at handling the sling, the only weapon they had in use: which dexterity the Minorcans are still possessed of. These isles the Greeks called also Gymnesiæ or Gymnasæ, from the inhabitants going naked in summer. The other ancient division of these isles was into Pythufian, from their abounding with pine-trees, under which denomination was comprehended Ivica, Formentera, &c.

The Rhodians, Carthaginians, Romans, Vandals, and Moors, are all said to have been successive masters of these isles; the last of whom had their own king: but between them and the Catalonians were frequent wars, which were carried on with various success on both sides.

About the close of the year 1229, James I. king of Aragon, made himself master of Majorca, and in 1232 he took Minorca; and two years afterwards Ivica: so that the whole kingdom of Majorca was annexed to the crown of Aragon.

Whilst the Romans continued in possession of these isles, they cultivated and fortified them, having considerable cities and sea-ports in each. They likewise changed their names into those of Major and Minor, or, as Pomponius Mela hath it, Majores and Minores; and he also styles them Colonisæ. See MAJORCA and MINORCA.

BALGA, a capital bailiwick in the circle of Brandenburg, and kingdom of Prussia, whose 16 churches are under the jurisdiction of the principal court-chaplain at Königsberg.

Of the same name with this district is a large village, and very old castle, situated on the Frischhafen, of which the Teutonic order made themselves masters so long ago as the year 1238. It was formerly a commendary, and converted into a capital prefecture by duke Frederic the grand master.

BALGANY, or BALGONY. Busching calls it a little town of Fifeshire. It is however an ancient and considerable seat, formerly belonging to Gen. Alexander Leslie, noted for his services in Germany under Gustavus Adolphus, king of Sweden; but at last more so, as commanding the Scots army against king Charles I. and into whose hands this unfortunate prince put himself.

BALISORE. See BALASORE.

BALL, an island of Asia, in the East-Indies, forming the north-side of the straits of Java, through which the East-India ships sometimes return from China to Europe: but the passage is commonly difficult on account of contrary winds. The island is extremely populous, and abounds in rice and other productions proper to the climate. The inhabitants are Pagans, and very warlike. Long. 115, 30, E. Lat. 9, 0, S.

BALINETUR, or rather BALLANATYRE, one of the six baronies, in the county of Wicklow, and province of Leinster, in Ireland.

BALINGHEIM, one of the 24 parishes belonging to the government of Calais, and that of Picardy and Artois, in France.

BALIUR. See BALYUR.

BALK. See BALCH.

BALLAGHY, a town in the county of Sligo, and province of Connaught, in Ireland. It lies 20 miles S. of Sligo. Lat. 53, 48, N. Long. 85, 15, E.

[We shall observe here, once for all, that the prefixed syllable BALL, in this and the following places of Ireland, signifies a town, or a wall either of stone or earth, both in the Irish and Highland languages.]

BALLAGEEN, one of the eight baronies into which the county of Wexford, in the province of Leinster, is subdivided.

BALLAN, a town of France, in the diocese of Muns, with the title of a marquise, seated on the river Orne. Long. 0, 20, E. Lat. 48, 10, N.

BALLEK, a little town belonging to the county of Fermanagh, and province of Ulster, in Ireland.

BALLENA, or RIO DE LA BELLANA, a river of Chili, in South-America, which is next to that of Rio Chico, and close to the cape of the same name; and was so called because of a (Balana) whale of prodigious bigness which died on that coast.

BALLENSTADT, a town on the river Getel, in the principality of Dessau; and in the seat of a bailiwick. In 1397 it was sacked and destroyed, and in 1498 burnt down.

BALLIADEM, one of the seven baronies into which Queen's-county, belonging to the province of Leinster, in Ireland, is subdivided.

BALLIBAY, or BALLIBUY, one of the eleven baronies in King's-county, belonging to the province of Leinster, in Ireland. Of the same name is a thriving plantation, very well situated, about the center of the province.

BALLIBRIT, another barony of the last-mentioned province, in Ireland.

BALLYCLOUGH, a village in the county of Cork, in Ireland; situated near Mallow, where are the remains of an elegant castle, and near it a chalybeate spaw, now disused.

BALLICONNEL, a town belonging to the county of Cavan, and province of Ulster, in Ireland. It is situated 11 miles N. E. of Cavan town. Lat. 54, 6, N. Long. 7, 50, W.

BALLICORA,

B A

BALLICORA, a small town belonging to the county of Cork, and province of Munster, in Ireland. It sends 2 members to the Irish parliament.

BALLYCOTTON-STRAND, near Youghall, in the county of Cork, Ireland. This Strand is 4 miles long, both smooth and level, and at the western extremity of it is the point and island of the same name, the point of Ring, forming the eastern point, forms a semi-circular bay, like the hollow of a fine amphitheatre. The island is an high, small spot; which, in the proper season, is almost covered with nests of various sea-fowls, and puffin's eggs. From this island may be seen Kinsale-head and the mouth of Cork harbour, though 15 miles distant.

BALLIECARY, one of the nine baronies of Antrim, a county belonging to the province of Ulster, in Ireland.

BALLIMONE, i. e. the peat-town; or BALLIMOHRE, i. e. the large town; a little town, belonging to the county of West-Meath, and province of Leinster, in Ireland.

BALLIMORE, a barony of Gallway, in the county of Connaught, in Ireland.

BALLYMORE-EUSTACE, a small town on the Liffy, near Dublin, in Ireland; which has a handsome bridge over that river, and the ruins of a fine old castle.

BALLINAHINCH, or MAGHEDROLL, a town on a little river nearly in the center of Down, a county belonging to the province of Ulster, in the north of Ireland. It lies on the great road from Lisburn, Lurgan, and Drommohre, to Down-Patric and the sea-side. This neighbouring country is very rough with rocks, and the roads upon that account difficult and unpleasant: yet the valleys and slopes of the hills produce good oats, potatoes, and flax. The staple-commodity here is linen-yarn. The Papists in this parish are near 1000 souls: for which reason a charter-working-school is settled at this place, in order to educate 20 poor Popish children of both sexes in the Protestant religion; and who are constantly employed in the linen-manufacture. Ballinahinch lies 8 miles from Down-Patric and Drommohre.

BALLINAKYLL, a small town of Queen's county, in the province of Leinster, in Ireland. It has a castle, which held out bravely against the Irish rebels in 1642, till it was relieved. The town sends 2 members to parliament, and lies 5 miles from Balliroan.

BALLINANE, or BALLINANEN, one of the baronies belonging to the county of Gallway, and province of Connaught, in Ireland.

BALLINROBE, BALLINROAN, or BALLINROAL, a corporation, and reckoned the shire-town of Mayo-county, in the province of Connaught, in Ireland. It lies 15 miles from Castlebar.

B A

BALL'SHANNON, a town belonging to the county of Dumagall, and province of Ulster, in Ireland. It is situated on a river, which runs out of Loch-Erne into Dunnegall-bay. It has a good harbour, with a tolerable trade; and is pretty well inhabited, considering that this county is full of bogs, large loughs, and woods. It has a bridge of 14 arches over the river which runs out of Lough-Erne, which a little lower falls down a ridge of rocks, about 12 feet; and, at low water, forms one of the most picturesque cascades. It is rendered still more singular and interesting by being one of the principal salmon-leaps in Ireland.

BALLITORE, a village or colony of Quakers, near Timolin, on the river Grifs, in the county of Kildare, in Ireland; a place remarkable only for its neatness of buildings and elegant simplicity, where industry reigns amongst this happy society.

BALLYVOGY-HEAD, the extreme point of land on the south coast of Ireland, near Crookhaven, in the county of Cork, between which and the opposite cape, called Mizen-head, is a great bay.

BALLYVOURNEY, a small town in the county of Cork, Ireland. On the south-side of the river Sullane, 6 miles west of Macromp. The church is in a ruinous state, seated on a hill, dedicated to St. Gobnate. This church is 102 feet long by 24 broad, whose steeple is ready to fall with age. About a mile from thence, on the north-side of the river, stood an old castle, now in ruins. About 30 yards west of the church there is a small stone cross, for the reception of the image of St. Gobnate, before it was lately forbid being exposed to adoration. The image is now kept very privately in a chest, and frequently carried by the person who has the care of it, to different adjacent parts to be sworn upon. Near this cross is a stone fixed in the ground, and a deep cavity worn in it by the knees of devotees who have come hither in pilgrimage. Adjacent is a well, dedicated to this saint; and near it a circle of stones, originally the foundation of one of those round towers for which Ireland is remarkable; round this well, and remains of the tower, are paths worn by the knees of devotees. From this spot are seen the Kerry mountains; which, like an immense wall, are ranged several miles from north to south, and divide Cork from Kerry.

BALLY, a small island belonging to the East-Indies, in Asia, by some called Java the Less, is divided from Great Java on the west, only by the straits bearing its own name. It abounds in provisions. The natives, many of which make good soldiers in the Dutch service here, are generally bold fellows. The straits of Bally, which in the narrowest part are not much broader than the river Thames, are very difficult to strangers. Capt. Beeckman, Beeckman, who passed them in January 1714, says, he was 15 days in making to them from the east-end of Madur-island, though only 30 leagues; for once in 24 hours the south wind bursting violently through the straits, drives ships back. On each side of them are also high mountains, from which gusts of wind come down, veering sometimes all round the compass, and that in a few minutes. See JAVA.

BALLON, a small town and marquise of Upper-Maine, in the government of the latter name and of Perche, in France. It is situated on the right bank of the Orne, contains 2 parishes, and lies 5 leagues from Mans.

BALME (La) a little town belonging to the duchy of Genevois, a subdivision of that of Savoy, in Upper Italy.

BALMERINO, a small place of Fifeshire, in Scotland. It is situated on the frith of Tay. Here was anciently a famous monastery, founded by Ermengred, queen of William king of Scotland; but even its ruins are now almost effaced by time. It gave the title of baron to a branch of the Elphinston family, the last of which unhappily lost his head on Tower-hill for his attachment to the Pretender, and espousing the insurrection of 1745 in Scotland, against the government.

BALNA, formerly a celebrated and opulent town belonging to the county of Gran, in the circle beyond the Danube, in Lower Hungary; but at present it is a very mean and inconsiderable place.

BALRUDERY, a post town 14 miles north of Dublin, in Ireland, and one mile west of the Irish channel, nearly opposite St. Patrick's isle.

BALSARA. See BOSSORA.

BALSA, an ancient town of Lusitania, in the Ager Cunæus; now Tavira, capital of Algarva.

BALSAS River, somewhere between Puebla de los Angeles and Acapulco, in New Spain, disemboing into the South-sea (the exact place we have not learnt), of which Navarette says, It is well known that it is a river very large, and that people pass over it on canes, which are supported by only 4 calabashes they are fastened to. At first, adds he, it is frightful to see so ridiculous and weak an invention. An Indian lays hold of one end of it, and the passenger being upon it with his mule's furniture, he swims and draws it after him.

BALSTER. See CALIES.

BALTALIMANI, a palace of Romania, in European Turkey. It is situated on the strait which joins the Black sea with that of Mamora.

BALTAR, a place belonging to Porto district, in the province of Entre Douro e Minho, in Portugal.

BALTIC Sea, in Latin Mare Balticum. It is properly a large bay of the German ocean, between Denmark, Germany, Prussia, Courland, Russia, and Sweden. The German name of Ost-sea, or East-sea, seems to have been given it by the Dutch, it lying to the east of Holland. In the Baltic is neither ebb nor flow; yet it is observed, that the natural current of its waters goes towards the Sund; but this may be hindered by a north-west wind of any long continuance, which also drives large volumes of water into the Baltic out of the German ocean; whence the observable rising of the waters is caused in its harbours. When the north wind blows, the water of this sea, which is otherwise salt, becomes pretty fresh, and in some measure may be used for culinary purposes: but in general it is not very salt, on account of the great number of rivers that fall into it.

The greatest depth of water in the Baltic hardly exceeds 50 fathoms. M. Andrew Celsus demonstrates, in the Swedish acts, vol. v. page 25, that the water in the Baltic decreases; and, according to his calculation, it has fallen 45 geometrical inches in 100 years. The waves here are not so high nor so long as they are in the North-sea; but fall shorter, quicker, and more numerous one upon another.

The fishery in the Baltic is considerable; particularly that of the streamer-fish, the best sort of which is called wasbuck. When the sea is tempestuous and violently agitated, it throws upon the coasts of Prussia and Courland, especially on the former, the so much celebrated amber: concerning which see more under PRUSSIA.

Near Sweden the Baltic extends itself into 2 bays or gulphs, which in Swedish are called Hafs-botnar; the one runs towards the north, and in the same language is called Nord-Botn, in Latin Sinus Bothnicus, i. e. the Bothnic-bay. This gulph is 80 miles long, and 30 broad. The other bay runs towards the east, and is called in Latin Sinus Finnicus, i. e. the gulph of Finland, or Finnic bay. It is 60 miles long, and 15 broad. It is said, that in the Baltic are many places where the magnetic needle does not stand true, here pointing between S. W. and there again towards N. W. Lastly, the Baltic near Livonia forms; 1. a bay, which is called the gulph of Livonia or Riga, at the mouth of the Dwina, where the town of Riga is situated; 2. the gulph of Courland, at the mouth of the Niemen, where Memel stands; 3. the gulph of Dantzick, at the mouth of the Vistula; and, 4. the gulph of Lubeck, at the mouth of the Trave.

You pass out of the German ocean into the Baltic through these three straits; namely, the Oersund, the Great and the Little Belt: the first strait lies between Seeland and the province of Schonen, in Sweden; the second between Funen and Seeland; and the third between Jutland and Funen. In winter the Baltic is commonly frozen for three or four months; by which its navigation is interrupted all that time.

BALTIMORE,

B A

BALTIMORE, a little town and corporation, but decayed, belonging to the county of Cork, and province of Munster, in Ireland. It has a commodious harbour, within an island and bay of the same name, which is secure against all winds. It sends 2 members to the Irish parliament. It stands on a head-land, which runs into the sea, 15 miles S. W. of Rosse, and 5 N. E. of the island of cape Clear. Lat. 51, 16, N. Long. 9, 26, W.

BALTIMORE, a county the most northern in the province of Maryland, in North-America, on the west-side of the bay of Chesapeake, reaching to the bottom of it. Its chief town is also called Baltimore: the houses are straggling, so that the township is rather a scattered village, or parish. This county is called from lord Baltimore of Ireland, 1631, to whom it was granted by king Charles I. Its capital lies in Lat. 39, 30, N. and Long. 76, 35, W.

BALTINGLASS, a town belonging to the county of Wicklow, and province of Leinster, in Ireland. It is situated on the river Urrin, and has the privilege of sending deputies to the Irish parliament.

BALVAIRD, a place in Fife, a county of Scotland, remarkable for the rocking-stone which was broken down by Oliver's soldiers. The motion of it was performed by means of an egg-shaped prominence made on a huge globular stone, which was inserted into a cavity in the surface of another lower stone quite flat, an exact proportion having been calculated for the purpose. This mechanism was concealed by the vast bulk of the upper stone, and two or three surrounding flat stones. In Popish times, by this pretended miracle, persons were condemned or acquitted of perjury, as interest or affection led the clergy, who were judges; and often criminals were brought to confess, by this means, what could not otherwise be extorted from them.

BALVENY, a mountainous district on the west side of Bams-shire, in the northern division of Scotland. It lies on the river Spey; abounding with pasture and wood, and noted for a rock from which bones and whet-stones are dug in such abundance that the people cover their houses with them instead of slate. Here are also veins of that stone from which allum is made; likewise springs of allum-water.

BALUCLAWA, or BALACLAY, a town on the W. coast of Crim-Tartary, in European Turkey. It was some time possessed by the Genoese, who called it Jambolic, from the store of fish in its neighbouring sea. It has about 120 houses, with an excellent harbour, surrounded with high mountains that secure the vessels in it from all winds. It receives ships of 500 tons, and has a considerable depth of water. The place is now in the possession of the Turks, who build their ships and galleys here.

BALWHIDER, a district belonging to Perthshire in Scotland.

BALYUR, or BALIUR, a sea-port of Africa in the kingdom of Dancali, about 14 hours journey west from Babel-Mandel. It is remarkable only for being the landing-place of the Abyssinian patriarch, Alphonsus Mendez, with his Jesuits and Portuguese, on April 3, 1724. The king, who had received orders from the Abyssinian emperor to give them a proper reception, dispatched his son to meet them and conduct them to him. The royal palace they found to consist of about half a dozen of tents, and a score of huts, fenced about with a thorn hedge, and shaded by some wild kinds of trees. Near the palace was a river, which was then quite dried up, and no water to be found but what was digged for in the channel. The hall of audience was only a large tent about a musket-shot from the rest. At the upper end was a kind of throne made of stones and clay, covered with a carpet, and two velvet cushions. At the other end was his majesty's horse, with the saddle and other accoutrements hanging on one side; it being the custom of this country for the master and horse to lie together, whether king or subject. Around the hall were about 50 young men sitting cross-legged; and when the Portuguese ambassadors were admitted, they were made to sit down in the same posture. Soon after came the king preceded by some of his domestics, one having an earthen pitcher full of hydromel, another a cup made of porcelane, a third carrying a cocoa-shell full of tobacco, and a fourth bringing a silver tobacco-pipe with some fire. Next to them was the king, dressed in a light silk stuff, having on his head a turban, from the rims of which hung a parcel of rings nicely wrought, which dangled before his face. He had in his hand a short kind of javelin, and was followed by all the chief officers of his court and household. The respect paid him at his coming in was by standing on their feet, and squatting down again twice, after which they went forward to kiss his hand.

BAMBA, a province of the kingdom of Congo in Africa. It is situated between the rivers of Ambrisi and Loze; the last of which parts it from Pemba on the east, and the Ambrisi from the province of Sogno on the north. Along the sea-coasts it extends itself northward to the river Belunda; and on the south to that of Danda, which parts it from the kingdom of Angola. The governors of this province bear the title of dukes, and are always some of the princes of the royal family. They are as despotic and arbitrary as if they were really kings, notwithstanding the care and pains their monarchs have taken to keep them within due bounds. The soil of this province is very fertile; and would produce all the necessaries of life in great plenty, were the inhabitants but industrious in its cultivation.

cultivation. The sea-coasts produce a vast quantity of salt, which could be purified with little trouble, and would yield an extraordinary revenue if the duties were duly paid; but these the governors find means to sink mostly into their own coffers. Here is also the fishery of the zimbis, or little sea-snail, whose shell is the current coin, not only in this and the neighbouring kingdom, but also in the most distant parts of Africa. Here are also said to be mines of gold, silver, quicksilver, copper, tin, and iron: but none except the iron mines are allowed to be worked. Its capital is Banga or Panga.

BAMBERG, (Bishopric of,) in Franconia, Germany, is the first in the empire. It has Wurtzburg on the W. and Anspach on the S. and E. It extends about sixty miles in length, and forty in breadth; abounding in rich fruits and plants, particularly corn, wine, saffron, liquorice, and prunes. Its bishop, who is a prince of the empire, and its vice-chancellor, depends immediately on the Pope, and is not only lord of this see, but also of divers manors in Carinthia, the castles of Cronach and Fortzheim, besides several royalties elsewhere. On him the king of Bohemia, and the electors of Bavaria, Saxony, and Brandenburg, are dependent for some parts of their estates. He is the only bishop in Germany who has the privilege of wearing a cardinal's hat, together with the pall of an archbishop; for which last he pays the Pope 4000*l*. The four above-mentioned electors are his hereditary officers, who have hereditary vicars under them. He can raise between 4 and 5000 men. His revenue amounts annually to above 50000*l*. besides the produce of sixteen large bailiwicks in Carinthia. The chapter which chooses the bishop, consisting of twenty capitular and fifteen domiciled canons, are all persons of quality. This country has but little commerce, and is wholly inhabited by Roman Catholics. It was formerly an earldom, but the Emperor Henry II. erected it into a bishopric, to be entirely dependent on the church, and gave it several other lands in Carinthia, together with the town of Abach (where he was born) near Ratibon.

BAMBERG, the capital of the above bishopric of the same name, a handsome, large, and populous city in the center of Germany, in Latin called Bamberga, Bahanberga, Bergium, and Baberabergium, the ancient Granicianon of Ptolemy. It is pleasantly situated, and watered by the rivers Rednitz and Pegnitz, which run through the town, and a little below join with the Mayne. Though formerly free and imperial, and afterwards governed by its own counts, is now subject to its bishop. About the town are a few vineyards; but the soil is fruitful in corn, melon, fig, lemon, and orange, trees, and is called by some the Italy of Germany. Here are two palaces, the old and new. The former is in an island formed by the Pegnitz, with a tolerable garden; the latter, standing on an eminence, is a vast pile of free-stone, with handsome apartments. Eight miles off is the bishop's hunting-seat of Pommersfelden, reckoned one of the most charming fabrics in the empire. The way to it from the city is through a large forest of fir, abounding with deer, and a lake. The house is free-stone, built in form of a square, with 4 large towers, one at each corner. All round the grand square court is a portico, whose walls are garnished at equal distances with 50 or 60 heads of deers of an extraordinary size, with inscriptions under each when and by whom killed. There is also the figure of a wild boar killed some years ago, which weighed between 4 and 500 weight. There is in the new palace a most magnificent staircase, perhaps one of the best contrived in Europe. The entry, supported by several colonnades, leads into a saloon which serves as a passage to the garden, and is in form of a grotto adorned with fountains, columns, and statues of marble. The cieling is painted, as well as the skylight of the staircase, and the arches of the principal apartments, which are all laid out with great choice, judgment, and splendour. The stables, that answer exactly to the castle, which they front, are built in form of a half-moon, with a pavilion in the middle, from both sides of which one sees all the horses. The mangers are of marble, in the form of shells; and the racks of iron, neatly wrought in form of a scuttle-basket. The saloon between the two stables is painted in fresco, and looks one way to the court and the other to the riding-house. The cathedral, dedicated to St. George, is a vast edifice, quite Gothic; has a lofty steeple with 4 noble spires like those at Wurtzburg, of very bold work, open at the top, and supported by tall pillars, which appear very light and easy. The treasury of this church is full of very great and costly curiosities, particularly the imperial crown of Henry II. consisting of 6 plates of gold adorned with precious stones; and another of his empress, of 2 circles of gold richly set with pearls and jewels. Her imperial mantle is decorated with such a large border of pearls that it is a good load for a porter. Two statues of the said emperor and empress, and a third of the virgin Mary, each of solid silver and 5 feet high, the emperor Henry's real head in a globe, which he holds in his right hand. A statue of St. George on horseback, combating the dragon, of silver gilt, 7 feet high. A vast shrine for relics, enriched with precious stones: and an adoration by the wise men, of mother-of-pearl. Two very fine vases of porphyry. A portative altar of massy gold, 5 or 6 feet high, enriched with several histories from the book of Genesis, all in onyx. A large chalice of massy gold, loaded with medals of gold and silver, and knots of ribands, which are vows paid to a nail grafted to a little pillar of gold, pretended pretended to be one of those with which Christ was fastened to the cross. A fine crucifix of rock crystal, adorned all round with a border of gold, and set with rubies and emeralds; the Christ being solid gold. A little tabernacle of gold, in which is preserved the aforesaid emperor's left jaw; it having a sapphire enchased on the top as big as a pigeon's egg. A large and heavy cross of gold, a foot and a half long; and another larger of silver gilt, stuffed with most precious relics. Yet one of the rarest curiosities is a folio MS. of the 4 gospels in Latin, on fine vellum, in a neat Roman character, with some Gothic letters interspersed, and the most beautiful miniatures that are to be seen. The binding is wood, covered with curious sculptures in ivory, of our Saviour's passion, and bordered with a gold edging, on which are the heads of our Lord and his apostles, as are those of the four evangelists at the four corners. The whole is enamelled, and the intervals between the figures embellished with pearls and precious stones. There are other MS. relics and curiosities; indeed so many that we think proper to omit them all, as scarce knowing which to prefer to fill up the little more room we could afford here. The Dominicans, Augustines, and Benedictines have their several churches, &c. A university was founded here in 1653, by Melchior Otto, one of its bishops. There are several public fountains in the town, but no fortifications more than its wall; so that in time of war the bishop resides, and has commonly a very strong garrison at Forcheim. Lat. 49, 56. Long. 11, 19.

BAMBERG, a town of Bohemia, on the frontiers of Moravia, near the river Orlitz, about six leagues from Glatz.

BAMBLE, priory of, in the shire of Brådsburg, and diocese of Christiania, in Norway. This, together with Lower Tillemarken, has twenty-two churches under its jurisdiction.

BAMBUCK, a country of Africa, of which the following account is given by the Abbe Reynal, on the credit of a modern traveller whom he does not name. "In the interior parts of Africa, under the 12th or 13th degree of north latitude, there is, says a modern traveller, a pretty large country, known by the name of Bambuck. It is not subject to a particular king, but governed by village lords, called farims. These hereditary and independent chiefs are all obliged to unite for the defence of the state, when it is either attacked as a community, or only in one of its branches.

"The territory of this aristocratical state is dry and barren. It produces neither maize, rice, nor millet. The insupportable heat it is subject to, proceeds in part from its being surrounded by high mountains, which prevent the wind from refreshing the air. The climate is as unwholesome as it is disagreeable; vapours, which continually issue from the bowels of a soil replete with minerals, render this country unfit to live in, especially to strangers.

"It is gold that hath made this miserable country an object worthy of notice: gold, which in the eyes of the covetous man seems to compensate for all the evils of nature, though in reality it increases them all. This metal is so common in this country, that it is found almost indiscriminately every where. To obtain it, sometimes it is sufficient to scrape the surface of the earth, which is clayish, light, and mixed with sand. When the mine is very rich, it is dug only to the depth of a few feet, and never deeper; though it has been observed, that the lower it was dug, the more gold the soil afforded. The miners are too indolent to pursue a toil which constantly becomes more tedious, and too ignorant to perceive the inconveniences it would be attended with. Their negligence and their folly are in this instance so extraordinary, that in washing the gold, in order to separate it from the earth, they only preserve the larger pieces: the light parts pass away with the water, which flows down an inclined plain.

"The inhabitants of Bambuck do not work these mines at all times, nor are they at liberty to do it when they please. They are obliged to wait till private or public wants determine the farims to grant this permission. When it is proclaimed, all who are able to avail themselves of this advantage meet at the appointed place. When their work is finished a division is made. Half of the gold goes to the lord, and the remainder is equally distributed among the labourers. Those who want gold at any other time than that of the general digging, search for it in the beds of the rivers, where it is very common."

BAMBROUGH, a place of Northumberland; where formerly was a famous castle, now in ruins.

BAMF, (Shire of,) in the middle division of Scotland, or north of the frith of Forth. It comprehends that part of Buchan, which lies N. of the river Ugie, the countries of Strathdoern, Boyne, Enzie or Eenie, Balvenie, and Strathyla. It was a part of the ancient Caledonia, and in the diocese of Murray, when under episcopacy. On the S. it is divided from that part of Buchan which belongs to Aberdeenshire, by the same river or water of Ugie; on the E. it has the water of Doern and the German ocean; on the W. the water of Spey and Elginshire, on the S. W. the braes of Badenoch and Braemar, and on the N. the Murray-frith. Its dimensions are variously given: but, according to Templeman's Survey, its length from E. to W. is 50 miles, and greatest breadth 18, containing 560 square miles. The climate and soil of Bamf-shire are much the same as in Aberdeenshire. The part called Buchan is watered by several rivers and small streams. It is divided into corn-fields and little hills; and no tract in the whole kingdom is so free from
